on the pinnacles of the mountains, where they were built under the idea that they would for ever remain secure against the efforts of honest men. But there grew up commercial communities in their vicinity, whose power at length was able to cope with the robbers of the mountains. (Cheers.) They fought in army that struggle which we fight otherwise, because it is best, and they succeeded, as we shall succeed, in bringing their enemies to terms. I wish not for the same terms, for they stopped not short of the ruin of their opponents. The remains of their strongholds tell us that their end was destruction. I wish not the ruin of any, but we must have a cessation of that pride which makes men say they will persist in living on the ruin of honest industry, on the destruction of your wealth and mine. (Cheers.) Is not my wealth such as I have implicated with yours, though I weave not neither do I spin? (Cheers.) There have been those before me—those who collected by their exertions that which I now enjoy, as their successor—and I hope you do not disapprove of that dispensation of Providence, which has left to a man’s son the working out of the good intentions of his his father, which I, as far as in me lay, have completed or carried forward. I now partake with you your triumph—the world’s triumph—and I would impress upon you the importance of not yielding at this most critical of all moments. You are going to win. (Cheers.) No horse ever broke down when so near the goal as you. (Cheers.) Three strides more, and you go in by a length. (Cheers.) I do think that in the recent movement throughout the country the Ministers have seen such reasons for pitching their proposal to the proper length as they will not be able to resist. I give them credit for intelligence as men who have passed their lives in the study of human affairs: and I believe they never knew an instance of a people showing such signs of determination as are here manifested, where the popular success was not secured. There is another secret. They are afraid of popular success afterward. They have found out that if they make this agitation go further than wise men wish, it may go further than any men, whether wise or not, can stop. (Cheers.) If they have the good sense of those who are born in this sagacious county they will remember—“Better to stop timely than go further and fare worse.” We are all united now. None of those cries which formerly produced division are heard in our now peaceful meetings. The rich and the poor lean together as they ought, and I hope always will, feeling that the true interest of each is the interest of the other. It is clear to the poor man that without capital he cannot carry his industry to a successful point; while it is clear to the rich, that without the labour of the poor, his wealth must be useless. If, then, the poor man thinks he has not a reasonable share in the management of affairs, hear him kindly, attend to him as a friend. (Hear, hear.) Let him not find you opposed without a consideration of his reasons. Put yourselves in his place, (loud cheers,) and ask whether, if you were he, and he were you, you might not find the means to come to some terms of reconciliation. Put away from you those dreams of danger which have troubled the heads of well-meaning persons among us. Having spoken of public affairs, I will now refer to the private reasons which make me rejoice to have been made the organ of giving the toast. Am I not sprung from the industry of your country? If I am here, is it not because those before me made me what I am? May I not speak of those most immediate instructors and models of every man—his parents? May I not speak of a great man, born in this town, an honour to learning and to his country; the ablest man, with whom, in the course of a long and somewhat active life, I was ever intimate? I mean Dr. Milner, late dean of Carlisle, born in a part of Leeds not very aristocratic, called Mudgegate. To that able man, I am proud to say, I owe whatever may have enabled me to be of any service. And, if ever I have shown any man the difference between right and wrong, true and false, to his labour it is due. (Cheers.) But there are other reasons. Did I not, one fine morning—and perhaps you will not thank me for it—carry off the pick of your county? (Laughter and cheering.) That it was a long time ago, you may be assured, from the fact that one of the fruits of that day’s adventure is now a heavy dragoon, joining his regiment in Ireland. Yet still that connection forms a bond between us which a man may not easily forget, for such things do not occur very often in one’s lifetime. Doubt not, then, that I am thoroughly engaged in your interests. I rejoice to see the victory which commercial men are on the point of obtaining, because I think they will use it better than those which preceded it. Do not rest with any half-victory, or one that is not to be followed up hereafter. What you have gained you must keep. Look to your children, and see that you make of them men able to hold their own; and women to bring up those who are worthy assistants in such a work. There is a great revolution taking place. Power is passing into hands which had it not before. Wiser men I trust, better men I feel certain, are now arriving at the direction of the power which a free constitution has given to this country. You are giving a remarkable proof of this. Go on and secure for Yorkshire in this contest the place which it has held in former national contests, and I trust ever will hold whenever any honest purpose is to be gained, and a dishonest one defeated. I conclude by requesting you to drink the health of the Mayor. (Cheers.)

The health of the Mayor was drunk with three times three cheers. His worship then acknowledged the toast and the meeting broke up at half-past ten.

REQUISITION FROM THE ELECTORS OF BRADFORD TO COL. THOMPSON.—The number of signatures to the requisition to Mr. Busfield and Colonel Thompson exceeds 750

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETING IN DROGHEDA.—The Drogheda Argus contains the following:—“The inhabitants of Drogheda are about to give a most important demonstration of their opinions, relative to the unnatural tax upon food. A requisition bearing the signature of his grace the Catholic Primate of Ireland, all the Catholic clergy of the parish, nearly all the members of the corporation, besides merchants, traders, and mechanics of the town, has been presented to Patrick Boylan, Esq., our mayor, praying him to convene a public meeting, on the earliest day possible, for the purpose of petitioning Parliament for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. We believe every member of the corporation would have signed the requisition if there had been time to call on the few whose names are not appended, before the document was presented to the mayor. His worship has fixed on Monday, the 19th instant, as the day upon which the meeting is to be held.”

Mr. Moore addressed a meeting at Queen’s Square Assembly Rooms, Theobald’s Road, on Friday evening. There, as everywhere, the Wiltshire Labourers’ meeting at Gouacres excited the deepest sympathy and interest.

THE WEEKLY CHRONICLE.—

The Proprietors and Editors of this Paper are desirous, on the eve of the MEETING OF A PARLIAMENT.

So important to the Principles of FREE TRADE, To call the attention of their Subscribers and of the Public to the claims of the WEEKLY CHRONICLE as the advocate of an enlightened policy, on all questions which relate to our industrial economy, and to the political progress and social happiness of the People.

The Weekly Chronicle has, from the period at which it came into the hands of its present Proprietors and Conductors, faithfully and firmly supported these principles—seeking at once to carry them out without violence or personal rancour, and to establish itself in the respect, not only of its readers, but even of its political antagonists, by a strict regard for truth and fair play, on which grounds alone, as its Editors feel confident, can any well-intending party be adequately and successfully supported.

As a Newspaper, the Weekly Chronicle will be found to contain a larger quantity of carefully compiled and well-digested reading matter than any of its contemporaries, and it has ever given, and will continue to give, the fullest digests of the proceedings in Parliament, consistent with its limits, which are of the largest size recognised by law.

The importance of this in the coming session must be evident: whilst in early intelligence of political movements, the Weekly Chronicle will maintain its lead, possessing, as it does, peculiar and exclusive sources of information, which its entire independence from personal influence and party trammels, enable it to give without mystification or reserve.

One of the features of the Weekly Chronicle are the popular Letters of principally devoted to questions of Free Trade and Industrial Economy, and of which a Third Series were commenced with, and will be continued from week to week throughout, the present year.

Sold by all News-men in Town and Country, price 6d.; or sent by post (if prepaid), at 6s. 6d. per quarter, 12s. the half year, and 25s. per annum.

Office, 337, Strand, London.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

DIRECTORS.
A. W. Poulton, Esq., 67, Fleet-street.
George Thompson, Esq., 6, Waterloo place.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Highbury-terrace.
Wm. Laver, Esq., 6, Park-street, Islington.
Josh. Ivimey, Esq., 26, Chancery-lane.
Wm. Wilson, Esq., 122, Long lane, Bermondsey.
R. G. Welford, Esq., barrister at-law, 6, Chancery-lane.
Sidney Smith, Esq., East Temple Chambers.
Richard Taylor, Esq., F.R.S., Red Lion-court.
Dr. James Carile, Hackney.
John Gadsby, Esq., Boueverie-street, Fleet-street.
A. L. Saul, Esq., 67, Fleet-street.
H. Hull, Esq., Uxbridge.
John Burnett, Esq., Covent Garden.
Frederick Farrand, Esq., Priory Villa, Peckham.

In consequence of earnest and repeated applications made to some of the gentlemen whose names appear in the above directory, an Investment Association is about to be formed.

Its object will be principally to afford to persons of limited means facilities for purchasing freeholds, &c.

In addition, it will serve all the purposes of a general Investment Society, and will be established on the most approved plan.

The Rules are being certified, and with the Prospectus will be published in a few days.

A Public Meeting, to be addressed by GEORGE THOMPSON, Esq., and DR. THOMAS PRICE, will be held before the termination of the present month, of which due notice will be given in the public journals.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, January 17, 1846.

The good cause makes rapid progress; the people of this great country feel that their destiny is in their own hands, and that these hands must execute their own work. There is no waiting for the doubtful determination of statesmen, or the timid movements of party. The aid of all who tender assistance is thankfully accepted; but the national cause is not entrusted to the discretion of any great leader, or the head of any great party. Lord John Russell has honourably taken his post in the van, but the direction of the march is independent of his guidance. Already, more than half of the Quarter of a Million Fund has been raised; Liverpool has nobly responded to the call of Manchester; the West Riding of Yorkshire emulates the exertions of South Lancashire. The manufacturing districts of Scotland have begun to put forth their energies, and the notes of zealous preparation are heard in the West of England. The crisis is one which admits of no delay. The towns must not wait to be invited to hold meetings; they must in Scotland exhibit the organisation of spontaneous action. A day now is of more importance than a week at any other period of our agitation. The fate of the country trembles in the balance, and the weight of public opinion must turn the scale.

In reply to the address of Mr. Gladstone, the Duke of Richmond has taken an opportunity of declaring his willingness to form an administration, should the protectionists drive Sir Robert Peel from power. He has wrought up his courage to act on his celebrated declaration, "We (the monopolists) made Sir Robert Peel Minister, and we can unmake him, should he play us false!" It was once declared an insoluble problem, to determine "how many acres make a wiseacre;" but the Duke of Richmond avows his readiness to attempt the solution, and sets himself forward as a specimen of land and wisdom combined in the due proportion. Let us, however, thank his grace for having uttered the only sentence to the purpose which has been spoken at any of the recent agricultural meetings. The question before the country has been marvellously simplified by his candid declaration; it is fairly in issue whether we shall have a Government of monopoly, or a Government of freedom; and the answer must come from the British nation.

Our double Number of this week contains the answer to this question given by the most important towns of the empire. Let their example be imitated by every town which has not yet announced its decision. Subscriptions to the League fund are unequivocal evidences of determination and perseverance. The purchase of freeholds in counties affords proof of the spirit to act, while it furnishes the means to execute. This is not a time when our friends should hold their forces in reserve; they must appear in the field equipped for active service.

Lord John Manners, in the very remarkable article which we quoted last week from the Oxford and Cambridge Review, and which we have reason to know expresses the sentiments of an influential though not a large section of the aristocracy, fairly states the absurdity of the monopolists in opposing the Ministers, unless they are ready to form a Cabinet of their own; and then, with more caustic irony than we should have supposed consistent with his amiable disposition, points out their incapacity to form an administration by examining the list to which their selection would be restricted. As the Duke of Richmond had the opportunity afforded him of reading this article in the proofs, previous to its publication, it may be that the reviewer has to answer for this sudden explosion of readiness for office in the "dukery."

But this declaration is not so unimportant as the preceding menaces of the lord of Goodwood; it has a distinct meaning and preposse purpose; it is intended as a warning to Sir Robert Peel, but it is really a threat to the nation. The duke clearly implies that the attempt to form a monopoly ministry will be made. It is our business to show that such an attempt is just as hopeless as would be the effort to manufacture ropes from the sands on the sea shore. If the League meditated any of the ulterior objects with which it is charged, nothing would be more favourable to its projects than the formation of a Richmond ministry. But too much would be risked by such an experiment, and it will not be hazarded in the teeth of a strong expression of public opinion.

Our columns record magnificent demonstrations of the resolute spirit which animates Free Traders in different parts of the country; the same spirit exists, as we know, in many localities where it has not been so significantly manifested. We exhort the inhabitants of such towns to lose no time in following the bright examples before them. Victory indeed is certain, but the interests of the country require that the struggle should not be protracted. Let us then at once display such a force in the field as will convince our adversaries that resistance is useless.

MARKETS.

CORN MARKET.

MONDAY, JAN. 12.—The quantities of Wheat, Barley, and Oats arrived up to Friday are not large, and to this day's market there is only a moderate addition of Wheat and Barley and trifling of Oats. The Wheat trade is without activity, and 2s lower than last Monday; there were a good many samples unsold at the close of market. Bonded Wheat is not inquired for. There is a limited sale for Barley, and last week's prices are barely maintained. We have a dull trade for Oats, and though the supplies are short, it is difficult to obtain better prices than this day week; there is a freer sale than on that day, and in some instances rather more money is paid, but this is only to a limited extent. New Beans and Peas are each a trifle lower.

S. H. LUCAS.

BRITISH.		Per Imperial Quarter.
Wheat, Essex,	Red 50 to 60	White 56 to 68
Kent, & Suffolk	49 58	56 64
Lincolnshire & Yorkshire	47 54	54 62
Scotch
Oats, Lincolnshire & Yorkshire Feed	23 25
Ditto	Ditto ..	Polands ..	New 24 26
Scotch Feed	25 26	Potato ..	28 29
Limerick	23 25
Ditto	Fine New 26 28	Old Fine ..	none
Cork	21 23
Waterford, Youghal, & Cork Black	22 24
Sligo	21 23
Galway	32 34
Barley	32 34
Beans, Mazagan	New 32 34	Old 40 44
Harrow	38 42
Small	40 44
Peas, White	Boilers ..	54 56
Grey	36 40	Maple ..	38 40
Flour, Town-made	per sack of 280 lbs.	45 67
Norfolk and Suffolk	43 46

FOREIGN.		FREE. IN BOND.
		Per Imperial Quarter.
Wheat, Dantzic, high mixed	58 to 66	46 52
Rostock	56 60	44 48
Stettin	54 60	43 46
Hamburg	52 57	42 45
Odessa	46 50	40 42
Odessa Polish	50 56	40 43
Russian	soft ..	48 57
Ditto	hard ..	40 55
Spanish
Ditto	White
Australian	60 69
Barley, Grinding	27 30
Distilling	30 32
Oats, Archange	25 26	22 26
Danish	25 26	22 26
Swedish	24 25	21 22
Stralsund
Dutch Feed	23 29	19 20

Brew	25 28 23 25
Polands	28 29 25 26
Beans, Egyptian	40 41 39 40
Peas, White	54
Ditto Boilers	none
Flour, Canada, fresh, per barrel of 196 lbs.	36 37
United States	35 36
Dantzic
Australian, per sack of 280 lbs.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from Jan. 5 to Jan. 10, 1846, both days inclusive.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Beans.	Peas.
English	6449	11666	3902	1166	1375
Scotch	200	937	1680
Irish	2970
Foreign	8994	3025	2603	203	1857

Flour, 8648 sacks; 5474 barrels.

Account of CORN, &c., arrived in the Port of London, from the 12th of January to the 16th of January, both inclusive.

	English.	Irish.	Foreign.
Wheat	3810	..	6920
Barley	4990
Oats	3650	..	9440

Flour, 5020 sacks.

LONDON AVERAGES for the Week ending Jan. 13, 1846.
Qrs.	Price.	Qrs.	Price.
Wheat	4628 63s. 4d.	Rye	5 38s. 0d.
Barley	6399 32s. 10d.	Beans	944 37s. 2d.
Oats	19002 23s. 9d.	Peas	966 43s. 4d.

20th	"57	11.32	7.23	4.34	5.39	6.42	5
27th	"55	4.32	5.23	0.32	8.38	6.30	10
3d	Jan.55	1.31	11.22	3.33	6.37	9.39	1
10th	Jan.56	3.31	10.21	9.33	11.36	8.38	11

Aggregate Average of the Six Weeks. Wheat, 57s. 2d.; Barley, 32s. 5d.; Oats, 23s. 3d.; Rye, 24s. 4d.; Beans, 39s. 1d.; Peas, 41s. 3d.

Duty. Wheat, 15s. 0d.; Barley, 6s. 0d.; Oats, 5s. 0d.; Rye 8s. 6d.; Beans, 3s. 6d.; Peas, 1s. 6d.

Stock of Corn in Bond, Dec. 5, 1845.

	Wheat.	Barley.	Oats.	Rye.	Beans.	Peas.	Flour.
In London, 322469	8421	63791	603	950	57362
Unit. King. 794252	67574	108596	405457

THE LONDON GAZETTE.

FRIDAY, JAN. 9.

CROWN OFFICE, JAN. 9.

MEMBER RETURNED TO SERVE IN THIS PRESENT PARLIAMENT.

County of Hertford—Thomas Plumer Halsey, of the Hall, Great Berkhamstead, Esq., in the room of the Hon. James Walter Grimston, commonly called Viscount Grimston, now Earl of Verulam, called up to House of Lords.

BANKRUPTS.

S. M. CROSS, Greenwich, corn merchant. [Messrs. Laurence and Plews, Bucklersbury.

W. URLWIN, Watford, fellmonger. [Mr. Sanger, Essex Court, Temple.

J. MARTIN, Wood Street, Cheapside, fringe manufacturer. [Mr. Reed, Friday Street.

M. BUTTERFIELD, and T. A. BUTTERFIELD, Royston, linendrapers. [Messrs. Laurence and Plews, Bucklersbury.

G. OSBORN, Exeter, whipmaker. [Messrs. Keddie and Co. Lime Street.

H. J. ANDREWS, Plymouth, apothecary. [Messrs. Clowes and Co., Temple.

J. PICKLES, Preston, cotton spinner. [Messrs. Gregory and Co., Bedford Row.

R. PICKLES, Barnsley, linen manufacturer. [Messrs. Jones and Co., Bedford Row.

W. WILKS, Leeds, builder. [Messrs. Wiglesworth and Co., Gray's Inn.

WM. BROADBENT, Delch, Yorkshire, cloth merchant. [Messrs. Sudlow and Co., Chancery Lane.

D. STANTON, Bristol, grocer. [Messrs. Clark and Co., Lincoln's Inn Fields.

T. WREN, Preston, share broker. [Messrs. Gregory and Co., Bedford Row.

R. GASCOYNE, Little Bytham, Lincolnshire, cattle dealer. [Mr. Harding, Birmingham.

T. B. DAFT, Birmingham, button maker. [Mr. Chaplin, Gray's Inn.

DIVIDENDS.

Jan. 30, J. Baker, Romsey, Hants, grocer—S. Smith, Garboldisham, Norfolk, grocer—Jan. 31, G. F. Cobham and W. B. Wright, Camberwell and Gravesend, builders—C. Carter, Saddington, Leicestershire, miller—Feb. 3, T. Sims, Whitechapel Road, victualler—J. Levett, Soham, Cambridgeshire, carpenter—Feb. 4, T. Todd, Manchester, dealer in cotton goods.

CERTIFICATES.

Jan. 30, J. Gadd, Camden Town, baker—B. Wade, Strand, tailor—E. Turner, Princes Street, Soho, chemist—Feb. 2, J. Russell, Ludlow, scrivener—Feb. 3, J. C. Kendall, Islington, tavern keeper—J. Hamsher, Hoxton, glove manufacturer—T. Bailey, Bristol, builder—W. H. Turnham, Leicester, innkeeper—R. Shanklin, Salford, druggist—T. D. Taylor, Brook Street, Holborn, oilman.

TUESDAY, JAN. 13.

BANKRUPTS.

C. BARTLETT, Southampton, merchant. [Messrs. Tilman and Squance, Coleman Street.

H. MUGGERIDGE, St. John Street, Smithfield, wire drawer. [Mr. Low, Chancery Lane.

M. GUY and H. SMITH, Farringdon Street, linendrapers. [Messrs. Reed and Langford, Friday Street.

J. STEVENS, Clement's Inn, builder. [Mr. Ashurst, Cheapside.

M. MACLEAN, Basinghall Street, cloth factor. [Messrs. Vallance and Beloe, Old Jewry Chambers.

T. EDWARDS, Montgomeryshire, surgeon. [Messrs. Dean and Sons, Essex Street, Strand.

J. REID, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, ship broker. [Mr. Plumptre, Temple.

H. LEVY, Plymouth, tobacconist. [Messrs. Surr and Gribble, Lombard Street.

J. G. GORE, Cheltenham, innkeeper. [Mr. Hill, Cheltenham.

T. W. PIERCE and G. HOMAN, Manchester, merchants. [Mr. Abbott, Bedford Square.

J. WILKINSON, Haslingden, Lancashire, builder. [Messrs. Humphreys and Co., Chancery Lane.

T. WILKERS, Burton-upon-Trent, Staffordshire, brewer. [Messrs. Everet and Co., Hatton Garden.

DIVIDENDS.

Jan. 30, J. Mott, Loughborough, wine merchant—Feb. W. H. Sheldrake, Ipswich, bootmaker—Feb. 5, J. Chamberlain, Liason Grove North, glass merchant—J. W. Collyer, Newgate Street, victualler—B. B. Cross, Woodstock, glover—E. Meredith, Liverpool, linendraper—J. Adamson, Stockport, grocer—W. Doford, Bishopwearmouth, shipbuilder—Feb. 6, G. Hardy, St. Ives, innkeeper—Feb. 10, J. Breakenridge, Liverpool, tailor—J. B. Bucklee, Kidderminster, mercer.

Printed at the Whitefriars Printing-office, Boueverie-street, in the precinct of Whitefriars, in the City of London, by JOHN GADSBY, printer, of Number 7, Ridgmount-place, Hampstead-road, in the County of Middlesex, and also of Number 4, Fairfield-place, Chesham-hill-road, in the parish of Manchester, in the county of Lancashire, and published at Number 67, Fleet-street, in the parish of St. Dunstan-in-the-West, in the city of London, by ABRAHAM WALTER PAULSON, of Number 67, Fleet-street, aforesaid—Saturday, January 17, 1846.

For remainder of News see SUPPLEMENT.

SUPPLEMENT TO THE LEAGUE.

No. 121.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1846.

[GRATIS.

FREE TRADE MEETINGS.

MEETING OF THE LEAGUE AT COVENT GARDEN.

The second of the resumed aggregate meetings of the League was held at Covent Garden Theatre on Wednesday evening last. G. Wilson, Esq., in the chair. The speakers announced were the Hon. C. P. Villiers, Esq., M.P., T. M. Gibson, Esq., M.P., and T. Gisborne, Esq., M.P.; but owing to the illness of the latter gentleman his place was filled by Robt. R. Moore, Esq. In addition to the above gentlemen, the meeting was addressed by Mr. Houghton, of Berkshire, who has a great extent of land under his charge upon his own account, and is steward to some of the first noblemen and greatest landowners of the day, and who, it will be recollected, made a public declaration last year of his conversion to Free Trade principles. Notwithstanding the numerous district meetings which have been held for some time past in and about the metropolis, the theatre was completely filled in every part; the mere overflow would in all probability have more than sufficed to fill Willis's Rooms twice over, while the audience within the theatre would have furnished at least fifty of those "great protection demonstrations" with which the columns of the London journals are now daily filled. The Chairman of the Council, accompanied by the speakers, entered the platform at seven o'clock, and their appearance was the signal for great applause. The spirit evinced by the meeting was evidently that which pervades the great bulk of the population at the present moment—a determination to rest satisfied with nothing short of abolition, entire abolition, and nothing but abolition. Among the distinguished personages present, were the Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P., T. M. Gibson, Esq., M.P., J. Hume, Esq., M.P., J. Collett, Esq., M.P.; Sir W. Baynes, Bart., G. Thompson, Esq., John Houghton, Esq., Broom Hall; Robt. Mather, Esq., Liverpool; Major-General Briggs, Dr. Cooke Taylor, W. A. Wilkinson, Esq., P. A. Taylor, Esq., H. Ashurst, Esq., Norman Wilkinson, Esq., Mr. Thos. Hodgkin, Mr. David Dowar, Mr. Thorne, Mr. Rawlins, Mr. J. B. Evans, Mr. Edwd. Lucas, Mr. Francis Place, Mr. Maurice Power, Mr. Edward Brownley, Mr. Grant, Mr. Robt. R. Moore, Mr. W. B. Wedgwood, New York; Mr. John Poulter, Mr. H. Brittain, Walthamstow; Mr. C. Constable, Surrey; Mr. Arthur Pattison, Mr. J. C. Hutchinson, U.S.; Mr. T. S. Pridoux, Mr. T. Allendine, Mr. Richard Ware Cole, Mr. Frank Eastwood, &c. &c.

The CHAIRMAN then came forward, amid loud cheers. Silence having been obtained, he spoke as follows:—Ladies and Gentlemen, I am sure it is a subject of great congratulation to find that, after an uphill fight of seven years, this subject loses none of its wonted interest. I take it for granted that there are few at least, at the present time, so benighted as to think it requisite to ask of 6000 people met in Covent Garden Theatre, in the 8th year of the League's campaign, what is the precise and definite object of that great organization of which this vast meeting is but a small fractional part. (Cheers.) Seven years have brought great and sweeping changes with them; many a good old fallacy has been gathered to its fathers, and many a good Free Trader, who commenced with us this agitation, has been laid in the silent grave. (Hear.) But here we are. Other opinions may change. Within that time cabinets have been formed and re-constructed, power has been transferred from one administration to another; but the principles of the League have undergone no change. (Cheers.) Nothing has stopped us; we are here, in the beginning of the year 1846, pledged to the same principles with which we commenced the campaign in 1838—the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws (Loud cheers.) It is in vain to deny that this is a most thrilling and interesting period of this agitation. All parties are agreed that the crisis of protection is now approaching; the intermediate ground has altogether been abandoned; the fixed duty party are gone for ever; and it now becomes every man fairly to consider whether he will make his election to stand or fall with that great party who seek the total abolition of the Corn Laws, or with that narrowing and diminishing section who are for restriction and scarcity. Next week Sir Robert Peel will explain to Parliament the course which it shall please him to adopt. I take it for granted he is already better acquainted than any man in the kingdom with the threatened scarcity of provisions, more especially in Ireland. (Hear, hear.) It has been shown over and over again, that the rate of mortality increases and diminishes with the price of provisions, and a fearful responsibility rests upon that man who at the present time shall hesitate as to the course which shall be pursued. (Cheers.) The first subject which, as you aware, we have in hand, is the qualification movement. It may be asked, what can the making of votes, which can only be used in October, have to do with the settlement of a question which may be finally disposed of in February, March, or April? I will tell you. If you wish to have that question fairly settled in February, March, or April, it will be because your rulers know the votes are in store for October (cheers); and to be in store—to have a great magazine of them prepared for October, the qualification must be acquired before the 31st of January next. Now what has been the success which has attended this qualification movement? The Council would incur a fearful responsibility if it invited their best friends to expend, as they are doing this year, some half a million of money in the purchase of qualifications, unless the Council had given to the subject its best consideration before advising such a course. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) It is well known that last year we dealt with registers containing 144,000 votes, or one third of the whole county constituency of England, and upon that revision we had a clear gain of 16,446 votes in the aggregate. Now, I do not come here to tell you what seats have been won, or what gains have been made by that revision, but we will take from the mouths of the monopolists themselves, we will gather from the events which are now occurring, the proof of the extraordinary progress which the League has made in that direction. You all know South Lancashire, one of the greatest counties and most populous districts in England. At the last election, the monopolist beat the Free Trader; how does the case stand now? Why, Lord Francis Egerton—and here I will say, that if we selected a monopolist for our representative, a more agreeable man, one more desirable for a member than another, more amiable in all the relations of private life, cannot be found than Lord Francis Egerton—the member selected to move the address in the House of Commons by Sir Robert Peel—well, what says that noble lord? "I will fight no more. Look out for another candidate. I have had enough." (Cheers.) And, at the next election, our friends, Mr. Villiers and Mr. Brown, will walk over the course unopposed. (Cries of hear, hear, and cheers.) Then, there is South Cheshire, which has been represented by Mr. Tatton Egerton ever since the Reform Bill. He owns eleven or twelve miles of land; he can ride over an estate of that extent of land; and yet, adopting their phraseology in that part of the country, when describing a man, I will say this of Mr. Tatton Egerton, that they have not a man of equal pluck amongst them. Well, what says Mr. Tatton Egerton? "Look out for another man: I have fought a hard battle here: I have won the country. I have been returned at the head of the poll; but you must get somebody else now; I shall retire at the next election." (Cheers.) Look again to the West Riding of Yorkshire. (Loud cheers.) That great county, with its population of 1,000,000, its 32,000 votes on the register, and its 300 monopolist majority at the last election,—what is taking place in the West Riding? Lord Morpeth has been in the field a fortnight, inviting a contest, and not a single man can be found to fight the county. (Cheers.) These are a few of the results taken from them. We know of a great many others who are prepared to follow the example of these honourable members at the first convenient opportunity; and as assuredly as we have the slightest ground of excuse for continuing this agitation another year—as assuredly as they leave one single rag of protection existing to keep the League in existence—so assuredly will we give the signal to the men of Scotland to cross the borders and join hands with the men of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Durham, till they meet the men of Lancashire and Yorkshire, who again join hands, and pass on through Cheshire and Staffordshire, to Birmingham and the Midland Counties, until the men of Birmingham shall be enabled to join hands with the men of London, who will go out on all sides—purifying the counties, knocking down one member after another (laughter), or, if there be some refractory county left, such as Buckingham, why then we will crowd sail upon it from all quarters, and take it completely out of the possession of the Duke. I next come to speak of the Great League Fund, the Quarter of a Million. It was agreed to in Manchester some months ago, and there are gentlemen whom I now see upon this platform who can tell you that the discussion in the Council-room did not take five minutes; and in a week after that a meeting was called in Manchester—such a meeting as I never saw before, or expect to see again, when, at the rate of 500l. per minute for two hours, 60,000l. was raised towards that League fund, which large amount has since been increased in that district to 77,000l. (Cheers.) Well, another meeting took place at Liverpool last week in furtherance of that fund. Our excellent friend, Mr. Brown, presided (cheers), heading the list with 1000l. (Loud cheering.) There is another gentleman now present from Liverpool, Mr. Mather, who followed him with another 1000l. (loud cheers); and they raised between 12,000l. and 13,000l. in that town. I have letters from all parts of the kingdom, stating that preparations are made, and great expectations formed of the ease with which this fund will be raised in different parts of the country. I received a letter this morning from our excellent friend, Mr. Baxter, at Dundee, at the other end of Scotland, where, at a meeting of 20 minutes' duration, 1600l. was raised for the League fund. To-night there is a public dinner of the delegates from the West Riding of Yorkshire, which is to be attended by Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright; and I have no doubt somewhere from 20,000l. to 25,000l. will be subscribed at that meeting. Now we will discard the small subscriptions altogether; we will take the more than 100,000l., which the meetings at Liverpool, Manchester, and Leeds, produced, in two counties; and we will challenge the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke of Richmond, and the Duke of Norfolk, (laughter and cries of "curry," and the whole of them, with all the squirearchy of England at their back, to call three meetings in any two counties they choose, and put down one half the sum in favour of that protection of which they are such strenuous advocates. (Cheers.) But this has not been all; these movements have never intercepted for one moment the general and ordinary operations of the League. Why, I had the curiosity to reckon how many meetings have taken place since the commencement of October last; and I find that our indefatigable and patriotic leader, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, our excellent friend Mr. Moore, and a few others, have attended 62 meetings in that time. (Cheers.) I find also that our esteemed friends in almost every town throughout the kingdom have held their meetings, either on the subject of opening the ports, the total repeal of the Corn Laws, or for both, amounting in number to somewhere between 100 and 120. We have heard of meetings on the other side—"great meetings." (Laughter.) I have had a little information respecting some of them. I know that at some of them not more than 60 or 70 persons attended—a decent committee meeting for a lady's charity, or something of that sort. (Laughter.) One of their speakers at Lincoln, the other day, said that a cat might be seen in any part of the room, it was so crowded; and yet the chairman said that it was the largest meeting of that society he had ever seen. But we will admit that they have lately displayed more than their wonted activity; we will admit that at some of the largest meetings—at Clichester, and one or two other places for instance—they have had perhaps a quarter of the number here present at their meetings; we will give them the benefit of the whole of it; and we will admit that with a good deal of abuse of the League, Sir Robert Peel, Lord J. Russell, Lord Morpeth; of men who did not come there, and men who did come, and did not please them when they came—(laughter)—and of others who did not advise them according to their own notions, they made up an interesting report. But what does it all prove? That there is still in existence—which nobody denied,—a number of men in this country, who will never yield until the Minister shall himself, or the people, decide that they shall be brought to book. (Cheers.) Let them meet, let them abuse the League as much as they like; let them threaten to turn that fabulous animal, the British lion, upon us as often as they like; we will catch him and bring him to Covent Garden Theatre. (Laughter.) Let them threaten, as they are doing, to meet us in the qualification movement. The League know well enough that they have exhausted themselves in that direction, whilst we were asleep—(hear); and whatever they do in future, we will beat them ten to one in that direction, in any county they may select. (Loud cheers.) But there has been another meeting, not called by the Protection Society, nor yet by the League; not presided over by his grace the Duke of Richmond; furnished with no speakers from Willis's rooms; but a meeting which, thanks to the Times, has been reported throughout the length and breadth of the land. (Loud cheers.) I refer to the meeting at Goatsacre (enthusiastic cheering; a voice—"Three cheers for the labourers." The call having been heartily responded to, the chairman proceeded). There, upon a winter's night, 1000 agricultural labourers met together—for what? To abuse the League! No. To support agricultural protection? No. But to ask the Government to look at their pale and haggard features; and as they were actuated by the feelings of humanity and justice, to open the ports and grant to these protected men Free Trade. (Cheers.) We will not put in the scale at all the preponderating influence of the meetings of the League over the protection meetings; we will take away all the meetings that have been held for League funds or qualification, or for any other movement connected with our operations, and we will put in evidence against them that single meeting at Goatsacre as an answer to the whole of the gatherings held under the auspices of the Protection Society of Old Bond Street; and when they can dispose of the opinions of the working men at that meeting, they may meet at 17, Old Bond Street, and issue a thousand addresses to Englishmen if they like, announcing that the agricultural labourers of this country are in favour of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, you will be addressed this evening by our excellent friend, Mr. Villiers (cheers), and by Sir Robert Peel. (Cheers.) Mr. Gisborne, I regret to say, is seriously indisposed in the Isle of Wight, but his place will be supplied by Mr. Moore (cheers); and our excellent friend Mr. Houghton, the largest farmer in the United Kingdom, is anxious to say a few words. (Cheers.) I have now, therefore, great pleasure in calling upon Mr. Villiers.

Mr. VILLIERS, upon advancing to the table, was greeted with most enthusiastic applause. The hon. gentleman addressed the meeting as follows:—Ladies and Gentlemen, I think we are come to that point in the progress of our cause when every person is anxious to know what prospect there is of our success, and what is going to be done. The last time we met in this theatre our spirits were much elated at the prospect which our cause then presented, owing to the position of political parties. Several events have occurred since that time extremely interesting to our cause. These have been viewed variously by politicians of different parties; but when we assemble in this theatre we profess to have nothing to do with party politics; persons of all creeds and opinions assemble together here; and we may, therefore, be excused in considering these events, as they bear upon our question alone. In that view, I venture to express an opinion that nothing has occurred since we last met at all calculated to discourage or weaken those hopes which we entertained upon that occasion. The moral of all that has occurred since that time seems to be that our good cause of Free Trade is in the ascendant, and that we are approaching, and our struggle is approaching, a speedy and successful issue. At our last meeting, Lord John Russell had received the commission of the Crown to form a Government, after having placed on record his identity of opinion with ourselves. (Cheers.) We have had the satisfaction to learn since that the colleagues whom he proposed to call to his assistance were entirely agreed in opinion with himself, and consequently with us. (Cheers.) And we have further reason to believe that if he had succeeded in forming a Government, he would have received the cordial support of Sir Robert Peel and such friends as he could influence. (Cheers.) We have also the satisfaction of knowing that he did not fail to complete his arrangements for forming that Government from any cause whatever connected with any difference of opinion upon our question. (Hear, hear.) And though it would have given the personal friends of Lord John Russell great satisfaction to have seen him in that post to which he was called, and which I believe he would have worthily filled, and which, I believe, notwithstanding what has been suggested by our friend, Punch, he would have had strength to maintain (a laugh); I do believe that the force which will now be presented in favour of our question in the House of Commons is greater than it would have been under any other circumstances. Sir R. Peel has returned to power; his dissentient colleagues have apparently returned to reason, and nothing has transpired which would make us believe that any of them have returned to their former opinions in favour of the Corn Laws; and though certainly it is difficult to confide in the course of any public man in this day, yet I cannot but find it difficult to believe that Sir Robt. Peel has returned to power for the purpose of convulsing this country with disappointment, and drawing upon himself the universal odium of the nation. (Cheers.) If his will is not wanting, he is in a position to advance this cause more successfully than he could before. Recalled to power, as a matter of necessity, he is at once relieved from all former party considerations. He has not only now all the patronage of Government at command, but he has that also of the Opposition, who are, for the first time that I have known them, united and decided, determined to extend to him earnest, cordial, and zealous support, if his measure is honest and complete (cheers); and equally determined, if he should fail or falter, to resort to any and every means by which they can procure that measure of justice for the people. (Cheers.) Under these circumstances I do feel sanguine of success. I cannot think that this year will pass without some satisfactory settlement of this question. I have almost faith in our rulers that they will not disregard the voice of common sense which is now so generally and unequivocally expressed in the country. The time is come when the question must be settled; but whatever they may choose to do, I think the period has arrived when all trifling with this question is past. There has always been a reality in it which time and circumstances were sure to aid; every thing has combined of late to show the real character of this enactment; and it now stands before this country stamped with the character of being a law against the food, the work, and the trade of the people. (Cheers.) We have now reached that point in our progress when it seems that no minister will undertake the administration of the country if he is to be held responsible for the continuance of this law. (Hear, hear, hear.) It was only the other day that we learned from the letter which Mr. Gladstone wrote to his constituents, that the party who are now pledging themselves in every portion of the country not to surrender one atom of the Corn Law, have been tested as to whether they will undertake the administration of the Government conditional on the continuance of the Corn Law. It seems by that letter that they have shrunk from the task. They wish the laws to be supported, in order that they may enjoy all the advantages, when it can be maintained quietly, and to escape all the risk when there is any danger in continuing it. (Hear.) I think if we look at their speeches, we shall see that it has been from no modesty or diffidence on their part that they have refused this offer, if it has been made to them; for in perusing their addresses to each other on the subject, they seem in the first place to claim superior integrity, a majority in both Houses of the Legislature, and seven-ninths of the population on their side. Now, it seems difficult to conceive—if they believe what they say, that they have this amount of public spirit, and they believed that this Corn Law was as necessary as they pretended—why they would not undertake to form a Government. It seemed, however, that they turned from this duty, and they content themselves now with exhausting the language in the most scurrilous abuse towards all those who are opposed to them, or who are in authority over them. But this brings us to a point to which it is well to draw the attention of the country—that we are now arrived at that period in the history of this monopoly when no man will undertake, and the strongest Ministry will not retain, the power of administering the Government of England, if he is to maintain also the responsibility of supporting this law. (Hear, hear.) That is the result of this measure after 30 years experience,—a 30 years experiment to impede the supply of food to 28 millions of people: and yet we are told we are not safe; that we are not yet out of danger;—that this party who are determining to uphold every part and every iota of this law, are yet so formidable that they may yet defeat any minister who may undertake the government for the purpose of abolishing it. I cannot conceive there can be much danger when I consider who the parties are, how they are managing the defence of the system, and what movements which are taking place in various directions in this country against them. We are told that they are about to follow closely in the steps of the League; that they are about to raise a large sum of money for the purpose of meeting them in everything they may attempt; that if the League should raise a quarter of a million, they are about to raise half a million. And we are informed, that in the opinion of Mr. Newdegate, the member for Warwickshire, that if it comes to the display of physical force, they can bring against the people who are for Free Trade, who are in favour of unrestricted commerce in this country, a force which we have no idea of at present. (Laughter.) I think there was something of this kind stated two years ago, when these Protection Societies first appeared; and though it is very seldom safe to prophecy, I remember that I then ventured to predict concerning them in this place, considering what their cause was, and knowing their advocates, that they would speedily disagree, and soon after disappear. It seems I was not very much out in my calculation, for I observe that Mr. Miles, at a meeting on Monday, said he was glad to see his friends again, because he had been asked in the summer what had become of the Central Protection Society. (Laughter.) I remember hearing the question asked, and answered by a member of that society—that they were doing nothing. (Loud laughter.) He was then asked what the local societies were about, and he said that they were under the direction of the Central Society. (Renewed laughter.) As to their disagreement, I think we have already had some specimen. It seems that even the dukes cannot agree—that if the Duke of Norfolk speaks, the Duke of Richmond is ready to sink into the earth, (laughter); and that I take to be very much the feeling of the whole peerage at some of the Duke of Richmond's proceedings. If one had to judge between the two, the Duke of Norfolk's nostrum is more innocent than the Duke of Richmond's. The Duke of Norfolk at this crisis only prescribes the labourers to burn their own insides; the Duke of Richmond recommends them to burn the Times newspaper. (Prolonged laughter.) But it appears to me that that logic is less innocent than the Duke of Norfolk's; for it seems to amount to this—that if they differ in opinion with any person, they then are to resort to fire to assert their views; a lesson which, I think, is very likely not to be forgotten by the labourers whom they instructed, and perhaps a hint which few had heard something of before. (Hear.) I have done what few persons probably have done besides, namely, looked through the speeches of these protection gentlemen—(laughter); and it seems to me that if a moiety of their half-million is to be devoted to the circulation of their speeches, the League ought to claim that as a contribution to their fund. I can conceive nothing more advantageous to our cause than the circulation, gratis, of the speeches of these protective gentlemen. In looking through them, I find that one half, at least, of all their speeches seem to contain a complete admission of the case and charge which we bring against them. Why, our case against this protection party is, that they maintain a law by which food is made difficult of access to the poor; that they diminish its quantity; and that the effect of the measure is to make that dear and scarce, which would otherwise be plentiful and abundant. In looking at their speeches, we find that that is what they are labouring to show. They say, "If the Corn Law is repealed, see how low the price of food would fall; and, if the trade were free, see in what abundance that food would come in." There are vicious calculations made, to show how much more wholesome and nutritious food might be introduced, if the Corn Law was repealed; and they pretend to an accuracy which they have not the slightest ground for, as to the great fall in prices if this Corn Law were repealed. Mr. Miles, at the meeting the day before yesterday, quoted a statement, which he considered to be authentic, to show what a prosperous trade would follow between this country and America. One can hardly really believe that people exist who are using these arguments not as the rest of mankind would, as the very strongest arguments for the adoption of that very measure by which they might be brought about; but in order to state something which is conclusive on them to uphold the law, to uphold the impediment by which the people should be precluded from the advantage. What a position it is for the gentry of this country to be actually associated together, to be arrayed for the great and noble purpose of preventing abundance, and preventing plenty of wholesome food coming into this country during the year! What a glorious attitude it is to assume, in face of the Sovereign of the country, who has just pronounced her grief, in answer to an address, that one great article of subsistence of her people has failed this year, and that she is ready to give her assent immediately to any measure of relief! (Loud cheers.) What a position that is for the gentry of the country, not only to be standing between the benevolence and good will of the Sovereign and the sufferings of the people, but betwixt that abundance which God has provided on the earth and the necessities of that portion of his creatures who dwell on this island! There they are pledging each other, arraying themselves together, subscribing their half million of money, and professing that they would succeed (ironical cheers)—all for what? Not to prevent the invasion of an enemy; not to avert misfortune coming upon the country; but simply to arrest the progress of the attempt to bring health and comfort—by bringing food, which is deficient, into this country! What a position it is for the aristocracy of a country, whose pride and power have been so much talked of in the world! Now declaring themselves as mere dealers in flesh, and fish, and other food, and invoking each other in the name of their order that they should stand firm to the prices which they fixed in 1841; and in order to cheer each other to their duty, the president quotes the line of the poet who has celebrated their constancy. How little idea the poor poet had that he was celebrating the constancy they were about to show! In the heat of his imagination he never supposed that the British aristocracy were in 1846 to prove their constancy to nothing but the sliding scale and scarcity, constancy in making food difficult of attainment to the poor, when the labourers are proclaiming to the country that for 40 years they have never been able to taste meat; that they know it by sight, but have never been able yet to afford the means of tasting it. (Hear.) That was the declaration made, which has not been disputed, by one of those unfortunate peasants at Goutacre. That is the condition of numbers in many parts of the country at this moment, where these great lords and gentry are about arraying themselves for the purpose of preventing that food coming into this country, by which these labourers might taste that which they have only seen these 40 years. Let them only be constant in this cause, and perhaps they may live to see another set of peasants arise, who will talk of bread as these peasants do of meat; they will know a loaf by sight, but the price will place it beyond their reach. I have a right to say that this is the effect of the course they pursue, because they never condescend to allude to any of those great considerations which we have so often brought under their attention—the effect of a scarcity of food in producing poverty among the people,—the means it affords for oppression, and all the ills which affect human life among the labouring classes. They have never disputed that the population of this country is increasing annually at a most enormous rate; they never pretend that any provision is made to meet the wants of that population; nor do they pretend that any provision is made to prevent those periods of deficiency which have sent thousands, and tens of thousands, to the jails, the grave, the streets, and the unions, simply through their poverty. (Loud cheers.) There is not one word mentioned at these protection meetings which would not equally apply if that famine had occurred which most men expected only three months since, and which most men are yet in doubt whether it may not occur in the middle of this year. They contend that they are entitled to make food dear; they claim simply to uphold the principle of protection: they do not look to the consequences; and if we were in the midst of a famine, there is not the slightest reason why they should not hold exactly the same language that they do at present. Wherever the potato has failed from disease in other countries (and the disease was known in other places before it arrived here), it has been found that the failure of the crop has been greater the next year than it was in the first, and greater the year after than it was in the second. Is it anything but wisdom to provide against a recurrence of this misfortune? And yet to what do these gentlemen pledge themselves all over the country? That not one iota of this protection shall be abated—that there shall not be any diminution of the obstructions now imposed to the introduction of food. No, they say, "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." We have had these famines before; and when they do occur, we call them "visitations of Heaven;" we offer up prayers in the churches that they may cease; and we request the archbishop to urge on their Christian flocks to be liberal in their charity to provide for the people. These things have occurred before; and as far as their humanity or their prudence goes, they will occur again: and it seems that if any Minister venture to provide for the responsibility of these misfortunes occurring, he is charged with cowardice and treachery. As far as I can collect from their addresses, they are charging the present Minister with cowardice in not having faced the famine. He ought not to have changed his opinion on the subject of this anti-food law because of the apprehension of famine. He ought to have met that boldly like a man; he should have made no provision for it. If there is anything to be drawn from their speeches, it amounts to this, that they charge him with cowardice and treachery. Treachery to whom? No treason to the State, no treason to the poor, no treachery to the great source of our power and greatness in this country; but treason to the hereditary proprietors of the soil. In an apology which was made for them, (I question whether it was by a very friendly hand) in the Morning Chronicle yesterday, the writer is very anxious we should be very careful in our allusion to them; that we should deal tenderly with them, because, he said, from the cradle to the grave these persons are placed under circumstances so unfavourable to the development of their minds (laughter), to the knowledge of men and to the management of their own affairs, that they may be as well excused if they commit great blunders in the management of the affairs of the country. (Renewed laughter.) A great consolation to those who live under their rule, and who are governed by them! (Cheers.) But I think that if this is their condition, we might teach them to be a little more modest in their mode of dealing with other men. They charge the present Minister with treachery; they say they gave him his present position; they seem to imply that he wears their livery still, and that he has no business to engage in another service. This claim of theirs to name the ministry of the country seems to me something very like an insult and offence to the whole nation. (Hear, hear.) How is it that they have acquired this power? They tell you by the county representatives; they say they have the counties in their hands—how have they got them in their hands? Lord Stanley has told us: he says that a few families meet previously to the return of a member, and then decide which of the members or retainers of their family shall represent the county. I do not think it is very wonderful, under those circumstances, that we see so much anger and indignation at what has been recommended by the League,—that their friends should seek to appropriate some of the property in this country to give them the privilege of having a voice in the representation. They call that "oppression," "tyranny," and "uncalled for innovation." (Hear, hear, and cheers.) It appears to me that if one ground can be urged stronger than another, for every friend of Free Trade, for every advocate of liberty, for every hater of tyranny and oppression, coming forward to invest his property in that legitimate and constitutional manner, it is this arrogant assumption, first, to name the members for the counties, and then the ministers of the State. (Cheers.) I remember, a short time after Parliament met, after the general election, the most arrogant assumption was made by some of these magnates with respect to the present Minister. They said they had made him, and they would unmake him, if he did not do their bidding; that they had given him his place, and they had bound him by a bargain that he should attend exclusively to their interests. Well, I must say, for the credit of the people who are yet disposed to expect some good from his Ministry, believing he understands the interests of the country, and has shown some inclination to support them—I must say he did at the time repudiate with proper spirit any such obligation to them, or any such inclination to do the service. And I would here quote his words, to show that he entered into an obligation then not to serve this sordid section of the community, but to do his duty by the nation at large. On some independent member calling upon him to say whether a statement was founded in fact which had been made in some place, to the effect that he had bound himself in this manner to them to do their bidding, he replied:

"It is my intention to act upon a sense of public duty—to propose those measures alone which my conviction of what is requisite for the public make me think desirable. It is right there should be an understanding as to this. What can be my inducement to take office and make the sacrifices the acceptance of it enjoins? I want to serve my country; I want to acquire an honourable fame. Would I go through the labour which is daily imposed on me if I could not claim for myself the liberty of promoting those measures which I believe to be conducive to the public weal. (Loud and continued cheering.) I will claim that liberty and propose those measures; and I will assure this House, and the country, that no consideration of political support will induce me to fill such an office as that which I fill by a servile tenure, and nothing would compel me to be the instrument of carrying other men's opinions into effect. It is not valuable from patronage or distinction; it is only worthy of my holding for an hour on account of the opportunity it gives me of serving my country; and the moment I feel convinced the power of doing that is denied to me, I tell every man in the country he has conferred no obligation on me, (hear, hear,) but free as the wind, I reserve to myself the power of retiring from the discharge of those duties which no longer could be filled with satisfaction to myself or advantage to my country." (Loud cheers.) (A gentleman in the boxes here called for "three cheers for Peel." Several voices replied, "Wait till the next meeting.") I think that precaution is very proper. (Cheers.) I have referred to those sentiments, which I heard uttered myself by Sir R. Peel, to show that these men had no claim on him, that he was not bound to them, but was bound to do his duty by the community at large. He has pledged himself to do so. I believe now that he is in a position, and that he has the power to do so; and I only refer to it to justify the expectation of many liberal-minded men that he does intend, and that he will, perform his duty by the public. I must say, in justification of his consistency, that from the time he uttered those sentiments, he has been constantly assailing that very system of protection and favoritism to particular interests during the whole of the time he has been in power. He has been assailing it in every way in the face of these very parties who claim him to be their humble servant. I think one has had experience enough of public men to have no particular faith in any one; but when any interest and duty are obviously combined, one is led to expect that a man will not shrink from doing that which it would be his interest to do. These gentlemen, who during the last four years have been making such a noise in the country, have been ready to support the Minister, notwithstanding his declaration on this occasion, and notwithstanding he has pursued the course which seems to be by their present declarations most opposed to their opinions. They have acted as supporters and friends of the Government; and I have no doubt that, as friends of the Government are apt to do, they have shared in the favour and patronage which Government is able to bestow upon them; and therefore they come rather late with the charge, that they are taken by surprise, which charge they intend to make the ground of opposing any measure which is proposed for the satisfaction of the country. These gentlemen are, in my opinion, quite out of court in their present position. There are only two grounds on which they could have supported their monopoly with any grace—they ought to have extended protection to all; or they ought not to have allowed it to be withdrawn from any; and they ought to be able to point to the results of their protection as justifying their being made an exception to the rest. But they have been active parties in carrying out the policy and applying it to every protected interest. All these interests have been attacked; protection has been removed from many altogether; and the weakest and most defenceless have been attacked without the least scruple, and they have been active and willing supporters in carrying out that policy. They have been constantly told that their turn must come next; they have been reminded that the same hand that attacked the other interests would assail them, and they were perfectly prepared for it,

They have on every occasion in Parliament, sanctioned the directly opposite principle to that for which they are now contending, when it did not affect themselves; they have sanctioned the principle of competition in everything else. There have been persons come before them alleging word for word that they state in defence of their own interests at present; they have pleaded also for the poor they employ, and have claimed the investment of their capital on the faith that they should not be disturbed. There are whole towns, great districts, and individual properties which have been greatly deteriorated and almost destroyed in value by the new railroads which have been sanctioned by Act of Parliament; and all those parties and proprietors have claimed from Parliament that very protection which these same proprietors are now claiming. They have prayed and petitioned against the improvements which were about to be made; but these proprietors, these protectionists have always disregarded their claims with the greatest philosophy and coolness. They have invariably resisted their claim to protection, and have on all occasions sanctioned the principle of competition. The thousands of the working classes of this country who are constantly thrown out of employment by the introduction of machinery, or some improvement which supersedes their labour, they have also come to Parliament and prayed for some protection which should continue them in employment against the use of machinery. They have constantly met them with the soundest views of political economy, and told them how erroneous their claims were; nothing which they have prayed for has been granted to them. They have in every case been told that their particular interests must be yielded to the public good; they have never obtained what they wanted, whenever competition has been put forth in any interest that has been consented to by the majority of the two Houses. And then people may readily ask, why these hereditary proprietors, these proprietors of the soil, whose property nobody disputes, whom everybody is willing to leave in the enjoyment of it to the fullest—but, who by no sacrifice, industry, or intelligence, of their own acquired their fortunes, are to be protected, and are not to be exposed to the principle of competition, when that principle would be of such advantage to the community? (Cheers.) But are they able to point to any result of this protective system which should justify any such exemption. Where is it they will take us to see the results of this system, either in the happy condition of their people or in the fulfilment of their engagement with the public? Will they take us into the county of Wilts to show us the happiness and comfort which it brings on the labourers they employ? We have had allusions this evening to the meeting which was held at a village in the county of Wilts; will they take us there by moonlight to see the happy condition of their peasantry. But what these unfortunate people in that village proclaimed, is no novelty to any person who has studied their case. I venture to say, that for 23 years out of the 30 during which this protection to the landed proprietors has existed, for that period you will find public documents recording precisely that condition of the labouring classes in the agricultural districts which was proclaimed by the peasantry at Goatacre. There was an inquiry in the House of Commons in 1824 into the wages of the labourer, and in the pages of the report of that committee will be found, word for word, what was proclaimed on this occasion by the peasantry—that they cannot be in a worse condition; come what will, let there be any change, they believed it would be for their improvement. There were witnesses then who stated that it was simply owing to the smallness of the remuneration they received that they were hurried into the commission of crimes; that they were as degraded and demoralised as any people that could be found. Why, it is conformable with every inquiry which has been made into the agricultural districts, that these unfortunate people are almost at the bottom of the scale of society. A few years ago, the Commissioners of the Crown drew up a scale, marking the condition of the different classes in this country; and the agricultural labourers were literally placed at the bottom, lower even than the felon or the pauper. (Hear.) Nothing was found more depressed in the social scale than the agricultural labourer. I ask then, with these evidences, which are accumulated, which are so notorious, if it is not testing the temper of the country rather highly, to say that these protective laws, and this protection to agriculture, exists for the benefit of these unfortunate people? It was, I think, about twelve years since, that a member for Bedford, a Conservative in politics, made personal inquiry of these labourers themselves, who were confined in the gaols in great numbers in those agricultural counties. They had been charged with many offences, at a time when there were great riots and incendiarism; and this gentleman, who, from his politics, was not disposed to lay too much stress upon those things, being a Conservative; but he declared that he had collected from these unfortunate peasants in the gaol, that they had been tempted and led into these offences, simply from the low rate of wages they were receiving from their employers. How can these people, then, be brought up as evidence in favour of this system? (Hear.) Why, these poor men, at that village meeting in Wiltshire, at once refuted the two leading fallacies, upon which protectionists have been trading for some years past. The monopolists say, if food is dear, wages are high; that, if you have a Free Trade in food, land will go out of cultivation; but, what say these labourers themselves? They say, "We will tell you, from 40 years' experience, that whenever the price of food rises, the wages of labourers do not rise in proportion. With respect to land going out of cultivation, we would undertake that: do not fear; it shall not return to waste. Give up your land," said they, "and we can cultivate it." (Hear.) But, if they cannot point to these unfortunate people as any proof in favour of their system, how is it they can answer for the manner in which they have fulfilled the condition of their great monopoly? Have they adequately supplied the people with food? (Cries of No.) Is it not notorious, that every four or five years we have these deficiencies, which derange the whole business of the country? We are constantly exposed to these periodical famines; and what is it they tell us? They cannot deny the fact; but they say this country could produce enough to support the people. Our answer, then, is, why do you not produce what is sufficient? (Cries of hear.) They bring scientific men down to their agricultural meetings who tell the farmer what he could, should, would, or might do if he would adopt this or that improvement. What is the invariable answer to all these lectures given to the only people who can make these improvements. They reply, "All that you say is very true; but we do not hold the land under circumstances which would enable us to make these improvements. We want greater security of tenure before we will invest our capital in your land." What said Lord Stanley only a year since, speaking at an agricultural meeting? He said, "Great improvements are required in the agriculture of this country, but no man has a right to expect that his tenant will improve his land unless he gives him the security of a lease, and the extent of that lease will vary with the duration of the term." Now I ask whether there is the slightest prospect of leases being more generally given than they have been hitherto. Look at the meeting of the Protection Society held last Monday; what is it they say? "We must increase our influence in the counties in order to meet the efforts of the League." Do you then believe that they would in reality increase that influence by giving their tenants leases, and rendering them independent? (Cries of No, no.) The tenantry-at-will system has been very much increased of late, simply for the purpose of acquiring influence in these counties. They want now more and more influence; and therefore there is less and less prospect of agricultural improvement. This is the reason why they will never give us a committee of inquiry in the House of Commons. Mr. Cobden has asked them for it for three years running, and they have never ventured to go into inquiry over and over again, to learn what good these Corn Laws do to the farmer. They will not grant a committee for inquiry, because they know that the farmers would come up upon any such occasion and give evidence which would be very prejudicial to their cause. (Hear.) The farmers have their Goatacre meetings as well as the labourers, where they talk of things in a manner widely different from the way in which they are discussed at their Parliamentary protection meetings. (Hear, hear.) They have their grievances; and, in my opinion, they are not frightened at the consequences of Free Trade, as the landlords and his dependants are. I happened recently to communicate with one of the most respectable land-agents in this country, a man who acts for twelve or fourteen different landowners in the country, and all of them peers of the realm. I asked him the other day whether he shared in the fears which were professed respecting the results of Free Trade by the landed interest? He told me far from it; that among the whole agricultural party no one could be found a more staunch and earnest advocate for Free Trade than he was; and none more perfectly convinced of the gross delusion of the statement that Free Trade would injure the landed interest. I asked him in what way he thought Free Trade would benefit the agriculturist? He replied, that one of the first things would be a better cultivation of the land, a greater employment of labourers, and a great decrease of odium incurred by the aristocracy, and which is now being daily heaped upon their heads. I then asked him whether the farmers placed much confidence in the statements made against Free Trade? and whether he believed they would sustain much loss by the repeal of the Corn Laws? He said he had just been letting some farms of a nobleman to his tenants; that he had asked every one of them whether they would wish to have a clause inserted in the lease providing that if the Corn Laws were repealed they should have their leases cancelled. He proposed that each party—landlord and tenant—should, six months after the Corn Laws have been repealed, have the option of cancelling the lease. All these tenants of this nobleman took time to consider of the proposition; but every one of them came back after reflection, and refused to have the clause inserted. (Hear, hear.) They said there was so much doubt among themselves as to whether the repeal of the Corn Laws would be beneficial, or prejudicial, as some people said, that they would not run the risk of the landlord cancelling the lease. (Loud cheering.) Then we are told by these protectionist gentlemen, that we shall do great injury to agriculture, threatening that most important class, the tenant farmers of this country with utter ruin. I say they have no ground for making any such statement. I have just quoted the opinion of this land agent; a man who would come to the bar of the House of Commons, whose respectability would be undoubted, and would give evidence to the same effect, before the face of Parliament, if he was invited so to do; and every man must admit the authority which his experience and character would give to what he said. But I will just call your attention to what was said in the presence of 20,000 people about three weeks ago by a gentleman who is president of an agricultural society, who is high sheriff of the county of York, much esteemed by all his class, and by the county in which he dwells, with respect to the prospect of the evil or advantage likely to result from the adoption of this system of Free Trade. I will read you this passage in a speech with respect to the expected effects by our agriculturist of the adoption of Free Trade. He says,

"What the effects of this Corn Law have been upon trade and manufactures, I leave to others who have felt them, I fear too bitterly; but as to the influence which this law has had on agriculture, I, as a farmer, as a country squire, and as the president of an agricultural society, may be supposed to be able to form some opinion; and I do not think it fair to take as a criterion such a district as that I live in—a district bordering upon a manufacturing one; and one, too, in which any blow struck to trade is always felt immediately and acutely. But I have lived for two years in a purely agricultural county in the south of England; and I have observed the results of protection there; I have seen there the protected labourer, I have seen what is his condition. I declare to you that I never saw labourers or land in a more wretched or destitute plight than they are in Devonshire, part of Gloucestershire, the Isle of Wight, much of Dorsetshire, and of Somersetshire."

Gentlemen, I think that that is a very important testimony in favour of the justice of the cause which we are advocating with so much earnestness; because it is not an indifferent thing to be charged with reckless proceedings in favour of our own interest, or the views we entertain, without any regard to the interests and well being of any other portion of our fellow subjects. I say we do rightly in exposing what would be the effect upon the interests which are supposed to be peculiarly concerned in the change we call for. When we find persons who possess the greatest means of information, whose interests are deeply involved in the change, and who tender us their opinions on the result, I think we do right in considering it. I say that it gives us confidence to hear these opinions expressed by such persons. I know nothing that is calculated to give us much more confidence, unless it be to read the speeches at some of the protection meetings, for they cannot evidently agree upon their own question. There was a great meeting in Hertfordshire the other day, at which Lord Salisbury was present. He made a violent speech in favour of protection. He said he would not bate a tittle of it; that they had not near enough of it, and that nothing should induce him to surrender any portion of that which was now possessed. At that very meeting Lord Essex was present, and he said he could not at all go that length; that there were a great number of protected things—which I presume he did not grow himself—and which, therefore, ought to be allowed to come into this country duty free. He asserted that all the inferior grains are now protected, and that it would be a most enormous advantage if we were to let them in without paying duty. For thirty years they have been upholding this system of protection, and all this time they have been finding out this, which they say would be a great boon to agriculture. They allege that if all these things were to come into this country free, it would be an enormous advantage to those who have to feed their cattle. (Hear.) Thus Lord Essex did not object to all the duty continuing upon the food for the people. He grew wheat, but not these inferior grains; and therefore, he said that the duty upon the latter articles was a positive evil to the agriculturists, and that you could not confer a greater boon upon agriculture than by withdrawing all the protection from this food for cattle. (Hear.) Then, with respect to the peculiar burdens, I defy any person to read their speeches and find two of them agreed upon the matter. They have been called upon, again and again, to bring in their bill and account, and to let us see what the amount of it is, in order that we may see whether we can arrange it with them, but they never will do so; they never will allow any inquiry to be made into the matter, because they believe that the examination would go farther than they wish, and extend to exemptions as well as burdens; and they have a strong suspicion that the exemptions preponderate. (Cheers.) Looking at all these inconsistencies, and marking the experience we have had of the mischief of this law; looking to the little intelligence they have brought to the defence of the system, and the invariable success which has attended Free Trade, how can any minister, who is convinced of the dangers and mischiefs of the law, give any weight and influence of authority to such a party? How can he regard the opinion of a party who have been wrong ever since they have been known, as the chiefs who take part in protection meetings have been? (Hear.) They are men who are eternally predicting woe on all that is conceded to the public wants and wishes. They are always supposing that what is given to the public is taken from them; that the last abuse which has been abandoned is the thing most essential to the greatness of this country; and they have been proved to be wrong in every prediction and opinion they have uttered; and, though there may be among them some of liberal politics, yet they have not been more right in their views on this subject. (Hear, hear.) Upon every commercial reform during the last four years they predicted some dire calamity to this country; and what is now the ground which they assume against any further change? It is that the country is now in a most unparalleled state of prosperity (cries of Oh, oh); and therefore it would be very unwise and dangerous in them to make any further reform. Look at all these opinions uttered during the last four years; look at the tariff reform; at all the changes in the custom-duties proposed and effected—all of which it was stated would ruin the country; that ruin and misfortune to all must result from it. And now again they come forward and say, "Do not touch corn; do not touch our protected counties, for they are more prosperous than they ever have been. Leave well alone; we cannot do better." (Hear, hear.) I cannot conceive, then, that these people, notwithstanding we are told that they are making a great display, can have any authority in this country, or over any Minister, from any sagacity they have shown, or from any disinterestedness one can give them credit for, or any talent they have evinced in the vindication of their systems. But, gentlemen, it is of no use disguising from you the truth, that they may, as the legislature is now constituted, obtain a numerical advantage if any honest and good measure is proposed; and therefore I should wish you to be prepared for the event. (Hear, hear.) I believe that a great effort will be made; and the more honest the measure is, the more full and satisfactory, the more likely are they to resist it, and the more effort will they make to defeat it. I only trust that you will be prepared for the event, and that you will leave nothing untried or undone, both in justice to yourselves and for the good of this country, to prevent yourselves being trampled upon and triumphed over by the most interested and unworthy party that ever arrayed itself against a people. The hon. gentleman was loudly cheered at the conclusion of his speech.

The Chairman then said—Ladies and Gentlemen, Mr. Houghton will now address you.

Mr. HOUGHTON came forward amid considerable applause, and spoke as follows.—Ladies and Gentlemen, I rise under circumstances of peculiar embarrassment to address you this evening. When I consider the great cause in which the country is engaged, and the position which I hold as an agriculturist in this country, and when I further take into consideration the eloquence with which you have been addressed by parties from the place where I stand, I can scarcely expect that I shall be able to keep your attention while I state to you the reasons I had for leaving the society, and the opinions I formerly espoused. Gentlemen, I say to you that unless I have a sufficient reason to state to you this evening to have influenced my mind in coming to that change, I ought to be denounced as a reverend gentleman in Staffordshire, who attended a protection meeting in that county last week, denounced Sir Robert Peel, as "a traitor to his religion and his principles." (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I should be a traitor, and worse than a traitor, because for 25 years of my life I have been engaged in agriculture, and expending every shilling of which I am possessed in that pursuit; not only have I done that, but I have advised other individuals who have estates under my charge to do the best to improve theirs also. If I considered this measure to be detrimental either to their interests or my own, I should be a traitor indeed. But I believe neither the one nor the other. I am satisfied that this measure would be of the greatest consequence to the community at large. I shall inquire to-night what protection has done for the landlord, the tenant, and the farm labourer. Upon this point I shall beg your attention for a short time, and I promise you shall be as brief as possible. I will tell you in the commencement what I think of protection. I consider it to be the parent of idleness (cheers), and I defy any man where protection has been applied to show me that that interest where it has been so applied has ever prospered. Now I will look at it if you please with respect to the article of silk. I recollect the time when the mercers in this country thought, when the duty upon that article was about to be attacked, that it would be the ruin of their trade. No such consequence has taken place. We were afraid of coming into competition with the rest of the world; and now I believe that of English silk it may almost be said that the flag floats upon the breeze in India itself. (Hear, hear.) Now with respect to wool, I am myself a large wool-grower. I recollect once expressing the strongest opinion I ever stated to a nobleman, whose name I cannot express with sufficient reverence and awe: he is gone, but a more worthy man never lived; I refer to the late Lord Spencer. (Hear, hear.) I recollect telling him that he had ruined us by the opening of the trade in wool, and that we should never be able to sell that article again. Why, gentlemen, the answer he made me was this: he said, "Now let me assure you, that the same answer I have given to the silk-weaver I give to you. You may depend upon it, you have no cause to fear competition in wool; that article will sell as dear as you have ever sold it before." That prediction has been verified since that period, and I have been selling my wool at a higher rate than I ever sold it previously. Then again, with respect to the tariff. I, amongst others certainly, when Sir R. Peel introduced that measure into the legislature, greatly feared that such a sweeping measure would ruin us; and I almost doubted whether we should not have come to pass what people told me, (mind I never stated it myself,) but I was told that pigs would never be worth any thing any more; that bacon might be had for nothing; that in America there were thousands of fat pigs always ready to kill; that there was nothing to do but to go out and slaughter them; that they were always fattened, and as soon as you had killed them you might bring them over here. All that was a fallacy, and we now see that after some years experience bacon is as dear as it ever was. We want all the fat pigs that we can get, and if the Americans have any more to send, so much the better; for we shall be very glad of them. Then, with respect to beef, in some countries they said they have cattle always fit to be killed; you had nothing to do but to go and kill the beast and bring them over here, as fat oxen as you ever saw. Why, gentlemen, we want all the oxen which they can send to us; therefore, I say, the very measures they were afraid of, has proved not at all injurious. What has been the result? Bacon and beef have been as dear as ever, and it is evident that our fears at that time were all groundless. So it is with respect to wool. Wool is no cheaper since we have had a Free Trade in that article. If protection is good, we must have been going backwards ever since the days of Mr. Huskisson, because every movement we have made, as sure as day follows night, has been in the direction of Free Trade. The very hat which I wear upon my head is of French manufacture; and therefore, I say, the manufacturer of that hat has as much right to come forward and ask for protection, as a hatter, as I have to ask for it in my business. Gentlemen, these are my opinions with regard to protection; we have had the Corn Laws for thirty years, and they are not by any means new acquaintances of ours. I had to give evidence before a committee of the House of Commons at a period when distress was very great, in the year 1822, when the Corn Law was the most stringent that we ever had. I will just read you one line of a meeting that took place in Kent. This is a petition to the House of Commons.—"Sheweth, that the unexampled distress with which your petitioners are now afflicted is of the most alarming kind." Gentlemen, this is when they were in the very height of protection; they could not by possibility have better, because this was the law of 1815, and yet they had sufferings as great as they ever had. (Cries of hear, hear.) The Corn Law has not had the effect which it was intended to have, because the grand object of the Corn Laws was to produce, as near as possible, a certainty of price. Has it answered that professed purpose? In the years 1835 and 1836, wheat was 35s. and 36s.; in the years 1841 and 1842 it was 74s.; therefore, the conclusion to which I arrive at is this, that when we have bountiful seasons, corn will be cheap; and when unfavourable seasons, we shall be very glad to have it from any country that can send it us. Now, I shall also inquire whether these Corn Laws have actually and in reality served the parties for whom they were professedly intended. For instance, much less has been said about their repeal. It has been said, that if you abolish the Corn Laws, it will ruin the church. (Laughter.) In that I differ from the supporters of the Corn Laws, for I love the church; and I will tell you another reason why I differ from them. I think the abolition of the Corn Laws will be holding out the hand of fellowship in the bond of peace; for surely it never can be good for religion, or the community at large, that people should be congregated together with a determination to carry this measure, one party being set against another. Therefore I say, in the unity of the spirit and the bond of peace, it is good for all parties; and I am sure those who are true members of the church will not object to any measure that will be for the benefit of the great bulk of the people. Again, it is said that the repeal of the Corn Laws will ruin the aristocracy. I, for one, have the greatest respect and reverence for that body. I do not hold violent opinions. I think that an alteration of these laws will do more to raise that body in the opinion, the good sense, and good will of the people than any other measure that can possibly be devised. I, for one, cannot agree with statements I hear, not only here, but at other meetings of this description, namely, that we are a privileged class. I do not wish to be a privileged class; I have no sort of objection to throw down the gauntlet, and to cultivate the land against any man, let him come from where he will. (Loud cheers.) All I ask is a free stage and fair play. I agree with what Mr. Villiers has said to-night; I say if there are burdens upon the land, the only way to settle that question is to bring in the Bill, to prove their burdens, and let them be settled. That is the plain and straightforward way. Something else has been said with respect to leases. I hold, as has been previously stated, the greatest quantity of land of any man in the kingdom; but I hold those farms upon leases, all of them. I say I should be a traitor; and I will tell you, more than that, if I was not prepared with an opinion, which I now espouse, to come forward as I am to offer to take a lease for as many years as my landlord chooses to grant at the same rent that I am now paying for them. I must be allowed to state, that the fears upon this head in my opinion are all groundless. And then another question is with respect to land going out of cultivation. I once remember saying to that lamented nobleman to whom I have before referred, that with a repeal of the Corn Laws the corn would be worth nothing. He answered, "If that is the case, we shall all be kept; if there is this land abroad, and corn is sent over in such abundance that you will find it at the corner of every street, we shall be all very well kept; but they will find us a very large family, therefore they will very soon get tired of keeping us. They would find it necessary to procure labour for us, or else they would be keeping us for nothing." With respect to land going out of cultivation, I do not believe any thing of the kind; but, on the contrary, I think Free Trade will be the means of increasing cultivation. Now, I must say, that we have had much said with respect to the landlords. If I look back for the last 30 years, I ask myself this question, what is the state of the landed interest? If I am to judge by the immense properties which have changed hands, has it been beneficial to the particular class where it was intended? If I look to the immense change which has taken place with respect to tennants, and look at the petitions which have been presented to the legislature by them, I see that protection has not been profitable. But then I come to another class, which I wish to draw your attention to particularly, and that is the labourers. I do not think the Corn Law has been beneficial to the labourers, but I do believe that there requires a change in the whole system; and if you will allow me this evening, I will tell you what I think should be done, and lay before you a plan which, if adopted, would lead to a better state of things. In the first place, I consider that every labourer should have land. (Cheers.) I consider that greater attention should be paid to his dwelling, and that every man should be educated. (Loud cheers.) That I believe to be necessary, and if you will only let him have land he will be able to cultivate that land,—he will be thrown upon his own resources, and he will be able to live in those seasons which have occurred, and always will occur when labour is more plentiful than demand,—he will have something to fall back upon, and something to do. (Cheers.) I also think that that land ought to be at exactly the same price as the rest of the land in the parish is let at; and that it should be as near to the town as possible. That, I think, would be the means of benefiting the labourer. (Cheers.) With respect to the tenant, he should have a security of tenure. I say a security of tenure, because I have the very best landlords that a man can possibly have. No better exist; none superior are to be found in the world: but I ask a security of tenure, because there is an uncertainty in life. The reason that I ask that is, because I have property, and large sums to invest upon that land; and, unless I had security of tenure, I should not have it in my power, and should not like to do it. If a man commences a farm, which requires large sums to be expended upon it, a man looks very hard in his face before he will assist him with any money, because he has no security of tenure. (Hear, hear.) Now, look at the security of tenure of farms in Scotland. Why, there it has had the most beneficial effect: if you apply it here, you will see the same effect will arise. (Cries of hear, hear.) Then, gentlemen, with respect to the lands, the landlord will see his lands improved; and he will also see to his tenant, and his labourer, because it is the landlord's duty to see the plan that he has adopted with respect to the labourer, having land and cottage, carried into effect; and that being done, he will find his state will be improved; and his tenant, who has a security of tenure, will still keep on improving. That is my opinion with respect to that measure. I do not think that these laws have been beneficial to Ireland; but I believe this, that bad legislation has been the cause of a great many evils that have afflicted that unhappy land. I demand for them what I ask for myself, and that is, that an alteration should take place; and I now to-night, before this country, and in your presence, as Englishmen, call upon you to lose no time, and to leave no stone unturned until you see justice done to that unfortunate country. (Loud cheers.) These Irish farmers do not think so much of the Corn Laws as that they ought to have fair play. That is the statement I have to make with respect to that country. I want to effect an alteration for them as well as for myself. I am sorry, gentlemen, for having trespassed so long upon your time (cries of "Go on"); but when I know, as I do, that things require to be altered, there as well as here. I will tell you exactly, if they are really in earnest in legislating for Ireland, what the House of Commons would do. In Ireland, the landlords have but little money, and the tenants less; and they have not the means of improving the land; and all I ask of the Government is this, to bring in a measure to enable the heirs of entail to raise money upon their estates for that purpose at 4 per cent. (Hear, hear.) Mark you, for this particular thing. If you will only do as you do in other cases, insist on a man who sends out a vessel to America, that he shall have enough room, and shall carry sufficient water; why should not the Government interfere, and say, "These human beings shall not live in places unfit to contain them!" In every instance, first, second, third, fourth, and fifth-class houses should be erected in proportion to the rent; and Government itself should be allowed to have proper men, to see that carried into effect. They should have the power to charge that estate with 4 per cent., then what would be the consequence? There would be a security for every man; and we should all have the satisfaction of knowing that men would live in houses fit to contain them, and not in hovels which are unfit for the residence of human beings. It would be the means of bestowing the greatest benefit to the trade of that country, because it would put men in employment, and no injury could be done. We should not interfere with private property at all, but there is a question in that country as well as here with respect to the church. I once visited a place that I shall never forget. What do you think was the answer given to a question proposed by me? I wanted to bring to the notice of Sir Robert Peel a bill that would enable certain parties to have some land, but it was church property. The owner of that property said, "I am perfectly willing that it should be so." I asked one of the county members a question on the same subject, and the answer that he made me was that he never could consent to that, because it would be an attack on the Established Church. I cannot for the life of me see what the one has to do with the other. I think if the repeal of those laws was effected, and we then went to work in a good spirit for the legislation of that unhappy country, we should soon have less of agitation and more of cultivation; less of agitation and more of education. (Loud cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN then came forward, and said—Ladies and gentlemen, I have now the pleasure of introducing to you Mr. Milner Gibson.

Mr. M. GIBSON, (who, on presenting himself at the table, was received with loud applause), addressed the meeting as follows: Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—After the excellent speech of Mr. Villiers, and the very practical and useful address of our friend, Mr. Houghton, an extensive agriculturist, it would perhaps ill become me to trespass long upon your time. But, this I will remark, that it seems from the vast assemblage collected here this evening, that you have not thought it wise at present to consider the measure of the repeal of the Corn Laws entirely carried. It has, I dare say, occurred to many of you, as it has been remarked by some in my hearing, that it is hardly worth while to attend a meeting upon the Corn Laws, now that the leaders of the two great parties, Sir R. Peel and Lord J. Russell, had taken the question into their care. Let me beg you to remember, that the question is still in your hands. (Cheers.) From the fatal mistake of considering that a question not carried is not still in the hands of the people, there have been many disappointments to the cause of liberty. The liberties of a nation were never yielded as a free gift by rulers to a people; they have always been wrung from the Government by the steady perseverance and unshaken exertions of the people themselves. (Loud cheers.) Who knows that Sir Robert Peel has yet decided what question he shall submit to the legislature, and who knows but that this very assemblage this evening may give him a power to dictate better terms to the Cabinet Council? Who knows that this assemblage may not have great weight with the ministers, and enable them to find courage to propose a bold and good measure? We are in the position of persons standing by the bedside of some worthy matron; we do not know yet whether it is to be a boy or a girl. (Laughter.) We do not know what it is to be; and therefore I say it becomes us not to desert our duty, but to watch and to be satisfied with nothing but a perfect and a healthy child. (Renewed laughter.) Our worthy chairman named that child; it is the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) What a contrast is this assemblage with those poor and pitiful meetings of our opponents? Why our chairman mentioned that at some protection meeting a cat might be discovered as it wandered amongst the listeners; but here I will venture to assert that if the whole Central Society for the Protection of British Agriculture which assemble in the parlour of No. 17, Old Bond Street, were to be put into this theatre, you would not know that they were here at all. (Cheers.) Perhaps some of them are here. (Hear, hear.) I wish they may be. (Hear, hear.) They are going it seems to fight the League with its own weapons in the Registration Courts; they are about to try the "manufacturing of votes," as it is called. Though they have condemned such a course as highly immoral and unconstitutional, yet it turns out that they are going to adopt it themselves. These persons, we find, though favourable to unrelaxed protection, have no very great objection to relaxed morals; and as they are going to use all the weapons of the League, perhaps we may live to see a rival house,—not Drury Lane; let me advise them not to be so aspiring at first,—try a small house, "The Strand," or some other little theatre—and I am quite sure our excellent friend, the chairman, if they are unwilling at the outset to engage a theatre upon their own account, would let a portion of the boxes for some of the principal members of "The Central Society for the Protection of British Agriculture," where they might attend and speak for themselves. We would give them a patient hearing, and would reply fairly and dispassionately to their arguments; and if we did not convince those of them that are capable of being convinced, that our cause is one of justice, humanity, and right, then I can only say, I should despair of the triumph of the cause that we are advocating. What an extraordinary thing it is that we should have this mighty opposition to the proposal we make. For what is it? We are endeavouring to take off a tax. If we were assembled here in great numbers to impose a tax upon the people, we could perfectly understand that there might be meetings of persons who would be unwilling to bear this additional burthen; but our object is nothing of the kind. Our desire is to remove a tax; and what a strange notion, what a singular perversion of the very idea of taxation!—that when there is a proposition to remove it you should have great numbers of persons coming forward and saying, "That tax is a bounty to us; it puts money into our pockets, and therefore do not relieve the nation from the burthen." Does it not strike every one that a tax ought to be a general burthen, and ought only to be levied for the purpose of the State; and that it is impossible that a rightful tax can be a bounty to any portion of her Majesty's subjects? But this is a tax that is at once a burthen to the nation; and, according to their own showing, a bounty to the landlords: therefore I say the very opposition to the removal of this tax is in itself a proof that there must be something dishonest in its operation, something at variance with the true principle of taxation, and that it must strike every man that it cannot be right that a burthen to some should be a bounty to others. We have never made this Corn Law question a question of mere price, nor have we confined it to or made it altogether a question of feeding the people; but the high ground which we have taken is this—that we have a right to freedom of exchange. We demand of the legislature, or the landed proprietors who have been from time immemorial the ruling party in that legislature, to desist from obstructing the corn trade. We say that trade in foreign corn is a legitimate pursuit; we contend that an Englishman has a right to invest his capital in the purchase of corn; that he has a right to buy foreign corn and bring it into this country and sell it at a profit if it suits his interest and convenience to do so; and we say, moreover, that he is not to be obstructed in so doing to suit the private and pecuniary interests of any class of his fellow-subjects. (Loud cheers.) We do not put it on the mere ground of price. Freedom of exchange is the most obvious of human rights; and we say if there is to be any obstacle thrown in the way of the foreign corn trade, by imposing a duty on the importation of corn, let the same be thrown in the way of the home corn grower; let him have the same tax which the foreign merchants and importers have to bear, and then there will be something like justice between them. Not that we admit that corn is a fit subject for taxation: nothing of the kind. We think the food of the people is of all things the most unfit for a tax. I was anxious to dwell upon that point, because so much had been said by our opponents as to certain alleged inconsistencies in the statements of the Free Traders, with reference to what would be the price of food after the repeal of the Corn Laws. Our argument and demand rests not upon price. What has been said of price is mere speculation. Whatever be the price, we contend for freedom in the corn trade. The speculation as to price is a curious speculation and an interesting one, and undoubtedly bears upon the question; but it does not and cannot form the basis upon which this just and righteous demand is made. Now, with regard to price, we have the evidence of our excellent friend, Mr. Houghton, who does not anticipate a fall of price from the repeal of the Corn Laws. There may be no diminution of price, and yet there may be a very greatly increased consumption of food. The imported food may not be a substitute, either, for what is grown; it may be additional: customers may increase as fast as imported grain; and without any diminution of price, there may be a great increase of the comforts of the great masses of this country. Undoubtedly the smallest duty upon foreign corn must have a tendency to limit the quantity that can be brought into this market; there always will be, when a certain number of quarters of corn have been imported into the country, and sold at a profit a quantity that might have come in, if this small duty which I am supposing had not prevented it. (Hear, hear.) This additional quantity, that might have been imported, however small, might have been sold at a profit but for this small duty; therefore, it is a fallacy, and a mistake to talk of a low fixed duty being paid by the foreigners, and making no difference to prices and quantity in this country. The smallest imaginary fixed duty must have a tendency to lessen the whole quantity which can be imported, and which would come into competition with our home-grown corn for the benefit of the consumers of this country. But the protection party seem to me to be doing all they can to depreciate the value of their landed property. It seems of all things in the world strange for them to be exerting themselves hard in telling their tenants that when the Corn Laws are repealed, the land will not yield any rent. Why, they must not wonder if many of these tenants come forward when they are repealed, and ask to have their land rent free. (Hear, hear.) We have never circulated such reports, or created such panics; and I should like to know what there is in the public events of the day that can justify any man in saying, that the repeal of the Corn Laws is to be the ruin of the landed proprietors of this country. Why, have not estates been lately selling in the public market by auction, and have not those estates been purchased by persons for mere investment solely as a security for money and for the interest which they will yield? And I ask if those estates have sold in the market for one year's, or one day's, less purchase than they would some time since, when the agitation against the Corn Law was not near so rife as it is now? Why, the capitalist is generally a very sensitive person. Can there be any answer to that fact the farms are selling by public auction for as many years' purchase as they have ever sold; aye, and even for a greater number of years' purchase? I know several farms that were sold the other day in the south of England, that were purchased for mere investment, and that brought two years' more purchase than the same farms had brought in 1839; and can it be doubted for a moment that the Corn Law is nearer its repeal now than it was in 1839? We all know there is a well-founded rumour that a very great change is near in the Corn Laws, and that it must before long be totally repealed. I say that if there had been a sincere belief in the mind of the public—in the breast of the capitalist—that the abolition of the Corn Law would ruin landed property, we should not have seen these farms selling at such high rates; we should have believed that similar effects would have been produced on the value of that land as would have been effected in the value of all other securities. (Hear, hear.) I put it to this meeting, if there was a well-founded rumour, or even a shadow of suspicion, that the dividends would not be forthcoming on the 5th of January on the account of consols, whether the consols would sell at their usual price? (Cheers.) Do railway shares bring the same value in the market when there is a talk of a competing line, which is seriously to diminish their profits? Nothing of the kind. We find that all securities are affected by these rumours, and very justly, when those rumours are well founded; and what possible exception can there be to the case of land? I can also confirm, from my own knowledge, a statement that has been made by my honourable friend, Mr. Houghton. I know a case in Suffolk where four tenants were concerned during the Ministerial "interregnum," as it was called. During that interval of time, when Lord John Russell was about to undertake the Government upon the principle of total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, those four tenants were engaged at that particular interval in negotiating new leases with their landlords; and not one of them mentioned to his landlord the subject of the Corn Law; but every one was willing to renew his lease for 7 or 14 years, as his landlord wished; and two or three out of those four tenants volunteered of their own accord to give an increase of rent. (Hear.) It is no part of our business as advocates for the cause of Free Trade, to be endeavouring to console persons whose property it is stated is about to be injured. But all I say is this—how strange it is that dukes, noble lords, and landed proprietors, should be endeavouring all they can to create a panic, and depreciate the value of their own property! The dukes—I do not wish to make any sweeping censure, because all sweeping censures are unjust, but when I speak of dukes, I speak of that description of dukes who have a propensity for delivering themselves of Corn Law speeches.—I say, I must consider that they are not the wisest of mankind. (Hear.) They seem to me to be persons, to judge from the speeches that have been lately delivered, of very homely wits. It is difficult to single out any one speech more foolish than another, and in this respect these worthies remind me of an old story of a French duke, who applied at court for a place for his friend. He said that he was under the greatest obligation to that gentleman; and when asked what those obligations were, he replied, "Why, if it had not been for him I should have been the ugliest man in France." Now I say that these dukes are under the greatest obligations to each other, for you cannot single out any one who has made the most foolish speech of the lot; they have left each other in remarkably good countenance. (Laughter.) But I do not despair even of any of these. That distinguished personage, the Duke of Norfolk, notwithstanding that celebrated curry-powder speech of his (hear), it is said that after all he is going to vote for a repeal of the Corn Laws. I cannot vouch for it, but that is the common report; and it is said that when he said "curry" he meant "rice"; it was a confusion in his mind. The curry and the rice are mixed together in India, and he made a mistake in putting the curry in the place of rice. But, however, we will forgive him the curry-powder speech if he will vote for a repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) We have another duke who has come forward with a very violent speech; he says that the Anti-Corn-Law meetings must be treated with the contempt,—or something of that sort,—which they deserve. It is a duke well known to the Anti-Corn-Law League, for he was once engaged in a remarkable correspondence with the chairman of that body; and he is rather an ungrateful person, for there is no one, I will venture to say, for whose education in this question the League have shown a greater anxiety. (Cries of "Name, name.") It is the Duke of Cleveland I refer to, whose speech appears in this day's Times. He says the country has been convulsed upon this question. (Hear, hear, hear.) I agree with him the country has been "convulsed," but it has been with laughter at the nonsense that has been uttered by noble dukes and marquises at protection meetings. But, if I might be allowed, as I alluded to the correspondence which took place between the noble Duke of Cleveland and the Anti-Corn-Law League, and as I have got a copy of the letters in my pocket, I would take the liberty, with the permission of this meeting, to read them. (Hear, hear.) They are very interesting documents in the progress of this agitation, showing that no steps have been neglected, to inform those who were thought to lack sound instruction upon the question of Free Trade. You must know that the Duke of Cleveland once before delivered himself of one of these speeches in favour of protection at Raby Castle, which speech was printed in the Mark Lane Express, and other newspapers; and Mr. George Wilson, our worthy chairman, by order of the Council of the League, wrote the following letter to the duke:

"My Lord Duke—In an account of a meeting of your grace's tenants, you are reported in the Mark Lane Express to have warned your tenants against the doctrines of the League, and that they (the tenants) could not compete with the foreign growers. As Chairman of the League, I believe you have made these statements in ignorance, and I forward you some tracts of the League that will give you information on the subject, which will show you that the land does not bear those burdens that you have asserted; and that it is not so heavily taxed; and that income derived from land is a small compensation; and I trust that you will take the earliest opportunity of correcting your error.—I am, &c.,

GEORGE WILSON,
Chairman of the National Anti-Corn-Law League."

Well, then comes the duke's answer:

"Sir—I have received a letter which has followed me to the Highlands of Scotland, and has filled me with astonishment. The writer signs himself 'Chairman of the League.' However despicable that faction has become in the consideration of the country, I could not conceive that any one of its members should have the boldness to lecture me on what I have thought fit to say at a private party, at which no member of the press was present. I know nothing about the Mark Lane Express, and treat your observations with the contempt they deserve."

Now, this is an unfortunate mistake, into which many of our men of rank fall; men who are hereditary legislators. They tell us that we have no business with their private opinions. But I say we have business with their opinions. (Cheers.) They make laws for us; they sit, in virtue of their descent, in the House of Lords; they pass laws which are to rule us, and therefore I contend we have business with the opinions of these hereditary legislators. (Renewed cheering.) I further contend that it was quite right and fitting for our chairman, Mr. George Wilson, if he thought the Duke of Cleveland under a misapprehension, and that he required instruction upon the question of Free Trade, as was proved by a certain speech he made, reported publicly in the newspapers; I say he did quite right to indite this letter to the Duke of Cleveland; and I further contend that the letter is indited in those courteous and proper terms that ought not to have called back a letter containing such charges as those of "falsehood," "sedition," and so forth. The duke says—and that is the fallacy which he adheres to now—that the land is more taxed than other interests in the country. Now, I will venture to say that if this account which has been so much talked of this evening was sent in, that we should see that, during the time the landed interest have had possession of the legislature of this country, that they had, to use a common expression, helped themselves with a bucket and dealt out to others with a tea spoon. (Hear.) I will venture to say that if we were to look through the list of taxes that have been taken off since the year 1815, we should find that the landed interest had allowed scarcely one year to pass without repealing some tax that peculiarly pressed upon agriculture. I say nearly all possible "taxes" that press peculiarly upon agriculture, because local rates are not taxes that press upon agriculture; they are only portions of rent intercepted by the receiver of local taxes, and which, but for him, would find their way into the pocket of the landlord. But I speak of taxes such as those upon husbandry, horses, taxed carts, fire insurance on farming stock, windows in farm houses, and various things of that kind, all of which have, from time to time, been repealed; and I believe it was shown in the speech delivered in 1836 by Mr. Hume, on Lord Chandos's motion for inquiry into agricultural distress, that the repeal of taxes, pressing peculiarly upon agriculture, amounted to something like a million a year; and up to the time at which he spoke had those taxes been received, they would have yielded something like twenty millions to the Exchequer. Is it not also in the recollection of every one that when the Central Society for the protection of agriculture waited upon Sir Robert Peel at the commencement of last session, there was not one of the party who could name a tax which pressed peculiarly on agriculture, when Sir R. Peel asked him to do so? The question was put—What is the relief you ask? What are the burdens that press upon you?—and there was not one of the party who could make any reply. (Laughter.) Talk of an account! I will venture to say, that if a debtor and creditor one was made out between the landed interest and the people of England, the balance-sheet would exhibit an awful deficit against the landed interest. I am myself, to some extent, connected with landed property, and I must say I should rather dread this account being called for on my behalf; for if the land is to pay up all the exemptions it has enjoyed from the state, if there is to be a fair balancing of accounts, I know not how we should meet the immense demand which the people of England would have a right to make on the proprietors of land in this country. (Cheers.) Is it probable on the very face of it that these men have been sitting in Parliament to do nothing but tax themselves, and taking all the burdens of the state on their own shoulders? The thing on the very face of it is an absurdity; and even if it were shown (which it cannot be) that there was an excess of poor-rate, or an excess of any particular tax pressing on the landed interest, I should say it is no business whatever of the Free Traders. We deny that the Corn Law is a fit compensation for any excess of burdens borne by any class of the community; we deny that you can compensate the landed interest by such a fiction and absurdity as your Corn Law scheme. We say if there be undue burdens, if the landed interest bear more of the taxes than falls justly to their share, we are ready to equalise those burdens; we are quite ready to distribute the public burdens with the utmost fairness and equity; but we contend that we are now entitled to freedom of trade, and that the mere alleging that there are special burdens, cannot be a ground for delaying one day the yielding this just and righteous demand. My Lord Beaumont, at the meeting the other day, spoke of these special burdens. He said that real property bore eight millions of local taxation, and, therefore, real property ought to be protected by the Corn Law. Eight millions of taxation, he said, in one scale, and the Corn Law in the other; ought not every one to be satisfied? (Laughter.) Now really it is hardly worth while to reply to such arguments as these; but does the noble lord imagine that real property is all arable land? Does he not recollect that houses are real property? Does he not recollect that railways are real property? Does he not recollect that quarries are real property? And that if this real property bear this amount of local taxation, a pretty compensation it is to the owner of the houses, or of the quarries, or the mines, or of the railroad shares, to tell him there is a Corn Law in the other balance, and that he ought to be satisfied? Then comes the argument that great mischief will result if we let in corn from foreign countries—from Poland, it is said, or from Russia, but Poland they especially dwell upon. Poland they are very fond of; they always tell you about Polish labourers and black bread. If we eat Polish bread, they say we shall become like Poles; our labourers will be like Polish labourers. (Laughter.) I wonder—to use an expression of a very distinguished veteran in this cause, one to whom the cause is, perhaps, more indebted than any man living—I mean Colonel Thompson—(Cheers)—I wonder they don't say that if the labourers eat Polish corn they will speak Polish (laughter), for they might as well say so. All these circumstances connected with the kingdom of Poland arise from different causes; there is a variety of causes connected with the condition of that country which has no application to the condition of this; and if it happens that the Polish labourer eats black bread, or that the Pole suffers under peculiar disabilities, those things are attributable to the unfortunate circumstances of the country, and are not at all applicable to Great Britain. Of all arguments it seems the most absurd—let in the food of Poles, and we shall at once sink to the condition of the Pole—forgetting our capital, our enterprise, our energy, the great natural advantages which England possesses, and the long period during which our country has been increasing, our manufacturers have been thriving, and our capital has been accumulating. No; the letting in of the corn will make Englishmen sensible at any rate, that they have accomplished the last step towards the abolition of the feudal principle. (Cheers.) The real question after all is, as I believe from my conscience, not a pecuniary question. I think our aristocracy and landed proprietors are, some way or other, jealous of the advance of the great mercantile community of this country. (Cheers.) They do not like to have their heels trodden upon by those whom they have been cradled and taught to look down upon as a secondary class; they do not like the idea of sharing with them in equal rivalry the political power of the country—they wish to elevate themselves by depressing the mercantile community. I believe this is one of the moving powers that inspires this opposition to the Corn Law repeal. It cannot be a merely pecuniary motive; it is a motive far higher than that: it is the love of power—it is the love of ascendancy—it is the love of aristocratic privilege—it is the desire to depress and keep down the middle classes of this country. (Cheers.) Now that this question has been thoroughly sifted and understood, now that it appears as if you had but to put out your hand and take it, now that it appears as if the fruit was within your reach if you would but stretch out your hand to grasp it—I say Englishmen will deserve to be branded as slaves if they do not throw off the ignominious yoke which a proud landed aristocracy has imposed upon them. (Cheers.) And when we consider the greatness and universality of the cause we are advocating, if the mercantile community of England throw off this yoke, it will be felt throughout the whole civilised world. England will not accomplish Free Trade for herself without her example being followed through the different civilised countries of Europe. It may not be to-morrow, it may not be next year; but the example will be followed. (Hear, hear.) Then, as trade becomes free, those ties of a mutual dependence, and the common interest which binds nations together in friendly alliance, will acquire increased strength, and become more closely interwoven. Commercial freedom is the parent of peace upon earth and goodwill amongst men (loud cheers); and the first step to this commercial freedom which is to unite the nations of the earth in the bonds of friendship and peaceable alliance, is the abolition of the British Corn Law. We look to that as the first great step in the cause of Free Trade. It is not true, as has been asserted by our opponents, that we seek for protection for certain branches of trade and manufactures, though we are unwilling to yield it to agriculturists. Having the honour of standing in this theatre the representative of Manchester in Parliament—(cheers)—that great seat of our manufactures—I say distinctly, that it is not true that the men who seek to remove protection from agriculture are desirous of retaining any protection for themselves. The resolutions which have emanated from the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester have all prayed that protection may be removed from corn, that the corn trade may become free, and at the same time that there may be a complete abolition of all protective duties. (Cheers.) A gentleman of the name of Stuart, who is about to become a candidate for the constituency of Newark, and to represent the Duke of Newcastle in the House of Commons, has undertaken to assert that those who are making this demand for Free Trade are in reality seeking some protection for themselves. He says so deliberately in his address to the electors of Newark. Now I must take the liberty of telling that honourable gentleman that it is not to be submitted to in these days—after the repeated assertions that we advocate the repeal of the Corn Laws on the broad principle of freedom of trade—of the abolition of protection altogether—that he is to write a letter, which has the authority of his name, asserting that we are seeking some protection to ourselves. The honourable gentleman is a Chancery barrister, I believe, of some reputation; but I can tell him that this is rather sharp practice (cheers and laughter); and I must tell him still further, that the brief which he has received, be it from whom it may, does not contain proper instructions. I hope when he goes to Newark he will take the opportunity of correcting the error into which he has fallen. Mr. Gladstone has left Newark; where he is going to I know not; but if report speaks true that Sir Robert Peel is about to propose a bold and conclusive measure regarding the Corn Law, why, perhaps, after all, the League may have to find a seat for Mr. Gladstone. (Laughter.) That would indeed be a most extraordinary position to be filled; but more extraordinary things than that have happened in the world. I believe Mr. Gladstone to be the best Free Trader of the lot; and I believe also that he has been tutored in the cause of Free Trade by that best of all teachers, experience. He has seen that every measure that has been adopted for the relaxation of our tariff and our commercial code, has been attended with success, and therefore I conceive that he is in the Cabinet Councils at this time one of the best supporters of our cause. But, after all, I must not detain you on that topic, for it signifies little what Sir Robert Peel is doing, what Mr. Gladstone is doing, or what Cabinet Councils are considering. I must repeat again, as I stated at the commencement of my address, that it is you, and you alone, assisted by the great body of the people, the intelligent community of this country, who must carry this question. That you will succeed I have no doubt, but I am equally sure that you would not succeed, and I believe you would not succeed even at the present moment, if there were suspected to be the slightest flagging on your part (hear); if it were supposed that, success appearing within reach, you had allowed yourselves to be lulled into false security—

(hear, hear.)—if such an idea entered into the minds of our party leaders, I fear the League would have many years still of arduous exertion. But that the day will come is most certain; because, when I consider what is the nature of the contest,—and if I may read the future by the record of the past, I know that you must triumph,—because I know that the contest is between justice and tyranny, between freedom and oppression, between equality and privilege; and therefore I know that, at a future day, you must succeed; and I believe that you will succeed in the present year also, from the circumstance of the parties between whom the contest lies. What is the condition of the two parties? On the side of protection there is division; on our side there is none. On our side there is mutual confidence; there distrust and suspicion. Here we have firmness; there there is nothing but passion. Here we have the spirit of intellect, of philosophy, of experience; there they are supported by none except those who have long distinguished themselves by advocating every feudal barbarism and every abuse which has disgraced the statute book of England. (Cheers.) Consider the parties, and I say that our distinguished leaders in this great movement have conducted it with prudence, with unshaken zeal, and with fidelity. Comparing, therefore, the position of these two parties in the contest, I say it is impossible but that these efforts must be crowned with a great and enduring triumph. (Loud cheering.)

The CHAIRMAN then said, Gentlemen, Mr. Moore will now address the meeting. (Cheers.)

Mr. R. R. R. MOORE then came forward amidst loud applause, and addressed the meeting as follows:—I had much rather our chairman had allowed the meeting to have broken up at the close of Mr. Gibson's speech. (Cries of "No, no.") I really have nothing whatever to add to what has been said to-night upon the subject. (Cries of "Go on, go on.") The only point that I would venture to occupy your time for a moment upon, is to urge upon you increased activity in adding to the number of 40s. freeholders in the counties of Middlesex, East Surrey, and Hertfordshire. I do not believe that there has been before the people of the counties eight more memorable days than those which will intervene between the present time and the meeting of Parliament. I do not think you have had a period when there was more in your own power than there is now between this and the close of the present month. We are now virtually contesting the election—not in Middlesex, that is won; you have gained there a majority of upwards of 1700, sufficient to return two Free Traders; but we are virtually now contesting the election in East Surrey and Hertfordshire. It is in your power, by the purchase of 40s. freeholds between this and the close of the month, to win both these counties—East Surrey for two Free Traders, and Hertfordshire for three. (Cheers.) You see what the Protection Society's last move is. It recently met at 17, Old Bond Street, to rescind its fourth resolution, so as to make itself ready for competing with us in the registration courts with success; in fact, to put itself in a position to follow our lead. They say we are attending to the registration; so will they—we are making 40s. freeholders; so will they. They assert that our proceedings are unconstitutional, that we have no right to take these measures with reference to the registration of the country. We beg to remind the noble duke who took the chair at that meeting, that his proceeding is really unconstitutional, and that, on the other hand, we are the real defenders of the constitution; the theory of that constitution being that we should have a House of Commons free from being tampered with by the House of Lords (cheers); and yet in reality we have no such House of Commons. (Renewed cheers.) We say, "we have rather more to do, please your grace, than to attend to the purging of registers of counties and boroughs, and increasing the number of independent 40s. freeholders; we will have a committee of inquiry into the unjust and unconstitutional interference of members of the peerage with the election of commoners." I find that every session there is a standing order of the House of Commons against the interference of peers in the election of commoners. Annually is that standing order renewed. At nearly every election that occurs; certainly at every general election, is that order openly, flagrantly, and unconstitutionally violated. (Hear.) Why, I have here a list of places that return members by the direct and avowed influence of peers? Does not Lord Salisbury return the member for Hertford? Does not the Duke of Richmond return those for Chichester, and in the county of Sussex? Has he not been boasting of his interest in West Sussex, and defying the League to come into that county, telling us that he can drive so many farmers up to the poll, that we cannot possibly have any power to win that county? Does not Lord Londonderry dare to dictate to the city of Durham, and to the southern division of that county who shall be their representatives? Has he not been holding a correspondence lately with the Conservative Association there, respecting a requisition, calling upon Lord Dunsannon to come forward at the next election? Then, is there not the Duke of Marlborough returning three representatives, within the last three years, for Woodstock—two of them his own sons. (Hear, hear.) Is there not the Duke of Newcastle, returning members for Newark, and having such influence, that Mr. Gladstone cannot get in there again? Many of the constituency of Newark are in favour of Free Trade, and they have been in correspondence with Mr. Gladstone, with a view to his return as their member; but that right honourable gentleman knows better; he is well aware that the Duke of Newcastle has such influence in that borough as would completely prevent his return if he were he to attempt it. Then there is Lord Lincoln, does he not dictate for Nottingham; the Duke of Buckingham for Buckingham; ditto for Winchester; ditto for Aylesbury; Lord Egmont for Midhurst; Lord Exeter for Stamford; Lord Bathurst for Cirencester; Lord Shaftesbury for Dorchester; Lord Sandwich for Huntingdon? and so on through a whole list of them with which I will not trouble you; you may have read it yourselves in the papers. I say there is in this list abundant proof of unconstitutional interference with elections, contrary to the standing orders of the House of Commons, which it is the duty of members of that House to endeavour to put a stop to; and if there is no other way of stopping it, then let the boroughs under such influence be disfranchised. (Hear.) We will teach these men what unconstitutional interference with elections is. Then they call our registration proceeding unconstitutional. The Duke of Richmond says—and I wish you to remember this—"The gentlemen of the Corn Law League boasted openly that they were determined to carry the county elections of England by fabricated votes. This threat, he doubted not, they would endeavour to execute to the utmost extent of the means at their disposal." I have not the slightest doubt of it. I believe gentlemen of "the Corn Law League"—that is, the Protection

League—the League of which the Dukes of Buckingham, Richmond, Norfolk, and Sir Edward Knatchbull, are at the head; the League that meets at No. 17, Old Bond-street; I know their intention is to carry their question by the abstraction of votes; it is the very means by which they have already succeeded. Our proceedings have been to purge the registers of their fabricated votes; and the very way in which we have made such gain upon the registers, has been not merely by adding 40s. freeholds to the list, but by getting rid of the fabricated votes of the protection party. (Loud cheers.) "Gentlemen of the Corn Law League" are the fabricators of votes; they are the men who unconstitutionally interfere in elections in this country; but we of "the Anti-Corn-Law League," what have we done? We have taken hold of the register as it stands, looked over it, and found it was not such as was required by law. We had a shrewd suspicion that there were men upon it who had no right whatever to be there. (Hear, hear.) There was a case which recently occurred at Highgate where a man claimed for a 40s. freehold, and when asked where it was, replied it was in the churchyard. (Laughter.) There it was—a grave. Who was the occupying tenant paying him 40s. a year rent—(laughter)? As he could not tell who the occupying tenant was, he was struck off the register. There were persons in East Surrey who claimed for 40s. freeholds, every one of them, and what was it for? 40s. a year, 10s. a quarter, for preaching a quarterly sermon in a certain church in that county, which was paid out of some land-rent or other, and thereupon they called themselves "40s. freeholders." (Laughter.) They were of course struck off. I give you these instances merely by way of enlivening the matter as we go on. One might readily produce scores of such cases. When these protectionists speak of our tampering with the register, and say that we make wholesale multitudes of votes to swamp elections, one would imagine that we could steal in at night and write down upon the register the names of Free Traders and rub out the names of those who are opposed to us, and make a register just such as we please. Why, do not you know that, with reference to the register, if we object to any man from the 1st of August to the 25th of that month, a list of the objections in good large legible print is nailed up to the church door, and stuck up in public places for all comers to go and look at, and see whether those objections are good or bad? Do they not know that those objections must not be merely nailed up to the church door, but notice thereof must be sent to the party objected to, and that there must be legal proof given that they have had actual notice of such objection? Do they not know that from the 11th of September to the 31st of October, an open court is held, where a barrister sits on the bench, called the revising barrister's court, where all these objections are gone into in the presence of the parties objected to, who have an opportunity of defending their votes if they are defensible, retaining them on the register if it is right they should be, and striking them off if they have no right to be on. It is in that way we have purged the register throughout the country—it is in that manner we have proceeded throughout England. They have notice of objections served upon them, and an account of every cause why they are sought to be removed from the register. The objections are dealt with in the way I tell you, and they are only struck off after argument has been gone into in open court, and the decision of the barrister, in the presence of the party objected to, and clear proof given that they had no right to be upon the right, clearing the register from the unfair parties opposing us. And then, how have we got on with our claims—those claims that we have added to the register? Have not all our claims to be sent in by the 20th of July? Is there not some three weeks allowed to object to them? Did not our opponents object to every name put on the register by us in the county of Middlesex? There was not one name which they did not object to. (Hear.) Not only have we a right to object, but if the objection be held to be invalid, the electors have a claim to a fine or compensation for loss of service, and for the expenses which they have incurred in being brought up there improperly to defend their votes. And yet, with all the objections that were made by us against monopolists in the county of Middlesex, but 21. was awarded against the League upon this ground, proving that in almost every case we were right. We have established our claims in the same way in open court. It is impossible to attach too much importance to these 40s. freeholds. I sincerely trust that between this and the 30th of January the applications at 67, Fleet-street, will increase daily. There you may obtain the whole of the particulars you may require for the purpose of enabling you to become freeholders of Middlesex, East Surrey, Hertford, or any other county in which you may desire to become possessed of the franchise. For 50l. you may be put in possession of a 40s. freehold, yielding you 4 per cent for your money. Having these freehold votes you will then be ready when the election comes. (Hear.) You will then have no occasion to run about hither and thither when the day of election actually comes, in all the dread and anxiety whether you shall or shall not win. If you want to win in the counties you must win now. (Hear, hear.) If you want to rescue East Surrey from the hands of the monopolists, it will not be by canvassing and speeches merely at the time of election, but by now purchasing 40s. freehold votes from the counties. This is the franchise which these monopolist speakers call unconstitutional, a franchise settled by the 6 and 7 Henry VIII., by which this important right was conferred. They call it unconstitutional to make 40s. freeholders. They speak as if we, Leaguers, spent our 100,000l. last year, and our 50,000l. the year before that, and intended to spend our 250,000l. this year in purchasing these freeholds and making them presents to the people. (Laughter.) We have done nothing of the kind. We have expended our funds in spreading such information as has induced the people to purchase for themselves, and by creating such an organization throughout the country as is necessary to effect this registration movement. Now what have you to do between this time and the meeting of Parliament? What, above all things, is it necessary for you to be ready for? You have already been told by Mr. Villiers and Mr. Milner Gibson, to take care that there shall be no compromise; nothing short of entire justice, if offered, shall be accepted. I cannot find any language sufficient to express the importance which I attach to the people of this country being in perfect readiness for whatever proposal may be brought forward by Sir Robert Peel. (Hear, hear.) Your meeting to-night will have a strong influence upon him. It is more than ever necessary for you to be unequivocal in the message which you will send to Parliament, being called on now to make a final stand against this falsely called protection. It is your duty, and the duty of every constituency, to memorialise its representatives, calling upon them to vote for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, and nothing short of their total and immediate repeal. (Cheers.) There has been some talk—the most lamentable nonsense, in my opinion, which has been uttered at protection meetings—about compensation. Mr. Newdegate spoke upon this subject at the meeting recently held at No. 17, Old Bond-street. "Compensation!" it is said, "what compensation could be awarded them in lieu of the duty on food?"—Another says, "Talk of compensation! Why, putting the whole burdens of the land upon the consolidated fund would not compensate us. We cannot be compensated." I say we will not talk of compensation; do not be afraid of it; we have not the slightest intention of any such absurdity. If there is any party to be compensated, it must in justice be those who have been plundered. (Hear.) The Quarterly Review says, that for the last thirty years the Corn Law upon an average has raised the price of wheat 15s. a quarter, that is 15,000,000l. a year. (Hear.) If they talk about compensation, we will beg them to repay us all that vast sum. (Hear, hear.) Compensation indeed! Compensation to those who enacted that law thirty-one years ago in defiance of the country, who hurried the bill through the House with such haste that the country had no time to meet, petition, and express its opinion against it! (Hear.) Compensation to those who, in spite of a petition signed by the citizens of London in one day to the amount of 41,000, enacted that law! Compensation to the men who rode down the poor people assembled at Peterloo in 1819 to petition for the repeal of this law! Compensation to those who have oppressed industry for thirty-one years! Was there ever such an instance of audacity heard of before? Do you imagine that any men will be found to stand up in the House of Commons and ask for compensation? That there can be any serious idea of putting in such a claim? Do they come forward and say, "You gave twenty millions to the slave holders to take their grasp off their fellow-creatures, give us something to let their bread be free," we reply, do you want to stand in the same category with the slave-holder? We have reviewed our verdict as to that grant. We say that twenty millions should have been given to the slave. (Loud cheers.) It should have been taken not from our purses to be given to the slave-holder, but from the pockets of the slave-holders to be given to the men whom they had wronged. These protectionists talk of compensation: we will tell them to be content; that we ask for nothing but forgetfulness of the past, and the total and immediate abolition of the law. If they speak of compensation, we will tell them to go over to our penal colonies, and see if they cannot find some men there whom poverty and hunger, the result of the scarcity of food made by those laws, tempted in the beginning of that criminal course which ended in their transportation to a penal colony. We ask if they can compensate them—if they can bring them home, and restore them to the situation they held, before want drove them into a course that ended so lamentably? We will ask them to go and look at our Gazette for the last thirty years, since they enacted this law, and trace the history of those merchants, shopkeepers, manufacturers, and others whose names are inserted there, and find out which of them has been broken down struggling for independence in spite of the most heroic endurance, perseverance, and industry by the crippling of trade, the result of these laws. Who can compensate them? (Cheers.) We will tell them to go into our orphan asylums, and try if they cannot find some children there whose parents were worn out before their time by want, from endeavouring to work when they had not food enough to sustain them in their anxiety for the support of their families, and let them try if they can compensate those children for the loss of their parents. (Cheers.) We will tell them to go into our union workhouses and endeavour to find old men and women there scarcely knowing whether they have a friend on earth left to protect them, left without home in their old age, notwithstanding they had worked hard in their youth to earn an honest independence, who had a right to expect it from their work in their old days. (Hear, hear, hear.) We ask them to look if there are no young persons in those workhouses brought down to that by the perpetually crushing effect of these Corn Laws, and we will tell them to compensate them. When they have done all that, let them go out over the broad land into those counties where they keep their agents ever busy at work on the register; let them go out into the neighbourhood of the boroughs which these noble lords influence—into the counties of Dorset, Devon, Norfolk, Suffolk, to Essex, Hants, and Wilts, and tell us if there are not whole sets of farmers who have been swept off farm after farm, having agreed to give high rents, believing that the Corn Law would enable them to realise such prices as would enable them to pay those rents by pressing the whole population down; and let them tell us if these parties can be compensated? Then let them take the climax of the whole—let them go out amongst their own agricultural labourers—"a bold peasantry, their country's pride"—the labourers whose health they drink—the labourers to whom they give prizes for rearing their families upon the least possible amount of provisions—the labourers that they are for ever talking of as if they were their especial favourites—to go into their wretched hovels that do not keep the wind and rain out, and let them go amongst the five hundred or six hundred labourers amongst whom the beds were distributed, which were subscribed for by the Free Traders in Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Hampshire, Oxfordshire, and elsewhere—let them go out into the cabins of their own peasantry, and see how they live—let them recollect that much of the anxiety felt at the present moment, is on account of the rot amongst the potato crop. It is proved that five millions of agricultural labourers, four millions in Ireland, and one in this country, live upon potatoes, and are likely to starve in consequence of the failure of the crop. How do they propose to compensate these labourers? Can they compensate men who have grown old before their time, working while it was daylight from year's end to year's end, and living, after all, on nothing better than pig's food—potatoes. (Cheers.) Can these protectionists compensate these injured men? Let them not talk of compensation! There is a dark and heavy account of responsibility lying at the doors of those who maintain the Corn Law. If they speak of compensation—if they retard the repeal by one day's debate for compensation, I tell you what must be done. The labourers of Wiltshire must again meet at Goatacre after their day's work, and not only have their speeches reported, but choose delegates to their class in other agricultural counties—the 12 or 13 counties in which the Rev. Sidney Godolphin Osborne, at the Hanover Rooms, said were in the same condition. We must have delegates from the labourers in every one of these counties, marching up to London claiming audience of Sir R. Peel, and appearing before him to refute the assertion that the Corn Law has been for their benefit. It is the first time a deputation of agricultural labourers in Downing-street will be seen coming to ask their own, demanding from the Prime Minister that, living upon God's bountiful and blessed earth, they should have as much of its bountiful production as their own strong arms, hard hands, and willing minds could earn for them. (Cheers.) I caution these protectionists; let them not talk about compensation. Why, between the present time and the meeting of Parliament—between this and the end of this month—you have a great responsibility thrown on you to protect the interest of these labourers. It rests with you to stand by them. The duty may be thrown more closely on you. It may be that Sir Robert Peel cannot carry his measure, or that he is attempting some measure short of the whole, and that he shall be defeated. I trust in that case that his country is ready for the awful responsibility which will be cast upon it. (Hear, hear.) I believe that London is ready to return four Free Traders, and Middlesex two. I cannot but believe that by the 31st of January the registers of East Surrey and Hertford will be in such a position as that those two places between them will be ready to return five Free Traders. I do believe that this new year will be the brightest and happiest that England has had for a long time. 31 or 32 years ago about this time of the year, there was breathless anxiety respecting the war then raging in Europe, and great interest as to the names of battles and victories. The whole country was ready in a moment to ring its bells, light up its windows, and go to its churches to return thanks because their side had killed more of "the enemy," as they called them than were destroyed in their own ranks. But none of you have a subject that you might so well meet for with breathless anxiety, one of infinitely more importance to you, and the question is, shall the great skill and industry of England, its mighty capital, its power, its trade be made as strong and as powerful for good as they have a right to be? The question is, shall this great England feed itself, shall it be let out of the hands of Parliament? Shall it continue to be dandled, nursed, and spoon-fed by Lords and Commons? Shall it be allowed to go abroad into the world and provide for itself? Has it not grown strong enough for its own maintenance? You cannot watch the coming events with too much interest: it is of vital importance to this great country; our whole position takes a change from the moment we have obtained freedom of trade. From that time we look forward to every man getting his fair share of the produce of the world; we say we will be contented with nothing short of a total, immediate, unconditional and uncompensated repeal of the Corn Laws, (Cheers.) There is one class here to whom I have a word to say, and then I have done. There are many men here who have worked for 31 years, who felt indignant when this was enacted in spite of the remonstrance of the country; there are many present who, long after the time which seems to be so near at hand, have been sneered at and pointed at as impracticable, for believing that this Free Trade question would ever be carried. I feel a wish to shake hands, and congratulate every one of them now; and ask them if they do not feel somewhat of the warmth of youth again at the near triumph of that for which they have toiled so long. I believe you have never too earnestly wished for it. If you could have seen the anxiety of the people in the manufacturing districts when they found food rising and heard the bad accounts of the weekly markets in Manchester and the other towns in Lancashire and Yorkshire; if you could have witnessed the delight of the people, their joyous greetings, the glad faces in the market on the Saturday night when they read that announcement in the Times a few weeks ago, believing that their long-felt anxiety at a time of distress, the shadow of which was before them was about to be got rid of, and the cause of it to be swept away for ever; if you could have seen their joy when they believed that Lord John Russell was about to form a Government, whose great principle was based upon the repeal of the Corn Laws; if you could have beheld the variations from gladness to despondency, from doubt and hesitancy to anxiety and fear; to have felt that the law was likely to be discontinued or repealed; if you knew the reason of that anxiety, if you had witnessed the bitter sufferings they have had to endure when the law pressed upon them, and when they wanted food and were willing to labour, but there was no work to be done, and no wages to be had; and men who love independence, who spurn the very idea of pauperism, who would have walked the country over to get work, yet had to go and stand in the yard of the parish relieving officer, waiting their turn for the miserable pittance of relief; I say, if you knew the joy of the recent revival of trade, the getting home of furniture again, the getting into better lodgings again, the getting on of better clothes again, the sending children to school again, the returning looks of health and strength of men, women, and children again; and if you could have seen on all our lines of railway the crowded trains of pleasure trips upon the Saturday half day, and at other holiday times, the very last clingers to protection would say, "We are ashamed to have stood by this law so long; we blush to have wronged these people for such a length of time! Compensation to us! We stand before the whole land and acknowledge that we have been in error, acknowledging that we have wronged them; we ask only this, that instead of giving compensation, they will forgive us, and believe that we are their friends for the future." The learned gentleman resumed his seat amidst enthusiastic applause.

The CHAIRMAN then came forward, and said, Ladies and Gentlemen, I have only to thank you for the very great order which has marked the whole of these proceedings, and to inform you that the meetings will be held here more frequently in future than they have hitherto been; and in all probability, the next meeting will be this day fortnight. (Three cheers were then given for the League, and the meeting separated at a few minutes to eleven.)

GREAT MEETING AT LIVERPOOL.

13,000. SUBSCRIBED TO THE LEAGUE FUND.

A magnificent gathering was obtained at Liverpool on the 9th, in the Amphitheatre, to give another impulse to the Great "Emergency" Fund now raising by the Anti-Corn-Law League. The meeting was called by a requisition bearing the signatures of some of the first merchants in Liverpool, the hour fixed upon being one o'clock. At that time the vast building—stage, circus, pit, dress circle, boxes, gallery—every part of the house, from the ground floor to the very roof, was crowded, and appeared instinct with life and animation. The boxes were filled with well-dressed ladies; and as they rose to wave their handkerchiefs, and join in the general expression of enthusiasm, which frequently burst forth during the proceedings, the coup-d'œil presented by the house at such times was past all description. If the money-amount collected at the meeting was less than that obtained at the Manchester meeting, no one who witnessed the proceedings can deny that the people of Liverpool are as heartily with the League in this great movement as it is possible for a people to be. The stage was crowded with merchants and the élite of the commercial classes of Liverpool; and above their heads, at the back of the stage, was erected their motto, inscribed in legible characters:

"RESOLVED, WE WON'T STAND IT ANY LONGER!"

The chair, on the motion of Mr. Holland, was taken by W. Brown, Esq., the candidate for the representation of South Lancashire at the late election. At his side were Richard Cobden, Esq., M.P., John Bright, Esq., M.P., the energetic and untiring champions of the cause, Thomas Thornley, Esq., M.P., Col. Thompson, William Rathbone, Esq., Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., J. Brander, Esq., &c. &c. The requisition convening the meeting having been read by Mr. Rawlins, the honorary secretary to the Liverpool Anti-Corn-Law Association,

The CHAIRMAN said:—Gentlemen, you are aware that we are met on this occasion to co-operate with, to sustain and strengthen, our friends of the Anti-Corn Law League—(loud cheering)—who have, for the long period of seven years, fought the Free Trade battle. (Continued cheering.) Gentlemen, we must not let the present occasion pass with a simple note of approbation, but we must be ready to furnish them with a large, and I hope a glorious subscription to enable them to carry out those objects for which they have so long and so nobly contended. (Loud cheers.) We cannot estimate—it is impossible to estimate—the services done for us by our enlightened friends Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright—(a great burst of cheering, the whole company rising)—and other gentlemen of the League, who have not only contributed a large portion of the pecuniary resources which were necessary to carry on this great struggle, but devoted an important portion of their time in endeavouring to get that justice done to you which we are entitled to, by the revocation of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) You have the example before you of Manchester, whose merchants have raised an amount towards this object unprecedented on any former occasion—(loud cheers)—and I have no doubt, gentlemen, that both you and the country at large will respond to the call in a similarly liberal spirit. We meet here this day not to make long speeches, but what is better, to do some substantial good, and I hope and trust that the cards distributed through this vast assembly, on which to write your subscriptions, will be sent up to the platform with no meagre amounts upon them. (Cheers.) We meet here with hearts determined, and with our purses in hand, to show the country that we are in earnest—that we will not be satisfied with any half measure now that the settling day is come: we must have a "clean bill of health" for all her Majesty's subjects. (Loud cheers.) We are now arrived at a crisis—this measure it is now evident must be settled—and it depends upon you, and upon our friends united upon this question, whether we shall have a full measure of redress or a compromise. (Cries of "No compromise.") No, I think our opponents may rest assured that you will be satisfied with no compromise, and I think we may also rest assured that our friends who have led this movement, and have the command, will never surrender the ship till they have brought it into port. (Loud cheers.) We have hoisted the white flag of Free Trade; it must be our endeavour to preserve it pure. We have been told that as England has relaxed her tariffs, other countries have made theirs more stringent. This is not a time to go over the whole of 22 treaties to answer this fallacy; but I may say that many of the countries with which we have those treaties have Free Trade already; that others only are waiting for us to set the example; there is only one solitary blot upon the escutcheon, and that is in the case of France. But once let us have the white flag of Free Trade hoisted, and no country will make war upon it without losing their places and standing as commercial nations. Gentlemen, I will not detain you longer, but call upon our distinguished friends, who will place before you, in a stronger point of view than I can, the importance of this question, and the necessity of now bringing to their assistance both our hearts and our purses. (Loud cheers.) I will now call upon Mr. Rathbone to move the first resolution.

WILLIAM RATHBONE, Esq., said he rose to move—"That we the inhabitants of Liverpool do hereby repeat our solemn protest against the laws which prohibit the free importation of foreign grain and provisions, or interfere in any way with the natural operations of commerce, believing them to be most oppressive to the great mass of the people, and destructive alike to the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country. That, relying upon the justice of our cause, and upon the intelligence and honesty of our countrymen, we do declare most emphatically our firm determination not to relax in our exertions until those laws be totally repealed. That we hereby express our high sense of the invaluable services which the National Anti-Corn-Law League has rendered to the cause of Free Trade; and in order to enable its Council to make renewed and increased exertions, a subscription be now entered into in aid of the great fund of a Quarter of a Million (20 per cent. to be paid up immediately); and that the following gentlemen be appointed a committee, with power to add to their number, to canvass for further subscriptions in this town and neighbourhood." (Here followed the list of names.) In moving this resolution, Mr. Rathbone said, 50 years back, in Williamson-square, William Roscoe, Edward Rushton, and William Rathbone, my father, and many others were stoned for taking part against that atrocious war with France which I firmly believe was the cause of our having this day to unite with heart and purse to struggle for the removal of this law. (Hear, hear.) I hope that no recording angel's tear will ever blot out the record of this fact, but that it will be remembered and pointed out to every statesman, what is the retribution which follows such unjust and iniquitous interferences. (Loud cheers.) We had the "life and property" men coming forward, and saying they would give their last shilling in support of "Church and State" (laughter); and it was a glorious victory which they achieved: it ended in 1815, but how did the "life and property" men redeem the pledge they made as to their last shilling? Fortunately the rivers of blood that were shed did not flow upon our own shores; but millions and millions of debt were thrown upon the country; and when in 1816 the war terminated, how did these men redeem it?—by passing a law for you to pay it! (Great cheering.) Gentlemen, as we hope to be forgiven, we will forgive them only if at this, the eleventh hour, they will come and free us from this unjust burden (cheers); but we will have justice. (Renewed cheering.) There is "justice for Ireland" and "justice for England," and as there is a God in heaven we will have it. (Tremendous cheering.) Gentlemen, we will support Sir Robert Peel, if, for once, he will be honest. (Cheers.) He knows that the so called liberal party—(and it is a liberal party) may be relied upon; he relies upon their honesty to carry those measures, which, when out of power, he advocates. (Applause.) He knows that he can rely upon them only to carry these measures. He knows where honesty is, and by that honesty, and by the exertions of the people, will these measures be carried. (Cheers.) I hope, gentlemen, you will carry this resolution, and that you will not only carry it with your voices, but that you will put your hands into your pockets at the same time. (Cheers.)

LAWRENCE HEYWORTH, Esq., who seconded the motion, said—Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen, when we commenced the agitation for the removal of the restrictions on commerce, we adopted a system which we considered to be most legitimate. Our first design was to expose the fallacies of that financial system which has hitherto governed the legislature of this country. Our first effort was to enlighten the minds of the people, and to show that protection laws and legislative monopolies were destructive to the interests of every part of the community. Ladies and gentlemen, we have been successful in this our first endeavour; and we now consider, because we have ample proof and testimony of the fact from every part of the country, that the public mind is well enlightened on this subject. (Cheers.) They now see clearly that monopoly laws and protection laws serve only to cripple our trade, to diminish the employment of our labourers, and to bring scarcity and famine; whereas, we ought to have, as a commercial population, abundance of employment, and an abundance of that which is to constitute, in the final result, the essential pay and reward of the labourer. Having arrived at this stage of our proceedings, it is necessary to take another step onwards. It is by the representatives of the people in Parliament that our laws are made; and we now consider that if the people had their wills in this respect (their minds being now enlightened) they would indubitably send up to proclaim legislators who would give us freedom of commerce. (Cheers.) Our object now is to extend the franchise of the country. (Loud applause.) Our design is to place within the reach of the labouring classes (he means of more readily acquiring the 40s. freehold than they have ever previously been able to do. Thus to extend the franchise is consistent with the constitution of the country; it is every way consistent with the rights of Englishmen (cheers); and we do hope that we shall succeed ultimately in gaining the representation of the counties—a right which has hitherto been most surreptitiously and wrongfully taken from Englishmen. (Loud cheers.) We do hope that we shall in this succeed with all the counties in England, as we have already succeeded in South Lancashire, West Yorkshire, and North Cheshire, and as I am told also we have now succeeded in North Lancashire. (Cheers.) Now we are quite certain when we have succeeded in this great step, we shall accomplish effectually the object we have in view. (Loud cheers.) But in order to take this step, we must have the necessary means; we must have money; and you must come forward liberally to subscribe the funds necessary to assist us in that object. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) I perceive before me a vast number of my fellow-townsmen. It is true that this subscription has been, so far, mainly entered into by the wealthy among the mercantile and manufacturing classes of this country, but I am persuaded that if the labouring classes will come forward with such small means as they can afford, it will give an amazing accession to the power of the League for accomplishing their object. (Hear, hear.) Ladies and gentlemen, we look forward with great confidence to the system and the means which we have adopted for accomplishing the direct object we have in view; but at the same time we warn the aristocracy that the influence which we shall create, the power we shall wield, will be such as shall raise the middle classes and operatives of this country to a state of manly independence. (Loud cheers.) And be assured as this power advances the aristocracy must look to it, or all their exclusive rights and privileges will be utterly destroyed. (Cheers.) It is for them to cogitate upon this revolution; we leave them to think it over, wisely and well. But if they will adopt the principles we are now striving to carry out, if they will give us freedom of commerce, the result will be such universal prosperity throughout the country, as may allow for a length of time, perhaps for a generation, those other agitations to which I have directed attention. If the people be happy and comfortable—if they have abundance of employment, cheap food, and every thing else cheap, the nominal rate of their wages will be advanced; and not only so, but, articles of consumption being cheapened, their wages will represent an amount double what they do now. Though I look forward with pleasure to this position and state of things, and though I know this will in some measure allay the other desires that the people have felt for a length of time, I do not deprecate their energies being put forth to obtain for themselves those privileges to which they have every just right. (Cheers.) Ladies and gentlemen, I trust that the observations which have been made, and the long acquaintance which you have had with this vital subject, which interests every town in England, will induce you to come forward liberally on this occasion to aid the League in the great and glorious object which they have in view. It is not an object which belongs to this country or to its inhabitants alone. It is an object which affects the welfare of the whole human family; and I am happy to see, as our worthy chairman has observed, that the various nations of the world are opening their eyes to the importance of this struggle. The last time I addressed you in this place I mentioned that an eminent individual, General Macduff, in America, had proclaimed, with whole soul and mind, his utter abhorrence of all protective duties. Now we have these sentiments promulgated on authority from the American Government itself. Mr. Walker, a member of the Government of America, and an officer of the treasury in finance, expresses his sentiments in these words: "Let our commerce be as free as our political institutions—[we said Mr. Heyworth] wish our commerce to be freer than our political institutions—let us, with revenue duties only, open our ports to all the world, and nation after nation will follow our example. If we reduce our tariff, the party opposed to the Corn Laws of England would soon prevail, and admit all our agricultural produce at all times freely into her ports, in exchange for her exports; and if England would now repeal her duties upon our wheat, flour, Indian corn, and other agricultural products, our restrictive system would certainly be doomed to overthrow." (Loud cheers.) Thus you see, my friends, that the battle we are fighting here in England is not a battle for the community of England only; it is a battle for the community of the whole world. (Cheers.) Here is a noble object to aim at accomplishing; here is an object worthy of every man, whether as a patriot, a Christian, or simply as a man. It is worthy of every man to aid in carrying out this laudable enterprise; and I trust that every one present will feel ready to contribute most heartily to the attainment of this great object. (Loud cheers.)

The resolution having been put and carried, the chairman called upon Mr. Bright, M.P., the mention of whose name was received with unbounded enthusiasm.

Mr. JOHN BRIGHT then rose, and was received with renewed expressions of applause. He said, Mr. President and Gentlemen,—At this moment I cannot help looking back to the period when I first formed one of a deputation from the Anti-Corn Law League to visit the town and port of Liverpool to invite its large and enterprising and intelligent population to assist us in the great contest upon which we were then entering. I recollect, that although there was then a large audience to greet us, yet that it was felt by every body that in your town, amongst many very influential persons, there was extreme apathy to the object we had in view. We have found, however, that here, as elsewhere, by persevering labour, by honest devotion to the great question, and one good principle, we have gradually stimulated our friends to renewed and increased exertions, and have diminished to a very large extent the opposition with which we were met by those who did not coincide with us. At present we have, I believe, almost the whole kingdom in favour of the principles which we have expounded. (Hear, hear.) It may be said without any hesitation, that the vast overwhelming majority of all those engaged in the manufactures of this kingdom are at this moment earnestly in favour of Free Trade. (Applause.) And it may as truly be said that amongst the artisan class—those by whose labour and ingenuity all our exports are prepared, that there is a unanimous feeling of approval of the course that we have pursued—(applause and shouts of "bravo")—with reference to this great question now before us. The town population, as a rule, is in favour of the emancipation of the industry of the people. Intelligent landowners we have had some from the beginning, and we find every year that the number of such as unite with us and approve of our question is increasing. Intelligent farmers too we have had from the beginning, but we find that farmers now, who are not the foremost in their class for intelligence and general knowledge, are receiving willingly the principles which we have offered to them, and are beginning to doubt or altogether disbelieve the advantages which their landlords have asserted they would gain from a continuance of the protective system. (Cheers.) But of the vast body of farm labourers throughout the kingdom, I believe we may say that they are with us as unanimously as are the labourers in the manufactories of Lancashire and Yorkshire. (Hear, hear.) We have succeeded, if not in converting, at least in changing, two ministers since the agitation begun—(loud cheering,)—and we have rendered it impossible that any party should undertake office, who is in favour of maintaining, or who will pledge themselves to attempt to maintain the Corn Law, as it now exists, or, in fact, any Corn Law at all. (Cheers.) But there is a class of our opponents that are still unchanged. I mean that class represented by the dukes and high aristocracy and squirearchy, whose speeches have recently occupied so much space in the Morning Post. (Great applause and laughter.) I have been charged with endeavouring to bring the aristocracy into public contempt. I have said harsh things of them, for I have felt harshly towards them. (Hear, hear.) No man can see what I have seen in connexion with this question, and hold the opinions which I entertain, and know that this Corn Law is supported by that class, without feeling his blood, at times, boil within him—(hear, hear;—and feelings, not the most Christian, I admit, may rise when looking at the conduct of a class which has, systematically for a generation at least, sacrificed the great interests of the people to the selfish and miserable interests of a class. (Loud cheers.) But I defy any man living to point to any speech made by any member of the Anti-Corn Law League which deals such fatal blows to the permanence and the supremacy of the aristocratic element in the British constitution as the speeches which have been made within the last month by men who are so fond of that element, and so devoted to that supremacy, that they would willingly sacrifice the people to maintain them. (Hear, hear.) Most of you have heard what has been said by the duke, and lord, and squire within the last month. Now I ask you, as representatives of a great commercial community, is it your opinion that those men are qualified by intelligence, or by their sympathy with right, and with the people, to rule over and to regulate trade and the vast mercantile affairs of this greatest of all commercial empires? (No, no.) Are you willing to sit still in Liverpool, and that other towns should sit still elsewhere, and that you should work as you can and earn what you can, and live just as you can, and all this merely permissively; that you should be here, calling yourselves citizens of this country, having the power, if the law did not interfere with you, to gather to yourselves the riches of the whole earth (hear), and to add, ever and ever, to the comfort and well-being of your population. (Cheers.) I ask, are you willing any longer that these men, who have proved their ignorance and their incompetency so that every man must see it, shall rule over and legislate for the commerce of this kingdom? (Applause, and cries of "No, no; we'll stand it no longer.") I said that that class of our opponents had made no change! There is another thing connected with this question which has suffered no change; and it is the great and sacred principle by which we are bound together as, I would say, a political association. We said from the beginning, and all experience has confirmed the opinion then expressed, that the Corn Law did good to no human being, unless it starved some human being (hear, hear); that it is a law which cannot enrich those who made it, unless it starves some of those who are bound to obey it. (Cheers.) And I will ask you to refer to the report of a recent meeting held in Wiltshire, at which a thousand labourers assembled by the light of the moon to discuss the grievances they suffer. Talk of the reign of terror in another country! What sort of a reign is it in this country, when those thousand labourers come out from their hovels almost at the dead of night, there to discuss the tyranny under which they believe themselves to labour, and there to proclaim to the world that the magnanimous aristocracy who rule this country let them cultivate their lands for 5s., 6s., and 7s. a week, and then in the Parliament of Great Britain, and before the world, avow that they have for 30 years been passing laws ostensibly to protect these very labourers. (Cheers.) And whilst this law is thus dealing out suffering and ruin to the labourers of Wiltshire, it is practically dealing out ruin and distress even to many influential capitalists engaged in trade. (Hear, hear.) I won't go back and speak of past years. We know what has happened before; we know where we are now; and we know that if that law be long maintained, the future will only reveal greater calamities than we can speak of as concerning the past. (Hear, hear.) This, then, is the critical time. Mr. Heyworth has spoken of the United States, and has read to you a paragraph from the report of Mr. Secretary Walker—a report which ought to be published in every newspaper in the kingdom—a report which ought to be read by every man in Great Britain and Ireland—a report which is justly regarded as an extending of the friendly hand from the American Government to this country, and asking us to forget bygones, and to be brethren, as we ought for ever to be. (Loud cheers.) The great reduction of the American tariff must follow the abolition of our Corn Laws; the abolition of our Corn Law will for ever destroy all chance of war between this country and the United States. (Loud cheers.) Now, is there a man here with a spirit of benevolence, or Christian feeling, who does not see that at this moment he is bound to come forward, and to urge on this great question to a final settlement? (Renewed cheering.) You may not think political agitation good; you may think that we may have committed some blunders in the course of this warfare in which we have been engaged. All this may be true; but here is a point of time arrived at where there is some danger; many people here thought the great danger that two of the greatest and most civilised nations in the world will be brought, not only into opposition, but into war. Repeat the Corn Law this session, and the chance is that war will for ever be postponed. (Cheers.) And you must recollect that the Prime Minister of England is in a position of extraordinary difficulty, a position which no Prime Minister has occupied, perhaps, within the memory of any man now present. He is the leader of a party who change not,—whose obtuseness, whose infatuation, must eventually be their ruin. (Loud cheers.) He is much wiser than they. He sees that Parliamentary majorities go for nothing against the necessities of a united people. (Loud cheers.) At this moment, in all human probability, he is balancing in his own mind what shall be the precise measure he will submit to Parliament the week after next. Shall it be total and immediate repeal—(cries of Yes, yes)—or shall it be total and not immediate—or shall it be neither immediate nor total, but some compromise that will leave this question unsettled? (Loud cries of "That will not do.") These are the questions which are passing through the mind of the Prime Minister; and they are questions which he must weigh, however well he may be disposed to do that which is really right and just. How then is he to come to the decision to which we wish to invite him? Why how! Not by his own individual strength; he knows that argument does nothing with Christian men whose champion he has been in former years; he knows that all persuasion with them is unavailing. He knows that they saw the trade of the country sink, aye, and their fellow-countrymen die of hunger inflicted by the land, and yet they did not quail and give in; and therefore he turns to other power, he seeks other support, he invites other co-operation, and calls as loudly as Prime Minister could call; and he called the other day, through the answer put into the mouth of the Queen to the addresses of the corporations of London and Dublin—(cheers);—he calls to you and to the whole kingdom to help him to give you redemption from the intolerable burden under which you groan. (Cheers.) Now we do not come to this meeting—we are not here to ask you to make any great effort in which we are not willing to take our share. (Hear, hear.) We were present at that ever memorable meeting which was held in Manchester a fortnight ago—a meeting which has no equal in the past—I trust the future may never demand such another effort from the people of this town. (Cheers.) Here we are assembled to-day to strike another blow; and there are not many days left for the blows which are to be struck before the ministerial scheme is propounded to the country. On Wednesday next we go to Leeds, to be present at a meeting which is to be held there for the purpose of raising a subscription for the Anti-Corn Law League. Now we want this money—we must have it—(cheers and laughter);—and if you are not disposed to pay it, we must go somewhere else, where the people are disposed to pay it. (Cheers and laughter.) In the expenditure of the large sums with which we have been placed in trust, I need say no more than that our proceedings have been public before the world. The newspapers that advocate our views, and those whose principal object it is to slander and calumniate us—these newspapers, alike, have published these statements more or less to the world. The labourers the League has undertaken are before you; and no man can look around him without confessing that—in the vast change which has taken place in public opinion in this kingdom, in the proud position which the question of Free Trade now occupies—if the expenditure had been ten times what it is, and if the labour that had been bestowed had been ten times what we have given, all would have been cheap to have purchased the glorious consummation which, we believe, awaits us. (Loud cheers.) Every man here, who ever gave a farthing to the League, should just consider the position in which he and the League are now placed. If the principle was right to begin with—worth fighting for at all—it is right now, and it is worth fighting for till the end. (Cheers.) If this great struggle, which has taken the best part almost of a life-time, was worth commencing, it is worth carrying out to a final and successful issue. (Applause.) If you wish the money you have already invested in this great national emancipation to bring you and the country and the world its fruits, well, then, add something to it now; and when you find the foe faltering—when you find his ranks giving way—then join in once again with a more unanimous, a more determined charge, and this foe to the nation's industry and to individual happiness will be driven entirely from the field. (Cheers.) This Liverpool has had no great reputation heretofore as connected with this great question, but there are men in this town who have done as much for Free Trade as any men within the limits of the kingdom with the means they had at their disposal. (Cheers.) Hitherto you have sent to Parliament, and now send men, who do not represent the true interests of this commercial community. (True.) I am happy to be able to believe with confidence, that whenever another occasion shall come—and come in all probability it will before the summer's sun shall shine upon us, that all past disgrace of this kind will be wiped away, that Liverpool will take its own position in the front of this great battle. (Cheers.) You acknowledge by the motto of your town—"Deus nobis hæc otia fecit;" God has bestowed upon you great gifts and great obligations. (Cheers.) You are here at the mouth of this noble river, the finest seaport, the greatest in the kingdom—(cheers)—you are backed by a population more numerous and more industrious than any in any part of the world on the same space of ground. Your town is increasing at an enormous rate. Fifteen thousand houses have been built in Liverpool since the League began its struggle. (Applause.) You have a population every day increasing. All that you have done in the past is as nothing to the greatness and the renown which await your future. May I then entreat you that you will look to this question as a question of life and death for Liverpool, for its trade, and for the country; and that, to-day, by your resolutions, by your acts, by your subscriptions, you will give one other (I trust it may be one of the last) of the blows that may be needed to drive this hideous system of monopoly entirely from the earth. (Great cheering.)

Mr. RAWLINS then announced the subscriptions, amongst which were the following:

	£	s.	d.
Wm. Brown, Richmond Hill	1000	0	0
Messrs. Mathers	1000	0	0
Lawrence Heyworth	500	0	0
J. J. Hamilton	500	0	0
Tenants, Clow, and Co.	500	0	0
James Mellor	500	0	0
Chris. and Jas. Rawdon	400	0	0
Thomas Thornley, M.P.	300	0	0
Chas. Wilson, Elm Farm	300	0	0
Rathbone, Brothers, and Co.	300	0	0
Jevons, Sons, and Co.	200	0	0
Darby and Sands	200	0	0
Higgins, Brothers	200	0	0
Chas. Holland	200	0	0
C. Rawlins, jun.	150	0	0
C. E. Rawlins	150	0	0
James Stitt, Son, and Co.	250	0	0
John Finch and Sons	250	0	0
Vincent Higgins and Son	250	0	0
James Ryder	250	0	0
Sir Joshua Walsley	250	0	0
James Branker	250	0	0
James Mullyneux	250	0	0
Jos. Dawson	250	0	0
H. Crossfield and Co., amended from £100 to	250	0	0
James Harvey	150	0	0
J. B. Cooke, Birkenhead	150	0	0
James Crossfield, jun.	150	0	0
James Dennistoun Wood	100	0	0
Thomas Orrell	100	0	0
Joseph C. Ewart	100	0	0
Wm. Stewart	100	0	0
Geo. Maxwell	100	0	0
Joseph Heap	100	0	0
Victor Pootz	100	0	0
Richard Sheil and Co.	100	0	0
Robert E. Harvey	100	0	0
James H. McCrea and Co.	100	0	0
S. P. Hobson	100	0	0
Frederick Pennington	100	0	0
D. Pritchett and Co.	100	0	0
Thomas Blackburn	100	0	0
Sam. Blackburn and Co.	100	0	0
A. Friend to total repeal	100	0	0
Andrew Melly	100	0	0
W. Maxwell	100	0	0
F. Boulton	100	0	0
D. Cannon	100	0	0
James Ryley	100	0	0
Wm. Blain	100	0	0
J. D. Thornely	100	0	0
John Carmichael	100	0	0
Thomas Harvey	100	0	0
Richard Johnson	100	0	0
Richard Sharpe	50	0	0
Wm. Crossfield	50	0	0
Grote, Tomkinson, and Co.	50	0	0
Henry Wood	50	0	0
J. P. G. Smith	50	0	0
Henry Martindale	50	0	0
Wm. Reynolds	50	0	0
Nathaniel Weeld	50	0	0
John Taylor Crook	50	0	0
Joshua Heap	50	0	0
Robert Abbott	50	0	0
George P. Leigh, Kidderminster	50	0	0
Philip Quirk	50	0	0
A. H. Wylie	50	0	0
Eyre Evans	50	0	0
Jeffrey, Maurish, and Co.	50	0	0
James Hodson and Co.	50	0	0
D. Macvicar	50	0	0
Samuel Johnson	50	0	0
Thomas Addison	50	0	0
Samuel Thornely	50	0	0
W. R. Manifold	50	0	0
Edward Lane	50	0	0
John Butler	50	0	0
John Ewart	40	0	0
J. H. and R. C. Rawlins	30	0	0
Thomas Baines	30	0	0
Mr. J. Whitty	25	0	0
Edward Evans and Co.	25	0	0
Joseph Mondle	25	0	0
James Smith	25	0	0
Thomas Bolton	25	0	0
Andrew Kirk	25	0	0
Edward Heap	25	0	0
Wm. Evans, farmer	25	0	0
Taylor and Brothers	25	0	0
M. Leland and Co.	25	0	0
Howard Worsley	25	0	0
D. King and Co.	25	0	0
Thomas Dilwall	25	0	0
Thomas Hibbert, Water-street	20	0	0
Lloyd Reynier	20	0	0
J. S. Hyers	20	0	0
P. E. Webber and Co.	20	0	0
Conservative Free Trader	20	0	0
Alex. Hallam	20	0	0
Francis Hollins	20	0	0
J. H. Tongue, Hope Field	20	0	0
Hughes and Ronald	20	0	0
George J. Everest	10	0	0
Joseph Fernyhough	10	0	0
A Shipowner	10	0	0
Thomas Johnson	10	0	0
Richard Rathbone, jun.	10	0	0
John Holmes	10	0	0
Miss Mellor	10	0	0
John Travis	10	0	0
John Graves	10	0	0

J. Dauber, 34 3s.; R. Turner, 5s.; E. Hampson, 1s.; S. Boyle, 5s.; A. Friend, 5s.; E. Graham, 1s.; W. Hooker, 5s.; W. Somerville, 1s. He says, should it be wanted, he will reckon this 20 per cent. D. Raw, 5s.; and his workmen, 1s. 18s.; J. Hulton, 5s.; E. Moss, 5s. 6d.; E. Clotley, 1s.; P. Eastwood, 5s.; T. Carter, 10s.; W. Atkinson, 10s.; J. W. Lloyd, 1s.; T. Morcroft, 2s. 6d.; T. Fisher, 1s.; W. Cotter, 5s.; J. Binyon, Park-road, 10s.; J. J. Jackson, 5s.; D. Muldrow, 5s.; Perdon Hardy, 1s.; R. McGuire, 2s.; T. Morley, 5s.; T. Esbridge, 5s.; M. Clarke, 1s.; Mrs. Leighton, 2s.; J. P. Jackson, 1s.; W. Stewart, 2s.; J. and W. Samuel, 2s.; B. Hobson, 2s.; P. R. Esklyn, 5s.; J. Laurie, 5s.; L. Keizer, 2s. 2s.; F. S. Pyrer, 5s.; W. McMillan and Co., 5s.; Dr. Baylis and Mrs. Baylis, sen., 5s.; J. Owen, 2s.; W. H. Thomas, 5s. 6d.; S. Leach, 1s.; T. Hill, 1s.; John Bennett, 1s.; J. Gibbons, 3s. 3s.; S. Seaward, 5s. 6d.; J. and J. Birkett, 5s. 6d.; W. Roberts, 1s. 6d.; G. Francis, 2s.; C. Field, 1s.; T. Harris, 5s.; H. Hanson, 5s.; W. Sayer, 1s.; Thomas Smith, 3s. 3s.; George Oldham, 10s. 6d.; R. Oldfield, 5s.; Thomas Cuff, 5s.; Cabel Tate, 5s.; Thomas Roberts, 2s. 2s.; James Taylor, 2s.; Joseph Harrison, 2s.; John Brigg, 2s.; Benjamin Fowler, 2s.; F. Room, Wapping, 1s.; John Miller, 1s. 1s.; R. Husband, 1s. 1s.; Sig. Levi Anconi, 5s.; John Syers, 5s.; H. Welford, 2s.

[A vast number of small subscriptions, owing to the rapidity with which they were read, escaped the reporter's pen; but as a full list of them will be advertised, our Liverpool friends will probably not blame us for this unavoidable omission.]

Whilst the subscription was yet going forward, RICHARD COBDEN, Esq., M.P., was called upon, and was received with overwhelming bursts of applause. He said: I feel that I can say nothing that will have half so much effect upon the public and upon the Government as those manifestations of your zeal and determination which have just been handed in so liberally. (Cheers.) Nor is it necessary that I should appear here in the quality of a beggar: I am not a very good hand at that kind of work, and fortunately I have a colleague in Mr. Bright, who has the best face for a beggar that I know of. (Cheers and laughter.) For he has impressed himself with this belief, that in persuading others to give as generously as he has always given in this cause, he is conferring upon them a great favour, and giving them the satisfaction in future life of reflecting that they have aided in the accomplishment of one of the greatest reforms that the history of the world has witnessed. (Cheers.) There is but one point in connection with this subscription to which I think it necessary to refer, and it is to remove some misapprehension which has got abroad as to the disposal of a portion of this fund. Some of our opponents have deluded themselves with the idea that we are raising this 250,000*l.* in order by some ingenious necromancy to manufacture county votes with it. (Hear, hear.) Now, if our opponents would really think but for a moment before they swallow these raw jokes of their leaders, they would understand at once that a fund of 250,000*l.*, one-fifth of it called up, would go but a very short way indeed in qualifying people to wrest the counties from the monopolists. The whole of the 250,000*l.* would not make more than 5000 votes. (Hear, hear.) We don't propose to buy votes for people; we don't propose to pay a farthing, even for the legal conveyance of the qualifications. All the League proposes to do by its organisation is, to establish a machinery, to pay for secretaries and the expenses of printing and advertising, and the expenses of qualified agents, both legal and others, in order that, if our opponents put us to the necessity, we may be in a position to do in the other counties of the kingdom what has been done in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Yorkshire. (Cheers.) And I really am so much in love with the 40*s.* freehold movement, that I have become almost fanatic on the point. (Laughter.) I am sure that if we obtain our end it will be by that instrument; and I want to bring before your attention the necessity of working that instrument in a neighbouring county. You have nothing more to do here in South Lancashire; but on the other side of the river is a county where you may work with great advantage; and I wish our friends here to consider that Liverpool and Birkenhead have it in charge to make South Cheshire as safe as we have made North Cheshire. I must say that I think the subscription which has advanced so far in Liverpool does you great honour, for, bear in mind, you are differently circumstanced to us in Manchester. In the first place we have no monopoly interest at Manchester; we never had a monopoly interest; we have had no rich West Indian merchants, nor Canadian merchants of olden time giving a fashionable tone to society; and by their wealth influencing public opinion in favour of protection. We have been simply and solely an unprotected cotton trade. (Hear, hear.) But besides that, in justice to you, and that you may not elsewhere be considered to have fallen short of Manchester, I wish it to be understood that in Manchester we have a large number of tributary towns; and those satellite towns on these great occasions always come forward most prominently and liberally with their subscriptions; and thus they swell the nominal amount of Manchester subscriptions, though they are not all contributed by Manchester houses. Liverpool, on the other hand, stands alone, a divided interest with many rich people in the ranks of your opponents, and having no tributary towns; and under these disadvantageous circumstances, I think that your demonstration to-day, will be considered by the country as wholly equal to what we did a fortnight ago in Manchester. (Loud cheers.) And I here beg to offer my tribute to those gentlemen in Liverpool who, in adverse times, have laboured for this good cause. (Hear, hear.) Here are gentlemen near me, one whose name I need but mention (alluding to Mr. Brown), who has grown grey in the service of the public—(enthusiastic cheers); a man who has always been ready to lead the forlorn hope in attacking every abuse, and who has not waited till the great battalion of reserve were coming up to his assistance. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, what you have done here encourages me to hope that what you are about to do soon will be decisive of this question. You cannot exaggerate the importance of the representation of Liverpool on this question. I agree with my friend Mr. Bright, that we shall have a dissolution on this question before it is settled. I have no doubt Parliament will be dissolved before next Midsummer. When that event occurs, nothing will be looked to with so much anxiety as the return of members for Liverpool. (Hear and applause.) I hear it everywhere asked, they say wherever I go—"You tell us South Lancashire is won—the West Riding is won—but what will they do in Liverpool in case of an election?" (Cheers.) Now I am anxious that this question should be put on the fairest possible footing, so as to give every man in this borough the opportunity of recording a Free Trade vote at the next election. This is not a party question; we have never treated it as a political party question; and I am glad to think that this question, by its force and justice, is destined to break up every old political party. You will be placed in a very different position in Liverpool on this question within a fortnight's time from this hour to what you have ever been in before. This day fortnight you'll know the intentions of the present Government. Now we have signs enough to prove to us—signs in the conduct of such men as Mr. Christopher, who, on the former changes of the tariff, was considered the pilot balloon of Sir Robert Peel—we have evidence now, in his declaration, that he is opposed to Government—we have in the fact that the Duke of Newcastle, who owns Newark, you know, having declared that Mr. Gladstone, who has taken office with Sir R. Peel, shall not go back from Newark again to sit in Parliament—(hear, hear); we have evidence enough in these facts to show us that Sir Robert Peel is going to propose a measure which will separate him from the protectionist party in Parliament. (Cheers.) Well, a rupture in the ranks of the leader in the House of Commons will have its consequence in the ranks of their followers in Liverpool. This day fortnight, and the great Conservative party in Liverpool will be scattered to the winds. (Loud cheers.) You'll not know, next Friday week, when you meet your fellow-townsmen on your Exchange what to call them. (Laughter.) You have,

I suppose in this town, two sections of what may be called Tories: there are the Peelites, or the moderate section; there are the ultras, whom, if you please, we'll call the Buckingham or Richmondites. (Cheers and laughter.) Well, I take it that three-fourths, nay, four-fifths of the Conservatives of Liverpool are Peelites. Sir Robert Peel will then have ventured the fortunes on the Free Trade cause (hear, hear, hear), and his followers here will be Free Traders,—not, probably, exactly Leaguers; we may have been a little too violent for them in times past: we don't ask them to join our clubs; but, gentlemen, they will be relieved from their party ties, and will become free men to consider our question on its own merits. (Loud cheers.) I am anxious, gentlemen, that everywhere we should open the door to a fair and impartial consideration of this question. Let us have no taunts against those who have for a long time been either adverse or doubtful. They have stood aloof because they look to their party. We have had Whigs who have done the same, as well as Tories (hear, hear, hear), and, mind you, there are worse qualities in a man than that determined resolution which makes him adhere to a party-colour when he has adopted it. We don't like renegades any more than the Tories; and we all know how much moral courage it requires to advocate a principle before party leaders have made up their minds to adopt that principle. (Applause.) Well, gentlemen, this day fortnight you'll have some of the best men in this town altogether released from their party ties and prejudices; then they'll begin to consider this question, and to see how it affects the interests of this good town of Liverpool. Merchants who would not hitherto look at it immediately will begin to see that Free Trade means more trade, and that more trade means more imports, and a fair exchange for the commodities of this district with all the countries of the globe. They will begin to see that our chief difficulty in carrying on a prosperous trade is in getting ample returns for our exports; there is no limit to the productive skill of this country, but our difficulty is in finding returns which, in this market, will pay a profit to the importing merchant. They will say, "Here is a principle which knocks down every barrier erected for the purpose of restraining and restricting imports;" and they will see, instinctively, as we have seen, that Free Trade will be for them a measure of unmixed good. (Hear.) Your brokers, who have sometimes been accused of being somewhat venal, who follow the merchant rather selfishly, will be released from their party ties, and from that restraint which their customers are sometimes apt to impose upon them. (Hear, hear.) Your brokers in Liverpool will see that more imports will lead to more sales on the Liverpool Exchange; and more sales must give more business to the brokers. Why the brokers' clerks, even, and all who want to be brokers' clerks, will see that this is a question pregnant with more employment for them,—better salaries for them, and a better prospect for them of becoming brokers in due time as well as their employers. (Hear, hear.) The ship-owners and builders will see that Free Trade will crowd your port with more vessels—that more vessels will be required to bring back the increased traffic of the world, and that more ships will come here to be repaired, and that more must be built here also. They will see at once that an increase of freights will bring improved charges for freights; and the profits of the shipowner will be as completely identified with this principle as that of either the merchant or the broker. (Hear, hear.) Well, then, gentlemen, the labourers, whether ship-carpenters or others—those men who have been accustomed to vote with their party regardless of the claims of this question, will see that more ship-building and more ship repairing will bring more employment to the ship-carpenter, the caulker, the anchor-smith, and every other business employed about the vessels. (Loud cheers.) And it will give increased employment not only to these labourers, but to your porters and all other men engaged in manual labour. This will enrich the town, the benefits will flow into shops, whether they sell cloth, or groceries, or provisions of any other kind. And you will thus find that every man capable of reasoning,—every man with an honest and conscientious desire to come at the truth, will be at once relieved from this bond of party, and become as sound a Free Trader as any man in this room. (Cheers.) But, gentlemen, let us have no impediment in the way of this conversion; let us abandon our old party colours if you please, till this food crisis is got over. Let us have none of your old colours: do in Liverpool as they have done in the West Riding; throw aside your old colours, and adopt the pure white as the fitting emblem of your principles. (Cheers.) I don't know what your colours are here. One faction have called themselves, I believe, scarlet: well it's a bloody colour—(cheers and laughter)—I'd throw it aside, and have nothing to do with it. And I believe the other parties have called themselves blue; why, they'll never hoist that colour the next time, surely; it's the colour of the cholera in the potatoes. (Laughter.) Throw aside your scarlet and your blue, and adopt white; it's the emblem of peace, the flag of truce held out to your political opponents; and I'll engage for it at the next election—(and here I venture to utter a prophecy)—if a dissolution takes place upon this great question, I'll venture to say it will be here as it was at the Reform Bill crisis, when General Gascoyne came down here and could not get through his canvass—dared not even show himself in Liverpool. Just so will it be at the next election; a monopolist, a pro-corn-law, a curry-powder man will not dare to show himself in town. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, that which you are to do in Liverpool, I hope will be done throughout the kingdom. I hope that we shall teach our friends everywhere to use this wise forbearance towards their old political opponents. I shall not be satisfied with the settlement of this question, unless it leaves us wholly, as a people, satisfied with the settlement of it,—satisfied that it has been formed in justice, and that it will ultimately prove a benefit to every class in the community. (Cheers.) I shall not be satisfied with it, if it does not bring into our ranks the farmers, those of them at least who are intelligent enough to see their own interest. (Cheers.) I shall not be satisfied unless the landowners, in my day, at least, whilst I am living to witness it—admit that we, the Free Traders, who are accused of being their greatest enemies, have, in the end, in the issue, proved to be their greatest benefactors. (Loud and prolonged cheering.)

Colonel THOMPSON was received with great cheering. He said: Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—Something like a premium has been held out for speeches; and you shall see if I don't win. (Cheers and laughter.) I shall be glad to take the opportunity of the few moments that I may detain you, to take the chance of making at least some suggestions that may be useful when delivered, as they will be, before what may be considered as the élite of our commercial community. I need not recall to your recollection the position which Liverpool holds, or has ever held, amongst the commercial portions of our country. 'Tis true we have heard you are not all agreed upon this great question; but you who are agreed, I suspect, understand it as well as any men who can be pointed out within this realm. Now you have heard before, the time is pressing and most valuable; 13 days from to-day, one fortnight from yesterday, and much will be done that cannot be undone, and that cannot be done over again, I suspect. (Cheers and laughter.) One thing is most certain, that what you hear announced, there will be the limit to what you will get. You will have no chance to get anything more—that is an impossible thing; you might get less; and therefore I would employ this time in urging you to consider what your dangers are now, and what you can by possibility do towards providing against and diminishing them. One danger that strikes me is, you'll hear something of a compensation; I heard a million named. I dare say the report has come before you in that shape. (Hear, hear.) If not in that naked sense, you may hear of it in another—the removal of taxation—taxation to be removed from those who ought to pay it, and put upon you and everybody else. (Cheers.) Now, then, will it not be wisdom to attempt to guard against these dangers; and is there not a way of doing it? Supposing Ministers should turn round upon you, and say, "Has any person in Liverpool an objection to compensation?"—has any person an objection to the removal of taxation from the landed interest? Oh, dear; if they had thought so, why did they not say so?" Now cannot you take time by the forelock, and in some way or other—not perhaps in the direct course of this meeting; but at some opportunity within these 13 days—cannot you contrive that the Minister shall know you consider every attempt of this nature as unjust, and therefore, you hope, dangerous; and you trust, also, impracticable? (Loud cheers.) Let him know what you think of it. Don't give him the chance of saying he was taken by surprise. Don't you see you must take time by the forelock? Use it while you can. Employ precaution against possible danger. (Cheers.) Don't let him have to say to you—"If I'd known you would have made a great objection, I might have altered my proceedings." Do you, or do you not, consider that both those expedients would be unjust? (Cries of Yes.) If you do, let Liverpool as a town contrive to say so. (Cheers.) Do not let it be held among things doubtful whether you intend to submit to anything of that kind or not. (Cheers, and "We won't.") And don't wait till the thing has been proposed, but endeavour to take measures which shall prevent its ever being talked of in the place where it will be dangerous. (Cheers.) One more peril I have thought of. Perhaps you'll say it is not a great peril; but I think it is bigger than it looks. There'll be some attempt to saddle you, it may be, with some pitiful remnant of a duty, which you'll be told is nothing because it is small. Now if any of you were riding a race, how many pounds and ounces would you allow to be put into your pockets to weight you with? If you were chasing, or being chased, would you allow so much as a pocket handkerchief to be towed astern? (Cheers.) Do I know enough of commerce to think that every commercial man is chasing and being chased? Has he not always somebody running against him?—somebody he would overtake if he could, and somebody that will overtake him if he allows them to do it? (Loud cheers.) Weigh, then, and consider the effect which the smallest of the small, in the way of duties, left upon you as a badge of servitude, would have upon your future prospects. It is not the quantity of the thing, but the effect that it is to have, the ways it is to lay you under an inferiority, and to give the superiority into the hands of your superior rival. Gentlemen, I am afraid I am incurring some danger of losing the sort of bet I made to you at the beginning, therefore I'll sit down. (Loud cheers, and cries of "Go on.") The calls continuing, the gallant Colonel again rose and said as follows:—Gentlemen, if you insist on having two speeches (laughter) I must go on, and endeavour to lay before you the many inducements there are why, at this moment, you should stretch every nerve for the obtaining of your honest purpose—I'll say more honest purposes. Now I'm not a man who wants to embarrass one great question with tacking others to it which are not so near to their completion. I trust I have lived long enough to be aware of the evil of this; but there is no harm in saying, I believe there is scarcely one of us who has not some honest object in view which he trusts will be benefited by the removal of this great and crying evil which weighs upon us all. Why, I was present but yesterday at an assemblage of eminent men, and I came to this conclusion, that every one of them had something that he hoped to see prosper, but nobody could agree upon which should prosper first. Well, then, let us endeavour to carry out this great object of ours, nothing doubting that we shall see it made the beginning of a course of prosperity to our country, which in the end will come to all of us. I can recollect things in this town representing a very different aspect to what we see now. I remember when the working-classes in this town were not advised well enough as they are at this present moment to see their interest in aiding in the promotion of this cause. Their conduct was and everywhere is evidence how rapidly they have improved. It is not the working classes that are the ignoramuses now (cheers and laughter); not a word from them of curry powder. (Applause.) Do you all know what curry powder is? (Great laughter.) Many of you have been in India, perchance, or where it is used. Why, curry powder is pepper—curry powder is mustard—curry powder is turmeric and coriander seed. (Applause and laughter.) You may feed a man with curry powder as much as he can swallow; and if he lives 12 hours longer for the dose, I give him leave to live for ever. (Laughter and cheers.) Now you must not blame me if I should fall back upon the question which I have heard asked here,—Is such knowledge as is there shown fit to the concerns of a commercial community like this our England? (No, no.) Let them keep to things within their knowledge. Cookery, it seems they know something of; let them be quiet there; let them be disciples of Mrs. Glasse, but let them not tell Liverpool "gentry" or Manchester "men" either, how they shall regulate those concerns on which depend a country's bread and a country's happiness. (Cheers.) Twelvemonth hence, I trust, we shall come round to congratulate you and one another upon the success of this over-honest cause. Never one promised better; never one was more sure, by the assistance of you, and our eastern men like you, everywhere speedily to find success. (Loud and prolonged cheering.)

THOMAS THORNELEY, Esq. M.P. moved "That the grateful thanks of this meeting are due to Richard Cobden, Esq. M.P., and the leading members of the National Anti-Corn Law League, for their untiring exertions in behalf of Free Trade;—services, the noble disinterestedness of which is only equalled by the importance of the cause to which they are rendered."

Mr. CHARLES HOLLAND seconded the motion, which passed by acclamation.

Mr. RAWLINS then announced the result of the subscription as follows:—The total amount subscribed to day in this building is 12,080*l.* (Immense cheering.) There were previously announced from gentlemen resident in Liverpool, at the Manchester meeting, at which 60,000*l.* were collected,—the amount of 1500*l.*, which makes a grand total from Liverpool of Thirteen Thousand Five Hundred and Eighty Pounds. This is by no means all we intend to get from Liverpool; and I am quite sure that if every man who leaves this building gets his friend to subscribe, we shall raise as much more. (Great applause.)

Mr. COBDEN: You have done nobly to-day. Our services would be of no avail here were they not so nobly, so magnificently backed by our fellow-countrymen here and everywhere. This demonstration will do more than ten thousand speeches to convince our opponents that the spirit is elevated, after seven years' conflict, to carry this battle to a successful issue, cost what it may, in time, labour, or money. I have only to say again—Don't forget 40*s.* freeholds for South Cheshire.

The hon. gentlemen then moved a vote of thanks to the chairman.

Mr. BRIGHT seconded the resolution.

Mr. COBDEN then proposed it should be given with three cheers, coupling with the chairman "Free Trade." The vote of thanks was then carried with three times three, and the meeting broke up about ten minutes to four o'clock.

CARLISLE.

A meeting of the friends of Free Trade was held in the Carlisle Athenæum on Tuesday evening last.

At seven o'clock, Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, accompanied by Colonel P. Thompson, made their appearance in the Lecture-room, and were received with the most enthusiastic cheering. The Lord Mayor (Mr. J. Steel) took the chair, and prefaced the business of the meeting with a brief speech.

Mr. COBDEN was loudly cheered on coming forward. He said: Mr. Mayor, and Gentlemen,—This is, I believe, the first time I have had the pleasure of meeting with an audience in this city; and I am glad to find, from the language of your worthy mayor, that this meeting has been more crowded than any that has been held in this city before. (Applause.) Why, it is so everywhere. Wherever we go there is but one difficulty, and that is to find space enough for our friends who are anxious to come and meet us on this question. (Great cheering.) Well, gentlemen, how different is the position of our opponents. The Protectionists meet together, it is true, but, somehow, their meetings are very select and snug little family parties, (laughter), in which the public are not called upon to take a part, and they seem to be only too afraid to have anybody to listen to them and take part in their proceedings. (Hear, hear.) Now, gentlemen, if their case is a good case, surely it will find friends in any part of our good country. There was never yet an abuse that had not a good few staunch supporters. Why the burning of witches was supported by a good body of staunch people. (Laughter.) Catholic emancipation raised a vast amount of prejudice against it. Now, although every abuse that has ever yet had to be put down has had some supporters, this bread tax is utterly and completely without friends anywhere. Gentlemen, I believe there is a right honourable baronet in your neighbourhood (laughter), the Home Secretary; and if any one may be supposed to have an interest in the Corn Laws, surely it is Sir James Graham, who has a very wide estate. Nobody doubts that he is a sagacious man. He is far-seeing; he knows which way the wind is blowing (laughter), and is as good a judge of a falling house as any one I know. I am glad, therefore, we have demonstrable proof that Sir James Graham, with all his talents, is as good a Free Trader as I am. (Cheers.) He has brought forward proof that crime, pauperism, disease, and death are increased by the high price of food. Sir James Graham and Sir Robert Peel know it is impossible to face us next session, and say the Corn Law is to last; they know they cannot face the people and say so. (Cheers.) Now, when we meet Parliament, gentlemen, we will find great chances there also. We will have a very great rout and rupture of parties. Sir Robert Peel will leave the protectionists. Mr. Miles, Sir John Tyrrell, Mr. Christopher, and the rest will settle down on the side of the Duke of Buckingham, and will dissolve partnership with Peel, Gladstone, and Company. (Cheers and laughter.) They will either swear by the Duke of Richmond or Sir Robert Peel; and I should say there will be three-fourths Peelites, and one-fourth Richmondsites. (Cheers.) People will then say to each other, "Which side are you walking now? do you go with Richmond or Peel?" Three-fourths will say, "We are Peelites and Free Traders." And in less than 12 months we shall all be Free Traders, with the exception of a few, who will be curious as a sort of antediluvian remains, to show that such persons have been. (Laughter and cheers.)

I know some people have come here who are severely logical, and who are already bending their brows on me and saying to themselves, "This has not much to do with the Corn Laws; there is not much argument in this. Indeed, gentlemen, I think the time has almost gone by for argument. (Cheers.) We understand this question pretty well. I meet with no argument I can't refute. What account do the farmers' friends themselves give of protection? "Show me a farmer," said Captain Pilkington, at an agricultural meeting, "Show me a farmer who ever made a fortune: he will be a curiosity for Dr. Buckland to preserve." (Hear and laughter.) Then where is the use of protection? The truth is, gentlemen, that neither farmer nor labourer gets any good by it; and I might go further, and show that the landlords never get good by it. And what is there in Free Trade to be afraid of? (Hear.) You have had every form of Corn Law. During the last 100 years you have had Corn Laws innumerable, and they have not stood three years on an average. You have tried fixed duties and sliding scales; you have had duties for exportation and duties for importation; you have your present tinkered system of a scale, and you are going to make another change. I say, away with it. God, in his providence, has afforded every guarantee against a famine, by having a standing harvest over the world throughout the year, and if you follow the laws of Providence, and avail yourselves of the laws of nature, you can never suffer from scarcity. (Loud cheering.) The question is getting more and more into the hands of politicians, and they are trying all they can to make a market of us; but they shan't. (Cheers.) I expect you will hear, when Parliament meets, a great profession by Sir Robert Peel of his anxiety to do what he can "under the circumstances of the case," and "under all the difficulties of his position," and of his determination "to do the best he can to satisfy all parties." (Laughter.) Now, the best thing Sir Robert Peel can do, if he will only do it, will be to do what Lord John Russell has done—leave his party, give up the protectionists, say he will not help them to save half their plunder—and then I shall be very much obliged to him for doing all I ask from him. (Cheers.) We won't have him keeping up his party by dexterity, and securing them half the spoil. If he does not approve of protection, let him abandon his party and leave us to make what we like of them; and depend upon it we will make short work of them. (Protracted cheering.) When he brought out, in 1842, his tariff, I taunted him with not putting his Corn Law in it. I said, "You have left out corn;" and said he, "I intend to treat corn as a distinct article; it has always been so treated, and I intend to adhere to the custom." And now, if you please, we will keep him to his text. (Cheers.) Mr. Cobden then entered into a detail of the forms necessary for obtaining qualification under the 40*s.* clause of the Reform Act, which he recommended his hearers to adopt in his usual style of eloquent firmness, and then concluded amidst a storm of applause which lasted for several minutes.

Colonel PERRONET THOMSON: I know not how I can more usefully employ the time given to me to address you than by attempting to impress on you the importance of the time present, and of using every day, every hour of it, while it is permitted to you, for the furtherance of our cause. (Cheers.) Do you see that in 16 days—16 exactly, calculate it as I have done—the Prime Minister of England will come forward to announce to an expectant country what he is prepared to do on this question? (Hear, hear.) During these 16 days you must consider the Prime Minister of England as looking abroad with all his eyes—and keen ones I apprehend he has (great laughter)—watching every indication of public feeling—saying, "these people care nothing about the question, let it go for nothing"—and if, turning to another quarter, he sees demonstrations of earnest feeling, then he will go with them, and say, "these men are not to be trifled with." (Tremendous cheering.) He had better not think of trifling with them. Let us see what he will do; ay, not only that, but let us do everything we can to make him pitch his mark a little further than he would do without it. (Cheers.) What will he be prepared to offer? A compromise? Shall we hear of a compensation, or of a great shuffling of taxes from the protectionists to you? (Cheers.) Would you like either of these things? It were folly to wait for an answer. Then give mouth—if I may be allowed such an expression—to the abhorrence with which you view such a conclusion to the struggle. (Cheers.) I wish I could produce that perfect union of parties which would bring a more lively interest in behalf of our great cause from one portion of the community, who, whether they know it or not, will finally benefit by this great act of justice. (Cheers.) If they feel themselves oppressed or trampled upon, what can be more gratifying than to see the pulling down of a vast fabric of oppression which their arms are not strong enough to remove, but which other arms will take away, opening the way to the improvement of their lot, which must be the necessary consequence. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) Is not every man who feels himself injured, and not in the position he ought to be, bursting with hope that the injury shall be removed? (Hear, hear.) Does not every man who feels that he is under an inequality, which he knows to be indefensible, trust to the attainment of his rights? (Renewed cheering.) Would I could induce them to apply their strong heads and tough intellects to the dispersion of their knowledge of the injustice which comes round to them in the shape of affliction, in order that they may have a share in that victory which is just now impending over our heads. (Cheers.) Who would keep aloof at such a period? If it were a cause involving a long struggle, and painful or doubtful exertions, then apathy could not be a matter of wonder; but every man sees that not many months—certainly not many years—must elapse before the evil complained of is removed. (Hear, and much applause.) Who would not try to be in at such a death, to enrol his name among his countrymen, and the class to which he belongs, who have contributed as much as in them lay to being partakers in these glorious efforts? Let me hope that you will employ well the time that intervenes between this and the meeting of Parliament—that your wise heads and intellect will bring forward a something that shall give demonstration to the feelings that possess you, that the House of Commons may see their universality, and shall reckon on your sending two members to vote for the removal of this evil. (Cheers.)

Mr. BRIGHT then addressed the meeting at great length, giving a graphic comparison of the condition and arguments of the Free Trade and protectionist parties, and expatiating upon the fallacy of the often asserted statements relative to the "peculiar burdens" upon the land. After which,

J. DIXON, Esq., of Knells, proposed the first resolution as follows:—"That this meeting being convinced that the Corn Law is injurious to all the great interests of the country, and being satisfied that the proceedings of the League, in urging the friends of Free Trade to purchase county qualifications are constitutional, hereby pledges itself to the use of every legal endeavour to further that object."

T. S. SPEDDING, Esq., of Greta Bank, was next introduced to the meeting by the chairman, as a landed proprietor. He said, I have great satisfaction in seconding the resolution moved by Mr. Dixon. It has been put into my hands, I suppose, for the reason alluded to by the Mayor, because I belong to a class supposed to have personal interest in the Corn Laws, and because every cause derives benefit when it obtains support from those whose personal interests are supposed to be in another direction. (Applause.) If the land is ruined, I shall be ruined; but I do not believe the land or anything else will be injured by the repeal of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) I am as much as any one can be for a total repeal of the Corn Laws. (Hear, and cheers.) I have not come to it of late, but ever since I reflected on it I have believed it to be impolitic and unjust, and contrary to the laws of nature and providence. (Loud cheers.) It has never done any good, but it has done much mischief; and if it were repealed to-morrow, and harm were to rise, it would be, not in consequence of its repeal, but in consequence of the law itself. (Loud cheers.) I am for a total repeal to-morrow, if it can be carried, and if not to-morrow, then by a general qualification; a legal and constitutional mode of increasing the landed interest, and which will be attended with happy results. (Loud cheers.)

The resolution was then carried unanimously.

Mr. J. D. CARR then moved, "That the thanks of this meeting be given to the League for the zeal, judgment, and perseverance with which they have conducted the movement for repeal of the Corn Law; and also to the gentlemen who have been deputed by the League to this meeting, for their kindness in attending, and for the valuable and interesting information they have supplied."

It was also carried unanimously.

Colonel THOMPSON and Mr. COBDEN briefly returned thanks; and the latter proposed three cheers for the chairman, which were given with due fervour, and the meeting separated.

STROUD.

On Thursday evening a Free Trade soiree was held in the subscription room here. The soiree was announced by advertisement for six o'clock, and at that hour a large and most respectable company were assembled. The price of the tickets was one shilling, until the day of the soiree, when it was raised to two shillings. Stroud, though not one of the largest towns in the kingdom, has always been foremost in the cause of Free Trade, and the result of this meeting is in every way creditable to the Free Traders of the borough. It will be seen that the subscriptions to the Quarter of a Million Fund reached, and will exceed a thousand pounds. Tea was provided, and the ladies officiated at the numerous tables in the room. The first part of the business having been concluded,

CHARLES STAUNTON, Esq., the chairman, rose and said, that as the meeting had done him the honour of electing him president of the meeting, he thought the thanks of the meeting should be given to the ladies for the very efficient manner in which they had provided and supplied the company with the "cup that cheers but not inebriates." (Hear, hear.) As regarded the Corn Laws, any argument upon them must be trite and common-place, unless he were gifted with the eloquence of a Cobden or a Bright; and he did not consider it would be good taste to occupy the time of the meeting with many observations on them. Next to security for life and property, it was the duty of all Governments to provide an abundant supply of food for the people. When, in 1815, the monopolists framed their bill, they said, "It is with these views that we want a Corn Law, to stimulate industry, to give low prices, to create abundance." The question has been tested and tried, and met by results in every possible way. We will see how the arguments failed. We had a few successive years of abundance; in 1823-4 prices were moderate; in 1828 they were very high; then we had three or four years of very high prices. For the last fifteen years prices have varied from high to low, the importations varying from 1,500,000 to 2,000,000 quarters. Why is corn imported at all (continued Mr. Staunton)? Because there is not enough grown in England for consumption. If the Corn Law arguments were good in that day, that the people could be abundantly supplied with home-grown corn, there must be a time when this could not be done, for this reason, that we go on increasing nearly half a million annually; the argument falls to the ground, then, that we could supply sufficient corn of home growth. That "protection" is merely to denote scarcity, is quite clear. On that point, too, we may consider the argument entirely closed. In the first place, the Corn Laws are entirely a labourers' question. He (Mr. Staunton) did not mean to say that the capitalist, or himself as a manufacturer, would not derive benefit; but he looked to the good of others—not to his own individual interest. There is another point. I mean protection to the cloth manufacturers. I hear (said Mr. Staunton) that at a meeting of Conservatives, held under this room on the day of the Free Trade Meeting, some of them found a mare's nest—they discovered that we were protected 20 per cent. There is, I believe, something of the sort; why it was given us I really do not know. I suppose that the landlords did it because they had given themselves a little protection. (Hear, hear, hear.) Our prosperity depends on our being an exporting country, and when we cease to be one, we must go down from that moment. If we can export cloths and can compete in any open ports, say Russia or France, with foreign manufactures, we have no protection there, and therefore it is quite clear we do not require any. Fifteen years ago, when we met for the purpose of getting a repeal of the Corn Laws, we said, "We are ready to give up our protection if the Corn Laws are repealed. We have no right to ask for the repeal of the Corn Laws to the injury of the landholder, if we will not agree to protection being taken away from our cloth." The Germans (continued Mr. Staunton), the Belgians, the French, have raw material close to their factories. They pay wages, say two-thirds lower than we do; we go to Germany for our wools, we pay all expenses of transit, we bring it here to our factories, and the cloth (made, perhaps, from part of the very same fleece which we may meet with in the shape of cloth at Trieste) we can sell lower than the foreigner. See how we produce against odds, and yet the landed interest cannot produce corn with a protection of 12*s.* a quarter. The sacrifice, if any, will fall on the landlords, not on the farmer. Has a farmer ever made any money? The labourer cannot be injured. Look at their condition under this infernal protection law. No doubt some of the company saw the report of the meeting of labourers at Wootton Bassett by moonlight. I think with one of the speakers of that meeting, that they cannot be worse off under any system. Now (said Mr. Staunton) for the registration. The League, before Cobden hit upon this lucky thought, was in a very delicate condition; it could not go on agitating with old arguments for ever, and it was a lucky hit when Cobden showed us how the middle classes could command a majority in the House of Commons if we would but do our duty to ourselves and country. I wish I could determine how many county freeholders are here. Let the freeholders hold up their hands. (Cries of "I intend to be.") Now, let the ladies look at those who hold up their hands, and see how many there are who have done their duty. Gentlemen (continued Mr. Staunton) there is no sacrifice required; it is a far better investment than scrip. You can secure seven and a half per cent. Why it is equal to our profit. (Laughter.) I do not mean to say we do not do better in better times. Do (Mr. Staunton continued) take this to heart. See what we owe to Cobden. "This is my scheme to squeeze Sir Robert Peel; he is made of squeezable materials, and we will squeeze him." For heaven's sake do register. There is one other point: there are expenses incurred by the League; they do not aid in the purchase of freeholds, but they will work the registration courts, and put you on the list. The League are not creating votes, they are not lowering the franchise to the voter, but elevating the voter to the franchise. The objects of the League are, that all products of the earth shall have protection remitted in toto. No fixed duty; the days for that have long since gone by. (Mr. Staunton sat down amid loud cheers.)

J. PARTRIDGE, Esq., said there was one thing he must notice, protection. We support Government—we support royalty (and we do all this with a great deal of pleasure), and we ought to have protection. He (Mr. Partridge) did not mean protection which made a man pay sixpence for a threepenny loaf—not protection which caused the poor labourer to be crushed in every possible way, and which made him the miserable wretch he now was. The affectionate and finer feelings of the labouring man must inevitably suffer under the pains of horrible distress. Young hopes were crushed—the young lass dare not enjoy the luxury of a lover, and he (Mr. Partridge) hoped no young lass would allow a lover to enjoy the luxury of a kiss until he had bought a franchise. (Hear and laughter.)

Mr. STAUNTON resumed, and said it was now time to commence the important business of the funds. It was the intention of the League to raise a quarter of a million, for the purpose of carrying on the registration courts; not that all the money will be required; 20 per cent will be all that will be required first, and he hoped that 20 per cent. would be the whole amount they would require at all. [The subscription papers were now sent round to the company.]

The Rev. HENRY FOX NEWMAN commenced by saying that it would have been better, perhaps, if some influential manufacturer had taken upon himself the duty of advising the meeting to subscribe, by attaching his name to the subscription list for 250*l.* or 500*l.* (Cheers.) Mr. Cobden had, on a previous occasion, complimented the people of Stroud on the liberality of their subscriptions to the League fund. He (Mr. Newman) was glad of this, for he had apprehended otherwise. Mr. Cobden considered that Stroud had contributed, comparatively, quite as liberally as other provincial towns in the district. (Cheers.) Let there (continued the reverend gentleman) be no diminution in public spirit. Let the subscription on this occasion quadruple—nay, be tenfold more than before. On the very eve of the late crisis (continued Mr. Newman) we held a splendid meeting in this room, and before we were aware of the dissolution of the Peel Cabinet. We were anxiously forwarding this cause, when a signal and glorious triumph had been achieved. One Government had succumbed before the just principles of public opinion, embodying as it does the permanent and substantial happiness of mankind. He (Mr. Newman) felt that they were in such a position that no power could discomfit them; and with hands and hearts prepared, success was certain. This was a question upon which no power on earth had a right to interpose its dictum. If a gracious Providence showered down plenty, why should man, with an impious hand, seek to prevent its fulfilment? God sendeth plenty for all his creatures, and I do feel (continued Mr. Newman) annoyed that rank, power, or any government should attempt to subvert the ordinations of Providence. It has been shown, over and over again, and with abundant proof, that the world has the power of producing sufficient and ample food for its population. According to the protectionist argument, and by the same rule, a law might be established for obliging a man to purchase any article he required in the same street in which he resided. This description of argument on the part of the protectionists was contrary to all reason. God intended that the world should be a highway to industry, and not a barren waste, so that our fraternal interests should be reciprocated. What sufferings are engendered (continued the reverend gentleman) by the obnoxious Corn Laws! What undeserved misery is experienced by the deserving poor! What a multitude of powers are rendered wretched! Would it not be better were the landlords of this country to act in a more liberal spirit? Instead of grasping every farthing of the tenants' hard earnings for the purpose of adding to their possessions, would it not be better if they were to say, "We will reduce our rents one-fourth, and then we shall see a happy and contented yeomanry and peasantry, instead of, as at present, a wretched and miserable class?" So long (continued Mr. Newman) as commerce is restricted, so long as trade is shackled, so long shall we be unable to prevent the ravages of war. Mr. Newman concluded by saying—We are not all equally endowed with the same modicum of influence; still the cause we are advocating is one of justice, humanity, and for the benefit and prosperity of mankind; and "he that withholdeth bread from the people shall be cursed." (Cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN here read a list of subscriptions, contributing himself 150*l.* Several other gentlemen subscribed very liberally—for instance, C. Hooper, Esq., 130*l.*; N. S. Marling, Esq., 100*l.*; C. E. Scooper, Esq., M.P., 100*l.*; Samuel Marling, Esq., 100*l.*, &c. &c.

CARTWRIGHT CARTWRIGHT, Esq., addressed the meeting at some length, with the view of proving that the manufacturers did not require a protection duty. (Cheers.)

Mr. FERRAHEE said it was all very well for the manufacturers to subscribe liberally, but for his own part he would rather see the operatives contributing a shilling each. Sir James Graham (continued Mr. Ferrabee) told us how to carry the Reform Bill, and why not carry the Corn Laws by the same rule? (Cheers.)

Mr. PARSONS, the secretary to the association, entered into a statement as to the finances of the Stroud Association, by which it appeared that from the commencement of the society a gradual increase in the receipts had taken place.

N. S. MARLING, Esq., shortly addressed the meeting, calling upon the Free Traders to register, and subscribe liberally to the fund now in course of collection.

CHARLES HOOPER, Esq., said he could not be silent in so good a cause. He said that the agricultural body, especially the farmers and labourers, would be materially benefited by the repeal of the Corn Laws. Stroud had not experienced the ill effects of the Corn Laws so much as other manufacturing districts, therefore it could not be said that they were agitating the question from an interested motive. (Cheers.) It was well known that Stroud was the principal manufactory for cloth of the very finest description, and the aristocracy could not do without this article. He (Mr. Hooper) was satisfied that the abrogation of the Corn Laws would benefit all classes of the community. (Hear.)

MARCUS MEEBWEATHER TURNER, Esq., at the request of some individual in the assembly, proceeded to address the meeting. He (Mr. Turner) had intended to have addressed him from so doing. He had the pleasure of witnessing the unanimity of feeling existing in every part of the room—feelings and sentiments he hoped on some future day to represent in Parliament. He fully coincided in the opinions expressed by previous speakers as to the horrible and detestable effect of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) It was said that were the Corn Laws repealed, a vast extent of land would be thrown out of cultivation. That was out of the question. A hundred and fifty years since, this country exported large quantities of grain. Within the last 50 years, however, the population of this country had nearly doubled. A great benefit would accrue to the operatives from the abolition of the existing laws, because the price of the article would not vary to any great extent; therefore he would be enabled to expend more in the purchase of food for the support of his family. A great deal was said by the farmers upon the introduction of foreign cattle and other agricultural produce. We do not, however, find more produce, and meat is probably as dear now as it was then; and so it will be with corn. The advantages of repeal would be gradual, and the prices would be unvarying. [Mr. Turner was here seized with spasms, and was consequently obliged to close his remarks.]

Several of the previous speakers again addressed the meeting, enforcing upon it the necessity of contributing liberally to the League fund now in the course of collection. The call was responded to, for before the close of the meeting the chairman intimated that upwards of 1000*l.* had been subscribed in the room, amidst enthusiastic applause. After which,

JOSEPH PARTRIDGE, Esq., in a highly complimentary speech, proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman.

CHARLES HOOPER, Esq., seconded the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN briefly returned thanks, after which the assemblage immediately dispersed.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL IN GLASGOW.

(From the Scottish Guardian of Tuesday.)

According to previous arrangement, this distinguished statesman arrived in Glasgow yesterday, for the purpose of receiving the freedom of the city, and likewise of being present at a Free Trade demonstration, to be held in the Tontine Hotel in the evening, in honour of his lordship. The noble lord, we understand, left Edinburgh by the half-past eight train, and reached Glasgow precisely at ten o'clock. His lordship was accompanied by Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, of Grange; Andrew Rutherford, Esq., M.P.; Mr. Gibson Craig; and Mr. Dick Lauder, jr., of Grange. The Lord Provost was at the terminus of the railway, to receive the party, and conducted them, in his lordship's carriage, to Carrick's Royal Hotel, George Square, where having breakfasted, they proceeded to the Normal Seminars, connected with the Established and Free Churches, and Mr. Napier's works at Finnieston, returning to the hotel about one o'clock. At two o'clock, Lord John proceeded to the City Hall, to receive the freedom of the city. After the proceedings there were over, the noble lord and his friends paid a visit to the Royal Exchange.

Yesterday, agreeably to a unanimous resolution of the Town Council, the Right Hon. Lord John Russell was presented with the freedom of the city of Glasgow, in presence of upwards of three thousand individuals, including many ladies, assembled in the City Hall. The presentation took place at two o'clock, previous to which the spacious hall was densely crowded. The magistrates and members of the town council were seated on the platform, in front of which were elevated seats for Lord John Russell and the Lord Provost, and where also were seated the Earl of Stair, the Earl of Camperdown, Lord Belhaven, Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, Mr. Lauder, jr., of Grange, Andrew Rutherford, Esq., M.P.; the Hon. Fox Maule, M.P.; the Hon. North Dalrymple, of Clelland; and Mr. Alexander Dunlop, advocate, Edinburgh.

The Lord Provost having taken the chair,

The resolution, conferring the freedom of the city upon Lord John Russell, was read by Arthur Forbes, Esq., town clerk, which resolution is inscribed upon the Burgess Ticket, and is as follows:

"At Glasgow, the twelfth day of January, eighteen hundred and forty-six.

"The Magistrates and Council assembled, in testimony of the high sense they entertain of his splendid talents as a statesman; of his elegant accomplishments as a scholar and historian; of his zealous attachment to the principles of our free constitution; of his energetic exertions in the cause of civil and religious liberty; and of his eminent services in promoting commercial freedom, unanimously and by acclamation admit the Right Honourable Lord John Russell a freeman citizen of Glasgow, with all the liberties, privileges, and immunities belonging to an honorary burgess and guild brother of the said city.

"Extracted from the minutes of Council by

"ARTHUR FORBES, Town Clerk."

The LORD PROVOST, who was received with much applause, then addressed his lordship as follows:—My Lord, in conformity with the resolution of a previous meeting of Council, which has just been read, I have now, in the name of the Municipal Corporation of Glasgow, and in presence of this great assembly, the honour of presenting to your lordship the freedom of this ancient city. (Applause.) Your lordship's connection with the illustrious house of Russell—a house which has rendered such memorable services to the cause of civil and religious liberty—though well calculated to produce in the minds of all lovers of freedom a strong prepossession in your favour, is but the least of the claims possessed by your lordship on the esteem of this community. To the historical claims of your family upon the regard of the British nation, your lordship adds personal claims of the highest order. From the day of your first entrance into public life until the present time, you have been distinguished as the firm and consistent advocate of every liberal principle of government. Every constitutional reform for which this age has been distinguished, has received your cordial and enlightened support. That just and wise legislative measure, the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, was greatly promoted by your zeal and eloquence. (Cheers.) With equal zeal and eloquence, and with untiring energy, your lordship supported the Reform Bill—that great measure from which, notwithstanding the efforts that have been made, by intimidation and corruption, to render it fruitless, the nation is in the course of reaping the highest benefits. (Renewed cheers.) For those benefits, as they shall successively develop themselves, the gratitude of future times will be pre-eminently due to your lordship, to Lords Grey and Althorp, and the other illustrious statesman with whom it was your privilege to co-operate in conducting that great measure through the many perils with which it was surrounded. The abolition of slavery in our West India colonies is another measure of justice and philanthropy in which your lordship largely participated. (Cheers.)

The cause of commercial freedom owes no less to your lordship than that of civil and religious liberty; and, in this city, the opening up of the trade with India and China, measures originating with the government of which your lordship was a distinguished member, has given an impulse to manufacture and commerce, the importance of which it is impossible to over-estimate. (Cheers.) This corporation, therefore, only echoes the general voice of the country when it expresses its deep sense of the powerful support which the principles of Free Trade have uniformly received from your lordship. Within the last few weeks, by the expression of your wise, statesmanlike, and patriotic sentiments upon the all-engrossing question which now occupies the minds of the people—(great applause)—your lordship has furnished a strong additional claim to the many you formerly possessed upon the public gratitude. (Renewed applause.) And I feel no little pride and pleasure in having been deputed by my fellow-citizens to offer you the only tribute by which they have it in their power to manifest their entire confidence in your public character, and their esteem for your private virtues. I hope, in their name and my own, that your lordship will be pleased to accept the freedom of the city of Glasgow thus offered; and that we may have the gratification to enrol so illustrious a name as that of Lord John Russell among the number of our citizens. (Loud cheers.)

His lordship concluded by presenting the document, inclosed in a very elegant box, silver-gilt.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL then rose, and was received with enthusiastic and prolonged applause. When the cheering had subsided, the noble lord said: My Lord Provost and Gentlemen,—The honour that your lordship has done me in the name of the Council and of the citizens of Glasgow cannot but inspire me with the deepest gratitude. In any ordinary circumstances, I should have felt it a matter of interest and gratification to have visited this great city. I could not but have admired your extensive manufactures, the noble port which has been created by the wealth and commerce of this, one of the most remarkable cities of the United Kingdom. I could not have failed to reflect with interest that here it was that science had enabled art and manufacture to attain some of their greatest triumphs. I could not but have recollected that it was here that Black made some of his most interesting experiments. I could not but have remembered that Watt here, as it were, almost recreated the steam-engine, the source of so many advantages and such wonderful inventions which have since succeeded. And likewise at this time, above all, it could not fail to be a matter of the deepest interest to visit your city, where Adam Smith in his lectures had laid the foundation of that knowledge which we have since attained respecting the economy of nations—where he in his lectures gave the outlines of that immortal work which he afterwards published to the world. These, I say, gentlemen, would be to any casual stranger matters of interest and gratification; but in my visit to this city you have added sentiments of pride to those of gratification; for I cannot but be proud that you have deemed me worthy to be enrolled among your citizens. I will not deny that, although I think it my duty in public life to pursue that course which in my conscience I deemed the best fitted for the public welfare, yet I do feel depressed when the approbation of my fellow-countrymen does not follow that conduct; and I feel proportionably proud and gratified when I receive the marks of that approbation. Your lordship has alluded to some of the measures in which I have been engaged since my entrance into public life. One of these measures was the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. The Protestant dissenters did me the honour to entrust that cause to my feeble hands. I had at least this claim to their regard, that I heartily sympathised in their opinions and their feelings with respect to these laws. I considered these laws to be unjust and inexpedient. I considered them unjust, because they inflicted penalties, disqualifications, and punishments upon the free exercise of conscience—because they attempted to interfere with those sacred rights which every man has to form and avow his opinions with respect to his religious duties. I considered them inexpedient—most inexpedient—because they fixed a brand upon a body of men who, for a hundred and forty years, had been zealously attached to the throne and constitution of these realms, because they had not happened to be entirely satisfied with the religion and politics of Charles II. (laughter and cheers.) Gentlemen, when I brought forward the proposal for the repeal of these Acts, I was opposed by the Government of the day; but the House of Commons gave me a majority—a majority, I think, of upwards of forty in favour of the first steps towards that repeal. The ministry of the day then thought it might be wise to propose a suspension of these laws, but I would not listen to any proposal for their suspension. I said there must be a repeal—that it was a question of right and justice, and nothing less than the repeal would satisfy me. Why, gentlemen, upon that the repeal was granted. A declaration indeed was added, to which I acceded, because I thought it very harmless in itself, but perhaps the history of that declaration may show how much danger there is at times in admitting conditions and qualifications to that which is a plain claim of justice. For in the House of Lords they added certain words which, when the law came into operation, were found to bear an exclusion from corporations of persons who by their religious profession were Jews. It was then that those who were the friends of persecution thought it was unsafe any longer to attempt persecution against Protestant dissenters—they were a body too numerous and powerful. It was not safe to continue persecution against the Roman Catholics, for they formed a great portion of the population of Ireland; they were too powerful, and could enforce their claims. But merely to indulge themselves with a little persecution, in the statute-book they added certain words excluding from the corporations those who professed the Jewish religion. Why, this little remnant, so far as the corporations were concerned, was done away last year. It was one of the measures I supported as a minister, but which I had the misfortune to see rejected in the House of Lords—one of those measures similar to others which, under the present Government, have been approved of by the House of Lords and carried by great majorities in the Commons, including some of those who made the strongest speeches against the admission of those persons to any corporate right. (Laughter and cheers.) Gentlemen, his lordship has alluded to the reform of Parliament—a vast subject, into which I will hardly enter; but I must refer to what, when I first knew it, was the state of Scotland and Scottish representation. The Scottish representation was a very close matter, nothing like popular election. Some three thousand persons in all Scotland had the right to send representatives to the Commons House of Parliament. The corporations were exceedingly close; the public voice was checked and repressed; the press itself hardly daring to utter those sentiments of free discussion which are now widely expressed over the land. I feel happy to say, that during the time I have lived since I was a student at the College of Edinburgh, I have seen a great change with respect to this matter. (Loud cheers.) I am happy to say that I myself have borne a part in some of the measures by which it has been accomplished. I remember the time, indeed, when a late lamented friend of mine, and a neighbour of yours, Lord Archd. Hamilton, supported by the present Lord Dunfermline, and many others, complained of the state of Scottish representation, but they were defeated by a great majority. I am happy to say now that at last the city of Edinburgh and this city have obtained the right of sending representatives to Parliament; and the Scottish representation does convey an image of the sense, intelligence, and wishes of the Scottish people. (Cheers.) So also with regard to the Scottish corporations. I was one of the ministry which proposed the measure that was afterwards carried for opening these corporations, and establishing popular election as the principle by which these corporations were to be formed. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, let me now say, with respect to these measures—with respect to any measure in which I have been engaged, that the view I took when I first entered upon the public life of this country was this—that there were many abuses—that there were many unjust restrictions—that there were many corruptions in our institutions; but that there were none which could not by patience, by investigation, by measures proposed to Parliament, by the influence of public opinion, be corrected and altered, and that above all things it was desirable to look to the possible conflict of opinion in order to obtain those changes which were to be desired. (Cheers.) And I say, then, with regard to any measures which are past, with regard to any measures which are to come, that the whole fabric of society in this country, with its extensive commerce, manufactures, and its various interests pervading every part of the country, and connected with other interests in every part of the world—that this fabric of society ought to be preserved entire, and that there would be the greatest danger if for one year or six months public confidence was lost, and there was anything like—I will not say a civil war—but distrust among us as to what was to happen in the next few months. But gentlemen, I am confident, with regard to measures to come, as well as those which are past, that the expression of the public voice known to the constitution of England, acting upon the constitutional powers of England, will obtain all that is to be desired. (Cheers.) My lord, your lordship has done me the honour to refer to other measures with which I was connected, but only as a member of the Government to which I belonged—the abolition of slavery, the opening of the East India and China trade. I will not detain you by touching on these measures; but I must refer to two questions in which I have taken a great interest, and upon which I have met with great opposition, but with respect to which, I expect, as with regard to others, to see public opinion firmly and decidedly pronounced in their favour. The one was, that as Scotsmen ought to have the privileges of Englishmen, so Irishmen ought to have the privileges of Englishmen and of Scotsmen. I consider that the union was but a parchment, an unsubstantial union, not to be trusted to in the hour of difficulty and distress, unless you showed Irishmen that you were prepared to allow them to participate in all our rights and privileges, and to treat them exactly as if they were the inhabitants of the same island. (Cheers.) I therefore could never listen to the assertion that they were to be considered as “aliens” (cheers)—nor could I consent to any laws, or to the absence of any laws, which were founded on that unjust presumption; and yet the endeavour to obtain these privileges, with respect to corporations for instance, the simple power of Irishmen being allowed to govern their own municipal matters, to regulate their own local affairs, even that privilege cost us session after session of endeavour to enforce. I am happy to say that at this time of day the principle appears to be generally allowed, and the question in dispute is only how it is to be carried into effect. For my own part I must say, that I thought I could do no greater benefit to the country than to endeavour to cement Ireland to Great Britain in affection, both in peace and in war. Far, however, from having obtained any strength from this effort, it has been a source of repeated calumnies—calumnies which you all have heard, which at the time I despised, but which were felt materially to impede the public usefulness which might have existed in other circumstances. I proceed now to the other question to which I have referred, namely, commercial freedom. (Hear, hear.) It is not the place to argue whether the general principles which Adam Smith has laid down on this subject are the true principles. I believe men who belong, whether to the present Cabinet or to the late Cabinet, or who have been thought worthy from their eminence in either House of Parliament of attempting to rule this country, are generally agreed on that subject—that legislation cannot do so well as the free intelligence, the free skill, the free industry, of the inhabitants of this United Kingdom. But Mr. Adam Smith, Mr. Ricardo, and others who have written on this subject, have all said that if a vicious system of monopoly or protection has been long embedded in the legislation of a country, that it required caution, that it required deliberation to consider in what manner such restrictions could be removed. Upon such principles, and upon such advice, was founded the general outline of the measures, which were proposed by the Ministry which lost office in consequence of this proposition in 1841. You all know that part of this proposition was that there should be an admission of foreign sugar with a differential duty of 12s. It was another part that the differential duty on colonial timber should be diminished; it was another part of the scheme that the duties on corn, instead of proceeding on what is called the sliding scale, should be regulated according to a uniform fixed duty of 8s., subject only to suspension by an order in Council in case of necessity, of which her Majesty's advisers were to be the judges. Now, gentlemen, in consequence of that proposition, the government of that day were assailed as being the most violent enemies of the landed and agricultural interest. I was held up myself to all the farmers as an enemy of the agriculturists of the United Kingdom. They rejected my proposition, and it was prevented from being carried in Parliament. The friends of protection—the friends of monopoly as I may call them—thought they had obtained a great triumph in defeating that government, and returning another more favourable to their views. Do they now rejoice that the 8s. duty was rejected? (Loud cheers.) Are they now prepared to say that the eight shilling duty, which would have prevented much of the misery and mitigated many of the evils of our manufacturing towns in the years 1841, 1842, and 1843, would not have been a compromise most favourable to the views of those who were calling for protection? (Loud cheering.) I was represented as an enemy to the landed interest, and to the farmer. Upon my word, upon reflecting upon my conduct, the only doubt I have is, whether that duty having been rejected, peremptorily rejected, with every mark of indignation and contumely, I ought not at once to have said that I would make no further proposition of the kind. But I proceed; I still said I thought it would be wise on their part to seek for a fixed duty. I went on, and when there was a surplus in the revenue, I said that if they would prove that there were taxes that pressed on them, then was the time to ask for an equality of taxation, along with the abolition of the Corn Laws; but I was again treated with indignation, and as an enemy to the landed interest. But let us consider what has been the effect of the rejection of these terms. Is there any man now, who, as a member of Parliament—as a Minister to his Sovereign, would propose terms equally favourable to these advocates of protection as those which I proposed in 1841? I believe not (cheers); and for my part, when I saw this obstinate and continued rejection, I reflected that that confined proposition of mine, while it was not accepted by the landed interest, was really an obstacle in the way of those who asked for the complete freedom of trade on the subject of corn; and rather than put that obstacle in the way, and believing that the present Corn Laws are, as I have stated, injurious to agriculture as well as to commerce, I withdrew that proposition, and declared my opinion in a letter to the electors of the city of London, whom I have the honour of representing, that these Corn Laws ought to be totally repealed. (Loud and protracted cheering.) Gentlemen, it is not for me in this place to refer to occurrences of which you must all be aware, and of which the day of explanation will arrive as soon as Parliament meets; but this I will say, that when that day of explanation arrives, I trust that you will find that I did not shrink from the assertion of the principles contained in that letter to the electors of the City of London. (Loud cheers.) Gentlemen, the question of the proposition with regard to the Corn Laws is now in the hands of Sir Robert Peel. I know no more than yourselves what his proposition may be, or how he has agreed with the remaining colleagues from whom he had differed, and who have again consented to serve under him; but of this I am fully convinced, that if Sir Robert Peel wishes his measure to be safe—safe to propose and safe to carry—it must be founded upon broad and extensive principles. (Cheers.) I am persuaded that unless it contains total repeal, the friends of monopoly and protection will rejoice at the proposal of a measure which will not satisfy the country, and that they will not take heart to defeat that which otherwise they will not have the means of opposing—I say they will not have the means of opposing. (Hear, hear.) Not that I do not believe but that they can make some struggle if they choose on behalf of protection—not but that I believe that if they stand on the ground of protection, and we stand on the ground of freedom, there may not be a formidable opposition to the measure of the Government in the House of Commons—not but that it is within the range of possibility that there may at first be a defeat of that measure; but if it is such a measure as I should wish it to be, I feel confident that defeat will be a temporary and not a final one (cheers); that that defeat will only be the commencement of a struggle which I should indeed regret to see, but which I should infinitely prefer to the carrying of a measure which would not settle this question (cheers)—which would not at once, for ever and ever, settle the question, and leave the people of this country that which they ought to possess, the power and the privilege to obtain their food as cheap and as good as it is possible for them to obtain it. (Cheers.) I believe that now the people of this country, to whom these questions were presented some time ago in a shape difficult for them altogether to see the bearing of them—I believe they now stand in such a shape that the people of this country will give their support to no measure which does not entirely rid them of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) Some time ago, in the year 1841, it was said by those who advocated protection, that the interests of the labouring classes would be injured, that their wages would be lowered, if the price of corn was diminished by free importation. It was said likewise that we should be exposed to scarcity from time to time were the restrictions removed from the importation of foreign corn. This is another of those assertions which now obtain no belief. Sir Robert Peel said in the House of Commons that he did not give his assent to the proposition that the labouring classes would be injured by the low price of food; and every intelligent man who can think on the subject is now of the same opinion. (Hear.) And with regard to the opinion of those who maintain that we should be exposed to periods of scarcity by removing the restrictions on the importation of foreign corn, I think the principle is well stated by Adam Smith, that if the kingdoms of a Continent have free communication with each other with regard to food, the prices will be more equal in all of them than if each kingdom were governed by separate laws upon that subject. This principle, therefore, if applicable to Continental countries, is equally applicable to a free communication with the whole world. If we cannot get a sufficient supply of corn from Dantzic or from Poland, we may obtain it from Odessa or the Black Sea; or if not, we may obtain it from the United States of America. (Cheers.) So that the free importation of food is sure to lead to a more general equality of prices, and a general provision for the people of this country, in a better mode than any law can afford—(cheers)—I say, than any law can afford; for we have tried what some of the wisest men in this country have invented as artificial schemes by which the country might be more equally supplied with food. We have tried the scheme of 1815, of which Lord Ripon was the proposer. We have tried the scheme of 1828, of which Lord Liverpool and Mr. Huskisson were the originators and promoters; and we have had the scheme of 1842, of which Sir Robert Peel was the author, after having given the utmost attention to the subject. We do not say that the proposers of these schemes were unskilful or unwise in the invention of artificial schemes; but we do say that no artificial scheme whatever will so well supply the people of this country with food, as leaving it free and unfettered, to pursue its natural course as an important branch of the commerce and trade of the country. (Great applause.) If I am right in believing that the people of this country, that the working men of this country, take this view of the question, I should like any one to tell me whether he thinks, that out of the public men of this country a Government could be formed that can resist that wish? (Continued cheering.) The people of this country are used to toil—their labour is often protracted—frequently it is of the most skilful nature. The curse that was pronounced, that man should earn his bread by the sweat of his brow is submitted to; and whether in the country in agricultural occupations, or whether in the town in mechanical and manufacturing operations, you see men, not from sunrise till sunset, but for far longer hours, giving all the strength of their sinews to labour, to hard labour, with the view of obtaining their daily bread. They submit manfully—they submit with courage to that toil, in the hope of keeping themselves and their families in sustenance, if not in comfort; and if they wish that their bread should not be farther stinted—that man should not make that more difficult by legislation which the eternal doom of the Almighty has already made difficult in regard to the natural course of things—where, I would wish to know, is the House of Commons, elected by the people, which will long resist such a wish? (Immense cheering.) Gentlemen, there is another advantage which I think will accrue from the abolition of the duties on the importation of grain—I think it will bind us more closely in relations of peace and amity with foreign States, and more especially with one—I mean the United States of America. (Cheers.) I think nothing of the questions which may be now in dispute—questions of territory, in which, as they now stand, the honour of neither nation is engaged, and upon which calm men, representing the Government of her Majesty, and representing the Government of the United States, may, as I believe, by calm and fair discussion, come to an amicable agreement. I see no prospect of war arising out of this difference, if we on this side are determined that with regard to the importation of the produce of the United States, and if the Government of the United States is determined with regard to the manufactures of this United Kingdom, that there shall be free intercourse; that they shall be permitted to feed us, and we shall be permitted to clothe them—(loud cheers)—I believe that if no unhalloved and partial legislation should stand in the way of such exchange, that these two nations—they being of the same race and the same language as ourselves—are formed to continue for centuries together in the bonds of amity, united in a family compact, not such a compact as that between France and Spain, arising from the mere relationship of the reigning families and their courts, but a compact arising from feeling ourselves to be of the same blood, and admirers of each other's institutions; they respecting the freedom of our monarchy, and we admiring the order of their republic. I believe such a union may for centuries endure for the lasting happiness of the world. (Applause.) I have now to thank you not only for the honour you have conferred upon me, but for the indulgence with which you have listened to the expression of my political opinions. It will be my duty before long, in the House of Commons, to declare my opinions upon some of the most important questions that were ever agitated in that community. I fear not the discussion. I should have little fear of the opposition or the arguments of the men to whom I may be opposed; even though they should think, as a gentleman who was lately proposed as a member of the House of Commons did, that the fittest comparison of me was that of Satan. (Laughter.) I say, I shall be very little afraid even of so brilliant a comparison as that, if the gentlemen of the House of Commons, who represent protection, will only employ such arguments as they adopted last year. (Laughter.) You will hear Sir Robert Peel accused of treachery to the landed interest. I will not enter upon that question; but I would here just say, that he was very unkind to the landed interest, for he allowed them to speak for themselves, and make out their own cause. (Much laughter.) And such an exhibition as it was—such a melancholy show of bad argument, and worse declamation, I have never heard. One day we had a gentleman for an hour and a half, with a number of statistical documents, to show that beef would be one penny and mutton a halfpenny a pound cheaper, all of which he attributed to the tariff; and asked, how can you possibly support any law so disastrous in its results? There is no saying how cheap beef, and mutton, and lamb may become if you go on in this ruinous policy of Free Trade! (Great laughter.) Another day the Minister proposed that a number of articles should be free—he proposed, not indeed corn, or oats, or maize, but a number of unpalatable articles, such as rhubarb and senna, and all those drugs whose names themselves are very nauseous. (Much laughter.) But these protection gentlemen were still afraid. Though assured that these laws really allowed nothing of human food to be admitted free, they were always on the look-out, and alarmed lest some food should come in. And when they came to the article of grease, they were under great apprehension. They said—Is not grease butter? and may not some persons import this grease for the purpose of eating it? (Laughter.) And Sir George Clerk, Vice-President of the Board of Trade, was obliged to get up with great solemnity—for he does most of these things with great solemnity—and assure these gentlemen, all the county members, and a vast phalanx at the lower end of the House, that this grease meant butter spoiled for human food by tar (great laughter); and he confidently assured them that no human being would attempt to eat it. (Renewed laughter.) Now, if they will but use such arguments as these, which, as I say, Sir R. Peel most unkindly allowed them to use for themselves, and did not stand forth in their behalf, they may call me by any terms they please. I do not know they can call me worse than the devil—(laughter)—but if they use such ridiculous arguments as these, I shall be sure of a triumph over them. (Cheers.) I hope I may be entitled to say, having received this honour from you, and being the representative of the City of London, that the great cities of England and Scotland are determined that this monopoly shall last no longer, and that commerce shall be free. (Immense cheering.) The noble lord on sitting down was greeted with three tremendous rounds of applause.

The meeting then separated; and his lordship, on leaving the hall, was loudly cheered by the immense multitude assembled outside.

KENSINGTON.

On Monday evening, the 4th inst., a public meeting was held in the Theatre, Kensington. The chair was taken by William D. Christie, Esq., M.P. for Weymouth. The theatre will accommodate from 700 to 800 persons, and was crowded in every part. There has not been in that district on any former occasion so numerous and influential a meeting. The neighbourhood stands very much in need of a room sufficiently large for the public meetings of the population. Many went away unable to gain admission to the theatre.

Mr. CHRISTIE opened the proceedings by referring to the present position of the Free Trade cause, which was now all but triumphant, and needed only the honest expression of public opinion to ensure its triumph. Conversations were numerous now. In the present ministry, and the late ministry, in Parliament, and out of Parliament, men had come over, and were coming over to Free Trade. Evidence of strength, and the near approach of victory, were always attractive and powerful to convince doubters and waverers. He was not one of the new converts; he was not an old member of the House, having been first returned at the last general election; but from the first he had been an advocate of the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws.

Mr. MOORE then addressed the meeting, replying to the speeches of the Marquis of Salisbury and Lord Essex at the St. Alban's meeting, reported in that day's Times. He gave details of the progress of the county freehold movement, and urged the importance of continued effort to increase the number of 40s. Free Trade holders in Middlesex and East Surrey. The latter county was not yet safe, but it was getting to the safe side; and he believed would be safe by the 31st of January. Middlesex was safe, but had yet more to do. With such an immense population, equal to that of fifteen counties sending 26 members to Parliament, and having but two members, it should be safe to return those two without a contest. I believe the register has been well worked during the last year. Encouraged by the progress made, they should work on until East Surrey and every county near the metropolis were won on the register. Let them be safe there, and they would be spared all anxiety when the contest came. Let the cottagers do their duty, and the castles could no longer cripple trade.

Mr. HANSOM, who has hitherto been a most active protectionist, working the register for the monopolists in that polling district, and indefatigable on their committee and canvass at elections, then came forward to move a vote of thanks to the chairman and the League. He avowed himself a convert to Free Trade; and he promised his best assistance to return two total and immediate repealers at the next election for Middlesex; no others should for the future have a vote or help from him. He proposed also that a requisition should be got up to the sheriffs to call a county meeting.

The vote of thanks was seconded by JOHN T. LOCKHART, Esq., who contested the borough of Aylesbury in 1841. He gave an amusing account of the protectionists who attended the late meeting at Aylesbury, of their little land, their many embarrassments, and their tricks to get up meetings, and have petitions signed.

The vote of thanks was carried by acclamation.

A gentleman then came forward to urge the importance of measures being taken to form a borough of Chelsea, Kensington, Fulham, and Hammersmith, a district with a population of upwards of a hundred thousand unrepresented.

The CHAIRMAN agreed with him that the district had a just claim to have two representatives, and he should have pleasure in giving the claim his best support. The two members taken from disfranchised Sudbury should be given to the populous district in which they were then meeting.

The meeting then broke up, with three cheers for the county movement.

REIGATE.

On Tuesday, the 5th inst a public meeting was held at the White Hart, Reigate. The chair was taken by Thomas Alcock, Esq., who, as a Free Trade landowner, contested East Surrey at the last general election, and has promised to do so again at the next election. Tuesday was the monthly market day, and the meeting was almost entirely attended by landowners, land agents, farmers, and labourers.

The CHAIRMAN spoke of the rapid progress that opinion had made of late, and of the circumstances of the country, imperatively demanding a repeal of the Corn Laws,—a repeal that, as a landowner, whose whole property was in land, he wished to be total, immediate, and unconditional. He promised the most perfect freedom of discussion,—and Mr. MOORE, on coming forward, requested all parties to put whatever questions might occur to them, and he would not consider it discourteous, however much they might interrupt him. He proceeded to point out the importance of Free Trade to farmers, as the only means of securing them independent cultivation of the land, at a profit secured not by deceptive Acts of Parliament, but by the prosperity of the whole people, their customers. He answered the statements made at protectionist meetings against repeal of the Corn Laws, and argued that, with labourers on the land brought down to live on potatoes, and in danger of being starved by the potato rot, in this the 31st year of their pretended protection by Parliament, it was impossible that the law should be maintained. The people had had enough of being fed by Parliament, and were for the future determined to feed themselves. For more than three hours a running commentary of questions was kept up. They were all answered, and the meeting broke up with three cheers, all but unanimous, for the chairman and the League.

HERTFORD.

On Thursday last, a public meeting was held in the large room at the Dimsdale Arms, for the purpose of hearing addresses from Mr. Falvey, and other gentlemen, on the subject of the Corn Laws, and the League Registration movement. At seven o'clock, the hour named for the meeting, the room was literally crammed to suffocation; indeed, so great was the inconvenience felt, that it was contemplated by the promoters of the meeting to adjourn, and call a meeting on a future day; but silence and attention having been obtained, the proceedings commenced. Mr. GARDENER proposed, and Mr. MANSEY seconded, a motion, that Mr. William Pollard take the chair, which was carried by acclamation. Having taken his place, Mr. POLLARD proceeded to open the business of the evening. He commenced by stating that endeavours had been made by himself and others, to procure the use of the Town Hall for the meeting, but the county magistrates and the Mayor had refused them, and hence the inconvenience and misery they were then enduring. He thought it most unfair to refuse the use of a public room to the public, but they had no remedy; and as this was the largest room they could procure, they would attempt to get through the business. After some further observations, he introduced to the meeting Mr. Falvey, who, on coming forward was received with much cheering. He commenced by stating that he had been engaged each day during the week addressing meetings in the county, at each of which he had been gratified by finding the utmost unanimity on the subject of Free Trade. He regretted the want of sufficient accommodation for the vast number present, and alluded to the absurd conduct of the authorities in refusing the use of the public room for fair discussion. He then addressed himself to the immediate object of the meeting, and most forcibly and eloquently stated the views and sentiments of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and urged the meeting to co-operate with them in obtaining an immediate settlement of the disputed question. Mr. Falvey was repeatedly cheered during his address, which he concluded by challenging the protectionists to call a public meeting for discussing the question. We regret that we cannot give a report of Mr. Falvey's appeal to our fellow-townsmen in consequence of the large space devoted to our report of the election, but we understand we shall shortly have an opportunity of supplying the deficiency, as it is proposed to make another attempt to induce the magistrates to grant the use of the County Hall for a similar meeting. The meeting was also addressed by Mr. Lattimore, Mr. J. J. Gripper, and Mr. Bontems, who stated distinctly that the League did not purchase votes, nor did they extort pledges from those whom they assisted by their advice in obtaining county qualifications. Their course was simply to exhort, advise, and assist the people in purchasing for themselves a right to vote, and they adopted no unconstitutional means for doing so. What they did was openly and fairly done. The following resolution was then put, and carried unanimously, amidst acclamations:—"That this meeting highly approves of the efforts of the Anti-Corn-Law League to increase the constituency of this county, and pledges itself to assist to the utmost of its power in carrying out that important object." Mr. Falvey then addressed a few words to the meeting on the absurdity of talking about our manufactures being protected, which he likened to the face of a protecting duty upon coals carried to Newcastle; and concluded by saying that Free Traders are anxious for the removal of all protection. Thanks were voted to the chairman, and the meeting dispersed.—Herts Reformer.

WATFORD.

A public meeting in connection with the Free Trade registration movement, was held at the Spread Eagle Inn, in this town, on Tuesday last; and although the notice was short, the large room was crowded with a most respectable auditory. On the motion of Mr. George Healey, seconded by Mr. Cooper, Mr. J. F. Bontems was called to the chair. After the chairman had explained the wishes and intentions of the "League," as to the registration, he read to the meeting a letter from Mr. Capel, cousin to the Earl of Essex. (The letter appeared in THE LEAGUE of last week.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that he should hand the five pounds to Mr. Lattimore, who is raising a Hertfordshire fund in aid of the Quarter of a Million proposed to be collected by the League.

Mr. FALVEY was then introduced to the meeting, and delivered an address on the subject of Free Trade with his usual eloquence and effect. At the close of the meeting, a resolution was carried by acclamation, approving of the proceedings of the League, and three cheers were given for Free Trade.—Herts Reformer.

HEMEL HEMPSTEAD.

A large and influential meeting of the friends of the League was held in this town on Wednesday last. William Howard, Esq., presided, and was surrounded by the leading friends of Free Trade residing in the neighbourhood. The speakers were Mr. C. H. Lattimore, Mr. Bontems, Mr. Falvey, Mr. James Price, and Mr. Crabstone. The two last-named gentlemen moved and seconded a resolution approving the conduct of the League, and pledging the meeting to assist, to the utmost in its power, in carrying out its objects. This resolution was carried unanimously, amidst the plaudits of the meeting. The opponents of Free Trade were invited to ask questions and to state their objections, but they abstained from so doing.—Herts Reformer.

ROYSTON.

A public meeting was held in Royston on Wednesday evening. Mr. Falvey and Mr. Bontems attended as a deputation from the League. The meeting was originally announced to be held in the large room of the Crown Inn, but a few of the monopolist farmers attending the market on Wednesday, declared that if the League meeting was held there, they would never attend the house again. Under these circumstances, the innkeepers, two orphan sisters, became quite alarmed, and expressed their fear of being ruined in consequence of the threats held out against them by the liberal friends of protection. Mr. T. Titchmarsh having learned how matters stood, at once undertook to relieve the young women from their fears of such petty and intolerable tyranny, and at the same time provide for the meeting by granting the use of a malthouse or granary for the occasion.

At seven o'clock the room began to fill; and on the motion of Mr. Titchmarsh, J. G. FORDHAM, Esq., banker and county magistrate, was called to the chair. He opened the proceedings by stating that though he differed in opinion from the gentlemen who were to address them, he hoped they would give every one an attentive hearing. He then introduced Mr. Falvey to the meeting, who had not concluded a sentence before a few neighbouring monopolists began to make the most hideous noises, and that, too, in opposition to the great body of the meeting, who were desirous of listening attentively. The chief disturbers were Mr. King, of Tadlow, and his son; Mr. Meyers of Harrington; Mr. Miekley, of Abington, and a few others who had threatened the innkeepers with their vengeance in the course of the day, and prevented them from making the most of their room. It was quite clear to all present, that the monopolists had made themselves drunk, in order to get their drooping spirits up. Mr. Falvey, however, persevered, and shewed the failure of every Corn Law since 1815, in affording protection to the farmers and farm labourers of Great Britain and Ireland. He invited any of his opponents to discuss the question with him; but they refused to do so, and continued their opposition to the sending forth of the most inhuman sounds. The Chairman repeatedly expressed his disgust at the conduct of the small knot of drunken monopolists, and said he intended to have said a few words in opposition to the views of the speaker; but he refrained from doing so in consequence of their un-English-like conduct. Mr. Falvey, at the close of his address, proposed the following resolution: "That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is the interest of the tenant farmer, the labourer, and the landlord, that the Corn Law question should be promptly and permanently settled, by a total, immediate, and unconditional repeal; the experience of the last 30 years having proved that protection drives capital from land, narrows the home market, by crippling foreign trade, and injures all classes periodically by ruinous fluctuations."

The CHAIRMAN moved an amendment in the form of two resolutions; one deprecating the total and immediate repeal, and the other condemning the present system of Corn Laws, and expressing a hope that in the approaching session of Parliament such a measure may be proposed as will finally settle the question. He then put both to the meeting, when he declared Mr. Falvey's Free Trade resolution to be carried.

Three cheers were then given for Free Trade, three for the League, and, at the suggestion of Mr. Falvey, three for the chairman; and the meeting broke up, the Free Traders in high glee, and the monopolists evidently chop-fallen. Many of the townspeople requested to have a second meeting as soon as possible, and Mr. Falvey promised that their request should be complied with as soon as the qualification business for the present year was brought to a close.

CALTON.

On Wednesday evening, at eight o'clock, a public meeting of the inhabitants of the populous district of Calton and Mile-end, containing a population of upwards of 750,000, principally weavers and factory operatives, was held in the Relief Church, Kirk Street, convened on a requisition presented to Provost Bankier, most numerous and respectfully signed, to take into consideration the propriety of petitioning for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. The meeting, which was a very full one, was presided over by Provost Bankier, who was supported by many leading gentlemen of the district.

The CHAIRMAN opened the proceedings by congratulating the meeting on the better understanding that now existed between the middle and working classes, which afforded a prospect of the interests of all being most materially advanced. With this union of interests, it was impossible that the abolition of the odious and unjust laws against the free importation of corn could longer be denied to them. There was a moral certainty that they must be speedily repealed. The honourable gentleman then went on to glance at the unsatisfactory state of the harvest, and the prospects of distress which resulted from it, and concluded by calling on the meeting to leave no exertion untied to secure the triumph of Free Trade principles.

Resolutions were then unanimously agreed to, deploring the partial failure of the harvest, particularly the potato crop, and urgently calling upon Sir Robert Peel to advise her Majesty, by an order in council, to throw open the ports immediately. A resolution was also passed, utterly repudiating the idea of granting any compensation to the landed proprietors upon the abolition of the existing protective duties.

The meeting then separated.

The following letter appeared in the Morning Chronicle of Tuesday, in reply to the one signed an "M.P., and a Member of the League" published on the previous Friday in the same Journal.

To the Editor of the Morning Chronicle.

SIR,—In your journal of Friday last is a letter signed "M.P., a Member of the League," on which I am anxious to make a few observations. Your correspondent evidently has a lingering, if not a strong, attachment to the principle of protection; and he is willing to preserve it by means of a fixed duty or a sliding scale. That he is not a Free Trader is clear, from the belief he avows in not a few of the arguments upon which the monopolists have chiefly relied. First, we are told that some revenue might be had from a fixed duty on corn, which is not denied by any one, although most persons who have examined the question are of opinion that revenue gained by any contrivance by which the supply of food is restricted is gained at the expense of a loss, from the injury inflicted upon the great mass of consumers. Next we learn that a fixed duty of 5s. per quarter would not enhance prices in the country at all, but that it would keep them somewhat lower in the producing country, by which the old and almost forgotten fallacy is attempted to be resuscitated, that a duty on imported corn would be paid by the foreigner. That a 5s. duty would to some extent limit the circle from which supplies would be drawn is too obvious to need proof, and no reason can be given why the foreigner would pay a duty of 5s., which would not be equally conclusive as to the probability of his also paying a duty of 10s. if such were imposed. But your correspondent attempts to justify a Corn Law on the old ground of special taxes paid by the land; or if he does not, he would at least endeavour to conciliate the landowners by taking half the county-poor and poor-rates on the Consolidated Fund. He is "certain that land pays more than its just share, as compared with other property, towards the maintenance of the poor," and says that "land pays on its improved value," and then he instances a cotton-mill, employing 1000 hands, paying, perhaps, on a value of 1000*l.* a-year, (which I may observe is, from ignorance or design, stated at less than half the real amount) while land employing 1000 hands would pay on a value of 30,000*l.*, or in some cases of 40,000*l.* a-year. The landowners in Parliament have been asked to go into an inquiry as to their special burdens, and they have invariably refused. They never "tell their griefs," and the unavoidable conclusion is that they are too imaginary for the covetry of a Parliamentary Committee. If by "conciliating" them is meant that we are advised to give, and they would be willing to exchange one wrong for another, I suspect they have played that game too long already, and that the country is too much alive to the question to submit to a mere shifting of the burden. But it appears a new idea has struck your correspondent; he has found out that "land pays on its improved value." And do not cotton mills pay on their improved value? Certainly they do; and any man at all fit to give an opinion on such a point must know it perfectly well. Perhaps the strangest notion which "M.P." has propounded, is to be found in his statement as to the inequality of poor-rate paid by a mill employing 1000 hands, and a number of farms employing an equal number of labourers. I have yet to learn that the value of any particular property is to be fixed by the number of workmen employed upon it. The trade of pin-making employs a large number of persons, but no one until now ever thought of charging the manufacturers engaged in that trade with poor-rate in proportion to the number of hands they employ. If the land pays upon 30,000*l.* a-year, it does so because it is worth a yearly rental of that amount, and if the mill pays only on 1000*l.*, it is because the yearly value of it is no more. The moveable machinery in a mill does not pay poor-rate, nor does the cotton in process of manufacture; but to balance this, the agricultural implements on a farm, the crops growing, or in the stack or barn, the manure in the farm-yard, the horses, cows, sheep, &c., are all likewise exempt. In fact the capital of the tenant or cultivator pays no poor-rate whatever, unless it be incorporated with the land when sunk in permanent improvements. Of the hands engaged in mills it may be said that they are almost universally contributors to the poor rate, and very rarely become chargeable upon it; and I can point to mills employing fewer than 1000 hands which have paid a tax to the state on the bricks alone with which they are built of not less than 1500*l.*

Your correspondent is anxious to retain something of the corn monopoly, that he may get rid of the "embarrassing question" of the removal of all protecting duties.

Now the Free Traders and the League are anxious not to leave a remnant of the Corn Law, because to the extent of what is left will mischief be done; and further, that no shadow of excuse may exist for the continuance of any other protecting duty.

It is a miserable quibble to talk of the duties on tea or wine being a protection to the grower of barley or the brewer of beer; and your correspondent may rest assured that the use of such an argument, if argument it can be called, will be taken by all who read it as a proof that, like his brother monopolists throughout the country, he is at his wit's end for an excuse for a great public wrong. But possibly his having recourse to such a quibble may proceed from a total ignorance or a total disregard of the principles of political economy; for I observe that a little farther on it is proposed to pass an act to convert rents under existing contracts into a corn rent charge, in case the Corn Law be repealed, until fresh agreements can be made. Is it love for the tenant, or the fear of the landlords which suggests this idea? I suspect the latter, with the view of magnifying the apprehended dangers of repeal, and thus stimulating the tenantry to a greater resistance to the change with which they are threatened. When wool was admitted free of duty, no breaking of contracts took place; and when cattle were admitted from abroad, graziers' leases were not cancelled by law; and corn will, before long, come in free, and Parliament will not interfere to overthrow existing arrangements with respect to the tenure of land. I may remark, however, that wherever a landowner has been a party to the fraud practised upon the tenants by the Corn Law, he would but act a just part if he offered to cancel the leases of such of his tenants who might wish to be freed from engagements contracted under the impression of a continuance of high prices secured by the law.

My chief reason for noticing this singular letter is not because the positions advanced in it appear to me untenable, but because the writer signs himself, "M.P., a Member of the League," the M.P., I presume, meaning member of Parliament, and your note at the foot of the letter assures me that I am correct in this supposition. Now, if "M.P." be a member of the League, he must have joined that body under false pretences. He knows what are the principles of the League; and he has joined it for some other object than that of endeavouring to carry out those principles. If he be a member of it because he has subscribed to its funds, I may remind him that, about two years ago, when the 100,000*l.* fund was proposed, Mr. Cobden distinctly stated in public, I believe in Covent Garden Theatre, that the League wanted no money from any man who could not go with it to the full extent in the assertion of its principles; and he hinted that any assistance from any such person would be dearly gained if it enabled him, by seeming co-operation with the League for a time, to injure it at any future period by the betrayal of its cause. Your correspondent is not, and, with his present opinions, cannot be a member of the League in an honest sense; he does not hold the views and principles of the League, and he has no right to publish a letter in favour of monopoly with the signature he has assumed, that he may convey the false impression that members of the League would be content with, or would approve the policy he suggests. I know nothing of the authorship of the letter; but if I were forced to make a guess, I should say the writer of it has some interest in some petty production of his own, either at home or in colonial produce; or, being a member of Parliament, he is a representative who has conformed to Free Trade unwillingly, and through a salutary fear of those who sent him to Parliament. To test this, I hope when next he writes as a Free Trader defending a Corn Law, he will publish his name, and then his constituents and the public will know who and what he is; and it will be a bolder and more manly course to oppose the League openly, than to assume its colours with the intention to betray it.

I am respectfully yours,

A LEAGUER.

[The writer of this letter, like the correspondent to whom he replies, is an "M.P., and a Member of the League," and one whose opinions are also deserving of every consideration.]

THE "PROTECTIONISTS" IN KENT.—The East and West Kent Agricultural Protection Societies have held their meetings—the former so secretly that no report of the meeting exists. Sir Edward Knatchbull was present, but rumour states that he did not encourage an agitation against Sir Robert Peel. A petition was agreed on in favour of the present monopoly—and that was all. We did not hear that so much as sixty thousand farthings were subscribed to counteract the pounds sterling of the Leaguers.—Kent Herald.

FREE TRADE.—We are happy to learn that the working-classes of this town are making arrangements for holding a public meeting to raise their voice in favour of Free Trade. Certainly, no one is so deeply interested in the abolition of a tax which makes bread dear and employment scarce as the man who lives on weekly wages. The monstrous delusion that cheap corn produces low wages may be imposed on herds and ploughmen in mihrand parishes, but will be scouted by the better-informed artisans and working-men of our towns.—Scotsman.

QUESTIONS FOR CANDIDATES.—Will you, if elected, in Parliament, vote for the following measures, whenever and by whomsoever brought forward?—1st. For the total immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws.—2nd. For the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of all customs' duties on the import of the flesh of all animals fit for human food, whether living or dead, whether salt or fresh; also on lard, butter, cheese, or eggs.—3rd. For the repeal of so much of all customs' duties as give a preference to the produce of one country over that of another; whether the produce come from a British possession or a foreign country.

We hear, from a friend in the enemy's camp, that Lord A. Hervey will certainly support Sir Robert Peel in his anticipated alterations in the Corn Laws.—Brighton Gazette.

REVIEW.

Forest and Game Law Tales. By H. Martineau. Vols. I. and II. London. Moxon.

Miss Martineau has never been found absent from her post as a zealous advocate of philanthropic improvement, whenever any great question, involving the social happiness of the people, has been mooted. The proved evils arising from the laws for the preservation of game having been established before a committee of the House of Commons, it is more than probable that these laws will be subjected to a thorough revision; and in order that such a revision may lead to a great amelioration, this benevolent lady has illustrated the principal evils resulting from a system of game-preserving by a series of sketches, which should be called pictures from life, rather than tales. The sketches in the first volume are antiquarian and historical. She commences before the Conquest with a description of rural life in England as it existed under Canute, when farmers who refused to furnish the best of their substance for the entertainment of the king's commissioners were obliged to collect a certain number of wolves' tongues as a fine. But this punishment, politic and lenient as it may seem, reduced the offender to the degrading condition of a felon. His social existence ceased to be recognised, while his wife and children were liable to be sold as slaves. Though these rude old times are far removed from our sympathies, Miss Martineau has given such a reality and truth to her description, that it is impossible to avoid feeling a deep interest in the fate of all the personages she has introduced.

The second tale, "The Manor and the Eyrie," refers to the period after the Norman conquest, when cultivated lands were deliberately laid waste to be turned into forests and chases for the royal deer. We deem this the best tale in the first volume; and the following extract abundantly proves that "Life in a Sick Room" has not weakened the writer's power of vivid delineation either in scenery or character:

"The royal City of Winchester lay fair to the eye amidst its chase and its woodland 800 years ago, when its cathedral, three monasteries, and the king's palace rose above the meaner dwellings hidden within its massive walls. Its castle was not yet built; and the afforesting of the district round was only half carried through: so that while in some parts green lawns, young copse, and clumps of old oaks and elms approached the walls, on another side, a manor-house and its village, and a convent surrounded by its orchards and pastures, might be seen within a short distance; and further off, a farmstead here and there, amidst its fallows and young crops. Such was the aspect of the district one early spring morning, when all was stillness on the side of the budding woodland, where the dragon-fly came forth unnoticed from the rushes of the pools, and the birds twittered and fluttered, unheeded by the fowler; and even the deer crossed the glades unwatched by the king's regards. Fowlers, foresters, their children, and even their dogs, were engaged on the other side of the city walls, aiding or viewing the spectacle which there distinguished the day. On that side, there was no stillness. The sounds were not those of an ordinary working-day. From the village, nothing was heard of the builder's mallet, or the carpenter's saw; from the fields, no ploughman's whistle, or herdsman's call. There was the toll of the convent bell, and the clang of that of the manor-house, till both ceased in the same moment,—evidently stopped by command, and, to judge by the murmur which arose, by some unacceptable command. The murmur was hushed by such a burst of foresters' horns and clamour of dogs as brought to the city walls the few inhabitants who were not already there to look abroad. And O! what a sight did they throng to see! The Benedictines came forth from their convent, in a procession whose order could not easily be preserved from the impatience of the royal dogs, and the press of the weeping poor, who were never more to receive the supply of their needs at the convent gate. Whenever there was confusion, the Superior stopped, and waited till order was restored; and then the train resumed its slow progress to one of the city gates. When the indignation of the gazers became so strong as to require some concession, the royal officers made an ostentatious show of mustering round the bearers of the convent plate and other valuables, as if to guard them from robbery. Before the monks were within the walls, another spectacle fixed the attention of all who were near enough to see. The gates of the manor-house enclosure were—not opened—but thrown down; and forth came another train. A rush was made to the spot; but there was a something encountered which made many shrink, and some look another way. The lord of the domain came first; and on the same horse was a veiled lady, whom all knew to be his eldest daughter. The other daughter, whose attitude showed extreme timidity, though her face could not be seen, rode next,—her horse led by an old serving man. No one dared to speak to the lord. His restless eye and bloodless lips made him terrible. But several neighbours accosted Dudda, the old servant, in a low voice, all eager to know where the family were going. 'To the convent first, with her and her, pointing to the young ladies; and to leave those things as an offering for their support.' Chests of precious goods came next,—of gold and silver cups and ornaments, and the embroidered hangings of the apartments left behind. 'And where is my lord going?' 'Heaven knows!' 'But where this day, till his goods are carried?' 'Heaven knows! But I believe we shall carry no more than you see. The king allows no time.' 'If my lord asked, perhaps—' 'He did ask,—and more for your sakes than our own. He asked for time, for you of the village; and he asked for a vessel for his family and goods, that they might pass over to the Island, for a short refuge.' 'They are going to the Island, then?' 'No. The answer was that the domain was wanted, without the loss of a day, for the spring breeding of the game; and the king's vessels are gone across to Normandy, to bring beasts to stock the new chase.' 'Norman knights in our mansions!' muttered the inquirer: 'and now Norman beasts in our folds and barns, and our very cottages!" "No," replied old Dudda; "no cottages and no folds will be left. They are all to be razed. It is all to be a waste where our village stands."

The "Staunch and their Work" is dated from the reign of King John, and is more illustrative of the history of Magna Charta than of the Game Laws. There is, however, great spirit in some of the historical pictures, particularly of the closing scene at Runnymede. We are less pleased with "Old Landmarks and Old Laws," and are disposed to regard the character of old Parr as a failure; the delineation is too indistinct to be effective.

The second volume opens with the admirable tale of "The Bishop's Flock and the Bishop's Herd." It describes the pranks of the deer-poachers in Waltham Forest, who were frequently instigated and joined by wild young men of fashion. A sad accident on the night destined to be the last of the frolic led to fatal consequences. Let us glance at a farm-house, whose inmates act a leading part in the story, as the shades of the unhappy evening began to close:

"Polly was this evening salting her new butter, thinking the while somewhat soberly of the strange disorder which had entered their household. She was persuaded that her father was uneasy under it. He had spoken sharply to Asher about his wildness, though the lad had done nothing wild till his father led the way; and the farmer had told her, three times over, without the subject being in any way led to, that in a few days he should have received compensation for the expense he had been put to by the deer, and then they must settle down, and have no more irregular doings this winter. Polly well knew that this expected money was from the sale of the venison which had now for three nights been sent off in large quantities to London; and she hoped full as earnestly as her father, that the Blacks would now soon disband for this time, and leave the district in peace. This night's poaching, she believed, was to be the last; and there seemed to be some doubt whether they would not to-night be met by some force which would render it advisable for them to close their enterprise. She wished that morning was come. While so thinking, the door opened, and she started.

"Don't be frightened, Miss Polly," said the man who entered turning up the black crape which covered his face.

"Oh, Mr. Bob, what brings you here?"

"Only that I am pretty well tired of my post, and thought I should be better amused here. Your quiet neighbour gives us no sport at all—never tries to let fly so much as a little bird with his message to my dad and the rest. Not a thing have we seen more amusing than an old butler, or a frightened housemaid, peeping out of an attic window, to learn whether we were still there. However, all is safe; and we are likely to have our night's sport undisturbed."

Mr. Bob was a law student, the son of a game-preserving magistrate in the neighbourhood, who had joined the party of poachers called "the Waltham Blacks" for the mere sake of fun and excitement. His sport was soon changed to sadness:

"Mr. Bob was really about to propose her searching for some kind of whistle or pipe, and going out deer shooting with him, as a little snug private venture, which might be made a joke of in case of their being overtaken by any keeper who might have courage to follow up the shot, when the attention of both was caught by the appearance of fire, not very far off.

"Mr. Bob muttered an oath, ran into the house, put on his crape and hat, and was gone.

"Polly could not stay long behind. The fire presently flared less; but it became a redder and steadier burning. Where to seek her father and brother she knew not; and there was not a neighbour to whom she dared to own this, except such as she had reason to suppose were with the Blacks. The suspense was soon unendurable. She locked the door, and ran at full speed, guided by the light of the fire, and soon by the shouts of a crowd, mingled with the roar of flames.

"O, thank God! it is only the furze!" cried she, stopping at the turn of the lane, and laying both her hands on her throbbing heart.

"It was a beautiful sight to her, relieved in mind as she now was. The flames seemed to flit and dance, like spirits, over the space of common in front of her; to flit and then alight, and shoot up, and crackle and spread, and then make another leap. Polly's heart leaped with them, and she could not help calling out to an acquaintance who was running past,

"A pretty fright I have had; and you too, I dare say; and all because some silly boy has set the furze on fire. I might have guessed what it was. Well! I shall not be so easily scared next time."

"Why, come on, mistress," cried the man, beckoning as he ran. "It's catching Squire Isherwood's house, they say."

"Again Polly flew at her utmost speed. She found enough to be alarmed at when she came in full view of the scene.

"The spread of the fire was terrible, leaping as it did from the furze on the common to the fence of Mr. Isherwood's kitchen garden; from the fence to the wood pile; from the wood pile to the doors and roofs of the offices; and thence to point after point of the main building, till it was clear that the whole must go. It was also fearful to see how the country people came rushing down to the scene of the fire, while the Waltham Blacks were still in considerable numbers on the spot, though many had stolen away, more careful of their own safety than of Mr. Isherwood's property. It was fearful to see her father, wholly forgetting his blackened face and the risks he ran, toiling away to put out the fire, and get his neighbours to help him. He made them form a line from the pond to the fire, and pass from hand to hand such buckets as they had been able to obtain: and there he stood, a Waltham Black confessed, in the row of his yellow-faced neighbours, as the fire shone equally upon them all. Yet more fearful was it to see, through smoke and the darkness of the night, fitfully lighted up by fire, rank beyond rank of horsemen approaching rapidly.

"Polly did not stop for a second glance. She rushed down among the crowd, and forced her way with the strength of vehemence to where her father stood. He either would not attend to her prayers that he would come home, or go somewhere out of sight, or he could not hear her amidst the hubbub,—the din of shouts, screams, and roaring of flames. But she distinctly heard him say, as he pointed to the house-keeper, which she still held in her hand,

"Go you home, child! You are wanted there. Mr. Bob is hurt, and gone there. Go you home, I say."

"She saw there was nothing else to be done; and half frantic, home she ran.

"When she burst into the house, she found it already entered from the back. Mr. Bob was lying along the settle by the hearth, and a labourer's wife whom Asher had brought in from the neighbourhood, had taken off his coat, and was cutting open his waistcoat and shirt, to save him pain. A falling beam had struck him on the shoulder, and bruised him severely; but it did not appear that any bones were broken, though the patient declared his belief that they all were. Asher gave no help, till reproached by his sister for his standing in a corner, as if asleep. When he came forward to the light, such was his expression of countenance, and his paleness, that his sister left her patient for a moment, threw her arms about his neck, and gave him a kiss which brought him to salutary tears."

The catastrophe is impressively told:

"Mr. Bob was conveyed away, in the course of two or three nights, in safety; but at a cost of anxiety and terror which turned his mother's hair white, and furrowed her face, so as to excite the wonder of her neighbours, and cause mysterious whispers at a time when every one had enough of news to tell aloud to all he met. Mr. Bob became a capital lawyer; but he lost all his fine spirits, and turned out by no means the genial character which everybody had expected from the sprightliness of his youth. His father stood in great awe of him, and grew less severe in his magisterial decisions, and less peremptory in the manner of giving them, even in game cases, and when his son was not at his elbow than he had ever been before Mr. Bob was a lawyer.

"Mr. Bob escaped. But all else connected with the transactions of our story was as black and dreary as the law which ordered the catastrophe. Legal vengeance had full play, in retribution for the deeds of that brief season. It was the extreme severity of the law which caused the organisation of so formidable a band—it was the extent and force of this band and its organisation which caused the magistrates to be passive, and the officers of justice supine in their function. And now that the band was broken up, the reaction was violent, and a cruel law was enforced in a vindictive spirit. Every magistrate who delighted in game was eager to see poachers punished. Every constable who had seen pass him in the streets culprits against whom he had warrants in his pocket which he dared not execute, was consoled when he saw them and their comrades in irons or at the bar. The Waltham Blacks were a fallen foe—or at first supposed to be so; and those of them who were caught had no mercy to expect. As they passed through the streets of Winchester in companies—passed from the jail to the gallows—they could only hope that their comrades yet at large would take warning, and let the game alone.

"It might have been thought that the warning was abundant; for the law was sufficiently preached and expounded by the spectacle of the hangings. It was pretty well known henceforward that 'to appear armed in any inclosed forest or place where deer are usually kept, or in any warren for hares and conies, or in any high road, open heath, common or down, by day or by night, with faces blacked or otherwise disguised, or (being so disguised) to hunt, wound, kill, or steal any deer, to rob a warren, or to steal fish, or to procure by gift or promise of reward any person to join them in such unlawful act, is felony without benefit of clergy.' That such was the law, all were reminded who passed Farmer Rasbrooke's place, during the years that it stood vacant, and who sighed to think that that man, though not wise, should have died on the gallows—that his spirited boy should have disappeared, and his gay daughter Polly should never have been seen to smile since the night of the fire at Mr. Isherwood's. Instead of the merry laugh which might formerly be heard from the farm at any hour of the day, there was now only the ominous cry of the owl from the roof-tree. Instead of busy figures which used to trip from kitchen to dairy, and from dairy to poultry-yard, there was now a blank solitude, unless those told the truth who said that Farmer Rasbrooke's ghost trailed about the premises at night, groaning bitter groans, and appearing to be searching for his children. These things were enough to prevent any one taking the farm; and one would have thought they would be sufficient to deter men from following the deer; but they were not. The poaching in the forest went on till there were no deer left to make it worth while.

"Some of the neighbouring gentry were, on their part, no less slow to learn. When Bishop Hoadley was translated to Winchester, he was urged to restock the forest.

"No," said he, "I think we have had mischief enough already from the Waltham deer."

"Heathendom in Christendom" is a powerful but very painful tale of legal oppression and rustic revenge. We pass it over to come to the very affecting portraiture of an honest industrious farmer reduced to poverty by the ravages of the game in his landlord's preserves. The story is called "Four years in Maude Chapel Farm." In these four years a young landlord has for the first time established strict preserves in the neighbourhood, and the social evils resulting from the system are exhibited with equal fidelity to truth and nature. Let us take one of the earliest incidents:

"Much dismay was caused one Sunday morning by such an event as had never been witnessed or heard of before by the oldest inhabitant. Some children, the oldest not above fifteen, the youngest nine, went out bird-nesting. Four of them got into the wood, saying that people always used to go there, and there was nothing but a gate to hinder them now. The others remained outside, being afraid of the keepers, and having some sense that it was wrong to go over locked gates. Their companions were bringing them a linnet's nest, and a miscellany of eggs in a handkerchief, when the halloo of a keeper was heard, and Tucker appeared. The boys scampered, and all but one had cleared the gate when Tucker came up; and that one was on the top bar. Tucker knocked him off, inside the gate, and struck him with a stick. As the man swore and threatened, and did not enjoy the good opinion of the neighbourhood, the children were afraid he would murder their comrade. They pelted him with stones which lay about. He did not stand this long, but retreated through the wood, shaking his stick at the intruders. They went homewards, sufficiently instructed against trespassing, and some two or three of the more timid doubting whether they had heard the last of it.

"A very speedy certainty succeeded to this doubt. Before they reached the nearest of their homes, they were overtaken by the constable and the two under keepers, and carried off to the house of a magistrate. Of course they did not appear at home in time for church; and their families went without them. It was in church that the report spread that several children were to be carried off to Norwich Castle, for an assault on Mr. Neville's keeper. All that day and the next, the parents tried in vain to obtain access to the boys, or to the magistrate. They were merely told through the medium of the butler, that the case would come on on Wednesday morning, when they might attend. On Tuesday afternoon, however, they heard that the case had been heard that morning, the children fined ten pounds for an assault on the keeper, and, being unable to pay, were sent for a fortnight to the nearest House of Correction."

Another evil consequence soon follows:

"The autumn was far from being the cheerful season that it ought to be in ordinary years, when the fruits of the earth are gathered in under a genial sun. The sun of this harvest was genial. All the influences of nature were as favourable as in any former year: but the widow herself could not but admit that never had she found it less easy to be merry at the harvest-home. The deficiency in the crops was so great, from the ravages of the rabbits and game, that she could not say that Henry ought to marry this Christmas, if he himself thought that he should not. Fanny King had been used to every comfort that persons in their rank are wont to enjoy; and it had been Henry's hope and thought of pride that he should bring her to a home which might compare favourably with that she had left. If he could not this year accomplish this ambition, his mother felt that she could say nothing against his waiting. Never at a loss for hope, however, the widow trusted that Fanny King would find means to intimate to her revering lover that she meant to marry him for himself, and had rather share his lowered fortunes than wait to be endowed with such as were good.

"Do take out a certificate, and shoot down all you can: and I wish I could help you," she said to her son, in her restlessness to be doing something, when they were estimating their losses after harvest. "And as for the rabbits, cannot we defend ourselves better against them?"

"Our men are wiring and trapping, morning and evening;—have been for months past, and must be, more and more, for the turnips' sake, as the year gets on: but it seems all of little use. If the keeper chooses to let them increase, we cannot keep them down."

"Suppose you write to Mr. Neville about it."

"He answers no letters of that kind, or not to any purpose. But I will see him when he comes down to shoot."

"Do, my dear. And tell him we could get seven or eight sacks of wheat to the acre, (though the land is none of the best,) but for the game. Tell him we did, before this year; and that this year we have under six."

"I will. And I must show him how the farm will suffer, if we cannot do more than turn ourselves round in it."

"That's right. And I dare say you will find him reasonable enough. He will compensate you, I dare say."

"Henry shook his head.

"What do you do that for, Henry? Why should not he make it up to us, when he sees he has injured us?"

"He must excuse our whole rent, and more, to make it up to us; and no landlord thinks of doing that for such a reason."

"But cannot you give him a hint,—just drop a gentle hint, you know, about an action for damages?—I mean, if you find he won't listen to you without."

"No, because he knows that I could not bring an action. I have all the law can give me now, in having the right to kill on my own farm."

"Then there ought to be a better law," said the widow. "I've no notion of a law that pretends to protect us, and then lets us be eaten out of house and home."

"Well, that time is not come yet," observed Dinah. "We have a home, dear mother."

"Yes, thank God, we have, my dears; and a very happy one, I'm sure,—for all a few losses now and then. We'll make it up next year, Henry, depend upon it."

"Henry did not reply; for he did not see how, with above 150*l.* deficient, which he had hoped to put into the land, he could expect to prosper better. He could not see how he could help falling back, unless he could induce some great change in Mr. Neville's proceedings."

We need not follow every step in the decline and fall of the once prosperous farmer. Ruin came upon him with more rapid strides every successive year; he bore up against misfortune with the sturdy spirit of an English yeoman, but all his efforts were vain, and he sunk to the condition of a day labourer.

We shall wait for the appearance of the concluding volume to discuss the social and economic questions of grievances and their remedies which Miss Martineau has undertaken to illustrate. But looking upon this work as simply that of a novelist laying open life, we feel that it is one in which intelligence of the highest order is employed to excite sympathies of the purest and noblest character.

SIGN OF THE TIMES.—At a meeting of the Gloucestershire magistrates, held in the grand jury room, Gloucester, on Tuesday, the 6th inst., on the propriety of erecting additional lodgings for the judges, the following hint was thrown out as regards the Corn Laws. The Hon. C. F. Berkeley said he agreed that this was a question of time, but he thought the present was a very bad time for incurring such an expense. The country was on the eve of a very great change with regard to the agricultural interest, and they were bound to defer expending such a sum (7000*l.*), until they knew what course would be taken, and he should raise his voice against laying out any sum for judges' lodgings at the present time. Earl Fitzhardinge said there was much that was worthy of consideration in the remarks made by the Hon. Craven Berkeley. That court was not a place for political discussions, but they could not shut their eyes to the fact that some great change would take place which would affect the agriculturists very much indeed. Before the next quarter sessions they should know what it was proposed to do.

A public meeting of the inhabitants of Edinburgh has been announced to take place on Thursday next for the purpose of adopting means to raise a subscription in aid of the League Fund.

LIST OF PRICES.
	READY MADE.	£ s. d.
Beaver Tazellonis		0 7 4
Chesterfields or Codringtons		0 10 0
Gray's, Ashola, Penmore, and every description of winter coats	from	1 5 0
Boy's winter coats in every style		0 8 0
Wulter trousers, lined		0 4 0
Doeskin		0 10 6
Dress Coats, edged		1 0 0
Frock ditto		1 5 0
Roll collar Vests		0 1 9
Double-breasted ditto		0 2 6
Boy's Hussar and Tunic Suits		0 18 6
Boy's winter Trousers		0 3 0
Boy's winter Vests		1 6 0
MADE TO MEASURE.
Winter Coats in every style and shape, handsomely trimmed		1 5 0
Milled Cloth Great Coats, velvet collar and cuffs		1 12 0
Tweed Wrappers		0 8 6
Ditto Trousers		0 8 6
Winter Trousers, in all the new patterns		1 12 0
Doeskin Trousers		0 10 6
Rest, or Dress Trousers		1 6 0
Dress Coats		1 12 0
Ditto, best quality made		2 15 0
Frock Coats		1 12 0
Ditto, best quality made		3 3 0
Cashmere Vests		0 8 6
Satin, plain or fancy		0 12 0
Boy's Hussar and Tunic Suits		1 6 0
Boy's Great Coats		0 14 0

THE LEAGUE.

No. 122.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1846.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE COUNTIES! THE COUNTIES! ONLY SIX DAYS MORE!

We are come now to the last time of asking. THE THIRTIETH OF JANUARY IS AT HAND. Another week, and it will be too late. When we next address the public, the campaign will be over, and the watchword of struggle and victory—"QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!"—will have lost its meaning and power, for this season. FRIDAY NEXT, the thirtieth instant, is the LATEST DAY up to which county qualifications can be purchased in time for the registration of the year 1846. A week hence, and the books will be closed. Whoever is unqualified then, will be too late for the church-door lists in July, and the revising barristers' courts in September—too late to bear a part in any general election that may take place between the 1st of December, 1846, and the 1st of December, 1847.

We entreat our hitherto unqualified friends to lose not an hour that now remains to them, for arming themselves with the only one weapon that can avail in this warfare of right against might, and of a nation against an oligarchy. We trust that no Free Trader, possessed of the means of entering himself on the muster roll, will subject himself to the bitter mortification of being self-doomed to stand by a passive and powerless spectator of the closing struggle. Let nobody dream that this question either will or can be settled without an APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE—i. e., an appeal to those of the people who have got votes. Never mind about Sir Robert Peel and his "plan"—be that plan what it may. The assumption that Sir Robert Peel can carry the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Law through the two Houses of Parliament, without an intervening general election, is one of the wildest of hallucinations. The PEOPLE have done it all, thus far—and rely on it, the People will have to do it all, at last. The total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Law will, almost certainly, be the work of the next House of Commons;—and the next House of Commons will, almost certainly (should the present one live long enough) be elected under the registration of 1846.

The time is short—yet much may still be done in this short time. In the precious six days that now remain, there is time for thousands and thousands of the unenfranchised to pay money, receive their conveyances, and take out their title to a freehold interest in the soil of their country, and a share in its government. In those counties, more particularly, in which most work has been already done, these few days may be invaluable. Where much has been accomplished, and the victory is all but won, a little more may make all the difference between a minority and a majority—or between a mere majority, and a majority so decisive and commanding, as to preclude all possibility of defeat, or even of contest.

Once more, then, with all the earnestness and emphasis prompted by the conviction, that the time, though short, is yet long enough for great successes—that victory is within our grasp, if we will but grasp it—and that the exertions of the next six days may have much to do with making the Parliament that is to make England free for ever from landlordism and artificial famine—we reiterate our fervent exhortation and entreaty to the Free Traders of every county in England, to

QUALIFY, QUALIFY, QUALIFY.

MR. COWPER AND THE BOROUGH OF HERTFORD.

We are glad to learn, by the subjoined letter which we have received from a highly respectable elector of Hertford, that we were mistaken in supposing that the Honourable W. F. Cowper represents that borough by aristocratic nomination, rather than by popular election. The passage in last week's number of THE LEAGUE to which our correspondent demurs—to the effect that Mr. Cowper's connexion with the Hertford constituency is based on the "favour of a couple of peers"—was written on the authority of Dodd's Parliamentary Companion, which states that "the Marquis of Salisbury has considerable influence in this borough, as has also EARL COWPER." From this we inferred, that a relative of Earl Cowper's, sitting in Parliament for this borough of Hertford, was the representative, not so much of the electors, as of that "considerable influence" which, in the vast majority of boroughs thus under influence, overrides all choice and judgment on the part of the constituencies, and makes the form of popular election a mere farce and sham. Our correspondent will, we are sure, allow that the inference was natural;—we most willingly and gladly give him the use of our columns, to tell the world that it was erroneous. His letter is as follows:—

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Hertford, 20th of 1st month, 1846.

"ESTEEMED FRIEND,—I will not comment on any part of your remarks upon the speech of the Hon. W. F. Cowper at the late election of a member for this county, as far as regards what is personal to that hon. gentleman; but, as an elector of the Borough of Hertford, I ask you to remove from the Liberal electors the stigma cast on them in that article, which states, that the Hon. W. F. Cowper 'represents, under favour of a couple of peers, the populous and influential Borough of Hertford.' Now, so far from his being the nominee of any peer or couple of peers, it is well known that he came forward at the earnest request of the electors, as signified by requisition, numerously signed, just in the same way as Lord Morpeth had been invited, and has agreed to stand for the West Riding: and to the honour of the Cowper family be it stated, they have never improperly interfered in our elections.

"Whilst admitting, as I most cheerfully do, the great service rendered to the public by the exertions of the League, I regret its organ should do injustice to any party; and I have no doubt they will have pleasure in correcting it in their next Number.

"I am, sincerely, thy friend,
"WILLIAM POLLARD."

Our correspondent does us no more than justice. We feel real pleasure in giving publicity to the above—not merely as a simple act of fairness to Mr. Cowper and the Hertford electors, but because it expresses an honourable sense of independence on the part of the Hertford constituency, and intimates an equally honourable respect for that independence, on the part of the Cowper family, both of which are, we fear, extremely uncommon in boroughs where "considerable influence" exists. It is creditable to the spirit of the Hertford electors, that they resent, as a "stigma," the implied imputation of subserviency to a couple of peers; and it is creditable to the Cowper family, that they do not, like so many others of their order under similar circumstances, practise that oppressive and unconstitutional dictation which has reduced a large number of our Parliamentary boroughs to the condition of so many Gattons and Old Sarums. We should be most happy to be informed, on authority as trustworthy as that of our correspondent, that Hertford is not, in these respects, a most rare exception from the general rule of the class of boroughs (some fifty or sixty) to which it belongs.

THE LAST OF THE PROTECTION SOCIETY MEETINGS.

We suppose society may now congratulate itself on having come to the end of these exhibitions of fatuous imbecility and drivelling rant. The spokesmen of the agricultural mind will, for some time to come, be safely housed, "attending to their Parliamentary duties," in a place where they do not speak; and the sated world will hear little more of its Tyrrells, and Mileses, and Newdigates, and Knightleys. The thoughts and words of statesmen will now occupy those columns which have latterly teemed with a brainless twaddle, that might have been held to qualify its authors for the interior of an asylum, did it not also afford satisfactory evidence that the poor creatures were thoroughly harmless.

We are glad of it. The thing was coming to be too tiresome. It was very well at first. We have had our laugh, like other people; and when the drollery grew flat, and one felt rather the humiliation of witnessing such awful self-exposures on the part of educated English gentlemen with decent coats on their backs, still there was the satisfaction that the affair was doing a salutary public work, by revealing the otherwise unconceivable mental pauperism of the protectionist cause. But the work is done, and no further revelations from that quarter are needed. All mankind have known for this many a week past, that monopolist landlordism has not an idea in its head—nor a reasonable, or reasonable-seeming, word to say for itself; that the party has scarcely a man in its ranks capable of making a decent figure at a tenth-rate spouting-club; and that "protection meeting" is but a short phrase for a certain amount of bungling and falsified statistics, exploded fallacies, ridiculous self-contradictions, and coarse and stupid virulence, uttered at small private parties in the large rooms of small country-town inns. Another hundred of them would add nothing to an already redundant demonstration. Latterly, the whole affair has only been a thing to yawn at. Curry-powder had lost its savour. Salmon was stale. The British lion was tame. The joke of "fighting the League with its own weapons" was dull. The Lennox poetry had gone the round of the critics. The dukes seemed to have exhausted themselves. Even the Norwich "shindy" turned out a failure. There was no shindy at all—so far, at least, as we can learn what a shindy is, or ought to be—but only one of Mr. Cobden's very best and most powerful speeches on the effects of protection on agriculture, rapturously applauded by five thousand people, in the capital of a great agricultural district. If there were one or two other incidents on the occasion, it is but common charity not to speak of them.

Never, surely, was a party so utterly, helplessly, and hopelessly prostrate as is this "country party"—as we believe it calls itself. Without a man of average Parliamentary talent to lead it in the House of Commons; snubbed most cruelly by the Premier, whom it made, but cannot unmake; the scoff and byword of the country; incapable of opening its mouth, without letting out the most desperate inanities and stupidities; without brains even to give a decent show of verisimilitude to its own fallacies; unable to call a public meeting in the most purely agricultural of country towns or villages, without a moral certainty of disastrous defect; insanely boastful and bullying, yet abjectly fearful; trembling all over, both with rage and terror; afraid of Peel, afraid of the farmers, afraid of its own representatives, afraid of the League, afraid of mountains of best foreign wheat, which labourers who get no wages grow on farms that pay no taxes;—was there ever anything in this world in so dismal a case as our British landlordism?

We bear these men no manner of ill will. Their day for mischief is over. They have still their Parliamentary majority (perhaps); but if they had twice their majority, they could do the country no great harm. They DARE NOT do anything with their majority. A few of the crazier ones may indulge in the antics of a sham resistance to a necessity known to be inevitable—but practically, the thing is over. We may look for some kicking and sprawling—but the hook is in the jaw of this big Leviathan of a "landed interest," and the creature will be safely hauled to shore.

LORD BROUGHAM IN A TAKING ABOUT THE LEAGUE.

We do not know that we are quite right in calling the attention of the public to the late Parliamentary display of this eccentric person. The precise nature and extent of Lord Brougham's responsibility for his words is, we believe, still an open question with the psychologists; and though we are not aware that he is entitled to the full benefit of the legal plea for an uncontrolled license of speech, we feel that the case demands every equitable consideration. It must be owned that Lord Brougham has received the most deadly provocation. The League have done without his lordship, and mean to do without him. The League never asked his lordship's opinion—never took his lordship's advice—never sought or acknowledged the favour of his lordship's advocacy of Free Trade in the abstract—never deprecated his lordship's censure—never recognised his lordship's existence, save on one or two occasions, the memory of which it would be cruel to revive. From first to last, his lordship has never been consulted about the League. And now the League are triumphing without his lordship. The grandest political drama of this age is being played out, with the part of Brougham (except in the capacity of candle-snuffer) omitted by everybody's desire. Actually, not a human creature cares—we are sure a vast number do not know—which side Lord Brougham is of. Could there be a graver offence—a more exasperating and inexpiable provocation?

As it is out of the question seriously to resent anything from a man whose inordinate and mortified vanity, disappointed ambition, soured temper, and constitutional recklessness of tongue, seem to deprive him of all power of self-restraint; and, as it is needless to controvert the nonsense, or turn aside the censures, of a man who has played the spendthrift with his talents and character, and muddled away the last remnant of the moral force, weight, and influence once attached to his name;—we are, on the whole, contented to leave Lord Brougham to be his own tormentor. We think it quite punishment enough, simply to put on record the Brougham opinions, as they stand. Be it known, then, to all whom it may concern, that Lord Brougham "must be allowed to express his disapprobation of the manner in which his opinions"—that is, his Free Trade opinions—"important as he deems them, and sincerely as he holds them, have formerly, but chiefly of late, been supported." And Lord Brougham "would rather put his right hand into the fire till it was consumed, than put it to a document which pretended that the Corn Law was the cause of crime, of famine, of disease, and of death." And Lord Brougham thinks the proceedings of the League, though "perfectly lawful," most particularly "unconstitutional," and rules that "those who enter into voluntary contributions without the consent of Parliament, must be prepared to abandon the constitution." And if Lord Brougham "were asked, was he one of the League, or one of the followers of the League, or one of the allies, or one of the accomplices of the League?—or if he were asked, 'Are their means your means?' then he would unhesitatingly answer, 'God forbid.'" And Lord Brougham "cannot bring himself to think favourably 'of constant political agitation,' and greatly deprecates 'ferment' and public 'excitement,' and 'would have' the legislature 'wholly uninfluenced by the pressure of the multitude from without'" (as it was in the days of his Lordship's Reform Bill)—it being well known that all our great reforms for the last thirty years have been carried by Parliament being left to do exactly as it pleased. The "abolition of the slave trade," in particular, is felicitously instanced by his lordship as a measure which was carried "WITHOUT AGITATION!!!"

Has Lord Brougham no friends? They should be on the alert. Trying times are coming. The exasperating and unbearable fact of his lordship's moral and political nullity is about to be more palpably manifested than ever. The greatest national struggle of this generation has been begun and carried on, and will now be finished without him. Why must he put the world in mind of himself? The world is good-natured—quite willing to forget, and pass on.

We pass to a far more agreeable duty in calling our readers' attention to the able and triumphant vindication of the League by our noble champion, Earl Radnor, which will appear in another part of our columns.

THE BEEF, BACON, BUTTER, AND CHEESE MONOPOLIES.

Previously to the formation of the League, no foreign cows, oxen, bulls, calves, sheep, lambs, or swine were permitted to enter this country to be slaughtered for food. Foreign beef, veal, mutton, lamb, and pork, were alike forbidden by law to be eaten by the people. It is pretended by the monopolists that these iniquitous laws were passed for the protection and benefit of the farmers, and their labourers; and that if they were abolished, both would be involved in ruin.

Few of our readers have probably read without emotion the extraordinary proceedings of the meeting of the starving Wiltshire labourers, in our last Number. What an affecting and unanswerable refutation do they present to the monopolist fallacies! Thirty years of protection have ended in yielding these poor labourers the magnificent wages of 6s. to 8s. per week! William Burchell, one of these protected labourers, told the meeting that "He was past forty years of age, and he could say that he never purchased a pound of good slaughtered beef fit to be carried into market. As to mutton, he had purchased a little of that; but never as much as would average a pound a year in the forty years. He knew what veal was, but he had never had any at all."

Well may these poor creatures cry out when told by their masters that "Free Trade would starve them," "Let us try it, we can't be worse off!" Things have assumed a serious aspect in Wiltshire. Truly it is high time to try Free Trade; and by the help of God we will never cease our labours until it be tried; for, be it remembered, that the League was founded to obtain not only the total and unconditional repeal of the infamous Corn Laws, but also the total repeal of the no less infamous provision laws.

The time is at hand when these laws must again be brought under the consideration of the legislature. Sir Robert Peel's tariff of 1842 removed the prohibition of foreign cattle and meat, but in its stead imposed such heavy protective duties as to render their admission more nominal than real. All the foreign meat imported in a whole year is scarcely sufficient for a single day's consumption of the metropolis. Of the butter imported, a considerable quantity has been mixed with tar, to save the duty, and then sold as grease! In the last session of Parliament, when Mr. Ewart moved for the repeal of the butter and cheese duties, Sir Robert Peel did not attempt the defence of these monopolies; he opposed the proposal on the ground that these duties involved a financial question, and that he had then disposed of all the surplus revenue in the remission of sundry other taxes. That the Government cannot spare the amount of revenue produced by the taxes on provisions is an idle pretence, as we shall presently show. We do not ask for one farthing of the existing revenue to be given up for this object. We are prepared to prove that not only the provision taxes, but taxes to eight times the amount they produce, may be remitted without imposing one shilling of additional burthen upon the people.

The duties levied on the following foreign provisions in the year 1844, the latest official account published, were as follows:

Bacon and Hams	3,538 cwt., at 14s. 0d.	£ 2,476
Beef, salted	5,204 "	8s. 0d. 2,081
Pork, salted	1,311 "	8s. 0d. 524
Butter	180,601 "	20s. 0d. 180,601
Cheese	210,480 "	10s. 6d. 110,502
Total		296,184

The total repeal of the above provision monopolies would create a loss of revenue amounting to 300,000*l.* How then can this deficiency be made up? Simply by the abolition of another monopoly. Sugar, imported from our own colonies, pays a duty of 14s. per cwt., whilst foreign sugar pays 23s. 4d. per cwt. The consequence of this difference in the rate of duty is a corresponding difference in the market price. Suppose the price of sugar duty paid be 54s. per cwt., colonial sugar without duty will sell in the market at 9s. 4d. per cwt. more than the same quality of foreign sugar, because the duty on colonial sugar is 9s. 4d. per cwt. less than on foreign sugar; thus:

FOREIGN.	COLONIAL.
Sugar in bond 30s. 8d. per cwt.	Sugar in bond 10s.
Duty 23s. 4d.	Duty 14s.
54s. 0d.	54s.

There cannot be two prices in the market for an article of the same quality, paying the same rate of duty. If therefore the duties on foreign and colonial sugar were alike, the price in bond (that is to say, without duty) would be also alike. Now foreign sugar in bond is selling at 30s. 8d. per cwt. of the same quality as colonial sugar which sells at 54s. per cwt., duty paid. The elements of the price of this sugar are therefore as follows:

	s.	d.
Real value of sugar in bond	30	8 per cwt.
Tax paid to the Queen	11	0
Tax paid to the sugar monopolist	9	4
	54	0

To meet the loss of revenue by the repeal of the taxes on provisions, we propose to transfer that portion of the tax on sugar at present paid to the sugar monopolists to its only legitimate claimant, the Queen's Exchequer. Estimating the consumption of colonial sugar at 4,800,000 cwt. per annum, at 9s. 4d. per cwt., the Queen would gain an additional revenue of no less than 2,200,000*l.* per annum. Add to this 2d. per lb. tax at present paid to the coffee monopolists on 20,000,000 lbs. of coffee, amounting to 170,000*l.*, which we propose also to transfer to the Queen's Exchequer, there would be from these two sources a revenue amounting to 2,370,000*l.* per annum, and the people would continue to pay precisely the same prices for their sugar and coffee which they do now.

It is sufficient for us to show that there are no real grounds for the pretence of maintaining the beef, bacon, butter, and cheese monopolies on the plea that the revenue derived from these articles cannot be spared. We shall not now enter into the discussion in what manner the surplus of more than 2,000,000*l.*, which would remain, after providing for the loss of revenue, in the abolition of the provision taxes, could be best appropriated, because we may hereafter enter upon this question in discussing the sugar duties; but we trust our friends in Parliament will now be prepared to meet a repetition of the arguments of last session against the repeal of the provision laws; and if they find themselves outvoted on our view of the question, we venture to suggest another plan of meeting the loss of revenue or provisions, viz. by extending the probate and legacy duties to real property. A case came recently under our notice, of a poor washerwoman, who, by 40 years of wearisome toil and rigid economy, had accumulated a few hundred pounds to leave to her children; but, before one farthing of this hard-earned store could be divided amongst them, a portion had to be taken from it to pay the probate and legacy duties. We could not avoid the reflection that, if this poor woman's property was taxed, it seemed but an act of justice that the lands and houses of the Duke of Richmond, and our other hereditary legislators, should be taxed in like manner; and yet, strange to say, their lands have descended to their heirs from generation to generation ever since the tax was laid, without having contributed one shilling of probate and legacy duty !!

IMPORTANT DECLARATION OF THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT IN FAVOUR OF FREE TRADE.

We have been delighted and cheered by the response to our labours from our brethren on the other side of the Atlantic more than we can express. The able and enlightened report of Mr. Walker, the Secretary of the Treasury, on the finances of the United States, on which President Polk's message to Congress is founded, has given us unmixed pleasure. The doctrines laid down in this most important document, relating to trade and the principles of taxation, are suited to all times and to all countries; and it comes most opportunely on the eve of a session of Parliament, in which those questions will absorb almost exclusive attention.

The Secretary acknowledges in a frank and candid spirit the improvements made during the last three or four years in the British tariff, and urges them as reasons for similar improvements in the tariff of the United States.

To meet the repeal of the cotton duty, and the reduction on American grain and provisions, the Secretary recommends that the duty on salt should be repealed; that on iron reduced from 60 per cent. ad valorem to 20; and all other duties reduced to the lowest point compatible with raising the necessary amount of public revenue. This recommendation ought to stop the mouths of those English protectionists who are continually declaring that foreign nations will not reciprocate our concessions, as effectually as the facts on which it is founded will close the mouths of the American manufacturers.

The following extracts from the report will be read with great pleasure by the friends of Free Trade, and may be read with great profit by its opponents.

The Secretary ably refutes the reciprocity fallacy, and declares that the repeal of our Corn Laws would result in the overthrow of the protective system in the United States.

"Soil, climate, and other causes (he says,) vary very much, in different countries, the pursuits which are most profitable in each; and the prosperity of all of them will be best promoted by leaving them, unrestricted by legislation, to exchange with each other those fabrics and products which they severally raise most cheaply. This is clearly illustrated by the perfect Free Trade which exists among all the States of the Union, and by the acknowledged fact that any one of these States would be injured by imposing duties upon the products of others. It is generally conceded that reciprocal Free Trade among nations would best advance the interest of all. But it is contended that we must meet the tariffs of other nations by countervailing restrictions. That duties upon our exports by foreign nations are prejudicial to us, is conceded; but whilst this injury is lightly felt by the manufacturers, its weight falls almost exclusively upon agriculture, commerce, and navigation. If those interests which sustain the loss do not ask countervailing restrictions, it should not be demanded by the manufacturers, who do not feel the injury, and whose fabrics, in fact, are not excluded by the foreign legislation of which they complain. That agriculture, commerce, and navigation are injured by foreign restrictions, constitutes no reason why they should be subjected to still severer treatment, by additional restrictions, and countervailing tariffs enacted at home. Commerce, agriculture, and navigation, harassed as they may be by foreign restrictions, diminishing the amount of exchangeable products which they could otherwise purchase abroad, are burdened with heavier impositions at home. Nor will augmented duties here lead to a reduction of foreign tariffs; but the reverse, by furnishing the protected classes there with the identical argument used by the protected classes here against reduction. By countervailing restrictions, we injure our own fellow-citizens much more than the foreign nation at whom we purpose to aim their force; and, in the conflict of opposing tariffs, we sacrifice our own commerce, agriculture, and navigation. As well might we impose monarchical or aristocratic restrictions on our government or people, because that is the course of foreign legislation. Let our commerce be as free as our political institutions. Let us, with revenue duties only, open our ports to all the world, and nation after nation will soon follow our example. If we reduce our tariff, the party opposed to the Corn Laws of England would soon prevail, and admit all our agricultural products at all times freely into her ports, in exchange for her exports. And if England would now repeal her duties upon our wheat, flour, Indian corn, and other agricultural products, our own restrictive system would certainly be doomed to overthrow. If the question is asked, who shall begin this work of reciprocal reduction? it is answered by the fact, that England has already abated her duties upon most of our exports. She has repealed the duty upon cotton, and greatly reduced the tariff upon our broadstuffs, provisions, and other articles; and her present bad harvest, accompanied by a reduction of our tariff, would lead to the repeal of her Corn Laws, and the unrestricted admission, at all times, of our agricultural products."

Commerce is the exchange of the products of one country for those of another. The report shows that when nations pass laws which interfere with this natural exchange, and force exports of specie, trade must be necessarily restricted. Our Corn Laws have afforded too many instances of the truth of this fact. Having no regular trade with foreign countries for corn in exchange for our manufactures, whenever we need foreign supplies of corn we are obliged to pay for it in specie; and hence the disturbance of our currency, the diminished demand for our manufactures, the decline in prices, the want of employment, and the long train of evils which follow.

"The growing West, in a series of years, must be the greatest sufferers by the tariff, in depriving them of the foreign market, and of that of the cotton-growing states. We demand, in fact, for our agricultural products, specie from nearly all the world, by heavy taxes upon all their manufactures; and their purchases from us must therefore be limited, as well as their sales to us enhanced in price. Such a demand for specie, which we know in advance cannot be complied with, is nearly equivalent to a decree excluding most of our agricultural products from the foreign markets. Such is the rigour of our restrictions, that nothing short of a famine opens freely the ports of Europe for our broadstuffs. Agriculture is our chief employment; it is best adapted to our situation, and, if not depressed by the tariff, would be the most profitable. We can raise a larger surplus of agricultural products, and a greater variety, than almost any other nation, and at cheaper rates. Remove, then, from agriculture all our restrictions, and, by its own unfettered power, it will break down all foreign restrictions, and, our own being removed, would feed the hungry and clothe the poor of our fellow-men throughout all the densely peopled nations of the world. But now we will take nothing in exchange for these products but specie, except at very high duties; and nothing but a famine breaks down all foreign restrictions, and opens for a time the ports of Europe to our broadstuffs. If, on a reduction of our duties, England repeals her Corn Laws, nearly all Europe must follow her example, or give to her manufacturers advantages which cannot be successfully encountered in most of the markets of the world. The tariff did not raise the price of our broadstuffs, but a bad harvest in England does—giving us for the time that foreign market which we would soon have at all times, by that repeal of the Corn Law which must follow the reduction of our duties. But while broadstuffs rise with a bad harvest in England, cotton almost invariably falls; because the increased sum which, in that event, England must pay for our broadstuffs we will take, not in manufactures, but only in specie; and, not having it to spare, she brings down, even to a greater extent, the price of our cotton. Hence the result, that a bad harvest in England reduces the aggregate price of our exports, often turns the exchanges against us, carrying our specie abroad, and inflicting a serious blow on our prosperity. Foreign nations cannot for a series of years import more than they export; and if we close our markets against their imports by high duties, they must buy less of our exports, or give a lower price, or both."

"Coal, iron, sugar, and molasses, articles of great bulk and weight, yielded last year six millions of revenue, at an average rate of duty exceeding 60 per cent. ad valorem. These duties are far too high for revenue upon all these articles, and ought to be reduced to the revenue standard."

"The duty on cotton-bagging is equivalent to 55 20 per cent. ad valorem on the Scotch bagging, and to 123 11 per cent. on the gunny bag; and yet the whole revenue from these duties has fallen to 60,064.50 dollars. Nearly the entire amount, therefore, of this enormous tax makes no addition to the revenue, but passes to the benefit of about thirty manufacturers. As five-sixths of the cotton crop is exported abroad, the same proportion of the bagging around the bale is exported, and sold abroad at a heavy loss, growing out of a deduction for tare. Now, as duties are designed to operate only on the domestic consumption, there ought to be a drawback of the whole duty on cotton-bagging re-exported around the bale, on the same principles on which drawbacks are allowed in other cases. The cotton planting is the great exporting interest, and suffers from the tariff in the double capacity of consumer and exporter. Cotton is the great basis of our foreign exchange, furnishing most of the means to purchase imports and supply the revenue. It is thus the source of two thirds of the revenue, and of our foreign freight and commerce, upholding our commercial marine, and maritime power. It is also a bond of peace with foreign nations, constructing a stronger preventive of war than armies or navies, forts or armaments. At present prices, our cotton crop will yield an annual product of 72,000,000 dollars, and the manufactured fabric 504,000,000 dollars, furnishing profits abroad to thousands of capitalists, and wages to hundreds of thousands of the working classes—all of whom would be deeply injured by any disturbances, growing out of a state of war, to the direct and adequate supply of the raw material. If our manufacturers consume 400,000 bales, it would cost them 12,000,000 dollars, whilst selling the manufactured fabric for 84,000,000 dollars; and they should be the last to unite in imposing heavy taxes upon that great interest which supplies them with the raw material out of which they realise such immense profits. Accompanying the drawback of the duty on cotton-bagging should be the repeal of the duty on foreign cotton, which is inoperative and delusive, and not desired by the domestic producer."

Our corn monopolists tell the agricultural labourers that the Corn Laws were passed for their benefit, and that if they be repealed wages will fall. This impudent assertion was answered the other day at the meeting of the poor Wiltshire labourers, by the declaration that they only earned 6s. to 8s. per week! The American monopolists tell their dupes the same story, and, as appears from the Secretary's report, with about the same degree of truth:

"An appeal has been made to the poor by the friends of protection, on the ground that it augments the wages of labour. In reply, it is contended that the wages of labour have not augmented since the tariff of 1842, and that in some cases they have diminished."

"Where the number of manufactories is not great, the power of the system to regulate the wages of labour is inconsiderable; but, as the profit of capital invested in manufactures is augmented by the protective tariff, there is a corresponding increase of power, until the control of such capital over the wages of labour becomes irresistible. As this power is exercised from time to time, we find it resisted by combinations amongst the working classes—by turning out for higher wages, or for shorter time, by trades' union; and in some countries, unfortunately, by violence and bloodshed. But the Government, by protective duties, arrais itself on the side of the manufacturing system, and, by thus augmenting its wealth and power, soon terminates in its favour the struggle between man and money—between capital and labour. When the tariff of 1842 was enacted, the maximum duty was 20 per cent. By that act, the average of duties on the protected article was more than doubled. But the wages of labour did not increase in a corresponding ratio, or in any ratio whatever. On the contrary, whilst wages in some cases have diminished, the prices of many articles used by the working classes have greatly appreciated."

"A protective tariff is a question regarding the enhancement of the profits of capital. That is its object, and not to augment the wages of labour, which would reduce those profits. It is a question of per centage, and is to decide whether money vested in our manufactures shall, by special legislation, yield a profit of ten, twenty, or thirty per cent., or whether it shall remain satisfied with a dividend equal to that accruing from the same capital, when invested in agriculture, commerce, or navigation."

"It discriminates in favour of the manufacturer, and against the mechanic, by many higher duties upon the manufacture, than upon the article made out of it by the mechanic. It discriminates in favour of the manufacturer, and against the merchant, by injurious restrictions upon trade and commerce; and against the ship building and navigating interest, by heavy duties on almost every article used in building or navigating vessels. It discriminates in favour of manufactures, and against exports, which are as truly the product of American industry as manufactures. It discriminates in favour of the rich, against the poor, by high duties upon nearly all the necessities of life, and by minimums and specific duties, rendering the tax upon the real value much higher on the cheaper than upon the finer article."

It was proved by the evidence of Deacon Humm and Mr. Macgregor, both Secretaries of the Board of Trade, and therefore the highest authority, that the effects of our Corn Laws were to impose a burthen upon the people greater than the amount of all the State taxes, including the interest on the national debt. The Secretary tells us, that the American monopoly taxes the people to the extent of 81,000,000 dols., but that of this sum only 27,000,000 dols. reaches the State treasury; and moreover, that 20 millions of people are thus taxed for the benefit of the small fraction of 10,000 capitalists. In like manner our Corn Laws tax the people to the amount of 50 to 60,000,000l. per annum for the presumed benefit of a few thousand owners of land:

"At least two-thirds of the taxes imposed by the present tariff are paid, not into the treasury, but to the protected classes. The revenue from imports last year exceeded 27 millions of dollars. This, in itself, is a heavy tax; but the whole tax imposed upon the people by the present tariff is not less than 81 millions of dollars, of which 27 millions are paid to the Government upon the imports, and 54 millions to the protected classes, in enhanced prices of similar domestic articles."

"This estimate is based upon the position that the duty is added to the price of the import, and also of its domestic rival. If the import is enhanced in price by the duty, so must be the domestic rival; for, being like articles, their price must be the same in the same market. The merchant advances in cash the duty on the import, and adds the duty, with a profit upon it, and other charges, to the price, which must therefore be enhanced to that extent, unless the foreign producer had first deducted the duty from the price. But this is impossible; for such now is, and long has been, the superabundance of capital and active competition in Europe, that a profit of six per cent. in any business is sufficient to produce large investments of money in that business; and if, by a tariff, a duty of four per cent. be exacted on the products of such business, and the foreign producer deducts that duty from his previous price, he must sustain a heavy loss. This loss would also soon extend beyond the sales for our consumption to the sales of our merchants of articles to be re-exported by them from our ports with a drawback of duty, which would bring down their price throughout the markets of the world. But this the foreign producer cannot afford. The duty, therefore, must be added to the price, and paid by the consumer; the duty constituting as much a part of the price as the cost of production."

"If it be true that, when a duty of 40 per cent. is imposed by our tariff, the foreign producer first deducts the duty from the previous price on the sale to our merchant, it must be equally true with a duty of 100 per cent., which is exactly equal to the previous price, and, when deducted, would reduce the price to nothing."

"In suggesting improvements in the revenue laws, the following principles have been adopted:

"1. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government economically administered."

"2. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue."

"3. That below such rate, discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties; or, for imperative reasons, the article may be placed in the list of those free from all duty."

"4. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries."

"5. That all minimums, and all specific duties, should be abolished, and ad valorem duties substituted in their place—care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and under-valuation, and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.

"6. That the duties should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

"Thus, by the tariff of 1842, a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem is levied on all manufactures of cotton; but the law further provides that cotton goods, 'not dyed, coloured, printed, or stained, not exceeding in value 20 cents per square yard, shall be valued at 20 cents per square yard.' If, then, the real value of the cheapest cotton goods is but 4 cents a square yard, it is placed by the false value of 20 cents per square yard, and the duty levied on the fictitious value—raising it five times higher on the cheap article consumed by the poor—than upon the fine article purchased by the more wealthy. Indeed, by House document, No. 306 of the first session of the 28th Congress, this difference, by actual importation, was 65 per cent. between the cheaper and the finer article of the 20 per cent. minimum, 131 per cent. on the 30 per cent. minimum, 48½ per cent. on the 35 per cent. minimum, 84 per cent. on the 60 per cent. minimum, and 84 per cent. on the 75 per cent. minimum. This difference is founded on actual importation, and shows an average discrimination against the poor on cotton imports of 82 per cent. beyond what the tax would be if assessed upon the actual value. The operation of the specific duty presents a similar discrimination against the poor and in favour of the rich. Thus, upon salt, the duty is not upon the value, but it is eight cents a bushel, whether the article be coarse or fine, showing, by the same document, from actual importation, a discrimination of 64 per cent. against the cheap, and in favour of the finer article; and this, to a greater or less extent, is the effect of all specific duties. When we consider that 2,892,631 74 dollars of the revenue last year was collected by minimum duties, and 13,311,085 46 dol. by specific duties, the discrimination against the cheaper article must amount, by estimates founded on the same document, to a tax of 5,108,422 dollars, exacted by minimums and specific duties annually from the poorer classes, by raising thus the duties on the cheaper article above what they would be if duty were assessed upon the actual value. If direct taxes were made specific, they would be intolerable. Thus, if an annual tax of thirty dollars were assessed on all houses, without respect to their actual value, making the owner of the humble tenement or cabin pay a tax of 30 dollars, and the owner of the costly mansion a tax of but 30 dollars on their respective houses—it would differ in degree, but not in principle, from the same unvarying specific duty on cheap as on fine articles. If any discrimination should be made, it should be the reverse of the specific duty, and of the minimum principle, by establishing a maximum standard, above which value the duty on the finer articles should be higher, and below which they should be lower on the cheaper article. The tax upon the actual value is the most equal, and can only be accomplished by ad valorem duties. As to fraudulent invoices and under-valuation, these dangers are believed to be arrested effectually by the stringent provisions and severe penalty of the 17th section of the tariff of 1842; and now one-half of the revenue is collected from ad valorem duties.

"From improved machinery, diminished prices of the raw material, or other causes, prices may fall even after a tariff, but they would in such cases have fallen much more but for a tariff. The truest comparison is between the present price of the same article at home and abroad; and to the extent that the price is lower in the foreign market than in our own, the duty, if equal to that difference, must to that extent enhance the price, and in the same rate with the lower duty. The difference in price at home and abroad is generally about equal to the difference in the cost of production, and presents, in a series of years, the surest measures of the effect of the duty—the enhancement in price being equal to that difference if the duty be higher than that difference, or equal to it, or if the duty be lower, then the enhancement is equal to the duty; and if the article is produced, like cotton, more cheaply here than abroad, the duty is inoperative. The great argument for the tariff is, that, foreign labour being cheaper than our own, the cost of foreign production, it is said, is lessened to that extent; and that we must make up this difference by an equivalent duty, and a corresponding enhancement in price, in our own market, both of the foreign article and of its rival domestic product—thus rendering the duty a tax on all consumers, for the benefit of the protected classes. If the marshal were sent by the federal government to collect a direct tax upon the whole people, to be paid over to manufacturing capitalists to them to sustain their business, or realise a larger profit, it would be the same in effect as the protective duty, which, when analysed in its simplest elements, and reduced to actual results, is a mere subtraction of so much money from the people, to increase the revenues of the protected classes. Legislation for classes is against the doctrine of equal rights, and repugnant to the spirit of our free institutions, and, it is apprehended by many, may become but another form for privileged orders—indicated here not by rank or title, but by profits, and dividends, extracted from the many, by taxes upon them, for the benefit of the few. No prejudice is felt by the Secretary of the Treasury against manufacturers. His opposition is to the protective system, and not to classes or individuals. He doubts not that the manufacturers are sincerely persuaded that the system which is a source of so much profit to them, is beneficial also to the country. He entertains a contrary opinion, and claims for the opponents of the system a settled conviction of its injurious effects. Whilst a due regard to the just and equal rights of all classes forbids a discrimination in favour of the manufacturers, by duties above the lowest revenue limit, no disposition is felt to discriminate against them by reducing such duties as operate in their favour below that standard. Under revenue duties, it is believed, they would still receive a reasonable profit, equal to that realised by those engaged in other pursuits; and it is thought they should desire no more, at least through the agency of governmental power. Equal rights and profits, so far as laws are made, best conform to the principles upon which the constitution was founded, and with an undeviating regard to which all its functions should be exercised—looking to the whole country, and not to classes or sections.

It seems strange, that while the profit of agriculture varies from one to eight per cent., that of manufacturers is more than double. The reason is, that whilst the high duties secure nearly a monopoly of the home market to the manufacturer, the farmer and planter are deprived to a great extent of the foreign market by these duties. The farmer and planter are, to a great extent, forbidden to buy in the foreign market, and confined to the domestic articles enhanced in price by the duties. The tariff is thus a double benefit to the manufacturer, and a double loss to the farmer and planter—a benefit to the former, in nearly a monopoly of the home market, and in enhanced prices of their fabrics, and a loss to the latter in the payment of those high prices, and in total or partial exclusion from the foreign market. The true question is, whether the farmer and planter shall, to a great extent, supply our people with cheap manufactures, purchased abroad with their agricultural products, or whether this exchange shall be forbidden by high duties on such manufactures, and their supply thrown, as a monopoly, at large prices, by high tariffs, into the hands of our own manufacturers? The number of manufacturing capitalists who derive the benefit from the heavy taxes extracted by the tariff from twenty millions of people does not exceed ten thousand. The whole number (including the working classes engaged in our manufactures) deriving any benefit from the tariff, does not exceed 400,000, of whom not more than 40,000 have been brought into this pursuit by the last tariff. But this small number of 40,000 would still have been in the country, consuming our agricultural products; and in the attempt to secure them as purchasers, so small in number, and not consuming one-half the supply of many countries, the farmer and planter are asked to sacrifice the markets of the world, containing a population of 800 millions, disabled from purchasing our products by our high duties on all they would sell in exchange. The farmer and planter would have the home market without a tariff, and they would have the foreign market, also, to a much greater extent, but for the total or partial prohibition of the late tariff."

Monopoly in the United States will not long survive the Secretary's very able exposure of its injustice and thoroughly anti-republican character. The American people are too shrewd not to see that their truest policy consists in commerce free as their political institutions. We may be excused if we exult in the pleasing idea that our seven years' labours have not been in vain. The President of the United States has declared in favour of Free Trade. We doubt not a message of a similar character will shortly be delivered to our assembled Parliament. When the two freest nations of the world shall have hoisted the banner of Free Trade, it will be the signal for other nations also to hoist the white emblem of "peace on earth, good will to men." "This will (in the language of Mr. Calhoun) indeed be a victory—THE HARBINGER OF A NEW AND BRIGHTER AND HIGHER CIVILIZATION."

The Council of the League some time ago presented to Mr. Calhoun and General McDuffie, the Free Trade leaders in America, splendidly bound copies of the League, as a mark of its esteem and sympathy, and of the sense it entertained of their able and indefatigable advocacy of Free Trade principles. We are happy to learn that the Council has ordered similar tokens to be prepared for presentation to President Polk, and to the Hon. Mr. Walker, the Secretary of the United States' Treasury.

THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

We re-publish from last week's League, with considerable additions, the list of LOCAL TREASURERS, and once more urge upon all those who have not yet replied to the Circular of the Council relative to their appointment, to do so without delay.

The Council, we believe, are anxious to announce, not only in the columns of this journal, but also in the local papers, the name of some gentleman in every considerable town in the country, to whom subscriptions may be paid, and by whom they will be transmitted to Manchester. This is a very important preliminary arrangement, and will, we trust, receive the prompt attention of those who have been corresponded with on the subject.

The gentlemen named below will, as we have already implied, receive contributions in their several neighbourhoods.

Immediate exertion is not only important—it is imperatively necessary. The present is the moment for action; and if it is allowed to pass away unimproved, we may look in vain for the recurrence of another opportunity of acting so influentially, or with such probabilities of success.

The Subscription Cards and Books are now ready, and will be supplied either direct from the offices of the League, in Manchester, or by the Local Treasurers.

Andover—James Baker, Esq., Prospect House.
Ashton-under-Lyne—Thomas Mason, Esq.
Aylesbury—J. P. R. Payne, Esq.
Ainwick—Thos. Duncan, Esq.
Ayr—J. Kinross, Esq.
Annan—Alex. Donnie, Esq.
Amersham—E. West, Esq.
Beaminster—Mr. Jos. Tite, Clenham Mill.
Bath—Admiral Gordon, R.N., Nelson-place, Norfolk-crescent.
Barnsley—J. S. Parkinson, Esq., Linen manufacturer.
Belper—Mr. J. W. Hancock.
Bromsgrove—W. A. Greening, Esq.
Bridgewater—William Browne, Esq.
Burton-on-Trent—J. N. Hanson, Esq.
Bristol—George Thomas, Esq., Great George-street, Park-street.
Burnley—Geo. Holgate, Esq., jun.
Bridport—J. P. Stephens, Esq.

Barnard Castle—Mr. Wm. Raine, Horse Market.
Brighton—Isaac Gray Bass, Esq.
Bury—James Kay, Esq., woollen manufacturer.
Boston—Mr. Robert Stevenson.
Cleckheaton—Geo. Anderton, Esq.
Cambridge—Chas. Newby, Esq., 55, Regent-street.
Creditor, Devon—Edward Davy, Esq.
Crayford, Kent—Henry Gould, Esq.
Carlisle—J. Forster, Esq., Caldewgate.
Colne—Mr. T. T. England.
Chorley—Mr. James Wallwork.
Carmarthen—Henry Norton, Esq.
Chapel-en-le-Frith—J. Carrington, Esq.
Devonport—Samuel Oram, Esq., Market-street.
Dundee—Edward Baxter, Esq.
Doncaster—Mr. Robert Milner.
Dunbar—James Wilson, Esq., Belhaven.
Dartmouth—Noah Clift, Esq.
Darlington—Charles Green, Esq.
Dunfermline—Mr. R. Robertson, Draper.
Edinburgh—Messrs. Arch. Thomson and Co., 255, High-street.
Exeter—Mr. Samuel Maunder.
Eynsford, Kent—Mr. H. Rogers.
Falkirk—John Smith, Esq., Writer.
Forfar—Mr. Wm. Sturrock.
Gateshead—Geo. Crawshaw, Esq.
Garstang—Dr. Bell, Chapel-street.
Glossop—John Kershaw, Esq.
Gloucester—Samuel Bowly, Esq.
Horsham—James Agate, Esq., North Parade.
Halifax—Mr. Thomas Denton, Old Market.
Hinckley—Mr. Thos. Payne.
Holywell—Thos. Mather, Esq., Glyn Abbot.
Hastings—Mr. Thos. Ross, Jun.
Hazel Grove—Mr. T. Wharmby.
Huddersfield—Foster Shaw, Esq.
Hawick, N.B.—Mr. George Easton.
Idle, near Bradford, Yorkshire—Mr. Wm. Russell.
Inverness—Donald Frazer, Esq., jun.
Jedburgh—Geo. Hilson, Esq., Manufacturer.
Kendal—Geo. Charnley, Esq.
Kelso—Mr. Alexander Dodds, Grocer.
Knarborough—Mr. Thos. Addyman, High-street.
Keighley—J. Craven, Esq., worsted spinner.
Kirkcaldy—Mr. Robt. Bryson.
Knuttsford—Henry Long, Esq.
London—A. W. Paulton, Esq., at the offices of the League 67, Fleet street.
Luton—James Waller, Esq., merchant.
Leek—Thos. Birch, Esq.
Lancaster—George Jackson, Esq.
Leicester—J. D. Harris, Esq.
Leighton Buzzard—Thomas Price, Esq., Newtown.
Leominster—Mr. J. V. Chilcott.
Landport, &c.—Mr. Thos. Ross.
Lichfield—Dr. Rowley, M.D.
Leeds—Samuel Birchall, Esq., woolstapler.
Maesteg, near Bridgend, Glamorganshire—Mr. Jos. Crayne.
Manchester—Mr. James Jones, at the offices of the League, 5, Newall's-buildings, Market-street.
Maidenhead—Mr. Thomas Woodcock, draper.
Maidstone—Richard Nemes, Esq., 109, Week street.
Maldon—G. W. Digby, Esq.
Middleton, near Manchester—Mr. Daniel Burton.
Mottram—Mr. Saml. Oldham.
Newcastle-upon-Tyne—George Crawshaw, Esq., and Mr. Daniel Liddell, Carlisle-street.
Nantwich—Mr. Philip Barker.
Newcastle-under-Lyne—Mr. Elias Shaw.
New Mills—John Yates, Esq.
Oldham—John Platt, Esq., Hartford Ironworks.
Ossett, near Wakefield—Mr. Frank Fearnside.
Potteries, The—Francis Wedgwood, Esq.
Poole—G. R. Penney, Esq.
Pontefract—Mr. W. Kidd, news agent.
Pateley Bridge—Mr. R. Harker.
Plymouth—Jno. Symons, Esq., Kinterburg-st.
Reigate—Mr. Thomas Dann.
Ramsgate—Mr. Henry Scott, 57, Queen-street.
Salisbury—Jno. Lambert, Esq.
Sevenoaks, Kent—John Clark, Esq.
St. Columb—Mr. W. Brown, 3, Fair-street.
Scarborough—Isaac Stickney, Esq.
Sheffield—William Hargreaves, Esq., Merchant.
Skipton—J. B. Dewhurst, Esq.
Southport—Richard Johnson, Esq.
Stockport—Mr. J. Heginbotham, Millgate.
Sihowry, Monmouthshire—Rev. Richard Jones.
South Shields—Mr. James Bell.
Stourbridge—Mr. E. Baylie.
Stroud—Mr. John S. Cobb.
Swaffham and West Norfolk—Arthur Morse, Esq., Swaffham.
Swansea—Mr. Joseph Rutter.
Stroud—Mr. T. Parsons.
Stirling, Robert Smith, Esq.
Sunderland—Mr. Edward C. Robson, Frederic-street, Bishopwearmouth.
Shepton Mallett—W. Richardson, Esq., Woodbourne Cottage.
Staleybridge—Henry Bayley, Esq.
Todmorden—W. Haworth, Esq., North View.
Tewkesbury—Mr. Benjamin Harris.
Thetford—Mr. Henry Brown.
Warminster—Mr. H. Bastings.
Widnesbury—Benjamin Round, Esq.
Wareham—J. Pike, Esq., Merchant.
Westbury—N. Overbury, Esq.
Wigan—Thomas Taylor, Esq., Spinner, and Mr. Thomas Wall, Bookseller.
Wirksworth—Mr. B. Street, White Lion Inn.
Wakefield—Charles Morton, Esq., Whitwood Colliery.
Whitchurch—Mr. Richard Thomas.
Weymouth—Mr. Charles Pope.
Westhrovich—J. Spittle, Esq.
York—Thomas Swales, Esq., Lawrence-street.
Yarmouth—Mr. Jno. Fish, Denes.

MARQUIS WELLESLEY'S MEMOIRS.—At this moment the opinions of the Marquis Wellesley on the great question of Free Trade, and the unrestricted importation of food for the people, are peculiarly interesting. In the "Memoirs of the Marquis Wellesley," just published, there is an account of the origin of the Corn Laws, and an ably drawn up protest expressing his lordship's objections against the whole principle of the baneful measure of 1815.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

First Week, ending Saturday, January 24.

The session of Parliament for 1846 has opened at an earlier period than usual, and under circumstances the most remarkable which have occurred in the entire history of Free Trade agitation.

After a night of storm and rain—a night in which the elements seemed let loose, as if to illustrate what would be the condition of Great Britain if it were abandoned to the anarchic sway of the monopolists—the sun, about the middle of the day, on Thursday, the 22d January, peeped forth, and threw a cheerful aspect over the royal procession. The crowds on the streets assembled to greet her Majesty were greater than usual; while the House of Lords contained a more splendid array of rank and fashion than we recollect on any similar occasion for several years past.

The usual ceremonials having been gone through, her Majesty delivered the following "Most Gracious Speech:"

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

It gives me great satisfaction again to meet you in Parliament, and to have the opportunity of recurring to your assistance and advice.

I continue to receive from my Allies, and from all other Foreign Powers, the strongest assurances of their desire to cultivate the most friendly relations with this country.

I rejoice that in concert with the Emperor of Russia, and through the success of our joint mediation, I have been enabled to adjust the differences which had long prevailed between the Ottoman Porte and the King of Persia, and had seriously endangered the tranquillity of the East.

For several years a desolating and sanguinary warfare has afflicted the States of the Rio de la Plata. The Commerce of all nations has been interrupted, and acts of barbarity have been committed unknown to the practice of civilised people. In conjunction with the King of the French I am endeavouring to effect the pacification of those States.

The convention concluded with France in the course of the last year, for the more effectual suppression of the Slave Trade, is about to be carried into immediate execution by the active co-operation of the two Powers on the Coast of Africa.

It is my desire that the present union and the good understanding which so happily exists between us may always be employed to promote the interests of humanity, and to secure the peace of the world.

I regret that the conflicting claims of Great Britain and the United States in respect to the territory on the North Western Coast of America, although they have been made the subject of repeated negotiation, still remain unsettled.

You may be assured that no effort, consistent with national honour, shall be wanting on my part to bring this question to an early and peaceful termination.

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

The Estimates for the year will be laid before you at an early period.

Although I am deeply sensible of the importance of enforcing economy in all branches of the expenditure, yet I have been compelled, by a due regard to the exigencies of the public service and to the state of our naval and military establishments, to propose some increase in the Estimates which provide for their efficiency.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

I have observed with deep regret the very frequent instances in which the crime of deliberate assassination has been of late committed in Ireland. It will be your duty to consider whether any measures can be devised calculated to give increased protection to life, and to bring to justice the perpetrators of so dreadful a crime.

I have to lament that, in consequence of a failure of the potato-crop in several parts of the United Kingdom, there will be a deficient supply of an article of food which forms the chief subsistence of great numbers of my people. The disease by which the plant has been affected has prevailed to the greatest extent in Ireland.

I have adopted all such precautions as it was in my power to adopt for the purpose of alleviating the sufferings which may be caused by this calamity, and I shall confidently rely on your co-operation in devising such other means for effecting the same benevolent purpose as may require the sanction of the Legislature.

I have had great satisfaction in giving my assent to the measures which you have presented to me from time to time, calculated to extend commerce, and to stimulate domestic skill and industry, by the repeal of prohibitory and the relaxation of protective duties.

The prosperous state of the revenue, the increased demand for labour, and the general improvement which has taken place in the internal condition of the country, are strong testimonies in favour of the course you have pursued.

I recommend you to take into your early consideration, whether the principles on which you have acted may not, with advantage, be yet more extensively applied, and whether it may not be in your power, after a careful review of the existing duties upon many articles, the produce or manufacture of other countries, to make such further reductions and remissions as may tend to ensure the continuance of the great benefits to which I have adverted, and, by enlarging our commercial intercourse, to strengthen the bonds of amity with Foreign Powers.

Any measures which you may adopt for effecting these great objects will, I am convinced, be accompanied by such precautions as shall prevent permanent loss to the revenue, or injurious results to any of the great interests of the country.

I have full reliance on your just and dispassionate consideration of matters so deeply affecting the public welfare.

It is my earnest prayer that, with the blessing of Divine Providence on your councils, you may be enabled to promote friendly feelings between different classes of my subjects, provide additional security for the continuance of peace, and to maintain contentment and happiness at home, by increasing the comforts and bettering the condition of the great body of my people.

In the House of Lords, the debate on the Address was tame and brief. The Duke of Richmond angrily demanded explanation; the Duke of Wellington sheltered himself behind a Privy Councilor's oath; and Lord Stanley, who stated that he had received the Queen's permission to disclose everything connected with his resignation declined doing so on that occasion, as he would thereby be driven into a premature discussion of Sir Robert Peel's plans. But he intimated, distinctly enough, that he had retired because of his dissatisfaction with the attempt to diminish or abolish "protection to native industry." A few other peers took part in the discussion; and Lord Brougham made a rambling and really contemptible attack on the Anti-Corn Law League, for which its members had very ample satisfaction in the fact, that at the very same moment Sir Robert Peel was stating their case with all his force and ability, and giving in his unqualified adhesion to their views. The Earl of Radnor took Lord Brougham to task, telling the House of Lords that the whole intellect and enthusiasm of the country were in favour of the Anti-Corn Law League; that there was nothing unconstitutional in its proceedings; and, with a touch of sarcasm, reminding their lordships, that "the League did not traffic in votes; that they did not take advantage of the 50l. clause in the Reform Act, nor did they split up property to manufacture votes." Some grumblings followed from the Earl of Hardwicke, and other peers; and then the Duke of Richmond (who had shown his pre-eminent capacity for the office of Premier, and the combined nobleness and grandeur of his character, by pettishly asking the Government why they did not make Mr. COBDEN a PEER, and place him on the Treasury Bench in the House of Lords!) put off his interrogations until next week.

In the House of Commons the scene was animating. The House was crowded; expectation stood on tiptoe. Sir Robert Peel gave notice that on Tuesday he will bring under consideration the commercial policy of the country, and the subject of the Corn Laws. Several other notices were given; one by Lord Ashley, of his intention to introduce a "Ten Hours' bill." Then came on the business of the night.

LORD FRANCIS EGERTON rose to move the Address, in answer to the Royal Speech. He reminded the House that, TWENTY YEARS AGO, he had, under the auspices of Mr. Canning, occupied a similar position; and this reminiscence led him to his chief topic—that his opinions on the CORN LAW have undergone an ENTIRE ALTERATION. A burst of cheering from the crowded Opposition benches was not re-echoed from the Ministerial side of the House; the "great party" received so important an intimation in blank and solemn silence. Then the noble lord went on to advocate the views of the Anti-Corn Law League—emphatically intimating, that if he did not concur, without qualification, in the recommendation contained in the Royal Speech, to re-consider the Corn Laws, he would not occupy his present position. He gave also to Mr. CROKER, in the last Quarterly Review, a most unceremonious contradiction. It may be recollected that the "ancient mariner," in the last Quarterly, rolled up his eyes in terror at the awful position in which this country would be placed, if, with Free Trade, we had also foreign war. In that case, the aged white-headed man, who affirmed that Tenterden steeple was the cause of Goodwin Sands, was resuscitated in the person of Mr. Croker, who solemnly affirmed, in the last "Quarterly," that if we had FREE TRADE, the French, during the next war, need not fit out a frigate, or fire a shot; all they had to do, was to "close their ports," sit down on the sea-shore, telescope in hand, and, looking across the Channel, with an exclamation of "mort aux rats," watch poor entrapped Englishmen dropping on their fields for want of food, leaving their skeletons to bleach for manure! Lord Francis Egerton laughed at the ludicrous fancy. He pointed to the year 1810, when even from France, we received the largest supply of Continental corn at the very time when we needed it; and he closed his remarkable speech by imploring the House to bring about a "FULL, SATISFACTORY, and FINAL SETTLEMENT of the Corn Law question!"

Mr. Becket Denison seconded the Address; and gave in his adhesion, though in a more guarded manner, to Free Trade views. Experience had driven him to his present convictions; and, looking to the results of the financial policy of Government during the last three years, he had the fullest confidence in her Majesty's Government, that any further measures they would undertake would be for the benefit of all classes, without injury to any.

Sir ROBERT PEEL now rose, and the full gaze and attention of the crowded House were concentrated upon him. His speech was the most remarkable thing that has occurred in the history of Free Trade debate, not for its novelty, but its speciality. The accounts which the newspapers furnished last year of the causes which had rendered so many Cabinet meetings necessary, have turned out from Sir Robert Peel's own account, to have been substantially correct. The mysterious and universal blight in the potatoes was the immediate and proximate cause of all those Cabinet consultations. But Sir Robert Peel said that it would be unfair to make that cause occupy the prominent place. The laws which regulate the IMPORTATION OF FOOD were the primary, the grand subject of the deliberations of a reluctant Cabinet. On the question of the CORN LAW his opinion had undergone a complete change! This announcement was received with triumphant cheering from the Opposition benches, with profound silence from the Ministerial. Then the Prime Minister proceeded, with great ability, to show that all the grounds on which "Protection to Native Industry" was advocated, had been proved to be wholly untenable. Deliberately adopting the speeches of Mr. VILLIERS as his model, he went on, as if he were about to conclude with a motion for the immediate and total abolition of the Corn Law. Protection was not a labourer's question; for during the last three years, prices had been low, and food abundant; and during that period the working classes had been better off than during the preceding three years. High prices did not produce high wages nor vice versa. In the last three years, with low prices and abundance of food, wages were comparatively high, and labour was in demand; in the three years preceding, with high prices and scarcity, wages were low and employment was scarce. Experience thus proved that wages were ruled by abundance of capital and demand for labour, and did not vary with the price of provisions. Again, increased freedom of trade was favourable to the prosperity of our commerce. In three scarce and dear years, namely from 1839 to 1841, our foreign exports fell off from fifty-three millions in value to forty-seven millions. But in three years of reduction of duties and low prices, namely, from 1842 to 1844, the value of our exports rose from forty-seven millions to fifty-eight millions. Even deducting the amount of the China trade, a similar result was shown. Nor was the reduction in the Customs' duties unfavourable to the revenue. In 1842 there was an estimated loss of a million and a half; in 1843, a smaller one of two hundred and seventy-three thousand pounds; but in 1845 there was a reduction, at an estimated loss to the revenue, of no less than two millions and a half. The total amount of the various reductions effected in three years exceeded four millions sterling; and many of the duties were totally abolished; the loss, therefore, not being compensated by any increased consumption. Had four millions been lost to the revenue? He believed that on the 5th of April next the revenue would be found to be more buoyant than ever. But there was a higher test. Criminal statistics showed a connection between increase and decrease of crime, and a declining or prosperous state of the country. In 1843, there had been a decrease of crime to the extent of five and a half per cent.; in 1844, of no less than ten per cent.; in 1845, of five and a half per cent.; and the decrease last year was especially marked in all the great manufacturing districts. Thus, during the time that they have been engaged in reducing Protective duties—in other words, gradually destroying protection to native industry—the interests of the labouring classes, of commerce and of morality had been promoted; and it was impossible to resist the inevitable conclusion that relaxation of protection was favourable to all the social relations and concerns of the country. Nor was relaxation unfavourable to native industry, however much it might hitherto have relied on protection. Flax was a striking instance in point. Foreign flax was now freely imported; yet, in the face of a rapidly increasing amount of foreign importation, the price of flax was higher. Foreign cattle was another instance. They all remembered the predictions of ruin in 1842, when prohibition was removed, and foreign cattle were admitted at a small fixed duty—predictions which created an unfounded though temporary panic. What was the case now? In the face of a rapidly augmenting importation of foreign cattle, sheep, and swine, prices had not been affected, and the contracts for the supply of provisions were now nearly double what they were even in 1844. Nay, on the subject of lard, about which there was so much alarm last year (loud laughter), with an importation running up from a nominal amount to eighty thousand hundred weight, prices had risen from 48s. to 62s. Another example was afforded by wool. The total abolition of the duty has been followed by a largely augmented importation, and a rapidly increasing price; as he showed by giving the quotations for several years. In the face of all these facts—the advancement of the comforts of the working classes, the diminution of crime, the improvement even of the public health, increase of trade, and an advance in price concurrent with an increase in importation, he felt he could no longer stand up in the House of Commons as the advocate of protection. (Hear, hear.) It would be impossible for him, with these convictions on his mind, any longer to meet the annual motion of Mr. Villiers with a direct negative. The change in his views had been brought about by observation and experience; and he now frankly stated to his usual supporters that he could no longer defend the Corn Laws. He could have wished that the settlement of the question had been deferred to another Parliament; but the sudden and mysterious blight in the potatoes—the food in Ireland of four million people—rendered necessary immediate action. Sir R. Peel then read copious extracts from the mass of communications which had been forwarded to the Government on the subject; mentioned the appointment of the Government commission of inquiry; and detailed the proceedings of the Cabinet meetings assembled from time to time to consider the subject. His own wish was either at once to open the ports by an Order in Council, of which he was ready to take the responsibility, or else to call Parliament together. But at the same time he felt that though a temporary opening of the ports was not essentially connected with a consideration of the Corn Law, yet that it must, on the present occasion, be necessarily involved. His propositions were opposed by his colleagues in the Cabinet; Lord Stanley especially, considering that there was much exaggeration in the alleged failure of the potato and grain crops. Meantime, agitation increased; and though he might have evaded responsibility, under the fact of his colleagues having overruled his opinions, he felt it impossible to continue at the head of the Government with the strong convictions he entertained of an impending danger, and the necessity for meeting it. His position also was changed by the publication of Lord John Russell's letter. Any movement after it would be misinterpreted; and feeling that he could not bring the matter to a successful issue without the support of a united Cabinet, he determined to place his resignation in the hands of her Majesty. Lord John Russell was sent for; and he (Sir Robert Peel) promised that, in his private capacity, he would give the noble lord all the aid in his power to effect a settlement of the question. The noble lord having failed in his endeavour to form an administration, the Queen asked him if he persisted in his resignation? He replied, no; as the noble lord had not succeeded, he would resume the Government, and endeavour to bring his colleagues into his views. He had given notice of his intention to bring the subject generally before the House, and would not therefore anticipate discussion. But he trusted that he had shown that his motives were honourable. He was charged with "treason" to agriculture. It would indeed be "treason" to agriculture to suffer it to incur the odium of so great a calamity as a failure in the sustenance of the people, to call upon the House to vote money to purchase oats, and refuse to ask them to make any relaxation in the laws which restricted supply. He would not touch the existing law on any slight pretence, as, for instance, the introduction of Indian corn, which was urged as a boon to the agriculturists. It was urged over and over again that he was under some personal obligation to the agriculturists, and he was told that the power which had placed him in his present position could remove him. But he did not feel himself under any obligation to any man or body of men for submitting to the sacrifices of office. He did not undervalue the distinction, but the value of power did not consist in the invidious office of selection for the distribution of patronage. He had now served four sovereigns; under three he had held high office; but the highest reward he had ever asked was the assurance of his having been a faithful and loyal subject. His power he had never used for unworthy purposes; he had tried to use it for the advancement of national interests, and as a Conservative leader, or a Conservative minister, he had thought it consistent with high Conservative policy to reconcile an ancient monarchy and a proud aristocracy to a reformed House of Commons. The burden of office was far above his physical and mental powers; relief would be a favour, not a penalty. But he would not retain office with shackled power and mutilated authority; the helm he would not hold, especially in such stormy nights as he had seen in the House of Commons, unless it had liberty to traverse. If minister of England, he must be unshackled in his efforts to provide for the public safety.

Sir Robert Peel concluded this triumphant Free Trade speech with a kind of defiance to the aristocracy and the landed interest. Had this been delivered at any Free Trade meeting, there would not be wanting foolish feeble people to talk about vulgarity and intemperance. But Sir Robert Peel plainly told the monopolist rulers of the country, that he was their best friend, now, as hitherto, in his attempts to reconcile "an ancient monarchy and a proud aristocracy" to the action of a Reformed House of Commons, and the necessity of moving with the times. Contemptuously did he talk of the boasted Richmond power of making and unmaking Premiers. Removal from office, the toils of which were above his physical and mental powers, would be a relief, not a penalty. But while he was Minister of England, it would not be with shackled power and mutilated authority. He would not hold office on a servile tenure. Nor would he touch the Corn Law for any trivial and temporary purpose, such as the free introduction of Indian corn. If he changed it at all, the change, he intimated, must be a comprehensive one. If he held the helm, especially in stormy times, that helm must "have liberty to traverse!" The Minister of England, if he held the office, must have unshackled liberty to take such measures as he considered necessary to provide for the public safety!

Such is an abstract of this remarkable speech; which was followed by one no less remarkable from Lord JOHN RUSSELL. The noble lord mainly occupied himself in giving those details respecting his recent attempt to form an administration, with which the public are familiar. But the speech was marked by the emphatic declaration of the noble lord, that the great principle on which he intended to form an administration was FREE TRADE in its integrity and power. Lord J. Russell went further than Sir R. Peel, for the noble lord repudiated any attempt at compromise, by any offer to COMPENSATE, or, in other words, to BRIBE the landed interest. But on one great point both Lord John Russell and Sir R. Peel are agreed—the principles of Free Trade are not merely the principles of common sense, but the principles of imperious public safety. Here is "Mene, mene, tekell, tekell upharsin," written on the walls of the House of Commons. The hand-writing was interpreted to the mortified monopolists by the two leading men of what used to be the two great parties. On Thursday night they were told that "their kingdom was departed from them;" and silence, more expressive than words, proclaimed the depth of their despair, the choking aggravation of their rage. The "dumb creatures" did at last find vent for hurricane-like explosion; and Mr. MILES, in a voice so agitated by internal passion, that he could scarcely articulate, warned the apostate Prime Minister that the agriculturists were preparing for him swift vengeance. Poor Colonel Sibthorp, also, uttered tokens of deep anguish. Once he thought Sir Robert Peel the only man to save the country; now he considered him the only individual capable of ruining it! But all this was mere brutum fulmen, so far as voting the address was concerned; though vigorous opposition is threatened when Sir Robert Peel's measures are brought in.

The only other speech of the evening was that by Mr. D'Israeli. But with this, as Free Traders, we have no sympathy. We have but one single object in view, that of the accomplishment of Free Trade; and whether it be achieved by Sir Robert Peel or Lord John Russell, we equally rejoice in the progress and the triumph of truth and reason. Sir R. Peel has as much right to change his opinions on the subject of protection as has Lord John Russell. Besides, Mr. D'Israeli is hardly the man to rate a Prime Minister for inconsistency. The member for Shrewsbury has himself boxed the political compass; he has veered in his short career from ultra-democratic to ultra-Tory views. In 1842, he elaborately patronised Sir R. Peel, when he introduced the New Tariff, and proved, much to his own satisfaction, that Free Trade was no heir-loom of the Whigs, for Pitt and the Tories adopted it before them. Whatever may be his motives, he has now taken to the dissecting line, his favorite victim being the Prime Minister; and with cool cruelty he performs his operations. Those who enjoy political anatomy may read the speech of Mr. D'Israeli on Thursday night. It is painful to see and to hear an assembly of Christians and gentlemen enjoying so keenly the process of skinning a living frog: but possibly it may teach future aspirants to office better to define their principles, and to study the map of their future course, before they commit themselves irrevocably to questions, on which, like a weathercock, they may have to turn completely round!

For remainder of Parliamentary News see Supplement.

THE NEXT COVENT GARDEN MEETING.—As Sir Robert Peel has announced his intention of bringing forward his Free Trade measures on Tuesday night next, and as the debate will probably continue through several nights, the Aggregate League Meeting in Covent Garden Theatre, announced for Wednesday next, will be postponed until further notice.

EAST SUSSEX REGISTRATION.—The county registration movement for East Sussex is going on with vigour. The Free Trade friends at Brighton are putting forth all their energies in the full confidence of success. Mr. Falvey will lecture in this division of Sussex during next week; at Eastbourne, on Monday; Hailsham, on Wednesday; and Uckfield, on Friday.

FREE TRADE MEETINGS.

NORWICH.

TRIUMPH OF MR. COBDEN OVER THE NORFOLK MONOPOLISTS.

Among the various meetings which have lately been held throughout the country upon the subject of the repeal of the Corn Laws, it is perhaps difficult to select any one as possessing pre-eminent importance. An intense interest in the question, and a firm and abiding determination to pursue it to a successful issue is the spirit which pervades every part of the kingdom. But the meeting at Norwich on Tuesday last, whether viewed in reference to its intrinsic importance, or to the extrinsic circumstances by which it was attended, certainly possessed features which gave it a high degree of interest, at least in Norfolk and the whole of the eastern counties, if not to the country at large. The intrinsic value of the meeting lies in a strong and unequivocal expression by the citizens of Norwich at the largest public meeting ever held there, of entire concurrence with the principles of the League, and a determination to assist in their realisation, notwithstanding the seductive blandishments, the corruption and intimidation employed by the monopolists of the district to procure a different result. The chief peculiar circumstances which marked the proceedings were the appearance of a gentleman—acknowledged to be the very beau ideal of a "county member"—at such public meeting to discuss the question of the justice or expediency of Free Trade principles, at a period when the whole question has long been given up by the leaders of his own and every other party. It is somewhat singular that Norwich should have been lately distinguished for the resuscitation of ancient superstitions and exploded fallacies, whose existence, even in the most rural districts, had become a matter of doubt. A few weeks ago, John Bell, of Norwich, gravely preferred a charge of witchcraft against a respectable old lady of that city. The magistrate listened patiently to the recital of the bodily ills which the complainant alleged he was labouring under, but as the poor fellow had come to a firm determination that they all did and must result from the baleful influence exercised over him by the aforesaid old lady, it was in vain to urge upon him the necessity of availing himself of the aid of medical science, the protection of the law being the only thing which in his bewildered judgment would meet the necessities of his case. The magistrates smiled and dismissed the case. The Hon. Edward Wodehouse, the prototype of John Bell, appeared on Wednesday last before 5000 of the inhabitants of Norwich—to whom, by-the-by, he facetiously introduced himself as "your representative,"—and in the face of that vast assembly propounded fallacies which have long since been abandoned by the protectionists themselves. The hon. gentleman, in a most piteous manner, detailed the evils under which he and his order were struggling, arising from the witchery exercised over the nation by the League, and the inevitable ruin that must ensue to the agriculturists of the country, if the Free Trade spell, now in operation, were not counteracted by the charm of an Act of Parliament. The fate of Mr. Wodehouse's appeal was similar to that of John Bell—the Norwichians laughed at the delusion and dismissed the case. It had for some time been known that Mr. Cobden had accepted an invitation given to him by the inhabitants of Norwich, to be present at a meeting in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws; and a requisition having been presented to the Mayor, calling upon him to convene a meeting for that purpose in St. Andrew's Hall, and that requisition having been cheerfully complied with, the greatest interest was excited with respect to the forthcoming meeting, but that interest was subsequently vastly augmented when it became known that a challenge had been sent by Mr. Wodehouse to Mr. Cobden, and accepted by that gentleman, to discuss the question of the influence of agricultural protection. It appears to be one of the arrangements of Providence that some of the most important advances made in great principles should result from the folly of their opponents. This was eminently the case in the Free Trade cause, in regard to the celebrated speech of Lord Mountcashel, and that more recently of the Duke of Norfolk. The determination of the rabid portion of the Norfolk monopolists to oppose Mr. Cobden, adds another memorable instance to the list, exposing as it does in the most signal manner the miserable weakness and futility of arguments of men who are deemed fit to hold the highest position in the ranks of the monopolists. But, perhaps it may be said that the only circumstance in which any thing like prudence was exhibited by the protectionists on this occasion was in the selection of their champions. The hon. member for East Norfolk, it is known, can sustain little damage in reputation for wisdom, and the Norfolk monopolists were so far safe in putting him forward. To apply the words of Mr. Cobden, with reference to the county representation, the stakes being all in the hands of their opponents, they could not by possibility lose much by a defeat. One of the parties by whom Mr. Wodehouse was seconded, was Mr. Hamond, a gentleman who, like his principal, is much respected in the county for his kindness and amiability, but who was most cruelly treated by his friends in their not preventing him from the rash attempt of defending the Corn Laws at a public meeting. Perhaps one of the most interesting features in the evening's proceedings was the manner in which the protectionist fallacies were all disposed of by the pithy remarks made by the working men in the body of the hall, clearly proving the success and value of those instructions which the League have disseminated throughout the country. The third protectionist champion was Mr. Bowles, of Cambridge. It was, indeed, strongly rumoured that Mr. George Game Day was coming over to aid and assist, but those who know that gentleman's character for prudence, were satisfied that the report was unfounded. Upon his first appearance upon the platform, Mr. Bowles assumed a very determined attitude; having arranged his papers, he paced the platform to and fro with a fierceness of manner and dignity of demeanour similar to that formerly exhibited in Smithfield by the tragic heroes outside of Richardson's Theatre. This gentleman has an exceedingly happy knack of addressing an audience, giving the pro-Corn Law fallacy in one paragraph and its refutation in the next, thereby taking upon himself the task of answering his own statements, and saving his opponent the trouble. A meeting of weavers was attempted to be got up at one o'clock on the day of meeting, when it was expected they would have been addressed by Mr. Warnes, a gentleman who has become notorious for that extraordinary panacea for the evils of the Corn Laws, namely, less bread and more flax. Indeed, it is stated that strenuous efforts have lately been made by the Norfolk monopolists to enlist the Norwich weavers as an auxiliary monopolist corps, through the medium of the old fallacy of "cheap bread and low wages;" but this effort has failed. George Lynes, to whom "The Norwich Weaver Boy" recently addressed one of his admirable letters in THE LEAGUE, was in attendance, and it was probably owing to that circumstance, and the ascertained unfavourable temper of the operatives, which induced Mr. Warnes not to appear, and the assembly broke up without holding any meeting. Strenuous efforts had also been made to rouse the farmers' clubs, and the local protection societies, but this attempt likewise proved an abortion; the only result being the attendance at the meeting of, at the most, some score of disorderly landlords and agents, and the subsequent presence at an hotel of an equally disorderly party—who, in consoling themselves for the miserable defeat of their champion, gave an infinity of trouble during the night to the servants of the establishment. The modern agricultural Cocker, the Marquis of Hastings, was upon the platform, in company with Mr. Warnes, but neither the one nor the other ventured to address the meeting, although every opportunity was afforded for so doing. Mr. Cobden was accompanied by Colonel Thompson, and both gentlemen were received with loud cheers upon presenting themselves upon the platform.

St. Andrew's Hall was crowded to suffocation. The vast cathedral-like aisle was filled by an immense assemblage, probably numbering five thousand, including people of every class in society, young and old, manufacturing and agricultural. The farmers from the neighbourhood flocked in early, their top boots and leathers shining almost like the party colours of monopoly. The town party of course consisted of the more intelligent ranks of Free Trade. Throughout the evening the feeling of the meeting was almost unanimous; it was that of a thorough Free Trade assemblage, and the triumph of the League was splendid.

Among the gentlemen present we observed Mr. Cobden, M.P.; Mr. Wodehouse, M.P.; Colonel Thompson, Rev. Mr. Brock, Messrs. Hamond, Willett, Younge, Sultzer, Tillet, Bateman, Prout, Martin, Blackburn Chamberlayne, Betts, Towler, Freeman, Butcher, Baker, Copeman, Finch, Thomson, Dr. Richardson, Brightwell, Banks, Bayne, Alexander, Gellheart, Stark, J. Richies, Harman, Bardwell, Pump, Jarrold, Mr. Sheriff Colman, Bacon, &c., &c.

JOHN BETTS Esq., the Mayor of Norwich, took the chair, and in opening the business of the meeting, requested them to hear all—friends and foes. He did not profess to know which party was in the right or wrong on the Free Trade question. He hoped they would hear both sides and then judge for themselves, and concluded by introducing to the meeting

Mr. COBDEN, who was received with tumultuous applause, at its partial subsidence, he addressed himself to the great subject of the evening, and after expressing the peculiar pleasure which he experienced from the presence of a gentleman, "a distinguished leader of the protectionist party in the House of Commons," he proceeded to define the term agriculturist, stating his conviction that farmers and labourers alone were entitled to be so called—not mere landowners—men who, perhaps, never had an acre of land in their own hands to cultivate. Mr. Cobden then delivered a long address, in which he expounded to the meeting what he himself terms the A B C of the Free Trade question. With reference to the present position of that question, the hon. gentleman said, I think, after all, that both landlords and tenants here must feel indebted to me and to the League for coming here, and telling them so much about their own business. (Laughter.) I tell them we are going to abolish the Corn Law. We will do it. (Tremendous cheers.) You see the old edifice shaking now, but you will see it tottering and crumbling before another six weeks are over. (Prolonged cheering.) Now I want this to be done without exciting the alarm of any of the parties concerned. I have gone into the country from end of it to the other. In almost every county, from Dorsetshire to Aberdeenshire, I have attended meetings, most of them, or many of them in the open air. Two years ago, we of the League spent 10,000*l.* in enlightening the farmers upon this corn question, in making speeches, in delivering lectures, in distributing tracts. (Loud cheers.) Wherever we went we took a reporter with us, and we distributed copies of the speeches that were delivered. And what has ever been the burden of my song? It has been always the same. I have always said that the Corn Laws might be repealed without injury to any one (hear, hear, hear); that the landowner would get as good rent as now if he attended properly to his business, and let his land on mercantile principles; that the farmer would get as good profit as now, provided he invested more capital, which he could if he had a secure lease; and that when the farmer applied more capital, labour could not fail to be more employed and to find better wages. This is the language I have ever held, and yet no sooner is my back turned, than up get these people in the protection societies, and cry out, "Don't mind what that Cobden says to you; it's all nonsense. You can't compete in your business with those Russians and Poles. Come to us; we will pass a law for your protection; if you don't trust to us you will all be ruined." And what a precious mess they have landed you in! They are going to have the Corn Law repealed, and they know it. They all know it; they know it just as well as I do. (Cheers.) Why, then, all this fuss and galvanised movement is nothing but a few landlords—and those, I can tell you, not the most intelligent of their class (hear, hear)—sending out their agents and whipping up the farmers, getting together meetings of not more than some 80 or 90, and getting up long reports of long speeches, which are put in the Post or Herald (great laughter), and then they call all this a great national demonstration. (Cheers.) Well, we meet in Parliament on Thursday (hear), and what is to become of this great protection party? Their own Prime Minister, the man they made Prime Minister to uphold them, has run away. (Cheers and laughter.) That reminds me of an anecdote I heard of a gentleman in the North who was betting upon a race-course, and it was proposed that the stakes should be deposited in the hands of a certain major to hold. "Aye, aye," said the gentleman, "but who is to hold the major?" (Great laughter.) Now the protectionists in 1841 put the stakes in Peel's hands, and now they want somebody to hold Sir Robert. (Laughter.) Now, that there may be no delusion on that point, I ask your honourable representative to speak out candidly to-night what his real opinion is as to the prospect of protection (hear, and vociferous cheering); for I think he will agree with me, at all events in this, that if protection be likely to be abolished, nothing can be so mischievous, nothing so much to be deprecated as the farmers of this county and of the kingdom at large being longer deluded with the idea that protection is to be maintained."

Mr. GEARY having moved a Free Trade resolution, it was seconded by

Col. ANGERSTEIN, a large landowner of the county.

Mr. WODEHOUSE, M.P., for the eastern division of the county, then came forward, and was well received by a small section of the meeting. He said: I have addressed a letter to the electors of Norfolk, saying that though we did believe that the predictions of a famine, if not groundless, had been grossly exaggerated; (noises, and cries of No, no, from all parts of the meeting); yet we did feel that the anticipation of scarcity, under all circumstances, and in all times, ought to be a matter of paramount importance. (Cheers.) Now, I ask you, and I appeal to every man present, whether it is not something like unblushing effrontery on the part of Mr. Cobden, that he has not in any way alluded to that scarcity, which a few weeks ago he said was so much to be apprehended and dreaded. (Cheers, Oh, oh, and a voice, "We want corn, and not potatoes.") I will read my resolution. It is as follows: "That this meeting, while it is duly sensible of the inestimable blessings derived from the enjoyment of commercial liberty, is still impressed with the belief that what is called 'Free Trade,' to use the words of Mr. Clay, formerly President of the United States, is nothing more than a beautiful vision, existing only in the imagination of philosophers and theorists, and practically repudiated by all nations; since an indispensable condition to the adoption of it by one nation is its adoption by all." (A laugh.) And that amendment I am prepared to move on the resolution which has been proposed. The resolution says: "That the Corn Laws and all other laws designed to restrict trade under pretence of protecting particular classes, are unjust in principle and injurious in operation, and ought to be forthwith abolished." (Slight uproar.) I know not whether by the forms of this meeting I am to be prevented from further discussion (no, no); but I am perfectly satisfied to sit down with this declaration. (Oh, go on, go on.) I am perfectly satisfied, I say, to assert that the resolution which has been proposed to you involving the sugar duties, the spirit duties, the malt and beer, and the tobacco duties; involving, in fact, a sweeping annihilation of everything—(Hisses, laughter, and considerable confusion.) Am I to be permitted to go on. ("Yes, to be sure, tell us the good of protection.") I was about to say that I do most cordially rejoice to see my friend Mr. Cobden here to-night. (Hear, hear.) I say so very sincerely, and I may add that I much regret the absence of another gentleman, Mr. Bright. (Cheers.) I am sorry that he is not here, because he has been taking so leading a part in this matter that I should have felt it my duty, had he been present, to have adverted to his conduct and expressions elsewhere. With the leave of the mayor, I will do so now. (Cheers, and cries of "Answer Cobden, never mind Bright; he isn't here to answer for himself;" followed by some confusion.) I was about to say that every man must view with indignation the excessive bitterness with which Mr. Bright expresses himself upon every occasion. (Uproar, cries of "Question," and "Why don't you answer Cobden?") I see I shall be obliged to sit down. The meeting here became impatient, and after a few more sentences Mr. Wodehouse resumed his seat.

Mr. HAMOND then came forward and seconded the resolution. He contended that both the agricultural and manufacturing labourer would be injuriously affected by Free Trade in corn. Mr. Cobden had said (alluding to his enormous size) that he (Mr. Hamond) had too much protection, but he was ready to prove that he had too little. He defended the landlords from the attacks which had been made upon them; and, in conclusion, he advised them to take the registration movement out of the hands of the League, and appoint their own agents for that purpose.

Mr. BOWLES, of Cambridge, then came forward to support the amendment. He denied that the Corn Law was passed to secure any particular price, or equality of prices. The distress of 1822 arose from the over abundance of the harvest of 1820; the growth in that year being 4,000,000 quarters above an average crop, and 1,000,000 more having been imported from Ireland. Wheat was, in 1815, lying in heaps upon the shores of the Baltic, and ready to be imported here at 1*l.* a quarter. America grew this year 15,000,000 quarters of wheat, and 80,000,000 of Indian corn; but the first effect of the introduction of American corn would be to ruin the entire milling property of this county, in which more capital was employed than in all the mills in the country. (Cries of Oh, oh.) The Americans would send us not corn but flour. But then the receipt of corn from America would be interrupted, for though America could grow corn cheap, it could be grown cheaper on the shores of the Baltic, in Odessa, in Moldavia, and in Wallachia; and instead of purchasing from America, we should go with our money in our pockets and buy on the Baltic, so that the reciprocity between England and America, expected to result from Free Trade, must not be looked forward to. (Cheers, and cries of "Oh.") Every quarter of foreign wheat imported displaced so much of English labour. (No, no, and cheering.) What a disadvantageous bargain, to have Free Trade with all the world! Was America so calm, and quiet, and contented, that when Great Britain became a beggar to her for wheat, she could be relied upon? What would she say?—that we had no right to the Canadas; that if we would give her Canada she would let us have food. (Oh, oh, and groans.) Mr. Bowles went on to contend, as well as we could understand, that Free Trade would produce poverty in the villages, and from them to the towns, where the shopkeepers would be ruined; and he contended that Mr. Cobden's speech, however amusing, had been utterly barren in argument, and that he had appealed to the passions, not the understandings of his hearers. (Indescribable uproar.)

Mr. COBDEN then came forward to reply, and was hailed with a renewal of the plaudits which had welcomed his first appearance. When I came here I expected, from the announcement made by the honourable member near me (Mr. Wodehouse)—made in London trumpet-tongued, that we were to have a great shindy here to-night. I expected that we should be treated with a great speech from the honourable gentleman. But he has said nothing in reply to my arguments. (Uproar.) He was very ready to answer Mr. Bright, who is not here (hear, hear, hear); and if I had not been here, he would have been very ready to reply to me. (Cheers.) But though Mr. Wodehouse has not given us a speech, he has sent forward a substitute (laughter), a volunteer in this cause. You have heard his speech, and whatever you may think of the quality of it, I assure you it is quite as good as I generally hear on that side of the question. (Hear.) But the third speaker displayed more ability. He told us that the agricultural distress of 1822 arose from the plenty of 1820, from the arable land of this country having exceeded by four millions of quarters its average yield. Now, let us see what all this amounts to? Why, it amounts to this, that the farmers were ruined by the abundance of nature. (Cheers.) I repeat, if there be anything in that argument, it is that the farmers will be the most prosperous when they have the worst crops. (Hear, hear.) Gentlemen, is there not something foully unnatural in such a proposition? (Loud cheers.) Does it require any argument from me to convince your judgments that there must be something fundamentally wrong in the trade of the farmer, if such pleas be started in his defence? (Cheers.) Your natural feelings—your moral, your religious feelings—will rise in rebellion against such arguments. (Cheers.) The blessings of abundance ruin the farmer! Why, does not the church offer up its prayers and thanks for abundant harvests? (Cheers.) But I will tell you why the farmer is ruined by favourable seasons. His rent was fixed when he believed that he was to sell his wheat at 80*s.* per quarter. (Hear, hear.) I think I hear an honourable gentleman say that the law held out no such prospect. Now, I put it to any candid farmer, whether it has not been the prevailing delusion, from 1815 to the present day, that Parliament can regulate the prices at which he is to sell his wheat? (Hear, hear.) Have I not heard it announced at half your protection meetings, that Peel proposed to give the farmer a protection of from 5*l.* to 5*l.* 6*s.* per quarter? (Cheers.)

Mr. COBDEN having in the most masterly manner replied to the statements of the speakers, in his usual conclusive style,

The MAYOR put the amendment of Mr. Wodehouse, for which about 20 hands were held up, while for the original Free Trade resolution a perfect forest of hands was immediately raised. The resolution was carried amidst loud cheers.

Mr. WILLETT then moved a resolution of confidence in the League, and co-operation in the registration movement.

Mr. Sheriff COLMAN (Sheriff of Norwich), seconded the resolution.

Mr. WODEHOUSE then moved an amendment affirming the impolicy of Free Trade principles.

Mr. HAMOND having seconded the amendment.

Col. THOMPSON then amid loud cheers briefly addressed the meeting in support of the resolution.

The MAYOR put the amendment and resolution with the same result as the first, amidst most enthusiastic cheers.

Mr. WODEHOUSE then moved, and Mr. COBDEN seconded, a vote of thanks to the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN briefly returned thanks.

Mr. BOLINGBROKE, Secretary of the Anti-Corn-Law Association, then read the following letters from gentlemen, apologising for their absence—

Thorpe, Jan. 19, 1846.

MY DEAR SIR,—I regret to say that I have been confined to my room for the last ten days by severe indisposition. I am better to-day, but Dalrymple will not let me stir, and there is not consequently the smallest chance of my being able to attend the Free Trade meeting to-morrow-night.

Yours truly, WM. FOSTER.

Hastings, Jan. 18, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—The near approach of the important contest on the Corn Laws makes me anxious to avoid the risk of a journey at this season of the year, which in my weak state of health might probably prevent my attending in Parliament, when every vote will be wanted. It is, I trust, scarcely necessary for one who from the first has been a supporter of the repeal of these odious laws, to express his firm determination to hold the same course to the end, in the full confidence that so just a cause must be finally successful.

I am, dear Sir, yours most faithfully,
To C. N. Bolingbroke, Esq. B. SMITH.

47, Russell Square, Jan. 19th, 1846.

SIR,—I have received the invitation of your Committee to attend the Free Trade meeting which they are about to hold in St. Andrew's Hall. I am rejoiced that so important a city as Norwich is coming forward a second time to give expression to its sympathy with the national movement against the Corn Laws. The sooner they are unconditionally and absolutely done away with the better for all parties. Persuaded of this, I would gladly have complied with the request to attend your meeting had it been in my power. Engagements in a distant county for Tuesday render it impossible, and I can only hope you will give Mr. Cobden such a greeting as shall convince him of your determination to support the League in their truly patriotic efforts to secure for the country the inestimable advantages of Free Trade; as a proof of my interest in your proceedings I enclose my cheque for 100*l.*

I remain, Sir, yours very faithfully,
C. N. Bolingbroke, Esq. S. MORTON PETO.

Lexham Hall, Swaffham, Jan. 19.

SIR,—I have only received your letter of the 17th inst. this morning, containing the request of the Norwich Anti-Corn Law Association to attend the meeting to-morrow evening. I regret that an engagement will prevent my doing so. However, I do not want to hear any arguments to convince me of the absolute necessity for abolishing the Corn Laws, as I have never yet read or heard of any that have been written or spoken in their favour, which a sensible boy in the upper part of Eton or any of our public schools would not be ashamed to make use of. I have long been a repealer, and wish all success to Mr. Cobden in his arduous undertaking.

The landlords and farmers rejected Lord John Russell's excellent proposition for a fixed duty upon corn, and must take the consequences, for every one is well aware that a repeal of the Corn Laws is inevitable—that shortly a minister might as soon attempt to stop the world from going round, as to attempt to prevent a repeal of the Corn Law. I only trust the abominable cant of measures not men will be also abolished, and that the people of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland will see that it is absolutely necessary to have an honest minister to govern this country—not a quack doctor, who must have his fee paid before he gives his prescription. Honesty is the best policy, and I much regret that I have lived to hear any other doctrine advocated.

Yours obediently,
To C. N. Bolingbroke, Esq., &c., &c. F. W. KEPEL.

WESTMINSTER.

A large and most respectable meeting of the electors and inhabitants was held at the Crown and Anchor on Tuesday evening, to petition against the Corn Laws. The feeling against all compromise was loudly expressed; and no passages in the speeches were so loudly cheered as those which threatened the landholders with a demand for more sweeping changes, if the total and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws were not at once granted. There was a large number of members of Parliament present. Amongst them were Dr. Bowring, Hon. Mr. Bouverie, Mr. M. Gibson, and Sir C. Napier.

The Chairman (Mr. ELPHINSTONE, M.P.), read letters of apology for non-attendance from Mr. Leader and Captain Rous. They were both badly received, though there were some cheers for Mr. Leader, inasmuch as he pledged himself to vote, as he had often done before, for a total repeal of the Corn Laws. Letters had also been received from Lord R. Grosvenor, Mr. Ewart, Mr. B. Hawes, Sir W. Clay, and Colonel Thompson, all expressing a regret that they could not attend.

The CHAIRMAN then amid loud cheering proceeded to address the meeting:—I must say, that when I look at the crowded state of this meeting, and when we know that equally important meetings have been held in almost all the important towns in every part of the United Kingdom, we, who for some time past have been Free Traders, have a right to congratulate ourselves on the progress which has been made in public opinion on this question. Every man who reads the signs of the times must be of opinion that the days of the present Corn Laws are numbered, and that the time has arrived when a final settlement of this question must take place. (Loud cheers.) I think the great mass of the people, in spite of the opinion of certain dukes and protectionists, have come to the conclusion that they ought to have the right of paying for their food in whatever markets they deem best and cheapest and most expedient for that purpose; and I believe the people fully understand the principles of Free Trade, that when duties are imposed, they should be solely for the purpose of revenue, and not for the sake of protecting any particular interest; and with that impression on their minds, they consider that all the money received by means of these duties ought to find its way into her Majesty's treasury, and not into the pockets of private and particular individuals. (Cheers.) In point of fact, it must be clear to every one, that if there be an article, a large proportion of which is produced at home, and a small portion imported, that you raise the price of that which is produced at home in the proportion of the tax imposed on that which is imported. Take the case of wheat. If of the 20 million quarters consumed, 18 are produced here and two imported; and if on that which is brought from abroad you lay a tax of 6s., you, in point of fact, for the half million that goes to the Treasury, make a present of 5,000,000. to the landlords. We Free Traders have long known that a fixed tax on the bread of the people is a fixed injustice. I wish to say, if there is any protectionist present, very respectfully, but firmly and emphatically, that the time has gone by for any compromise in this matter. (Loud and long-continued cheers.) I think the people of England have a full right to ask, and they should be satisfied with no less than the total and immediate repeal of those laws which press so heavily on the industry of the people. (Vehement cheering.) There can be no doubt we are now arrived at a great political crisis, the consequences of which on the future destinies of this country it is impossible to foresee. But having the fullest confidence in the good sense of the people of England, I do not fear for the result; and if Sir Robert Peel brings forward a really good measure, he may calculate on the unanimous and warm support of the Liberal party in Parliament; but in saying this, I trust there will be no compromise, (loud cheers, and cries of, "We'll hear of none;" no clipping and mutilation of a great principle; and I trust that if Sir Robert Peel should think it right to consult the people, he will not give them the half of what they demand, but the whole of what they are entitled to. (Cheers.) I am satisfied at all events that we may calculate with the utmost confidence on the near approach of the day when these bad laws will be swept from the statute book. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. M. GIBSON, M.P., came forward amid loud cheers to move the first resolution:—It has been with much satisfaction that I have come to this meeting, the more so as I appear not a stranger amongst you, but as a resident of Westminster, and an elector of this borough. The resolution is to this effect:—"That it is proved by undoubted evidence that several millions of the agricultural population of Great Britain and Ireland are fed on potatoes, and that there are a thousand individuals born daily, for whose future support provision must be made; and that the Corn Laws, though they professed to be enacted for the protection of industry, have wholly failed in that object." The resolution insists on certain facts, some of which are not disputed even by ultra-protectionists. Every one knows that a large portion of the population of the United Kingdom subsists on potatoes. We did not want the authority of Dr. Marsham for that fact; nor does it require any argument or reasoning to show that the population is increasing, for this simple reason—that it has been counted at successive intervals of ten years, and that at the end of each there has been found an increase of something like a thousand a day. I dare say, if the census had not been taken, some of our opponents would dispute the fact as to any increase of population; and (it can hardly be credited,) a writer of authority on such subjects in his day wrote a book to satisfy the country that the population had not increased. But fortunately we have taken the means, by counting the people, to set at rest that question; and from various commissions of inquiry into the state of the agricultural population, we know that in Ireland, and in many parts of this country, their subsistence is reduced to the lowest point at which human beings can be kept alive. (Hear, hear.) We who advocate the cause of Free Trade believe that the Corn Law is instrumental in reducing the labouring population to the melancholy condition in which they are now placed. We do not say that there are not other causes that have not had an effect, and a considerable effect, on the condition of the people; but we think that whatever other causes may have been at work, the Corn Laws have tended to aggravate the evils under which the people suffered, and were in themselves calculated to straiten the means of the great bulk of the industrious population, and gradually reduce the labouring people to a worse condition than they would have been in had they the means of procuring a fair reward for their own industry. But we require not, in advocating Free Trade, any arguments to prove that the condition of the agricultural labourers has deteriorated. We deny the right of any portion of our fellow-countrymen to dictate to the remainder the condition on which their industry shall be carried on. We deny to any portion of our countrymen the privilege of measuring out employment and trade to the rest of their fellow-subjects. (Cheers.) We say the loom is as essential to the country as the plough, and that the people of the country have as good a right to food, through the operations of the loom, as through those of the plough. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) We say further, that if any body of persons, combined together in Parliament for their own pecuniary interest, restrict one of the most sacred and obvious rights of Englishmen, it is a gross and odious tyranny, and a matter of congratulation that the people have at last determined to throw off the odious yoke, and to proclaim to the world that trade and industry shall be free. (Cheers.) Who are the parties to the conflict? On the one side the landed proprietors, and on the other the people of England. It is true the generality of landed proprietors advocate monopoly, but we have many distinguished and able supporters in that body; and we know as a fact that the most distinguished advocates of Free Trade have also been remarkable for the improvements they introduce into agriculture, and the ability which they displayed in promoting the improvements of the soil. I need only refer to such names as Lords Spencer and Leicester amongst those who have passed away, and Lords Ducie, Fitzwilliam, and Radnor, amongst those still with us. Our enemies—the most bitter of them—are the mortgaged landlords (cheers); the men who fear even a small reduction of their rents, because there is but a narrow margin between the limits of their entire rental, and the interest of their mortgages. (Loud cheers.) Those are the men who are our most bitter opponents; but let it be remembered, that if the estates of those men have been mortgaged, they have, or have had, the money which was raised on these lands. (Cheers.) They have sold their property—they have received the money for it—and they cannot now call on the legislature to restrict the comfort of the great body of their countrymen, in order to maintain the arbitrary position in which they chose to place themselves. (Hear, hear.) It is true that we do not hear much of their mortgaged lands now. Sir Edward Knatchbull (hear, hear, and laughter) once ventured on that dangerous ground in the House of Commons, and I remember that a friend of mine said on that occasion, that it was a very dangerous speech for his party. The gentleman whom I mentioned is a member of Parliament, and I remember his saying of Sir Edward Knatchbull—"His speeches are always perilous (laughter), but his explanations are fatal" (loud laughter); for you must know that the worthy baronet thought it necessary to enter into an elaborate explanation, which left the matter worse than he found it. (Cheers and renewed laughter.) Instead of that topic, we now hear of special burdens on the land—of peculiar taxes and imposts—which are supposed to press heavily upon the agricultural interest. (Hear, hear.) And we are told that it is necessary that the effect of those taxes should be counterbalanced by some duty on the admission of foreign corn, &c. (Cries of hear, hear.) After referring to all the Parliamentary documents on the subject, and listening to all the most able speeches of the supporters of the agricultural interest and their views, I must say I never recollect to have heard a single case of peculiar taxation on land at all proved; but I have heard that there are peculiar exemptions from taxation, (loud cheers,) and I know that it is a very common thing to hear of the House of Commons being employed for much of its time in procuring and maintaining those peculiar exemptions. (Hear, hear.) That indeed is not to be wondered at, considering the large majority which the landed interest possesses in Parliament—it is not to be wondered at, if under the circumstances much of their time is spent in devising measures for the protection of their own interest; and if they have a chance by a little bamboozling (laughter), and by having such a leader as Sir Robert Peel, of doing so, that they should take every opportunity of benefiting themselves, and of removing the consequences of their own acts from their own shoulders. (Hear.) I wonder that at some of those agricultural protection meetings they do not call upon the speaker to explain what and why those peculiar exemptions are. I should like to know why a farmer is not to pay window tax, whilst the shopkeeper is called on to do so? (Loud cheers.) Can his grace the Duke of Richmond, can the Duke of Buckingham, or the whole collective wisdom of 17, Old Bond-street (roars of laughter) explain that? (Laughter and cheers.) Can they give an intelligible reason why a farmhouse should not pay that duty as well as a shop, or why farming stock and implements of husbandry should be exempt from the fire insurance duty, whilst those of the shopkeeper are not? (Cheers.) Can they explain the reason why it is that very few farmers, as it now appears, pay any income-tax at all? (Cheers.) The farmer's profit is taken as being equal to one-half of his rent, and it is now ascertained that the great majority of farmers pay rents under 300*l.* a year; those who do not pay more than 300*l.* are exempt from the income-tax (cheers), for it is presumed by the legislature that he only makes 150*l.* a year, as they choose to take one-half of his rent as his profit. (Cheers.) I want to know why the shopkeeper, making 3*l.* a week, should pay the income-tax, and the farmer who may happen to pay a rent of 299*l.* 19*s.* 11½*d.* be exempt from it? (Cheers.) A man paying 300*l.* a year may be making more than 150*l.*, but the legislature supposes he does not, though it is well known that the farmer's profit depends on the capital applied to his land, and he may be making a very much larger profit than the equivalent to one-half of his rent. (Cheers.) There is gross favoritism in the way in which the income-tax is applied to the agricultural and manufacturing classes. (Hear, hear.) Look at the odious inquisition into the private affairs of the shopkeeper, from which the farmer escapes. (Cheers.) He is not compelled to show his books, the profits of his trade, or the state of his stock. (Hear, hear.) The rent he pays is the only question, and half of that is at once taken as the amount of his profit. Here, again, I say, it appears to be gross favoritism to the landed interest. (Hear, hear.) But the chairman has more than once called the attention of the House to other instances of a similar nature, such as the exemption enjoyed by land from the legacy and probate duties. (Cheers.) Will those men of 17, Old Bond-street, explain the reason why a tradesman should pay heavy taxes and be subject to deductions from his family, whilst the estates of the Duke of Buckingham or of the Duke of Richmond pass from son to son without any diminution? (Hear, hear.) I say that a grosser case of plunder, a more flagrant instance of unequal legislation is not to be found in the annals of history than the treatment which the people of this country have received at the hands of their legislators. (Loud cheers.) No doubt the freedom of taxation may be advantageous to the landed interest, but it is not very much to the benefit of the farmer, for—as they almost begin to find out—the whole advantage derived from protection finds its way into their landlords' pockets. How seldom does he get even the remission of a local rate—the amount of it is only added to his rent. (Hear, hear.) I believe the farmers are now making their calculations, and are beginning to discover that the Corn Law is not so beneficial to them as capitalists and men engaged in the cultivation of the land; and I can state that the more readily, because I have just returned from a part of the country where I know that farmers are taking land under the full impression that the

Corn Laws are gone. (Loud cheers.) I could name cases, were I at liberty to do so, where they have even taken leases under that impression—where they have ignored the Corn Laws, and considered them as repealed (cheers); and yet they have calculated on being able to cultivate them profitably, without relying on the broken reed of protection. The landed interest has been the spoiled child of the legislature, and, like too many other spoiled children, has been frequently indulged to its own disadvantage. (Hear, hear.) I believe the Corn Law is one of those instances, for I think the farmers would have been in a far better position if those laws never had been passed (hear, hear), and that their workings have been most prejudicial to the interests of the farmers. I have spoken to many of that class, and their answers have led me to believe that some such thoughts have passed through their minds too. (Hear, hear.) You have heard of the large numbers that have assembled at various protection meetings throughout the country (hear, hear); but you must remember that those are not county meetings—that they are packed in small rooms, and that no strangers are admissible, and that in many the reporters of the Morning Post and other papers form a considerable part of the audience. (Hear, hear.) The farmers attend them from habit—they go there to hear the news—they are there informed that my Lord This and Squire That will make a speech—and for them they are told that there will be a very good dinner, with a bottle of blackstrap at the inn afterwards. (Laughter.) All these were inducements from which if you separated the farmer, he would tell you three times out of five that the Corn Laws had done him no good. (Hear, hear.) But, as the Morning Post has admitted, the landed interest see in this question something more than mere money—(hear)—they see in it a question affecting landed supremacy—(hear)—they see that it is a struggle between the privileged classes and the people, and they see that success inspires further hopes, and that the repeal of the Corn Laws will be but a step towards the complete destruction of every thing which can be considered to war against just and righteous legislation. (Loud applause.) As we are approaching so near the day on which it is supposed Sir R. Peel is to make his revelation, there seems to be vast dismay among the supporters of the right honourable gentleman. I am told that the usual ministerial dinners are put off; that, in fact, the usual supporters of Government are "off their feed." (Roars of laughter.) Let us hope that the people of England will get a better supply for themselves from their loss of appetite. (Laughter.) Seeing the determination of the country on this subject, I cannot think that Sir R. Peel will propose anything short of a complete measure, which will satisfy the country and the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Cheers.) It must be complete, it must satisfy the north of England. I believe the men who have supported that League are men determined to carry this question. (Loud cheers.) Those men have not brought this forward as a mere party question, as a means of displacing this ministry, or reinstating that; they have not made it what political questions in this country have been many times made,—a mere watchword to bind a party together. (Hear.) They are determined to carry it; they mean never to desist till commerce, trade, and industry are set free. (Cheers.) I believe—and I have some reason to believe so, if we may read the future from the past—that Westminster (cheers) has a constituency of firm and determined purpose not to rest till this great question is carried successfully. (Loud cheering.) I believe the glories of old Westminster will be renewed (cheers), and that the day will come, and that soon, when the heart of Westminster will be what it once was—the heart of the nation (great applause), at every throbbing of which the whole empire was driven into action. (Cheers.) What was more natural than that the most wealthy, if not the most populous, of the metropolitan boroughs should be in the van of this great movement? (Applause.) The metropolis aiding the north will make our triumph certain. They might have been successful through their individual efforts, but the union of all the determination, wealth, and enterprise, and stability of the metropolis must carry this great movement to a successful issue. [The hon. member resumed his seat amid loud applause.]

Sir DE LACY EVANS, in coming forward to propose the next resolution, begged to express the pleasure he felt at seeing so many well-known faces, and in assisting at one of the most important meetings in which that great constituency had ever been engaged. The preceding speeches left him only the task of stating a few additional facts in confirmation of their views. Mr. Gibson had reminded them that scarcely a session passed without some measure being carried for the benefit of the landed interest. (Hear, hear.) About two years ago there was a most painful sensation produced by a number of persons being seen in the streets of the metropolis in great distress, who were agricultural labourers out of employ. (Hear, hear.) It was declared that it would be inhuman not to prevent them dying of famine. The consequence was, that last session an Act was passed, requiring every parish to provide asylums for the casual poor, although they had ample accommodation for the maintenance of their own paupers. (Hear, hear.) That Act was clearly passed for the purpose of relieving the agricultural interest from the relief of their own poor. (Hear, hear.) The resolution which he had to propose asserted that the Corn Laws had failed to accomplish their professed object of affording protection to industry. It was impossible to imagine in what way industry could be supported by placing a price on the means of subsistence. (Hear, hear.) Another of these evil consequences of the Corn Laws, to which he would allude, was the number of absentee families on the Continent. There were living abroad about 100,000 families, with average incomes of 300*l.* a year each, which amounted to 30,000,000*l.* spent out of the country, without paying any proportion of taxes (hear, hear); and that was all, no doubt, attributable to the high prices of corn here, which causes high prices in everything else. They were told that the Corn Laws were intended for the benefit of all classes; tenant farmers, as well as agricultural labourers. It had been in existence thirty years, and yet it was well known that the condition of the latter class had been declining instead of advancing. It was equally clear that these laws produced crime, and a variety of proofs had been brought before the House and elsewhere to that effect; but the landed proprietors had friends in Parliament, and the proofs dropped on their ears and produced no result. The petition stated that the great portion of the British population were reduced to subsist on the potato; that 4,000,000 in Ireland, and 1,000,000 in England used it as their only food. That was another consequence of the additional price of bread; and the consumption of the potato in place of corn would increase as it was progressing, instead of being lessened. They were all aware of the dangerous position in which Ireland was placed with respect to the potato crop. It had been ascertained that already one-third of the crop was injured, and no one knew to what extent the disease might go for the next three months. What had the Government done? In France, Belgium, and other Continental nations, the ports had been thrown open at once; but here not one measure had been resorted to by Government to remedy the evils that were likely to ensue. He thought they might expect a better measure of Corn Law repeal from Sir R. Peel than from the Whigs, who were but recent converts to the great principle of the League. For the last 15 or 20 years he had attended meetings in that room, in which great triumphs were obtained for political and religious liberty; and if he rightly interpreted their enthusiasm on the present occasion, he anticipated a speedy triumph for the cause of Free Trade, from the manner in which the principles had been advocated there that night.

Dr. BOWRING seconded the resolution. They asked no more and would accept no less than a total, absolute, and irrevocable repeal of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.) There were but two principles that Premiers had to choose between: there was no room now left for the narrow, shifting sliding plank between monopoly and Free Trade. (Loud and vehement cheering.) He recollected Sir Robert Peel's declaration as to posthumous fame; and there was no position more deserving of a great man's ambition than the martyrdom which that right hon. gentleman was subjected to for having abandoned principles which he discovered to be false, and for giving effect to principles which he knew to be true. (Cheers.) He hoped they might find Sir Robert Peel had greatness enough for this. He could not conciliate those whom he had abandoned, for he had done enough to incur their unmitigated hatred. Why not, then, at once entitle himself to the affection and goodwill of the people of England, and record his name in the page of history as favourable to a measure which, he ventured to say, would have more effect in destroying human misery and creating human happiness than any other which could be submitted to Parliament. (Loud cheers.) He had watched the birth, education, strength, and now the omnipotence of the Anti-Corn-Law League. In its early progress it was said to be contemptible. Again and again its depression and death were announced and rejoiced over: and now we see it making and unmaking Ministers, creating and overthrowing Governments, knowing that while it was supported by men like those whom he addressed no Government could exist, should exist, or would be tolerated, which was not founded on the principles of the Anti-Corn-Law League. (Cheers.) The people had set their heart on a settlement of this question; and it could only be settled one way. Compromise was too late. (Cries of Yes, and cheers.) The monopolists had better deal with them in their present temper. There was a willingness to forgive them for all the wrongs and robberies they had committed. They should be allowed to button up all the ill-gotten gains they had amassed under that wicked, inhuman, and oppressive legislation. But he was not sure the people would be so good humoured by-and-by. We should have no sharp reckonings now; but we entreated them to shut the books of accounts, as the balance was everywhere against them. (Hear, hear.) We are willing to give them an honest discharge; but on this condition, that the Corn Laws were unconditionally repealed, now and for ever. (Loud cheers.) The time had gone by for argument as to the operation of the Corn Laws. Public opinion was unanimous on the subject. (Cheers.) The Corn Laws made war on all that was true, honest, and religious. Their overthrow was connected with peace, commerce, and human felicity. In the name, then, of all the interests that unite us, in the name of our country and of mankind, he demanded the immediate and total repeal of these laws. (Loud cheers.)

Sir C. NAPIER was received with enthusiastic cheering. I feel perfectly oppressed (said he) by the manner in which you have received me. This is the second time I have had the honour of appearing at the Crown and Anchor, the first being to support my gallant friend, Colonel Evans, when he stood for this borough; and I must say, though I have a great respect for my gallant fellow-officer (Captain Rous), who, it must always be remembered, was the first to sound the downfall of the monopolists, I should like to see my gallant friend near me in his place, and I hope he will attain that high honour at the next election. (Cries of Yes, and cheers; and a cry of "We don't mean to have Leader again.") I am almost unworthy to address you on the subject of Free Trade; for it is only lately I have become a total repealer of the Corn Laws in preference to the sliding scale; but I thought, and perhaps wrongly, that a fixed duty would be the fairest arrangement for all parties. Lord John Russell's letter has thrown a fixed duty overboard; and all liberal men are now united that nothing but a total repeal can satisfy this country. We owe a great deal to the League. But next to them we owe most to the protectionists. Let us take an analysis of a few speeches. We'll go first to Chichester. There Lord March presided, the son of the Duke of Richmond, the protector-general of abuses. He was not able to attend the meeting; but a letter was read from him, in which he said there was a failure of the potatoes, but a greater breadth of crop than usual, and that two millions of quarters were ready to come in. Yes, when the prices were so high, that the people must be in a starving condition. (Cheers.) Then comes the Duke of Rutland. He says he has a relish for potatoes. So have I; but the poor are able to relish them too, though unfortunately they may not be always able to get them. (Hear, hear.) Then comes another duke, who told us what I never heard before, and that was, that it was a good cure for hunger to give a man a pinch of curry and some hot water. (Laughter.) Now, I have been a long time at sea, and seen many stormy nights; but I never learned that curry powder was a protection against cold and hunger. (Renewed laughter.) My friend (Mr. Gibson) did not give the whole of Sir Edward Knatchbull's explanation. That right honourable gentleman asked, in the event of the Corn Law being repealed, what were they to do for the jointures of widows and the portions of younger children? (Hear.) So that the modest request is, that the working-men of England should pay the bread tax, that Lady Knatchbull, when her husband may die, should have a jointure and her younger daughters and sons portions. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) A gentleman at Chichester asked, "If you abolish the Corn Laws, how are the country gentlemen possibly to keep up their station?" And what did that mean? Magnificent castles in the country, mansions in town, preservation of game, and trips to Newmarket, during which thousands were expended in gambling. All must be abandoned if the Corn Laws are repealed. I went to the castle of the Duke of Northumberland the other day, and it took me a day to go over his preserves and demesne. I quite agree that he, like his brother peers, has a right "to do what he likes with his own;" but he has no right to force the people of this country to defray such expenses out of the price of their food. (Cheers.) There is another class to whom we also owe much, and who have only lately spoken out—I mean the agricultural labourers. I believe the meeting at Goatacre will be followed throughout the length and breadth of the land if Sir Robert Peel has the magnanimity to throw himself on the liberal part of the community, instead of sticking to his old friends the protectionists. I am a farmer myself. I purchased forty acres of forest land, which were constantly overflowed with water, and which farmer after farmer gave up. I divided the lands into six fields. I knew no more of agriculture than a child; and though I tried to get some ploughmen to do my work, I found them bent on the old usages, and so little intelligent, that the horse seemed to go before the ploughman because he had the instinct to know that some guide was necessary. (A laugh.) Having found myself 200*l.* out of pocket the first year, I lighted upon a man who, for his intelligence deserves to have his name mentioned. It was John Sparkes; and he, having six acres of land of the same description as mine, completely redeemed it without any other assistance than his own industry, one poney, and a wife. (Much laughter.) The gallant officer then proceeded to give a detail of the various agricultural operations performed at the suggestion of his assistant on his farm. The land was too wet; he drained it by degrees, and got excellent crops off it; and now, said Sir Charles, I'll engage there's not better land in all Hampshire. (Cheers and laughter.) My loss at first was 100*l.*, next year it was reduced to 30*l.*, the fourth year it was nothing, and this year I have 100*l.* in my pocket. (Loud cheers and laughter—"I hope you've got a long lease.") The gallant member next enlarged on the superiority of the Scotch agricultural system, which made land, naturally much less fertile, produce better crops than the English farms. So much had the Scotch improved their land that good farmers did not care one straw about the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) Why did they not do the same in England? Why did not landlords, instead of making long speeches to their tenants, give them long leases, (great laughter and applause,) give them draining tiles, and charge a reasonable amount for them, and he would answer for it that this country, instead of being an importing, would be an exporting country. (Cheers.) In 1841, Lord J. Russell, like a clever statesman, saw that it was impossible that the Corn Laws could continue as they were, and recommended an 8*s.* fixed duty, as sufficient protection to the landlords. They refused to accept it, and turned him out of office. They had now been struggling for five years to maintain protection; their last year was come, and they now deserved no protection at all. He hoped and trusted that he would this session see a repeal of the Corn Laws, without having any taxes clapped on them to reimburse the landlords for what they had been robbing the country of for forty-five years. (Cheers.) Let them suffer a little—it would make them cultivate their land properly, and cause the country to be the example instead of being the disgrace of the world in respect to agriculture. (Loud cheers.)

The Hon. Mr. BOUVERIE said, that after the expression of opinion which the meeting had given, there could be no doubt but that they would all agree to the resolution he had to propose, which was, that they should petition Parliament for a total repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) Parliament was now about to meet again. The two questions which had been so lately agitating the public would speedily receive a solution—the one was unimportant but as it was considered in connection with the other. It would then appear why all Sir Robert Peel's government, strong in the ordinary sense of the word, in one day fell to pieces like a house of cards. He thought any reasonable man could make a good guess as to the cause. For himself he thought the reason was, that the cabinet was founded on a great falsehood—that the Corn Laws could be maintained in free discussion, and that the working people of this country would get under that system a greater portion of the produce of the earth than under the beneficent dispensations of God. (Cheers.) The cabinet so founded deservedly fell to the ground when the day came. The question was now, will the Corn Laws be repealed or not? With the exception of one gentleman, who appeared to have disappeared, (laughter,) they were all unanimous with respect to those laws. (Hear, hear.) He could not conceive the existence of two opinions on the subject in an unprejudiced mind. There was no use in arguing with those who had no ears, and would not understand. (Hear, hear.) Let them suppose there was a statute, which enacted that every year 1000 persons should be put into the Thames and drowned, 5000 hanged, 10,000 inoculated with the typhus, and 30,000 sent to the workhouse. (Hear.) Why, it could not exist in this country for ten minutes. But he said the Corn Laws did more and worse than that. (Loud cheers.) Death—the greatest evil which human nature is subject to—is not less terrible from hunger, than by the halter or the knife. (Applause.) There was evidence the Corn Law had done this; it had been admitted by a leading member of the cabinet that the Corn Laws caused crime, and multiplied disease, hastened death, and perpetuated all those evils which the light of returning prosperity would be unable to dissipate. (Cheers.) He thought he might assume that they were all agreed as to what ought to be done with the Corn Laws, and believed that nothing but a mind biassed by prejudice or supposed regard to its own interests, could differ from them. He rather wondered that a gentleman of the gallant officer's (Sir C. Napier's) intelligence and ability could have been at any time in favour of the Corn Laws. (Sir C. Napier intimated his dissent—he was for a fixed duty; but it appeared that he was only so till he became a farmer. (Hear, hear.) Let them mark, that the instant he became a good farmer he disregarded the Corn Laws altogether. (Cheers and laughter.) Such a farmer cared nothing about those laws, but the farmer who did not hunt about on his pony for his neighbour's assistance (laughter) looked to the rotten reed of protection, and imagined that the law should give him those advantages which his own intelligence and industry ought to afford him. (Cheers.) He could not help hoping that Sir Robert Peel would propose a total repeal. What less could he do with any hope of success? If he proposed a reduction of the duty he would meet the same difficulty from his quondam friends as if he proposed the total repeal. He knew—he must know—that the total repeal must come sooner or later—that if the public once made up their minds they were sure to triumph. (Loud cheers.) It seemed that an attempt to propose any relaxation or reduction would merely be taking a bite at a pill, (laughter)—the whole of it would do him and the country good (laughter), but the half of it would be exceedingly nasty, and would not produce half the good effects that the whole would if swallowed at once. (Loud laughter.) The monopolists were strong—not in numbers, it was true, nor station, or intelligence, but in the state of things which they had themselves created, and which they were banded together to maintain. At the time of the Reformation, the college of the Sorbonne declared that there was an end to the Christian religion if the study of Greek and Latin were continued. In the same way the Duke of Newcastle believed that the monarchy would be at an end if the Corn Laws were repealed. (Cheers and laughter.) Let them observe the close resemblance. A nation's Christianity had not suffered for the study of Greek and Latin, neither would the condition of this country be injured by the repeal of those laws. Nations would be linked more closely together; peace receive more homage; and every condition receive greater reverence.—The honourable member concluded by moving the resolution.

Mr. HEALEY seconded the resolution in an eloquent speech. The secret of Sir Robert Peel's resignation might be explained thus:—"There are such incapable legislators in the Houses of Lords and Commons that I can't govern the country as it ought to be through them, and I therefore must resign." He warned the landlords that if this just demand was refused, the people would soon ask why birth alone was a qualification for Government, and why the Commons House did not somewhat better support their name? (Cheers.)

Mr. DEASY moved the adoption of a petition founded on the foregoing resolutions.

Mr. WALKER seconded the motion, and referred to a number of returns to show that the landlords, by the position of this country, had a natural protection of 8*s.* or 9*s.* per quarter.

Mr. G. THOMPSON addressed the meeting at great length in support of the resolution.

The usual vote of thanks having been passed to the chairman, the meeting broke up.

MARYLEBONE.

A numerous and important meeting of the members of the Anti-Corn-Law League and other friends of Free Trade resident in the parish of St. Marylebone, was held on Tuesday evening at Hall's Riding School, Albany-street, Regent's-park, for the purpose of considering the present position of the Corn Laws, and also of adopting measures to ensure the registration of Free Trade voters in the borough. A large platform was erected immediately in front of the gallery at the upper end of the room, and was thronged with some of the more influential parishioners, while the remainder of the spacious building was densely crowded by the public. The gallery and a reserved space in front of the platform was filled with ladies. At half-past seven o'clock,

Mr. HUME, M.P., took the chair, amidst loud and general acclamation. When the cheering had subsided, he proceeded to address the meeting as follows. He said, in order that their discussion should proceed effectively, he had to request that they would, as far as possible, maintain quietness and silence. It was of the utmost importance that in that, as in every other assemblage where Englishmen were met together, a fair hearing should be extended to all who wished to address them. They had the privilege which the inhabitants of many other countries did not possess, of meeting and expressing their opinions on any subject that might interest the public welfare, or even their own particular interests. It was, beyond all others, the privilege of Englishmen to differ in their opinions, and it was on that ground that he would call upon them—should any individuals who differed from him, and from others who had called that meeting, wish to address them—to give such individuals a full and a fair hearing. (Hear.) Their cause was a sacred one. They had no want of confidence in the goodness of their cause. They only wished to hear what arguments could be urged against it, and the meeting might rest assured that to these arguments, should they be brought forward, there would be ample, prompt, and effective answers returned. Before proceeding to the consideration of the resolutions that would be offered for their approval, it was his anxious wish to be allowed to offer a few remarks on the great and important object for which they were assembled. There could be no doubt whatever but that the Government of this country was constituted with a view of passing laws that should affect equally all classes of the community, and no matter from what cause these laws may be enacted, whenever they became partial and oppressive on any portion of the people, it was their duty as honest men to endeavour to effect the correction of these abuses, and see justice done to all. (Hear, hear.) He could speak from many years' experience. He did not come before them as a tyro about to commence his public advocacy. Four-and-thirty years had passed away since he first entered Parliament, and he could boast that the opinions which he publicly professed in the first year of his Parliamentary life remained to that hour unchanged, or rather, they had become stronger and stronger throughout all the intervening time. (Cheers.) The only difference which he could trace was, that the prospect which was now as it were within his grasp, he had then but slight hope of ever seeing realised. Great progress had since then been made in the advance of public opinion. The feeling against injustice in the laws towards any portion of the community had become most powerful, and with the public voice so united as it now was, he hoped and trusted that those who governed the nation would think it their duty to yield to prudence what they might even not be ready to grant to justice, and would act in a manner calculated to satisfy the public mind. The meeting of that evening had two objects in view. One was to express their feelings with regard to the partial laws, and the old restrictions and trammels that pressed upon all classes of the community. He was one of those who had always held, and who still held, and who was capable of proving the fact, that the Corn and Provision Laws had injured the great mass of the community, while they had failed to benefit those for whose advantage they had been intended. They wanted no concessions from any portion of the community. They required no favour, no partiality. They sought only for justice; and it was to demand that justice that they had assembled there that night. (Hear, hear.) He wished, in addressing his fellow-parishioners, to remind them that they personally had much to effect in their populous and most important borough. Their object was to repeal all laws that were unjust and oppressive, and they desired to effect that object in the constitutional mode allowed them, peaceably, quietly, but effectively. They possessed a representative Government; and he for one would wish to see the representation more effective. He had lived to see the power of making laws taken from a few boroughmongers, and put into the hands of the middle classes. The representation was now in the hands of the middle classes, and if they only acted as they ought, if every man would invest himself with the power which the State gave him of having a vote, and if he then exercised that power on the soundest principles of justice to his fellow-men, they might be certain of success. (Hear, hear.) They had, therefore, a double object in meeting that night: first, to pass an opinion, which he hoped would be an unanimous one, of the destructive tendency and injustice of the Corn Laws; and secondly, to join with those who were so ably and actively engaged in obtaining for as many as possible the power of voting, and thus giving an effect to their wishes by a gradual and perfect change in the selection of those whom they sent to represent them in Parliament, and who would be thus taught to act honestly and justly. Could it be supposed that if Great Britain—enlightened as it was—were freely represented in the House of Commons, such laws as those against which they were now met to protest would have been allowed to remain on the statute-book? (Cheers.) With these general views he would conclude with the hope that this question would receive the warmest consideration from the meeting, particularly at a period at which they were within almost eight and forty hours of the assembling of Parliament, when they expected to hear from her Majesty's ministers the course that they were prepared to adopt. Should the public be disappointed at the announcement that would then be made, it would become their duty to buckle to, as men conscious of being injured and determined to be free. (Cheers.) After some further remarks the hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst loud cheers.

Professor KEY moved the first resolution. He said he would not have undertaken to perform the duty of moving a resolution at that meeting had he followed his own personal inclinations, because he felt himself utterly incompetent, as well as inexperienced, to take a part in a great public discussion. The meeting would, however, be better pleased at having only a short address from him, when he informed them that he would be followed by a most eloquent orator—Mr. Moore. (Hear, hear.) Though he had not, like their chairman, a public life of thirty-four years to refer back to, he could say, that since he had arrived at any maturity of mind, he had entertained but one opinion on the subject of protection laws. He had the pleasure of forming the acquaintance of Mr. Charles Villiers at the University of Cambridge. They both came to London about the same time, and they shortly after joined with three other friends for the purpose of studying the question of Free Trade. Their little party consisted of five individuals. Three of these had entered Parliament, and had distinguished themselves there for being most zealous advocates for a repeal of the Corn Laws. Mr. Charles Villiers was the first to move in the House of Commons for the total repeal of this law; and, after his various unsuccessful efforts there, it was gratifying to think that it was no longer in the power of any minister to resist the public will. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) The resolution was as follows:—"That this meeting enters its solemn protest against the Corn Laws, as impolitic and unjust, and urges their total, immediate, and unconditional repeal."

Mr. GEORGE FODDO seconded the resolution. He referred briefly to the progress which public opinion had made latterly in favour of the abolition of the Corn Laws, and expressed his opinion that if a portion of the malt duty, to the amount of two millions annually, were repealed as a relief to the agriculturists, the loss to the revenue ought to be made good by an extension of the legacy duty to landed property. In a case that came under his own knowledge, a poor blind girl had been left an annuity of 20*l.* a-year by some benevolent individual, but out of this sum no less than 2*l.* a-year was taken away by Government, while the landed interests were allowed to bequeath estates worth 50,000*l.* a-year to their relatives or others, without the payment of any duty whatever.

Mr. ROBERT R. R. MOORE addressed the meeting in support of the resolution. He said the man would have been a bold prophet who, when they met there two years ago, would have ventured to foretell that they would at the present time meet under such altered circumstances. At the time of the former meeting the League was comparatively a small body, while he never witnessed such a scene of riot, uproar, and confusion, as in that room (cries of "Whose fault was it?") and some slight confusion in the body of the meeting.) At present they were all but unanimous. That was the forty-second meeting that he had attended since the 25th of November last, in London and the metropolitan counties; and though they had been all public meetings—open to all who wished to attend them—still they each unanimously expressed a condemnation of the Corn Laws. They had then neither the Whig nor the Tory party with them. They had a majority of a hundred and upwards opposed to them in the House of Commons. Everything looked dark and gloomy; but now there was no party in the State willing to take office and govern on the principles of protection. (Cheers.) Lord John Russell had come nobly forward, and in the manner that he liked to see a man come forward in. He did not say that he had always been with them, but he boldly admitted that for twenty years he had been in error; that for that period he had thought protection was right, but that he now admitted it to be a delusion. That he felt it had been the blight of commerce and the bane of agriculture. The landlords have been latterly particularly busy. They boasted of having the farmers and the agricultural labourers with them; but if the fact were so, why were their meetings held in inn-rooms, instead of being great county meetings as they ought to be? He would like to see the Duke of Richmond presiding at a second labourers' meeting at Gosnate, to revise and correct the mischief they had done by the first. (Hear, hear.) He denied that the manufacturers were anxious for protection, or that they would continue the import duty on French silks, and Swiss watches, and Belgian fire-arms. (Hear, hear.) The protectionists could bring forward no proof that such was the fact. On the contrary, the first resolutions adopted at every Free Trade meeting were against all protection whatever, and the Manchester Chamber of Commerce adopted a resolution to that effect as long ago as 1822. (Hear, hear.) He had been in Derby about a year ago canvassing for articles for the Free Trade bazaar, and he could tell them what occurred there. Derby, as they all knew, was the great centre of the silk trade, and when the repeal of the duty of 6*l.* on foreign silk was spoken of, a single manufacturer there held a meeting of himself to provide against the change. (A laugh.) He got two friends to move and second a resolution in favour of the protecting duty, while he occupied the chair himself, and then went up to London to present his memorial to Sir R. Peel. But what did the other silk throwers of Derby do? As soon as they heard of what he had done, they held a meeting. They refused to allow his expenses in going to London, and drew up a counter memorial, praying Sir Robert Peel to take off the 6*l.* duty, and declaring that they were ready to meet the competition of the world; that they did not believe they would suffer at all by the removal of the duty; and that even if they should be injured, they would prefer bearing the injury rather than have the duty continued as a peg on which to hang some shred of an argument for the continuance of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) It was also said that if the protection duty was repealed on Swiss watches, the English watchmakers' trade would be destroyed. While in Coventry last year he called on every watchmaker there, and got contributions from all for the Free Trade Bazaar. He spoke to them on this subject, and their reply to him was, that every one hundred pounds' worth of Geneva watches imported into this country paid, up to a few months' previously, 30*l.* in duty, but that since the duty had been reduced to 10*l.*, the watchmaking trade in this country, which had been previously in a most miserable condition, began at once to revive.

A VOICE—That is the fact. (Hear.) Mr. MOORE continued—He did not mean that the alteration of duty was the instantaneous cause of that improvement in the trade; but what the watchmakers said was, that their trade with America would become three times as great as it now was if American corn could be received in return; and the fact must be so, for English watches were admittedly the best in the world. (Hear.) Another proof of the sincerity of the manufacturers was afforded by the fact, that though the superiority of English goods was mainly to be attributed to the pre-eminence of English machinery, they did not oppose, but, on the contrary, actually petitioned in favour of the repeal of the law prohibiting the exportation of machinery. (Hear.) He then referred to the necessity of exertion in the registries. By attention to the registration, they sought to have men instead of acres represented. (Cheers.) At the next election he trusted they would exert themselves. (Hear.) Let them go to their office in Fleet-street; they would get every information on the subject. They must not go away from that meeting and say, that the fate of the Corn Laws was settled. They did not know that the Lords would go with him. They did not know but that they would have dissolution upon dissolution of Parliament. It was nothing but the public voice that would enable Sir Robert Peel to carry repeal, even if so inclined. The progress of events had assisted him. The 40*s.* freeholders must prop him up on one side, and Lord John Russell, with his motion for total repeal, must prop him up on the other. He did not know but that their exertions must be redoubled; he did not know but that a compromise might be suggested. That they must denounce. He trusted that this year would be memorable in the annals of England, and that it would be the first year in which they would have industry free and unfettered. (Cheers.) They must be earnest, zealous, and unanimous in their opinion, and there could be no doubt of final success. The learned gentleman resumed his seat amidst enthusiastic and reiterated applause.

The CHAIRMAN then put the resolution, first inviting observations from any gentleman present.

Mr. LANGHAM coincided in the views of the previous speaker with respect to the impolicy of a duty on corn, but dissented from him on some other points which he was proceeding to specify, when he was encountered by a storm of opposition, amidst loud cries of "No protection," and "Down, down," which compelled him to resume his seat.

The resolution was unanimously carried.

Mr. BRADSHAW moved the next resolution, urging the meeting strenuously to carry it out, and beat the protectionists with their own weapons. It was to the following effect:—"That this meeting tenders its most cordial thanks to the Council of the National Anti-Corn-Law League for the attention given to the registration of electors; congratulates them on the progress of the 40*s.* freehold movement in the counties, and pledges its support to win the counties of East Surrey and Hertford, and other metropolitan counties." He impressed upon them that after all, votes in the House of Commons must carry this measure for repeal, and votes in the House of Commons must be got by votes out of doors. (Hear, hear.) They must seal the fate of the Corn Laws for ever. (Cheers.) It was their duty one and all to assist in this momentous crisis. (Cries of "We will.") Though they might have to struggle on one or two occasions more yet, they might be assured their exertions would be crowned with victory. (Cheers.) They owed their present position on this measure to the League, to whom they owed their cordial thanks. There were hundreds and thousands of persons in Marylebone who were not on the register. He begged those gentlemen to take the hint. They must make this question their own. They had now 16,000 votes on the register, and he trusted that by their next meeting it would be increased to 20,000. (Cheers.)

Mr. ROBERT BAGSHAW seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously amidst great cheering.

Mr. HUME, M.P., further stimulated the assemblage to exertion by a characteristic speech on the weakness of the landed interest in this country, which he affirmed few persons were aware of. He would give evidence of this which no one would deny. His statement was grounded upon the returns of the income-tax in the Parliamentary papers which were laid on the table of the House of Commons in 1843. The whole amount of the income-tax of the United Kingdom was 5,384,124*l.* Now, what was the fact? The entire land of England was only assessed at about one-sixth of the whole. (Hear.) The total amount of property in all the schedules upon which the assessment was made was 190,606,535*l.*, which, from the report on the table of the House of Commons, appeared to be composed of the following items: houses, wharfs, factories, docks, and shipping, 41,063,292*l.*; tenant farmers, 20,486,606*l.*; public funds, 27,873,691*l.*; profits of trade, 50,296,645*l.*; public offices, 8,936,891*l.*; Scotland in all its schedules, 9,384,383*l.*; land in England and Wales 32,655,137*l.* The honourable member, after entering into some further calculations, concluded by observing that out of the 190,000,000*l.* of capital, the capital of the great interest in land which kept them all in bondage, was only about 32,000,000*l.* (Hear, hear.) He had been at pains to draw up these figures, to open the eyes of the people at large to the real facts, and to show the imprudence of those agriculturists who set down the other classes as mere shopkeepers, and who would not be received at a mere country ball. He pressed upon them these details not simply for the purpose of obtaining a repeal of the Corn Laws, but to show them the possibility of attaining in a constitutional manner their rights and liberties to the fullest extent. In furtherance of this view he would tell them another story. The number of members in the House of Commons was 658. Now, every county in England, Scotland, and Ireland, together with the six members of the universities, made 358. They had to meet that, if the ten-pounders would be honest in the cities and boroughs, 302 members, which, adding that portion of the landed interest voting with them, gave them a clear majority of 147 votes. There was no man without a vote who was not a slave—he was completely governed by others. There was not a Free Trader who possessed 50*l.* who ought not to lay it out immediately in the purchase of a county freehold wherever it could be had. Nay, there was no tradesman or artisan who could not by economy save 50*l.*; and why should he not? He might then stand at the poll as independent as any duke in the land. (Cheers.) If the middle and working classes would carry out this principle, they would have the remedy for the evils of which they complained in their own hands. At this hour the power of the State was in the hands of the middle classes. He assisted in carrying the Reform Bill, and he was now anxious that the people should exercise the privileges they possessed, and free themselves from the shackles in which the aristocracy wished to bind them. The middle classes were too sordid—they had the means to attain political power. The working classes had the means, and if they did not use them, let him never hear more of cruelty and oppression. He had laid before them plain, simple, and consistent views, which every man ought to carry out if he did his duty. (Cheers.)

Mr. R. R. MOORE proposed, in very handsome terms, a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was carried with all the honours.

The meeting then broke up.

EDINBURGH.

On Thursday evening, a public meeting of the inhabitants was held in the Music Hall, for the purpose of promoting the immediate and unconditional abolition of the Corn and Provision Laws; and of taking means to raise a subscription in aid of the National Anti-Corn-Law League Fund of a Quarter of a Million. The hall was crowded. Among those on the platform we observed the following:

The Lord Provost; Baines Gray, Duncan, and Ritchie; Councillors P. Wilson, Drummond, Russell, and Robertson; Alex. Dunlop, Esq., advocate; Rev. Mr. M'Kenzie; Rev. Mr. Robertson; James Mencliff, Esq., advocate; John Wigham, jun., Esq.; Robert Hunter, Esq., advocate; Duncan McLaren, Esq.; George Stone, Esq.; William M'Kenzie, Esq., of Muirton; Professor Gregory; George Macallum, Esq.; Robert Cox, Esq.; Ralph Richardson, Esq.; John Howison, Esq., Secretary to the Anti-Corn-Law Association; Rev. Mr. French; Wm. Tait, Esq.; J. H. Burton, Esq., advocate; Andrew Smith, Esq.; Archibald Thompson, Esq.; John Dunlop, Esq., of Brockloch; R. S. Grieve, Esq.; John Gray, Esq.; James Richardson, Esq.; Captain Willis; Chas. Morton, Esq., S.S.C.; D. Laidlaw, Esq.; John Lees, Esq.; Robert Richardson, Esq.; Dr. William Peddie; Dr. Renton, &c.

On the motion of Bailie DUNCAN, the Lord Provost was called to the chair.

The LORD PROVOST said, that before commencing the other proceedings, there were one or two letters he wished to read. The first was from Mr. Murray, of Henderland, a landed proprietor. Mr. Murray's letter, after regretting his unavoidable absence, went on:

"I have long been convinced that the repeal of the Corn Laws will not injure the landed or agricultural interests, whilst the establishment of Free Trade will afford the best security for a regular and steady supply of food for the people at a fair price, notwithstanding the vicissitudes of the seasons, to which all countries are liable. But this is not the only good it will produce. The derangements of the monetary system, occasioned by the export of bullion in times of scarcity, which have frequently done so much mischief to the country, will no longer occur. The working-classes, by increased demand for the produce of their labour, will obtain larger means of procuring the necessities of life, and be better able to compete with foreigners in their own markets."

"It is also no small recommendation of the measure in my opinion, that it would at once put an end to the prevailing impression that one class is disposed to oppose the others for its own particular advantage, and that it would thus restore that harmony and kindly feeling which ought to exist among all classes of the community."

"Whilst the repeal of the Corn Laws will thus increase our internal prosperity, it will at the same time strengthen and cement our relations with foreign countries, by the mutual advantages of commercial intercourse, the best and surest bond of peace and friendship between rival nations."

"I am, &c.—WM. MURRAY."

The LORD PROVOST afterwards read letters from Mr. George Hope, of Fenton Barns, and Sir G. S. Mackenzie, Bart., Rosebank, Roslin, approving of the meeting, and the latter intimating a subscription of 20*l.* His lordship afterwards addressed the meeting at considerable length. He concluded by saying that he had no doubt, notwithstanding all the opposition which certain gentlemen about Edinburgh had made at present, they would all succumb when Sir R. Peel brought forward his measure.

Mr. ALEXANDER DUNLOP, Advocate, delivered a long address in proposing the first resolution, and concluded as follows:—"When we see the working classes obliged to toil much longer every day, in consequence of the increased price of food—when we see them broken down by premature old age—when we see their children stunted for food, and, instead of the joyous smile, the glad laugh, and the springy vigour of youth, have presented to us the pallid countenance, the sunken eye, and the emaciated form—when we see this, I think it impossible for any man to behold it without indignation, when he considers that the cause of it is the stinting of the daily meal of the poor child, in order that the great aristocrats may be enabled to have additional equipage, and to keep up the luxuries they enjoy. Feeling this, I cannot but feel indignant, not so much at their oppression, though that is great—not so much at their selfishness, though that is intense—but at what I cannot but call the unutterable meanness of taking the children's bread. (Applause.) Mr. Dunlop, after a few other remarks, said, that the conclusion of all this was, and this was his opinion, as he was sure it was that of the meeting, that these laws should be immediately and unconditionally abolished."

J. GRAY, Esq., seconded the motion, which was unanimously agreed to, as were all the others proposed.

The Rev. Mr. MACKENZIE, of Leith, in a spirited speech, moved the second resolution:—"That, in the opinion of this meeting, Free Trade would be fraught with many blessings—would open up new markets for our manufactures; give a fresh impulse to our commerce; compel other states to reciprocate our liberal policy; extend and perpetuate the blessings of peace among the nations, by promoting friendly intercourse, and making it the interest of all to maintain peace;—that it would compensate the reduction, if any, on the incomes from land, and, in effect, improve other incomes, by the greater amount of necessaries, comforts, and luxuries which they would purchase; ameliorate the condition of the poorer food; lessen the temptations to immorality, vice, and crime, by employing the idle and supplying the necessities of the destitute; facilitate the progress of education; and by these means greatly promote the happiness of the people at large.

The Rev. Mr. ROBERTSON, of Portsburgh, seconded the motion, which was unanimously approved of.

Mr. JAMES MONCREIFF, Advocate, proposed the next resolution, pledging the meeting to support the League Fund.

Mr. JOHN WHIGHAM, jun., in seconding the resolution, said, he had much pleasure in announcing the state of the subscriptions; and, in doing so, he had to state that, along with Mr. Stone, he had been requested by the committee to call on a few friends of mark to begin the subscription; and he was happy to say that they had been received in the kindest manner, and that the sum of 2000*l.* had been already obtained. (Loud cheers.) There had been some very liberal sums indeed put down. One individual had subscribed 250*l.*; one firm, 300*l.*; five individuals, 100*l.* each; seven individuals, 50*l.* each; one firm, 50*l.*; one individual, 30*l.*; and a great many for 20*l.*—making altogether 2000*l.* (Loud cheers.) Mr. Whigham then explained the way in which the League proposed to call up the subscriptions, and concluded by expressing an earnest hope that the people of Edinburgh would be as liberal as they had been on former occasions. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. ROBERT HUNTER, Advocate, said—The bare mention of the resolution which has been entrusted to me will be sufficient to command the general and cordial approbation of this meeting. It is—"That this meeting express its highest sense of the invaluable services to the cause of Free Trade which have been rendered by the National Anti-Corn Law League; and tenders its warmest thanks to Messrs. Cobden, Bright, and Wilson, and the other members of the Council of the League, for their unwearied labours in the cause." (Loud cheers.)

The motion was seconded by Mr. DUNCAN M'LAREN, and unanimously agreed to.

Mr. STONE proposed that the cordial thanks of this meeting should be given to the Right Hon. the Lord Provost, for his conduct in the chair. (Cheers.)

The following are the subscriptions above 10*l.*—

	£	s.	d.
Richardsons Brothers	300	0	0
G Stone	250	0	0
J Jamieson, 18, Rutland-square	100	0	0
R Grievie, Noble House	100	0	0
Duncan M'Laren, 13, Frederick-street	100	0	0
W Somerville, sen, Dalmore	100	0	0
W Somerville, jun, Dalmore	100	0	0
A Annandale, Polton	100	0	0
J Cowan, 17, Princes-street	100	0	0
W Murray, 11, Great Stuart-street	50	0	0
J Wigham, jun, 10, Salisbury-street	50	0	0
Wm Chambers, 13, Manor Place	50	0	0
R Laidlaw and Son, Simon Square	50	0	0
Wm Dick, Clyde-street	50	0	0
J and W Howison, 2, Drummond-street	50	0	0
G M'Callum, 42, India-street	50	0	0
W M'Murray, Stead's Place, Leith Walk	50	0	0
H Girdle, 125, High-street	30	0	0
Messrs J and P Boag, 3, Waterloo Place	25	0	0
G Hope, Fenton Barns	25	0	0
Dailie Ritchie	25	0	0
J Dunlop, Randolph Place	25	0	0
J Veitch, of Woodside, Leith	25	0	0
A and C Black, 27, North Bridge	25	0	0
J Wigham, Tertius, 52, Nicolson-street	25	0	0
Wm Wemyss, Salisbury-road	25	0	0
Jno Gray, Craigie Terrace	25	0	0
Jas Leishman, Corstophin House	25	0	0
Sir G M'Kenzie, Coull	20	0	0
G K M'Callum, jun.	20	0	0
J M'Murray, Stead's Place, Leith Walk	20	0	0
J M'Laren and Son, Blacket Place	10	0	0
A Friend to the Cause	10	0	0
G Mercer and Son, 17, Nicolson-street	10	0	0
Wm Darling, 94, South Bridge	10	0	0
Wm Renton, Buccleuch Place	10	0	0
Wm Renton, 14, Princes-street	10	0	0
G Smith, 30, Niddry-street	10	0	0
Peter Wilson, Regent Arch	10	0	0
John Lees, 3, Brown Square	10	0	0
Baillie Duncan, Heriot Row	10	0	0
M Johnstone, 4, Park-street	10	0	0
John M'Intosh, Nicolson-street	10	0	0
W B Campbell, 13, Nicolson-street	10	0	0
Jno Kidd, 5, Arncliffe-place	10	0	0
R Cox, 25, Rutland-street	10	0	0
A Smith, Palace Yard	10	0	0
Wm Tait, 107, Princes-street	10	0	0
Captain Willis	10	0	0

GLASGOW.

Last night a great public meeting was held in the City Hall, at eight o'clock, for the purpose of considering the present position of the question of Free Trade, and the steps which ought to be adopted to ensure the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. The Hall, which can accommodate about 6000 persons, was completely filled, and on the platform we observed Baillies Anderson and Whitehead; Councillors Bankier, Chapman, R. Orr, Allan, Stirling, Small, D. M'Phail, Wylie, Turner, Hamilton, Dregburn; Rev. G. Jeffrey, Walter Buchanan, Esq., Alex. Graham, Esq., S. Higginbotham, Esq., James M'Clelland, Esq., W. P. Paton, Esq.; Messrs. Mitchell, P. B. Henderson, Davidson, &c. &c.

Mr. W. BUCHANAN, as President of the Glasgow Anti-Corn Law Association, took the chair.

The CHAIRMAN on rising said, You are aware that this is a meeting of the Anti Corn Law Association; and, as President of that association, I have ventured, without being moved to the chair, to preside over the meeting. (Applause.) The object for which we are assembled is to endeavour, as far as we possibly can, to support the views of the Anti-Corn Law League, and to subscribe in aid of the 250,000*l.* fund which they have announced. The centre of the agitation against the present Corn Laws is in Manchester. For more than seven years the gentlemen there have been engaged in this agitation, and have exhibited a degree of energy and enthusiasm in the cause of Free Trade, which has drawn forth the admiration of the whole island. (Applause.) But not only have they shown a great deal of zeal, and devoted a great deal of time in this good cause; they have been equally liberal with their money. You, no doubt, will recollect, that about two years ago they called upon the Free Traders of Great Britain and Ireland to subscribe the sum of 100,000*l.* That was looked upon by many as an idea altogether chimerical, and it was believed that the amount would not be collected. Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Wilson, and the liberal spirits associated with them, entertained a different opinion. They were satisfied that the Free Traders of Great Britain would cheerfully respond to the call made upon them. You are all aware of the result. The sum subscribed greatly exceeded 100,000*l.*; it amounted to 120,000*l.*; and the disbursement of that large sum has also been explained to you. I believe no argument can be employed more likely to influence the most ignorant and the most apathetic than this great, palpable, and undeniable appeal to the sympathies of the British people. It may be from our mercantile character, or from whatever other cause I cannot explain, but so it is, that John Bull never argues with more effect than when he comes down with a sum to back his opinion. (Applause.) This was the logic addressed to the community by the Anti-Corn Law League at Manchester, and I believe the sagacity and knowledge of mankind, so eminently conspicuous from first to last in that body, was never more shown than in this appeal. They said, rally round us—give us positive proof of your sympathy, and we may defy the monopolists to resist our efforts. The consequence of this appeal was just what was expected—the 100,000*l.* was more than subscribed. From the moment this was commenced, our opponents trembled in their strong places. Having gained strength and confidence from experience—having seen the enemy beginning to tremble—we are resolved to re-double our strokes, and, finally, to conquer in this cause. (Great applause.) They appeal, now, for a quarter of a million; and, gentlemen, I am happy to see that those bold and liberal hearts who recommend this great plan are not at all slack or loath to follow up their advice by a good example. They have up to this day already subscribed the sum of upwards of 70,000*l.* (Applause.) In Liverpool they have subscribed upwards of 15,000*l.*, and various of the minor towns throughout Yorkshire and Lancashire have announced large subscriptions; and I am happy to observe that our good neighbours in Dundee have had a meeting, and subscribed upwards of 2000*l.* to the same object. (Cheers.) I am sure we all feel, therefore, that Glasgow would be disgraced if it did not come forward liberally on this occasion; and I hope before we separate that the good and true men of Glasgow will not prove unfaithful, but, according to their abilities, will come forward liberally and willingly with their subscriptions in aid of the great cause. (Cheers.) The business of the evening, you will perceive, is not of the same exciting kind as upon some former occasions, being more one of pounds, shillings, and pence, than of speechmaking; but I have no doubt but that the gentlemen who will address you will throw interest even on those dry details. (Cheers.) Without further preface, I beg to introduce to you Mr. Alexander Graham. (Great cheering.)

ALEXANDER GRAHAM, Esq., of Lanefield, said—In consequence of the absence of a reverend and learned gentleman who was to have moved the resolution on this occasion, the task had devolved on him at very short notice. He had, however, put together a few notes, and in so far as time had not permitted him to give them that premeditation and digestion which was necessary in order to luminous expression and clear method, he begged to throw himself on the indulgence of the meeting. He was sure they would be at all times indulgent to one who had never been absent from his post as an advocate of the principles of Free Trade. (Cheers.) Mr. Graham here read the resolution, which is as follows:

Resolved,—“That we, the merchants, manufacturers, and others, of Glasgow, do hereby repeat our solemn protest against the laws which prohibit the free importation of foreign grain and provisions, believing them to be most oppressive to the great mass of the people, and destructive alike of the true interests of agriculture and commerce; and relying upon the intelligence and honesty of our countrymen, we declare most emphatically our determination not to relax in our exertions until those laws are entirely abolished. Farther, that this meeting hereby expresses its high sense of the invaluable services which the National Anti-Corn Law League has rendered to the cause of Free Trade; and in order to enable the Council to make renewed and increased exertions for the repeal of the corn and provision laws, a subscription in aid of the Great Fund of 250,000*l.* be now commenced, and that the Directors of the Glasgow Anti-Corn Law Association be appointed a committee to canvass for subscriptions in Glasgow and the neighbourhood, with power to add to their number.”

This resolution, he continued, in its terms is as broad as the vast question of Free Trade itself, and it would be absurd for him at the present time to attempt to follow it out in all its details. He would, therefore, content himself with calling their attention to one point of the question, on which he conceived latter events had thrown peculiar light, namely, the connection betwixt commercial and manufacturing prosperity, both as it concerns the manufacturing capitalist and the labourer, and its operation in the lowering of the price of food. Within the last few years there had been made several new discoveries in political economy, by which the truth had at last been brought forth to bear on the public mind, and been demonstrated before the public eye with a strength and clearness which had never before been attained. The facts which proved this principle lay within a small compass. If they went back for 13 years, it would be found that from the year 1833 to 1837, we had good harvests and low prices, high wages, and commercial prosperity. From the year 1837 to 1842 we had five bad seasons, and wheat rose from the previous range of 40*s.* to 45*s.* up to 60*s.* and 70*s.*; and it would be in the recollection of those who now heard him the state of prostration under which the manufacturing interest of this country suffered at that period; and more particularly when he looked to the vast mass of operatives now present, the friends of Free Trade could appeal to them for proof as to the distress that was then suffered by all the labouring classes. (Cheers.) It has been stated that the manufacturing classes sunk one hundred millions of money at that time, and he believed it. Now, such being the case, he should like to get at something like a philosophical analysis of the cause of this fact; and in order to get at this he begged leave to press on their attention this fact, the whole annual value of the produce of this country, not agricultural, but manufacturing and mineral, amounts to 250 millions. This is the value of the produce of this country, exclusive of the agricultural produce of the United Kingdom. Now, let it be observed, that of this amount of produce all that is exported is 50 millions, leaving 200 millions, or four-fifths, to be consumed at home. It was evident, therefore, that the home market is the sphere of consumption for this vast amount of produce, and according to the healthy state of the home market, would be the state of prosperity of the manufacturing capitalist, and the operative by whom he is employed. The next question was, seeing that so vast an amount of our manufactures are consumed at home, is it the upper classes or the operatives who are the best customers? He believed the whole Parliamentary constituency of this country was not above 24 or 3 per cent. of the population; therefore 97 per cent. of the people of this country lived in houses under a 10*l.* rental. Another fact he might mention, namely, that it was ascertained by the census taken in the year 1841, that there are only 3 per cent. of the population who live in independence; all the rest of the people of this country are living by means of their own industry, in one form or another. Now, what did these facts demonstrate? Did they not plainly tell us that the portion of wealthy consumers is very small, and that the vast mass of the consumers consists of the industrious classes?

He held in his hand a statement of the stocks on hand in the year 1844, which he would read. It is as follows:

Cotton, a stock equal to 40 weeks' consumption.
Cotton,	40 do.
Rum,	40 do.
Saltpetre,	40 do.
Rice,	35 do.
Tea,	50 do.
Sago,	50 do.
Indigo,	60 do.
Coffee,	50 do.

and all spices 100 weeks' consumption. But at this time what a striking contrast to the above do the stocks of monopolies present:

Of corn, stock equal to 8 weeks' consumption,
Colonial sugar	10 do.
Foreign sugar (prohibited)	13 do. in bond.

Under Free Trade in corn they would have in place of eight weeks one hundred weeks' consumption. But look at the working of the same principle on sugar. Of colonial sugar we had ten weeks consumption; and of foreign sugar, which is prohibited from consumption by these restrictive laws, we had thirteen weeks' consumption. He believed that if we had Free Trade in corn a remarkable change would be seen in the commerce of this country; and, great as would be the advantages to commerce, those which would accrue to the grain trade would surmount them all. Great Britain would then become the emporium of grain. England would become the money pivot of the world, affording, as she could, the greatest facilities and accommodation for receiving stocks of all kinds in consignment; and he was persuaded that, with Free Trade in corn, this country would become the granary of Europe—a second Egypt.

They were next told that other nations would not act towards them on a system of reciprocity, but he believed the exclusion of manufactures from other countries arose entirely from the system pursued by this nation. (Hear, hear.) Other nations saw Great Britain prosperous, and it was very natural to suppose that it was by this exclusive policy that she rose to this eminence. Now it was in spite of this policy that it had prospered. It was well known that in their negotiations with Germany the Corn Laws had been the principal barrier in the way of reciprocity, and that the German League would never likely have been formed if Great Britain had opened its ports to their timber and corn. The same opinion was entertained in America, and was well expressed in the following extract from a report by Mr. Walker, the secretary of the treasury. This official document says:—(Mr. Walker then read an extract and continued.) But what was this bugbear of reciprocity? He would venture to say that it was as clear as any axiom in mathematics, that for any kind of produce they receive from foreign countries they have something to pay for it. Nothing was clearer than that if they saw stuff of any kind coming into this country, there would be something exported to pay for it, either of their own production, or of some other thing they had previously got for the products of their industry. The services of the League in enlightening public opinion had been of the greatest consequence to the cause in which they were engaged, as public opinion was the lever of power by which they hoped to achieve their final triumph. Let them observe the tribute paid by Lord John Russell, on the occasion of his addressing them in that hall the other day, to the leaders of the League. They could not suppose that he viewed the League in its first progress with opposition, but with that magnanimity for which his lordship was so conspicuous, he declared “that it would not be consistent with fairness, if he did not say that the progress this question has made, is very much owing to the persevering exertions, the instructive statements, and the lucid arguments employed by the members of what is called the Anti-Corn Law League. (Cheers.) In 1842, at the meeting at which the League fund of 50,000*l.* was first spoken of, Mr. Cobden merely hinted at it, saying that their friend in the chair had got a project to announce by which they would be startled when they told them of it. He meant, he added, to subsidise the country of fifty thousand pounds. Since public opinion had gone on expanding, and they had raised a further sum of 100,000*l.* this had increased their boldness, and they were now bent on obtaining 250,000*l.* (Cheers.) In fact the money was realised. Manchester had given nearly 80,000*l.*; and he believed, if it were necessary, that such was the extending influence of this question, such the influence acquired by the League, that they could realise half a million for the same purpose. He could conceive no means so effective to enlarge it to that amount as the threats of some of their opponents; for if these were carried into effect—if it were attempted, by the arm of the law, to put down the League, or to punish its leaders as violators of the law—he was quite sure if a finger was laid upon a member of that body, a spirit would be raised in the country which would show a willingness of surrender of property far more than anything yet accomplished. (Applause.) He was no admirer of Sir Robert Peel's politics, but he was satisfied he was possessed of more sense and caution than to countenance the landlords in hinting at such a thing; and the monopolists only showed their own weakness and impotence, when they talked in this way. Let them look to the opinions of the League extracted from the ministers of the Crown. (Loud cheering.) Sir Robert had declared that we should buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest. Another minister had declared that the principles of Free Trade are the principles of common sense. And a third minister had written articles in favour of Free Trade. (Hear.) Now, all that had been extorted by the League. (Hear, hear.) Look at what the League had done by converting all the fixed duty men, and bringing them into their ranks. They were thus united and going forward in a phalanx which would prove to be irresistible. The League had dissolved and re-constructed the Peel Ministry, and he hoped for the purpose of carrying the Corn Law question. There was something said about compensation, but in his opinion the less the landlords said about compensation the better. If the landlords were to bring an action for compensation, then the people must bring on a counter-action against them. (Hear.) It would be a curious inquiry to enter upon, in endeavouring to ascertain the amount of unjust burdens the landlords had thrown from their own shoulders on the rest of the community. (Cheers.) It could be shown that, in order to supply the place of that portion of the land-tax of which they shook themselves free, they threw the burden of taxation upon consumption, and thus upon the great mass of the people. If compensation was to be given at all, he was afraid it would be found that the balance would preponderate against the landlords. (Hear.) After a few further observations, Mr. Graham resumed his seat amidst loud cheers.

BAILIE WHITEHEAD said—I rise with great pleasure to second the resolution. As I see, by manifestations of your impatience, that you came here to night more to show your deeds in aversion to these accursed laws than to listen to speeches on the subject, I say no more.

Mr. DAVID MURRAY, Secretary, then read the following subscriptions:—

	£	s.	d.
Charles Tennant & Co.	500	0	0
J & A Dennistoun	500	0	0
Samuel Higginbotham	500	0	0
Wm Dixon	500	0	0
John Wilson	500	0	0
Buchanan, Hamilton, & Co.	500	0	0
Wilson & Co.	500	0	0
Colin Dunlop & Co.	250	0	0
James Scott	250	0	0
The Lord Provost	250	0	0
Dun M'Phail	250	0	0
Neale Thompson	200	0	0
Robert Dalglish	200	0	0
James Merry	200	0	0
A Friend, per J and W C	150	0	0
Wm Stirling & Sons	150	0	0
Alex Graham	150	0	0
Johnston, Galbraith, & Co	150	0	0
Wm Gemmill	150	0	0
A Friend	150	0	0
Wm & James Murray	100	0	0
Chas Gray	100	0	0
A Friend (J Y)	100	0	0
Robert Hutchison	100	0	0
Samuel R & T Brown	100	0	0
Chas Dunlop	100	0	0
Robert Stewart	100	0	0
Alex Smyth	100	0	0
Robert Bartholomew	100	0	0
J & A Anderson	100	0	0
Robert Hastie & Co	100	0	0
Geo Smith & Sons	100	0	0
Francis Orr & Sons	100	0	0
J J Robertson	100	0	0
Wm Gibson	100	0	0
John Anderson	60	0	0
A & D J Bannatyne	52	10	0
Wm Stirling	50	0	0
Geo Stirling	50	0	0
Alex Couper	50	0	0
James M'Clelland	50	0	0
John Loudoun	50	0	0
Geo Robson	50	0	0
W G Mitchell	50	0	0
W P Paton	50	0	0
David Chapman	50	0	0
Arch McConnel	50	0	0
Geo Anderson & Co	50	0	0
John Whitehead	50	0	0
John Kerr	50	0	0
James Couper	50	0	0
D & J Anderson	50	0	0
Thomas Mitchell	50	0	0
James Laurie	50	0	0
Robert Bryson	50	0	0
Wm Stevenson & Sons	50	0	0
J & D Wilson	50	0	0
Fleming, Watson, & Nairn	50	0	0
Ewing, Paul, & Co	50	0	0
R Orr	50	0	0
James Broom	50	0	0
Lewis Potter	50	0	0
John Stirling	50	0	0
James Donaldson & Co	50	0	0
A Friend, per W Buchanan	60	0	0
Robert Wilson	30	0	0
Drysdale & Wilson	30	0	0
W Paterson	30	0	0
A Friend, per A Couper	30	0	0
James Mitchell	30	0	0
James Davidson, jun	30	0	0
Robert Ker	25	0	0
Geo Mitchell	25	0	0
A Friend, per A Smyth	25	0	0
James Tweedie	25	0	0
David Dregburn	25	0	0
Wylie & Lochhead	25	0	0
Paterson, Brothers, & Co	25	0	0
Wm Hay & Co	25	0	0
R G Finlay and Brothers	25	0	0
Miller & Caldwell	21	0	0
James Paterson	20	0	0
Thomas Brown, jun	20	0	0
John Brown, jun	20	0	0
Wm M'Laren	20	0	0
Wm Brodie	20	0	0
J & C Risk	20	0	0
Laird & Thomson	20	0	0
Wm Service & Sons	20	0	0
Alex Tennant	20	0	0
A Friend, per W Hamilton	20	0	0
Fulton, Laird, & Co	20	0	0
James & T Brown & Co	15	0	0
Geo Lancaster	15	0	0
John Hamilton	15	0	0
John Small	15	0	0
Wm Yule & Son	15	0	0
Thomas Richard	10	10	0
A & J M'Nab	10	10	0
Malcolm Kerr	10	10	0
Geo Gamiss	10	0	0
Geo Ord	10	0	0
Wm Bankier	10	0	0
Wm Blackwood	10	0	0
Alex Allan	10	0	0
Service & Workman	10	0	0
Robert M'Kay	10	0	0
Geo Young	10	0	0
W W Mitchell	10	0	0
W White	10	0	0
John Cairns	5	5	0
Peter B Henderson	5	5	0
Geo Caird	5	5	0
Harper, Macfarlane, & Glen	5	0	0
John Finlay	5	0	0
Hilliard & Chapman	5	0	0
J S Aked	5	0	0
James Turner	3	0	0
John Ure	3	0	0

£10,060 10 0

[The announcement of the various large subscriptions called forth the most rapturous applause; and during the time the lists were being handed in, the Chairman took an opportunity of apologising for the absence of the Lord Provost.]

SAMUEL HIGGINBOTHAM, Esq., then rose and said: Gentlemen,—The Chairman has just whispered into my ear that I am to tell you that there is still something to be done. And as we came from the ante-room he gave me the first certain indication I had, that I should be expected to address you this evening; and he gave me that indication in these rather familiar terms: "You must tell the people they ought to fill up the cards they have received." (Hear, hear.) Now, gentlemen, I trust you have all obtained cards, and that you will do your duty—for, in this great cause, England expects every man who has an interest in the country, in himself, and in his labour, to do his duty. (Cheers.)

I wish you to show your adherence to this cause by deeds not simply by words. (Cheers.) I see a gentleman not far from me who said to me some time ago, in reference to the repeal of the Corn Laws: "I know the importance of this question, and I will not, according to my means and abilities, be behind any one in the city of Glasgow in the endeavour to obtain a repeal." (Hear, hear.) This gentleman, I am happy to say, belongs to a religious party in this country, for whom I have always entertained the highest respect and esteem. (Hear.) And as a proof of the great interest he feels in the cause which has brought us together, he has not only come himself to the meeting to-night, but has likewise brought with him some female friends—and almost the only female friends in the Hall. (Loud cheers.) This friend, I am sure, will commence the subscription which it is expected will be made by those present: he will, I feel assured, manfully do his duty. (Cheers.) This gentleman belongs to a class of men who are at once intelligent, shrewd, and able, and who are well acquainted with the bearings of this great question upon the interests of all classes of the people of this country. He, too, is well acquainted with the subject; and according to his means will, I am sure, not be behind any of us in this subscription. I need not say that the gentleman to whom I allude is our respected friend, Mr. White. (Loud cheers.) I hope he will pardon me for the allusions I have made; but I could not help calling to mind the language he used when speaking to me on this subject some years ago. (Hear, hear.) Like my friend who lately addressed you (Mr. Graham), I have a few notes—but I have no written speech—and I hope you will excuse the somewhat irregular manner in which I address you. (Cheers.) I think, gentlemen, that the contest in which we are now and have for some time been engaged—the contest of Free Trade against monopoly—is fast drawing to a close; and that the principles which this association has all along advocated are about to receive a most signal triumph. (Hear, hear.) And why should not this be the case? (Cheers.) Those principles are the principles of truth, the principles of common sense, the principles of justice, and therefore they must ultimately triumph. (Cheers.) If we look abroad on the political world, everywhere we see indications and proofs of the truth of what I say—that this great contest is drawing to a close. (Hear, hear.) But I think the most striking, the most conclusive proof we have received of this, is the acknowledgment of that most distinguished statesman who has recently visited our city, that the question of commercial freedom was about to receive its solution; and in the solution of that question our contest is at an end, and the principles that have been advocated so ably, so clearly, and so distinctly, by the leaders of the association are triumphant. For, gentlemen, that question can only be solved in one way, an immediate and unconditional repeal of the provision laws. (Cheers.) When that question shall be solved, the contest in which we are now engaged will have come to an end; and our principles, I say, will then be triumphant. (Applause.) Now, if this be the case, what is it that has placed this question in so favourable a light, in so favourable a position, at the present moment? (Hear, hear.) Without any wish to disparage statesmen, eminent and celebrated men, who have taken an interest in this question—either those who promulgated the doctrines of Free Trade years and years ago, or those statesmen who now come forward and wish to bring those principles of Free Trade into practical operation in the policy of this country—without wishing, I say, to disparage those men, you must all admit, I think, that the Anti-Corn Law League has the great merit of having brought this question to its present most favourable position. Without the exertions of the League, in all probability we should have been years and years more in obtaining the point at which we have now arrived. (Cheers.) Now, if this be the case, has not the League a claim upon every man's exertions? has it not a claim upon every man's purse, in proportion to the means he possesses, and is able to give? (Hear, hear.) Yes, gentlemen, we must say, without disparagement to any of those eminent statesmen for whose services we are grateful, that the League, by its unceasing exertions, and by the liberal support which it has received from the people of this country, has in a great measure accomplished the object it had in view, in causing the question to attain that position in which it now stands (cheers); and I claim your support to the League on that ground. It matters nothing what names our opponents may call us. They may call this meeting an incendiary meeting, an unconstitutional meeting, or anything else they please; but it is by means of these discussions, and by means of our public meetings, that the question has assumed its present most favourable aspect. (Cheers.)

In contrast with the splendid, the lucid and conclusive arguments of that well-meaning publication, the Herald—(loud laughter)—I'll give you the simple reasoning of two piers in our own mill. The conversation I am about to refer to was overheard by one of the overseers. I shall relate the incident in half English and half Scotch, for, you know, I am only a Scotchman by adoption. (Hear.) One of the boys said to the other, "The ports will soon be open now." "Weel," says the other, "muckle gill will the openin' o' the ports dae us." Says the other—"Is that a' ye ken o' the subject? Didn't auld Gourlay gie us our breakfast for twopence formerly, an' noo he charges us twopence-halfpenny; but if the ports were open there would be mair meal i' the country, and auld Gourlay would gie us our breakfast for twopence again." (Much cheering.) Here, gentlemen, is much finer reasoning—this is, indeed, common sense. (Applause.) And just contrast the reasoning of the little boy with the duke of Curry-powder notoriety. (Hear.) Why, in contrast with such dukes, the boy puts them as much in the back-ground as Voltaire was put in the back-ground by Cowper the poet, when he drew a contrast between the contented cottager and the wily philosopher. (Cheers.) There is much more in the conversation between the two boys than may at first sight be apparent. Until I began to reflect upon that conversation I did not see all its bearings. The boy said he had to pay a halfpenny more for his breakfast in consequence of the rise in the price of provisions. The boy in this way spent twopence per day or one shilling per week more than formerly for his food. Now, if you extend this increase to the twenty-six millions of the people of this country—say a shilling per week to each for fifty-two weeks—the increase in the price of provisions will be found to amount very nearly to the enormous sum of seventy millions sterling. (Loud cries of Hear, hear.) You will, therefore, see that it is consistent even with economy to subscribe to the fund now being raised by the League. Indeed, I am of opinion that if they had to subscribe ten millions—if that were necessary—it would be policy on our parts to come forward and subscribe to the utmost of our means—(great cheering)—aye, and beyond our means, in order to effect the object we have in view, the repeal of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) Now, gentlemen, I hope you will all hand in your cards, and testify, by the amount of your subscriptions, your determination that these laws shall be finally, totally, and for ever repealed. (Great cheering.)

Mr. BURFUM, a gentleman from the United States, having been requested by the Chairman to address the meeting, he said he was much interested in the cause of Free Trade, and trusted that, by venturing to express his sentiments on the subject, it would not be considered in the light of foreign interference. He had been present at the late meeting held in Manchester by the Anti-Corn-Law League, and was not more impressed by the eloquence and sound judgment which Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright brought to bear on this great subject, than with the intelligence of the audience assembled on that occasion. He had argued upon the question of Free Trade with many persons since he came to this country, but he had never found one who, although disagreeing with him to a certain extent, did not admit that the question was right in itself. He referred to the question of Oregon, and stated it as his opinion, that the fire and bluster of General Cass's late speech in Congress would soon give way before the sound arguments of Mr. Webster, and that peace would prevail. He then went on at considerable length to refer to the peculiar advantages of the two countries, the one from its minerals and other natural facilities to supply America with articles of manufacture, and the other from its great extent and fruitful soil to supply this country with food; and concluded by saying that the best and most effectual plan to maintain peace betwixt nations, was to abolish all restrictive laws.

On the motion of PROVOST BANKIER, a vote of thanks was given to the Chairman, and the meeting dispersed.

MEETING OF THE GLASGOW INCORPORATION OF WEAVERS.

In terms of previous intimation, a special meeting of the members of this old and highly respectable incorporation of Glasgow freemen, was held on Friday in the Trades' Hall, Glassford-street, for the purpose of taking into consideration a motion, "That her Majesty's Ministers be memorialised, and petitions presented to both Houses of Parliament, praying for the abolition of the existing restrictions on the importation of grain and provisions from foreign countries. John Bartholomew, Esq., was unanimously called to the chair. In addition to the chairman, we observed among the gentlemen present, Baines Anderson, Whitehead, Brodie, and Mackinlay; Provost Bankier, of Calton; Councillors Orr, Smith, and M'Nee; Thomas Waddell, Esq., from Montreal, &c. After the reading of the advertisement upon which the meeting was convened, the chairman made a few introductory observations. He then called upon

Baillie BRODIE, who, on rising to move the first resolution, said—In accordance with the object for which this meeting has been called, a resolution has been put into my hands which I have much pleasure in proposing. It is not my intention, neither is it necessary that I should occupy your time in discussing this question, because the arguments which go to prove the injury inflicted upon all classes by the operation of the Corn Laws are so numerous, so unanswerable, that every person of the meanest capacity must see the necessity for their total and immediate repeal. It is gratifying to me, as it must be to all, that we can now approach the discussion of this subject without reference to politics—(cheers)—men of every shade of political sentiment agreeing that these laws, so obnoxious, so destructive to the interests of the community at large, can not be much longer maintained in consistency with the prosperity of the kingdom at large. Among the few who still advocate a restriction in the supply of food, are some who hold up the agricultural and manufacturing classes as the enemies of each other. But this position he would meet with a simple denial, as an assertion utterly destitute of truth. While Free Traders express their determination to persevere until they get these unjust laws repealed, they did so under the solemn and deep conviction, that the proper application of capital and skill to the cultivation of the soil would do more than promote the prosperity of agriculture than all the laws which a short-sighted policy has or can enact for its protection. Agriculture and commerce are nearly allied to, and mutually dependent upon, each other—the one cannot suffer without the other partaking in it. The one cannot prosper without the other partaking in the prosperity; so that, in every point of view, the mercantile is the best friend of the agricultural interest. (Applause.)

Councillor M'Nee, in seconding the resolution, remarked, that from a conversation he had that day with a surgeon, a marked increase in mortality had taken place among the poorer classes since November last.

Mr. W. ORR rose to move the appointment of a committee to carry out the object of the previous resolution. He entirely coincided with Baillie Brodie in the opinion that the interest of the manufacturer and agriculturist were perfectly identical. He would ask, how would the agriculturist be protected, if manufactures were driven from the country? They would have a people who could not want bread, yet must have it, and yet have nothing to give for it. He had always viewed the Corn Laws as founded on injustice, and supported in misconception. And so far from being a benefit, a protection to the agricultural classes, every day's report from the agricultural districts, and the oft-current appointment of Parliamentary committees, to examine into the cause of agricultural distress, betokened that the system of protection did not even effect the objects for which it was said to be retained. But a better proof lay in the fact, that in 1831 the agricultural population was to the manufacturing as 28 to 42, while in 1842 they bore the relationship of 22 to 46. (Hear.) Now, if these Corn Laws were of benefit to the agricultural interest as a whole, would this change have taken place? Few people left a better position for a worse; but in almost all possible cases they did so from a worse to a better. (Great applause.) The agriculturists tell us that they are our best customers, but he thought they were more dependent upon the mercantile community than the latter. They point to splendid mansions of our merchants, and to the poor dwellings of the agricultural labourer, in proof that protection is necessary to preserve the small remaining comfort which the poor peasant possesses. But this only proves one fact, viz. that their so-called protection, however it may tingle sweetly in the ear of the ignorant, is a farce, a nonentity as far as regards either the farmer or labourer. (Cheers.)

Mr. GOVAN, in seconding the resolution, hoped the memorial would tell as it should upon the legislature of the country.

The motion being agreed to, a vote of thanks was passed to the chairman, and the meeting broke up.—Glasgow Argus.

DEMONSTRATION OF THE WORKING MEN OF LIVERPOOL.

One of the most important demonstrations which have been made in favour of Free Trade was made last night by the working classes. The meeting was called by a placard, of which the following is a copy:

"Working Men of Liverpool,—You are hereby invited to attend a public meeting of ourselves, to be held in Clayton-square, on Thursday evening next, January 15, 1846, at half-past seven o'clock, to give expression to your sentiments in reference to the present high price of all sorts of provisions, and the demand for labour in connection with the maintenance of the present Corn Laws, and their total, immediate, and unconditional repeal. A journeyman shipwright is expected to take the chair, and several other working men only will address the meeting. It is hoped that the best of order will be preserved, and a fair estimate of our opinions obtained on this question.—Signed at the request, and on behalf of, a number of working men, originating and intending to conduct the said meeting.—R. BIRKETT, 67, Jordan street, Queen's Dock."

Long before the hour appointed for holding the meeting, throngs of the industrious classes crowded the square, and before the chair was taken there could not have been fewer than 5000 persons present. There would no doubt have been a much larger number assembled, but the meeting was summoned at two days' notice, and it was, comparatively speaking, unknown. The arrangements were quite of a characteristic nature. A four-wheeled lorry was stationed on the east side of the square, and upon the vehicle two or three chairs and two small tables for the reporters were placed. The only light was the glimmering of a neighbouring gas-lamp, the rays of which enabled the reporters to take but very imperfect notes of the proceedings. To see so many thousand faces, not yet washed after the labours of the day, gazing intently at the speakers, was most gratifying. It bespoke a determined and earnest desire on their part to promote the progress of the cause which now agitates the country. The devout attention they paid to the speakers, and their hearty responses to the liberal sentiments uttered, also marked their devotion to the principles of Free Trade. Upon the motion of Mr. Hinde, seconded by Mr. William Simmonds, Mr. John Price, a journeyman millwright, was unanimously called on to preside.

The Chairman opened the proceedings by expressing a hope that they would do all they could to conduct matters in a quiet and peaceable manner.

The assembly was then addressed by Mr. Simmonds, who moved the following resolution:

"Resolved,—That we, the working men of Liverpool, in public meeting assembled, having no other means of procuring a sufficiency of food and other necessities of life for ourselves, our wives, and our children, except through the profitable sale of our labour, and the receipt of 'a fair day's pay for a fair day's work,' do enter our solemn protest against the continuance of the Corn Laws, which at this inclement season of the year, with a prospect of scarcity, by closing our ports to the admission of food from abroad, and thus limiting the quantity, enhances the price, and restricts to a great extent the demand for our labour, by which alone, as free-born British subjects, we wish honestly to live. May God protect the poor."

Mr. Simmonds concluded by quoting passages of Scripture which proved that the Free Trade cause was sanctioned by the Bible. He was followed by William Hinde, a rope-maker, and by one or two others, in speeches of some length, which were frequently applauded; and the resolution, being put by the chairman, was carried unanimously. Another meeting will be held in a short time.

KENDAL.

On Wednesday night, a meeting was held at the Odd-Fellows' Hotel, to meet Messrs. Cobden and Bright, and Col. Thompson, as a deputation from the League, to promote the increase of Free Trade qualifications in counties, and especially in the county of Westmoreland.

The hall was crowded by men of the first influence in the county. The orchestra was filled with ladies.

Mr. J. J. Wilson said he had great pleasure in proposing that Mr. W. Whitwell take the chair.

Mr. J. THOMPSON, jun. said he had great pleasure in seconding the nomination.

Mr. J. J. WILSON, before the business of the evening commenced, read a letter from Mr. Crackanthorpe, expressing that gentleman's regret at not being able to attend.

Mr. COBDEN, on rising, was greeted with the most enthusiastic acclamations. He spoke at very great length, commenting argumentatively and humorously upon passing events. In the course of his speech he made the following allusion to the representation of Westmoreland:

The Free Traders have won South Lancashire, and by the end of the present month North Lancashire will be equally safe. But then we want to go forward. Westmoreland comes next, and you stop the way. We want Westmoreland next, and we intend to have it next. (A voice, "You shall have it next.") Now, I will undertake, if necessary, to find, in less than twelve months, a thousand men who shall qualify in Westmoreland, and wrest it out of the hands of the Lowthers. (Immense cheering.) If there is any reporter present, who reports for the paper that is read at Lowther Castle, I hope he will take down these few words. I tell Lord Londale, if he upholds these laws for another two years, we, the Free Traders of England, will as surely have Westmoreland in our power, as we have now South Lancashire and Yorkshire. If he maintains the monstrous injustice of taxing the people's bread—(A voice, "Whether he does that or not?")—I speak, continued Mr. Cobden, as a Free Trader; if he had not meddled with the food of the people, we should not now have come forward to interfere with him; if, I say, he persists in the monstrous injustice of taxing the bread of the people, for the mean and paltry object of filling the pockets of his own order, I do not say his own pocket, for whatever he may think, he does not really put anything into his own pocket, we will as surely wrest the representation out of his hands, as we have won the other counties that have been alluded to, and he shall be as little consulted in the choice of members as any hard working man that wears a fustian jacket. (Most rapturous applause, that continued for some time.) Now, you will say this is bold language for a humble individual like myself to use towards a man whose family has been accustomed to dictate terms to the Prime Minister, and to compel him to give them the Lord Lieu-tenancy of two counties, lest they should withhold from him that large parliamentary influence which they possessed. But how is it that I am enabled to use this language? It is that he has made me strong by attempting to maintain a great injustice against the people of this country. I should be nothing in this country, if he would only do justice to the people. (Loud applause.) I pledge my honour here this night to find a thousand men, and if a thousand is not sufficient, then I engage to find two thousand to take up the franchise for Westmoreland. (Cheers.) Now, you must remember they cannot play the old trick over again which they practised when Henry Brougham fought the battle with them. In those times the poll lasted fourteen days, and finding themselves on one occasion in a minority, they took the advantage of a Sunday intervening, and the lawyers were set to work, and fictitious votes were created, which were polled on the Monday. (Cries of "That is all true.") "We know all about that." This trick cannot be repeated; the names must now be on the register 12 months; they must be hung up on the church and chapel doors, where every body that passes by may examine them; they must go through the revision court, and stand the test of the closest legal scrutiny, and we will take care there shall not be a vote on the register that has not been honestly paid for. (Cheers.) They cannot play tricks with us. I throw down the gauntlet in the name of the Free Traders of England, and I declare that if he maintain these laws, he shall not retain the representation of Westmoreland. (Loud and continued cheering.) He will believe us when he sees what we have done; and, if he wants a character, we will refer him to Mr. Wilson Patten and Mr. Talbot Clifton, in the adjoining county of North Lancashire. (Laughter.) Why, Westmoreland is nothing to North Lancashire. In that last-mentioned county, by the end of this month, we shall have gained 5000 upon the register; here, in Westmoreland, we want only 1000, which is but a work that can be done before breakfast. (Laughter and cheers.)

Mr. Cobden resumed his seat amidst the most enthusiastic cheering. The meeting was subsequently addressed in a most effective manner by Colonel Thompson, and Mr. Bright, M.P., who were followed by Mr. J. J. Wilson, and Mr. J. Holme.—Mr. John Gill, on behalf of the working classes, made an excellent speech; and after a vote of thanks proposed by the Mayor to Mr. Cobden, and Mr. Bright, the meeting separated in a high state of enthusiasm.

SUNDERLAND.

Even with a Supplement we are compelled to omit detailed reports of several important meetings which have been held in various parts of the country. At Sunderland, the mayor, in pursuance of a requisition, held a meeting which was attended by the most influential merchants and ship-owners of the borough, including several who withheld their votes from Col. Thompson at the last election. The principal speakers were the Mayor, who is one of the largest ship-owners in the town, Dr. J. Browne, Mr. A. J. Moore, Mr. J. Wilson, Mr. Dickinson, (better known as the Manchester Parker, and a leader of the Chartists), Mr. A. White, Mr. J. Thompson, Mr. G. Horncastle, Col. Beckwith, and Mr. Curling. On the Tuesday following, at a meeting of the Anti-Corn Law Association of the same town, resolutions were adopted to canvass for the Great League Fund, and nearly 2000 were subscribed in the room.

On Wednesday evening, the 7th inst., a meeting was held at the Clarendon Hotel, Grainger-street, for the purpose of carrying into operation the recommendations of Mr. Cobden, at the Corn Exchange, on the previous Monday evening. Mr. Crawshaw was in the chair. The meeting was principally occupied in receiving subscriptions to the League Fund, and the names of those who wished to qualify themselves as county voters. About 30 gentlemen applied for qualifications, principally in North Durham; and the names of a great many who were likely to qualify were taken down. The following gentlemen have subscribed to the League Fund:—Mr. Geo. Crawshaw, 100*l.*; Messrs. Pow and Fawcus, 50*l.*; Messrs. John Lee and Co., 50*l.*; Mr. Robert Ormston, 50*l.*; Messrs. Bell, Brothers, 30*l.*; Mr. H. C. Armstrong, 25*l.*; Mr. John Shield, 21*l.*; Mr. James Shield, 20*l.*; Mr. W. Armstrong, Town's Chamber, 10*l.* 10*s.*; Mr. Joseph Watson, 10*l.*; Mr. T. A. Cook, 10*l.*; Mr. F. Staniford, 10*l.*; Messrs. T. Burnett and Son, Dunstan, 10*l.*; Captain Weatherley, 15*l.*; Mr. T. Burnett, 5*l.*; Mr. R. H. Yea, 5*l.*; Mr. W. Proctor, 5*l.*; Mr. W. H. Brockett, 5*l.*; Mr. Thomas Dewar, 5*l.*; Mr. Joshua Watson, jun., 5*l.*; Mr. Jacob Grey, Gateshead, 5*l.*; Mr. Timothy Oliver, 5*l.*; a Gateshead Friend to Fair-play, 5*l.*; Mr. John Blakey, 1*l.* 1*s.*; Mr. Jas. Clephan, 1*l.*; Mr. Samuel Dixon, 1*l.*; Mr. John Fawcett, 1*l.*; Mr. Joseph Clephan, 1*l.*

DUNDEE.

A meeting of the Friends of Free Trade in Dundee, convened by the League Fund Committee, was held in the Guild-hall on Saturday last, for the purpose of considering the best means of immediately raising a subscription in aid of the Great League Fund of 250,000*l.* On the motion of George Duncan, Esq., member for the burgh, Provost Brown was called to the chair; and, on the solicitation of the Provost, George Duncan, Esq., took his seat on his right, and Edward Baxter, Esq., on his left. Several spirited resolutions were adopted, and a sum of 1,461*l.* 11*s.* was subscribed in the space of a few minutes; the total subscription in Dundee being nearly 2000*l.*

OXFORD.

On Thursday, a meeting convened by the Mayor was held in the Town-hall of Oxford, which was completely filled by citizens of all ranks, forming a striking contrast to the "hole and corner" meeting of protectionists held in that city during the preceding week. The speakers were Mr. Grub, Mr. Toole, Mr. Hemming, Mr. Faulkner, the Rev. Mr. Godwin, Mr. Wane, and Mr. Langstone, M.P. We greatly regret being obliged to omit Mr. Langstone's speech. He showed that the landlords would profit by the repeal of the Corn Law in common with the rest of the community, and that they were actually losers by maintaining the present exclusive privileges.

ST. AUSTELL.

On Friday evening, the 9th inst., a public meeting was held in the Market-house, at St. Austell, when petitions to both Houses of the legislature, praying the removal of every restriction on trade that is compatible with the raising of a sufficient revenue, especially the removal of those that bear upon necessary articles of food were moved. The chair was filled by Mr. John Hosking, a member of the Society of Friends, who made a few pertinent observations on opening the business. He was followed by Mr. Barlow and Mr. Boyle. Mr. J. S. Trelawney, M.P. for Tavistock, made a powerful and argumentative speech in supporting the petition, which was listened to with marked attention. Mr. Jacob Prior and Mr. Morcom briefly addressed the meeting, and C. J. W. Ellis, Esq., who is well known as an earnest and zealous reformer, and a considerable landowner in this county, spoke with telling effect, and concluded by saying, "Though there was a calm for the moment, the period might not be far distant when the people ought to be prepared to stand up for those gentlemen who would really and disinterestedly support the bread-and-cheese question, which affected the whole community. (Cheers.) And surely that county which boasted of a Davy and a Paris in science, and a Molesworth and Trelawney in politics, should not be behind the rest of the kingdom in this great Free Trade movement. (Cheers.)"—Cornish Herald.

HERTFORD.

A Free Trade meeting was held at the Shire Hall, Hertford, on Monday evening, Jan. 19, which was fully attended, and great interest was excited. The Hon. Wm. Cowper, M.P., and many gentlemen from the town and neighbourhood, were present. Mr. Wm. POLLARD was called to the chair, who briefly explained the objects of the meeting, and introduced Mr. Falvey. Mr. FALVEY replied to the fallacies and mis-statements uttered at the late election for this county (by a Mr. Woodley, a grocer, from Cambridgeshire, and Sir M. Farquhar) at great length, and with considerable force and eloquence, and completely demolished them.

Mr. J. J. GRIPPER then proposed a petition to Parliament for the immediate and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws. This was seconded by Wm. Manser, Esq., and carried unanimously. It was proposed that the Hon. W. Cowper, M.P., for the borough, be requested to present such petition to the House of Commons, and to support its prayer. The hon. member then addressed the meeting at great length, pledging himself to support the principles advocated by their petition to the utmost of his power, and stating his conviction of the speedy and inevitable abolition of the Corn Laws. (Loud cheers.)

The Chairman having called upon Mr. LATTIMORE, he said, that he should have been happy to have remained a passive listener to the able and argumentative speeches delivered that evening, so great was the delight he derived from witnessing the rapid and wide-spread progress of the important principle of commercial freedom, which he had long and conscientiously laboured to support. (Cheers.) Every part of the ground had been preoccupied that evening, and he would therefore occupy but little of their time at that late hour, as they must be exhausted by listening to the lengthened addresses delivered that night. (No, no.) Mr. Lattimore stated his entire concurrence in the advantages derived by the staple manufacturers of the country from the remission of duties upon the raw materials used thereby, as cotton, wool, and silk, to which allusion has been made, and commented with great force upon the singular anomaly that such duties were now solely retained upon the raw materials used by the farmers and graziers in the manufacture of beef, mutton, and pork; such as oats, beans, peas, &c., which he considered as a proof of the consciousness of the injustice of the Corn Laws. And Hertfordshire, he said, had been lately distinguished—first, by the great protection meeting at St. Albans, at which the Marquis of Salisbury, being chairman, actually came out as an advocate of the purity of election! Now, many strange conversions were daily taking place, but the most surprising of them all was that of the noble marquis becoming a political Magdalene! (Cheers.) They had all heard of the conjuror who invited the public to see him get into a quart bottle; but even such a feat was scarcely inferior to that of the noble marquis becoming an advocate of electoral independence. Then the Earl of Essex announced himself as a partial Free Trader in some minor articles, as lentils, Indian corn; and secondly, by the recent election for this county. When he read the account of the meeting for that purpose (at which he was not present) the long and malignant tissue of abuse uttered at that meeting, the saturnalia of diabolical images presented to the public, it forcibly recalled to his mind that passage in holy writ, where the arch-enemy of man is described as having come down to earth, with great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time. (Cheers.) He thought that passing events were daily declaring to these intemperate persons, in language as conspicuous as the handwriting upon the wall—

"O man, thy kingdom is departing from thee, And while it lasts is emptier than thy shade." (Loud cheers.) But the staple of all their speeches consisted solely of indiscriminate abuse, and unjustifiable imputations of the League, which he believed arose from an entire ignorance of the motives and feelings which animated the members of that great national body. (Cheers.) They required no defence from any one, being well able to defend themselves from these malignant aspersions; but he should be ashamed of himself if he failed to speak, from his own personal knowledge, to the great worth of, and high national objects supported by, the champions of that body. (Cheers.) He sincerely believed that more pure, honourable, or patriotic-minded men than the leading members of the Council of the League did not exist in this country. (Loud cheers.) He believed they were actuated by the conviction that the great principle of commercial freedom they sought to establish was calculated to produce immense advantages to all classes of the people of this country, and universal good to the world at large. (Cheers.) He had also witnessed the cordiality and good feeling prevalent between the working people and their employers, having lately been through many of the large factories and dwellings of the mechanics in the neighbourhood of Manchester. They had heard the most harrowing tales of the miseries and sufferings of the work-people in manufacturing districts, and he sincerely wished they could have witnessed what he had recently seen, and then such statements would be scouted for ever. He was requested by the masters to put any questions to the working people about their earnings, comforts, or privations, that might occur to him. More cheerful, happy, and contented people, he never saw. The earnings of the men, which he took from their own lips, were 16*s.* to 40*s.*; girls, 9*s.* to 11*s.*; women, 11*s.* to 18*s.*; then their dwellings were neat and comfortable; and he could safely say that the better class of mechanics enjoy more of the comforts, decencies, and elegancies of life than many of the small farmers of this country. (Cheers.) He assured them that he felt the degradation, upon comparing the different rate of wages paid by manufacturers, and that by agriculturists; and yet, Mr. Bigg stated at the late election, on seconding Mr. Halsey, that he supported the Corn Laws, in order to maintain wages and employment. (Cheers.) He would state that he had seen the extensive and admirably managed factories of Mr. H. Ashworth, of Turton; Mr. E. Ashworth, of Egerton; Messrs. Gardner and Barely, of Halliwell; Mr. J. Whitaker, of Ashton; and Messrs. Bright, of Rochdale; at the whole of which the machinery was beautiful; the most perfect order prevailed; and the appearance of the working people cheerful and happy. (Cheers and cries of Hear.) And he would state before that meeting, and before the world, that he felt indignant at the aspersions which had been thrown upon the manufacturers, and was proud to be able to call such men his countrymen. (Loud cheers.) These gentlemen had invited all persons to come and examine for themselves, and they would be happy to show them their mills, and to give them every information they required; and he recommended those present at that meeting to avail themselves of an early opportunity of doing so, and he felt assured they would derive a similar satisfaction to that he had done, and thus enable them to refute the ignorant calumnies asserted at various meetings, against this most valuable class of our countrymen. (Cheers.) Great attention was now paid to the moral welfare of the mechanics; schools, assembly rooms, and chapels, were springing up on all sides. The working people employed at Mr. J. Whitaker's factory, at Ashton, have subscribed (from their earnings 400l. towards the erection of a chapel at Ashton. (Cheers.) I trust the speakers upon this subject will feel it to be their duty to become acquainted with the truth, before they venture again to asperse and calumniate the members of the League. (Loud cheers.) He said, then, all honour to the citizens of Manchester, who have set their countrymen so glorious an example, and exerted themselves so nobly to establish the moral, industrial, and political independence of all classes of the community. (Loud cheers.) In conclusion, he begged to propose the best thanks of the meeting to their respected chairman, for his able and impartial conduct in the chair; seconded by Mr. Bontems, and carried by acclamation. Three cheers being given for Free Trade, the meeting quietly dispersed.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

THE Friends of FREE TRADE residing in the Northern or Midland Counties, desirous of purchasing Freeholds in any of the undermentioned Counties, are requested to apply to the Secretary of the League, Newall's Buildings Manchester.

North Lancashire	North Derbyshire
South Lancashire	South Derbyshire
North Cheshire	North Durham
West Riding of York	East Cumberland
South Stafford	West Cumberland
North Stafford	South Northumberland
South Cheshire

Each applicant is requested to give his name and residence at full length. By Order of the Council, JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds for Middlesex, East Surrey, West Kent, South Essex, East Sussex, and South Hants, are requested to send their applications, with name and address in full, to the League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, London.

By Order of the Council, JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

NORTH LANCASHIRE.

QUALIFY! QUALIFY! QUALIFY!

AS but few days now remain for Qualifying, so as to be on the next Register, the Friends of Free Trade are respectfully urged to Purchase Freeholds without delay.

Freehold Property, giving a Qualification, can be purchased, in North Lancashire, at from 30% to 35%, yielding about 7 per cent.

Every information may be had from Mr. Moorhouse, League Rooms, 4, Cheapside, Preston.

FREEHOLD QUALIFICATIONS FOR HERTS.

FREE TRADERS desirous of purchasing Freeholds in Hertfordshire are requested to send their applications to The League Offices, 67, Fleet-street, or to Mr. J. F. Bontems, Herts Registration Office, Hertford.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

While we congratulate our readers on the progress of the subscriptions to the Quarter of a Million Fund, and on the effect that they have obviously produced without and within the walls of Parliament, we must impress upon them the necessity of not relaxing in their exertions, now that the crisis of our great struggle has arrived. The victory is not yet won; all the resources, and all the energies of the League, will be required, before complete success can be achieved. A dissolution of Parliament appears to be imminent; and the battle of Free Trade will have to be fought inch by inch on the hustings. We are anxious to urge on our friends the importance, not only of subscribing freely, but of subscribing early. The manifestation of strength will often decide the course of the wavering and the doubtful; but, above all, our subscriptions are the best proof that we are thoroughly in earnest, and that we shall not cease to labour until every link of the fetters imposed on British industry is struck off, and every restriction on the supply of food to the people completely annihilated.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Jan. 21, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

	£	s.	d.
*Ashton, R. Hyde, near Manchester	200	0	0
*Henry, A & S, Co ditto	200	0	0
Pennington, John, R. & A. Hindley, nr Wigan	200	0	0
Walker, Wm, Southport	100	0	0
*Andrew, G & Son, Compstall, near Stockport	100	0	0
*Buckley, A & Son, Ashton-under-Lyne	100	0	0
*Buckley, A ditto	100	0	0
*Foster, G, Salden, Lancashire	100	0	0
Johnston, B, Park House, Broughton, Manchester	50	0	0
*Arrowsmith, P. R, Bolton	50	0	0
*Schofield, J. B, Littleborough, near Rochdale	50	0	0
*Watkins, W. B, Manchester	40	0	0
*Pettigrew, Messrs, 70, Fountain-street, ditto	40	0	0
*Whitworth, J & Co, Chorlton-st ditto	30	0	0
*Merox, H. J. & Co, Cross-street ditto	30	0	0
Du Fay, Messrs & Co, 32, Booth-st ditto	30	0	0
Wilkinson, James & Son, Stockport	20	0	0
Laird, Wm, Birkenhead, near Liverpool	20	0	0
Laird, Macgregor, ditto ditto	20	0	0
*Benson, R. jun, Fairfield, near Manchester	20	0	0
Potter, R. 3, Up Hamilton-ter, St John's Wood, London	20	0	0
Openshaw, J. E & R, 34, George-street, Manchester	20	0	0
*Harvey, Tyso, & Co ditto	40	0	0
*Atkinson, F. R, 3, Norfolk-street ditto	20	0	0
*Andrew, J. & M, Brookbottom, Saddleworth nr Morley	20	0	0
*Rawson, J, Ardwick, Manchester	20	0	0
*Clark, R & Son, 30, Spring Gardens, ditto	20	0	0
Ainsworth, G, Holland-street, Rochdale	20	0	0
*Lees H. & Sons, Ashton-under-Lyne	20	0	0
Pender, J. & Co, 29, Dale-street, Manchester	20	0	0
*Ainsworth, D, 13, George-street ditto	20	0	0
*Dodgshon, T. & Nephew, Swann-ct, ditto	20	0	0
*Haworth, Geo, Rochdale	20	0	0
*Wilson, James, Belhaven, Dunbar	20	0	0
*Standing, J, 28, Fountain-street, Manchester	10	0	0
Burton, J. & J, 6, Faulkner-street ditto	10	0	0
Fletcher, C, 3, Princess-street ditto	10	0	0
Lane, J. E, York-street ditto	10	0	0
*Dixon & Galloway ditto	10	0	0
*Pearson, J. & B, Marsden Square, ditto	10	0	0
Brotherton, J. M. P., Salford	10	0	0
*Goodfellow, Benj, Hyde, near Manchester	10	0	0
Andrew, J, Medlock Vale ditto	6	0	0
Yates, Aspell, & Fildes, Lower King-st ditto	6	0	0
Cummingham, W. A. 59, Morely-street ditto	5	0	0
Slater, N, Withington-street ditto	5	0	0
A Friend per Abm. Lees	5	0	0
Osborn, Geo, Newport Pagnel	5	0	0
Milne, J, York-place, Oxford-road, Manchester	5	0	0
Slove, A, Bank Parade, Salford	5	0	0
*Sidebotham, Wm, Hyde, near Manchester	5	0	0
*Horsley, Messrs & Co, 8, Charlotte-st, ditto	5	0	0
Williamson, Wm, Stockport	5	0	0
Higgin, J, Tenenill-street, Broughton, ditto	5	0	0
*Gordon, Admiral Henry, Bath	5	0	0
*Peacock, H. B. St Ann's-square, Manchester	4	0	0
*Gamble, J. C & Son, St Helens	4	0	0
*Cockshot, Wm & J Shipley, Yorkshire	3	0	0
*Spier, A, 96, Deansgate, Manchester	2	10	0
A Friend per A. Lees,	2	2	0
Batty, Wm, Andenshaw, near Manchester	2	0	0
Turtle, T, Regent-road ditto	2	0	0
*Kendal, Geo, 18, Market-street ditto	2	0	0
*Jewsbury, J. & F, King-street ditto	2	0	0
Dale, T, Angel-yard, Market-place, ditto	2	0	0
*Naylor, Wm, Smithydoor ditto	2	0	0
*Robson, Isaac, grocer, Huddersfield	2	0	0
Twallon, Wm, jun, Commercial-street, ditto	2	0	0
*Robinson, M. J, surgeon, Bank House, Bolton	2	0	0
*Saithwaite, T, 127, Chapel-street, Salford	2	0	0
*Hilton, C, solicitor, Wigan	2	0	0
Lowndes, James, 118, Deansgate, Manchester	2	0	0
*Hockton, J, 26, Oxford-road, ditto	1	10	0
Grundy, Wm, G, Summers-place, Broughton-lane, ditto	1	10	0
*Hargreaves, J, 2, London-road ditto	1	10	0
*Hully, Dr, St John street ditto	1	10	0
*Fox, Sam, 187, Deansgate ditto	1	10	0
*Preston, J, 2, Albert Bridge ditto	1	10	0
*Taylor, J, 3, Princess-street ditto	1	10	0
*Taylor, Sam, ditto	1	10	0
*Barker and Packey, 65, King-street ditto	1	10	0
*Webster, J, 3, Worcester-street, Hulme ditto	1	10	0
*Rogers, R, Oxford-street ditto	1	10	0
*Warburton, T, Broad-street, Pendleton ditto	1	10	0
*Hosstott, Wm, 44, Thomas-street ditto	1	10	0
*Tennant, H. B, Oth Barn, near ditto	1	10	0
*Twiss, James, 3, Oxford-road ditto	1	10	0
*Wolstencroft, G, Blakely Mill, near ditto	1	10	0
*Scholes, P, Stand-lane, near ditto	1	10	0
*Robinson, E, 23, Whitby Grove ditto	1	10	0
*Hampson, Benj, 22, Foyntain-street ditto	1	10	0
*Walker, A, Stand-lane, Pilkington, near ditto	1	10	0
*Leck, R, 12, Downham-street ditto	1	10	0
*Whittaker, J, Great Ancoot-street ditto	1	10	0
*Bland, J, 28, Bridge-street ditto	1	10	0
*Watts, J, 66, Deansgate ditto	1	10	0
*Mills, W. 18, Bridge-street ditto	1	10	0
*Wakefield, J, Blackfriars ditto	1	10	0
*Horton, R, Nantwich ditto	1	10	0
*Barge, G, 41, Grosvenor-street, Corn Market ditto	1	10	0
*Wood, T, 91, Millgate ditto	1	10	0
*Atherton, Wm, St Mary's Gate ditto	1	10	0
*Paterson, Mr, Market-place ditto	1	10	0
Hopkinson, T, Bury, Lancashire	1	10	0
*Allanson, J, Union-street, Bury, ditto	1	10	0
*Grundy, R. J, Bury, ditto	1	10	0
Robinson, Wm, Brookbottom, Bury, ditto	1	10	0
*Heap, J, Rev, Lydgate, near Huddersfield	1	10	0
Burdon, Benj, Westgate ditto	1	10	0
*Robinson, T, King street ditto	1	10	0
Wormald, J ditto	1	10	0
Rowley, T, MD, Lichfield ditto	1	10	0
Bond, E ditto	1	10	0
*Taylor, G, St George's-road, Little Bolton	1	10	0
*Cottrill, J, Market-street, Bolton	1	10	0
*Cottrill, Joseph, Fairfield, Buxton	1	10	0
*Darker, R, Co-tessey, near Norwich	1	10	0
Murriott, J, Wellingborough	1	10	0
*Ragland, J, Rev, Hindley, near Wigan	1	10	0
*Bates, J, Aores-lane, Staleybridge	1	10	0
Hall, R, per R Ashton	1	10	0
*Hamer, S, Newport-street, Great Bolton	1	10	0
*Stott, J, Edge-lane, Royton, near Oldham	1	10	0
Jackson, E, 7, Deighton-street, Bristol	1	10	0
A Working Man, London-road, Gloucester	1	10	0
Elliot, G, Bromsgrove	1	10	0
Bertie, D, Greengate, Salford	1	10	0
Broad, R, King street	1	10	0
*Coffee, Wm, 26, Hick-street, Newcastle-under-line	1	10	0
*Hall, J, Shipley, Yorkshire	1	10	0
*Whitehead, J, Mill Gate, in Smallbridge, Rochdale	1	10	0
*Smith, T. H, Hill-Marsden, near Burnley	1	10	0
Evans, L, Ashburton, Devon	1	10	0
Smith, J, Kearsy, NB	1	10	0
Horton, R, Nantwich	1	10	0
Pittfield, Chas, Great Moor-street, Bolton	1	10	0
Morris, D, Mill-street, Little Bolton	1	10	0
Taylor, Wm, Croft Head, Royton, near Oldham	1	10	0

Bleasdale, R, Derby-st, Bury, Lancashire	1	0	0
Cropper, Benj, Whitehead Bridge, ditto ditto	1	0	0
Jolley, T, Wallgate, Wigan	1	0	0
*Gaskell, N, Upholland, ditto	1	0	0
West, E, Amansham, Liverpool	0	10	0
"A Denbighshire Freeholder"	0	10	0
Robinson, J, Cross Church-street, Huddersfield	0	10	0
Sanderson, J, Dock-street ditto	0	5	0
A Friend, Salford	0	5	0
Edward, A, 10, Halford-place, Richmond, Surrey	0	5	0
A Friend, per ditto	0	2	6
Holmes, T, 68, Deansgate, Manchester	0	5	0
Jones, Wm, Smithy-door ditto	0	5	0
Brown, T, 20, Bridge-street ditto	0	3	0
Liverpool:—
*Heyworth, Lawrence, Rumford-place	100	0	0
*Rawdon, G and J, Old Hall	80	0	0
*Rathbone, Brothers, South Castle-street	60	0	0
*Thornley, T. M. P., Mount-street	60	0	0
*Mulleneux, James, Mount Vernon	50	0	0
*Walsley, Sir J, 12, Dale-street	50	0	0
*Ryder, James, Falkner-square	50	0	0
*Kitt, James, Messrs, Sons, and Co, Water-street	50	0	0
*Branker, James, Dorans-lane	50	0	0
*Mather, T, Glyn Abbot, Holywell	40	0	0
*Mather, J, 58, Mount Pleasant, Holywell	40	0	0
*Mather, R ditto ditto	40	0	0
*Mather, D ditto ditto	40	0	0
*Cooke, Isaac B, 1, Exchange Buildings	30	0	0
*Pontz, V, Duke-street, Edge Hill	20	0	0
*Wood, James D, 15, Old Hall-street	20	0	0
*Pennington, F, 22, Exchange Chambers	20	0	0
*Harvey, T, Hamilton Hall, Waverton	20	0	0
*Brocklebank, T, Rumford	20	0	0
*Heyworth, P. G and J, ditto	20	0	0
*Mather, Miss, 58, Mount Pleasant, Holywell	20	0	0
*Mather, Jane, Miss ditto ditto	20	0	0
*Sheil, R. and Co, Fenwick Chambers	20	0	0
*Johnson, R, King-street	20	0	0
*Stuart, W, Rumford-place	20	0	0
*Heap, Joseph, Matthew-street	20	0	0
*Hobson, Sam T, 65, Catherine-street	20	0	0
*McAndrew, Fletcher, and Co, 7, North John-street	20	0	0
*Irlam, T, Royal Bank Buildings	20	0	0
*Maxwell, W, 30, King-street	20	0	0
*Maxwell, Geo, ditto	20	0	0
*Carmichael, J, 10, Trafford Chambers	20	0	0
*Quirk, P, Court House, Bombr	20	0	0
*Lane, E, 7, Chapel Walks	10	10	0
*Thornley, Sam, 22, Claremont-street	10	0	0
*Kennedy, P, 7, Everton-road	10	0	0
*Johnson, Sam, King-street	10	0	0
*Heap, J, Matthew-street	10	0	0
*Doshud, J, Atherton Buildings	10	0	0
*Schwabe, G, 16, Exchange Buildings	10	0	0
*Sharpe, R. and Son, 18, Temple-court	10	0	0
*Reynolds, W. M. D., Allerton	10	0	0
*Mulleneux, J. W, 9, Moss-street	10	0	0
*Eyre, Evans, 36, Chapel-street	10	0	0
*Brocklebank, Ralph, Rumford	10	0	0
*Martindale, H, Lyceum-place	10	0	0
*Muir, J, 8, Leveson-street	8	0	0
*King, Joseph, and Sons, Exchange Buildings	6	0	0
*Evans, E, and Co, 65, Church-street	5	5	0
*Dod, Wm, 15, Everton-crescent	5	0	0
*Knrk, A, Bootle	5	0	0
*Bright, R, 72, Bole-street	5	0	0
*Bolton, T, Great George-street	5	0	0
*Taylor, Brothers, 16, Temple-court	5	0	0
*Matthews, Mrs, Waverin	5	0	0
*McClellan and Lee, 5, Princes-street	5	0	0
*Cannon, D, 52, South Castle-street	5	0	0
*Seward, Sam, 42, Upper Stanhope-street	5	0	0
*Ward, S. P, Church-street, Woodside	4	0	0
*Winn, Wm, Springfield House, Bootle	2	2	0
*West, Chas E, 13, Whitechapel	2	2	0
*Cliff, Wm, jun, Exchange Chambers	2	0	0
*Rathbone, R. R, Woodcroft	2	0	0
*McMurdoo, Jas, Sefton-street	2	0	0
*Robberds, Rev J, 2, High Park-street	2	0	0
*Waylie, R, 2, India Bridge	2	0	0
*Crossley, R, 40, Sonning-road	2	0	0
*Jones, M, 140, Mill street	2	0	0
*Sharp, Alex, 119, Richmond-row	2	0	0
*Welch, E. T, 50, Paradise-street	1	1	0
*Banbury, J, 18, Park-lane	1	1	0
*Jones, J, 29, St Domingo Road	1	1	0
*Drummond, Wm, 38, Stanley-street	1	1	0
*Hooker, Wm, 65, Dale-street	1	1	0
*Rathbone, B, Woodcroft	1	1	0
*Bleazard, R, Boole Brewery	1	1	0
*G, West Derby	1	1	0
*Sergeeson, J, Roe-street	1	1	0
*Butler, James, 62, Dale-street	1	1	0
*Estlin, T. R, 188, Great Howard-street	1	1	0
*Hunt, Geo, 31, Irvine-street, Edge Hill	1	1	0
*Cortier, Wm, 90, Chatham-place	1	1	0
*Godber, Geo, 10, South Castle-street	1	1	0
*Slack and Howden, 87, Park-lane	1	1	0
*Dodgson, J, 25, Hanover-street	1	1	0
*C. H. D. per J. Dodgson	1	1	0
*Barlow, R, 14, Devon-street	1	1	0
*Fortune, J, 38, Great George-street	1	1	0
*Parley, T, 108, London-road	1	1	0
*Birkett, J and G, 213, Great Howard-st	1	1	0
*Francis, Geo, 100, St James-street	1	1	0
*Byron, F. G, Pythian-street	1	1	0
*Myers, J, 166, Dale-street	1	1	0
*Matthews, Edw, 14, Edgware	1	1	0
*McMuldrow, P, 5, Himter	1	1	0
*Lane, J, Vauxhall-road	1	1	0
*Harris, T, 2, Stanhope-street	1	1	0
*Bradburn, J, 91, Bradburn-street	1	1	0
Tate, C. A, 17, Great George-place	0	13	0
McAllister, T, 37, Knight-street	0	10	6
Roberts, T, 87, Dale-street	0	10	6
Copley, J, 36, Addington-street	0	10	0
Plant, G. H, 31, Chapel Walks	0	10	0
A Friend, per J. C. B.	0	10	0
Gamp, Mrs	0	10	0
Harris, Mrs	0	10	0
Fisher, T, 157, Dale-street	0	8	0
Rigg, J, Ranehagh-place	0	8	0
Stephenson, James, Paddington-place, Edge Hill	0	5	3
Tinson, Wm, 77, Hunter-place	0	5	3
Hindford, T, 16, Cheapside	0	5	3
Evans, E, and Co, 65, Church-street	0	5	5
Morris, C. J, 25, Richmond-row	0	5	5
A Friend	0	5	0
Lettman, J, 8, Tirbock-street	0	5	0
Mundy, E, 132, Mount Pleasant	0	5	0
Padmore, J, 19, Egerton-place	0	5	0
J. H.	0	5	0
Carter, T, 4, Temple Boss	0	5	0
Shoon, Alex, 27, Hunter-street	0	5	0
Field, Chas, 61, Upper Hill-street	0	4	0
Smeathorn, Wm, 40, South Castle-street	0	2	4
Wall, Wm, Fairclough-street	0	3	0
Archdeacon, Geo, 10, Sawney-pope-street	0	2	6
Small Sums	0	2	0
Sayer, R. R. R. N.	1	0	0
Griffiths, J, Crow Inn	0	5	0
Jones, E, baker	0	5	0
Collins, Sam, Burford	0	5	0
Wade, R, saddler	0	5	0
Broom, Wm, butcher	0	2	6
Green, E, watchmaker	0	2	6
Jenkins, T, glazier	0	2	6
Pound, B, saddler	0	2	6
Page, J, saddler	0	2	6
Small Sums	0	2	0
Tenbury, Worcester-shire.

Harrison, Wm	5	0	0	*Beardmore, G A, Pilchergate, Nottingham	1	0	0
*Price, Wm, Park-row	2	2	0	*Jennison, Levi, Hove, near Battle	1	0	0
*Hay, Wm, Park-square	1	1	0	*Smith, James, Brough-street, Woodbridge	1	0	0
*Tilney, N, West-street	1	1	0	Walton, E, Woolstapler, Faversham	1	0	0
*Pool, L, Sweet-street, Holbeck, near	1	1	0	*Pigg, Joseph, Colegate, Norwich	1	0	0
*Walker, Mr, innkeeper, Wellington-st.	1	1	0	Donaldson, A C, manufacturer, Buckie, N.B.	1	0	0
*Harrison, H, Keathley-lane, Hunslet	1	1	0	*Jany, 19, Gilterson, James, Carlisle	1	0	0
*Mann, A, Cloth Hall-street	1	1	0	*Jinks, R, Station, Northamptonshire	1	0	0
*Hutton, Sam, Meadow-lane	1	1	0	*Gadsby, Mr, Post Office, Brigstock, ditto	1	0	0
*Glew, Matthew, Marshall-street	1	1	0	Braines, Mr, shoe factor, Kettering, ditto	1	0	0
*Wharton, J, Park-lane	1	1	0	*Pugh, Wm, Hay, Breconshire	1	0	0
*Sanderson, H S, Rose and Crown	1	1	0	*Peace, Sam, Medhurst-street, Sheffield	1	0	0
*Walker, J, Millshaw Beeston, near	1	1	0	*Fowler, J D, Haslingden, near Manchester	1	0	0
*Richardson, Wm, Roundhey-road, near	1	1	0	*Temperley, J P, Newport-place, Bolton	1	0	0
*Leeds.				*Harrison, J P, Carlisle	1	0	0
*Alderson, Union Place, Holbeck, near	1	0	0	*Ralph, Geo, draper, Scotch-street, ditto	1	0	0
*Galloway, T, Boor-lane	1	0	0	*Heron, R and Co, 5, Pottery, Kirkcaldy	1	0	0
*Watson, J, Holbeck Lodge, Holbeck	1	0	0	*Gilbert, Thomas, Bank, Shifnal	1	0	0
*Parker, E, Bowling Green, ditto	0	10	0	*Vallack, J, solicitor, Derby	1	0	0
*Palfreman, G, Hardwick-yd, Briggate	0	10	0	*Renton, Rev H, Secession Manse, Kelso	1	0	0
*Harrison, Geo, ditto	0	5	0	*Archer, Wm, Bridgend, Perth	1	0	0
*Walker, J, Meadow-lane, Briggate	0	2	6	*Darley, Chas E, Coalbrookdale	1	0	0
Russell, G, Charlotte-st, Meadow-lane	0	2	6	*Sawers, Simeon, Dunbar	1	0	0
*Pearson, T, Holbeck, near	0	2	6	*Tosh, R, Dock-street, Dundee	1	0	0
*Rhode, T, ditto	0	2	6	*Haigh, T, grocer, Westgate, Wakefield	1	0	0
*Oliver, G, ditto	0	2	6	*Hooley, J, Chestergate, Macclesfield	1	0	0
*Evley, J, ditto	0	2	6	*Workmen of Mr T Thredfall, Bingley, Nottingham	1	0	0
*Barnclough, T, ditto	0	2	6	Four Workmen in the Employ of Messrs S Courtald & Co., crape manufacturers, Braintree, Essex	1	0	0
*Littlewood, Wm, ditto	0	2	6	Harbord, R C, 21, Ocean-place, Hull	1	0	0
*Parker, Wm, ditto	0	2	0	Denton, Samuel, Halifax	1	0	0
Broughton, M A, ditto	0	2	0	Greaves, H, Smithy Stake, ditto	1	0	0
*Oakes, B, and Sons, manufacturers, Storr's Mill	4	0	0	*Ward, John, Park-lane, Madeley, Salop	1	0	0
*Mitchell, J, and Son, manufacturer	3	0	0	*Paine, J, farmer, St Neot's, Huntingdonshire	1	0	0
*Younger, J, Mitchell, ditto	2	0	0	*Forsyth, J & T, Perth	1	0	0
*Smith, James, M.D.	1	0	0	*Coulthard, J, Croft House, Brampton, Cumberland	1	0	0
*Mitchell, J, sen, manufacturer	1	0	0	*Simpson, A, Bridge-street, Derby	1	0	0
*Glover, J, and Sons, ditto	1	0	0	*Martin, J, Chamberlain, Greenock	1	0	0
*Mitchell, J, jun, ditto	1	0	0	*Paterson, R, Galashiels	1	0	0
*Speight, J, ditto	1	0	0	*Molyneux, John, Milton, Northwich	1	0	0
*Earnshaw, Jno, mill owner	1	0	0	*Shirreff, P, Langewydd, Bridgend, Glamorganshire	1	0	0
*Mitchell, T, sen, manufacturer	1	0	0	*Storr, J, Oustwick Roos, Hull	1	0	0
*Wilby, J, ditto	1	0	0	*Warwick, R, Wyddington, Cheltenham	1	0	0
*Smith, J and D	1	0	0	Watt, John H, Irvine	1	0	0
*Phillip, T, sen, mill owner	1	0	0	Ogle, Rev S, Dorfield Rectory, Barnsley	1	0	0
*Wilby, R, manufacturer, Green	1	0	0	Payne, Philip, Aylesbury	1	0	0
Ossett, near Wakefield.				*Young, T, Bramley Farm, East Acton, Middlesex	1	0	0
*Archer, A, jun, manufacturer	1	0	0	*Acton, R J, Acton, ditto	1	0	0
*Harrap, Geo, ditto	1	0	0	Steel, Joseph, grocer, Mordlake, Surrey	1	0	0
*Radley, Geo, ditto	1	0	0	*Moore, G, St James's Cottage, Northampton	1	0	0
*Ellis, David, sen, ditto	1	0	0	*Eden, Joel, St Mary-street, ditto	1	0	0
*Ellis, J, sen, ditto	1	0	0	*Angas, J & J W, Hays, near Bromley	1	0	0
*Ellis, S, sen, ditto	1	0	0	Woodbridge, John, 19, Bath-place, New-road	1	0	0
*Ellis, S, jun, ditto	1	0	0	A B, Bishops-gate-street	1	0	0
*Emmerson, J, ditto	1	0	0	*Preston, W T, 2, Figue-street, Temple	1	0	0
*Harrap, Wm, ditto	1	0	0	*Seymour, Wm, 24, Lime-street	1	0	0
*Gunsion, B, ditto	1	0	0	1323, Register, East Surrey	1	0	0
*Mitchell, T, jun, ditto	1	0	0	Louis, Wm J, 27, Gerard-street, Soho-square	1	0	0
*Mitchell, J, jun, ditto	1	0	0	*Kendall, Edw, 105, Pall Mall	1	0	0
*Mitchell, F, ditto	1	0	0	Harper, Mr, 20, Cold Bath Square	1	0	0
*Lawrence, J, ditto	1	0	0	*Vieuzeux, T, 62, George-street, Euston-square	1	0	0
*Gartside, J and W, dyers	1	0	0	*Taylor, P A, jun, 8, Powis-place, Queen-square	1	0	0
*Mitchell, Geo, manufacturer	1	0	0	*Allen, Wm, 62, Warren-street	1	0	0
*Mitchell, T, Tinner	1	0	0	*Revell, Major, 2, Albert-terrace, Paddington	1	0	0
*Cooper, E A	5	0	0	Barker, J, 42, Wynate-street, Goswell-road	1	0	0
*Henderson	3	0	0	*Birch, W J, 20, Park-road, Regent's Park	1	0	0
*Boby, J W	1	0	0	*Char-ton, Geo, 21, Beaufoy-terrace, Edgware-road	1	0	0
*Hanson, C A	1	0	0	*Jones, Wm, 242, Wapping	1	0	0
*Vaughan, W	1	0	0	*Brooks, J, Grove-lane, Camberwell	1	0	0
*Cockrane, J	1	0	0	*Fairfoot, H S, 25, Lloyd-square	1	0	0
*Clarke, Chas	1	0	0	*Wright, E, 8, Grove-road, St John's Wood	1	0	0
*Griffiths, J	1	0	0	*Parr, Henry, 3, East-street, Greenwich	1	0	0
*Fox, Wm	1	0	0	*Sykes, C & Sons, Lindley, near	10	0	0
*Taylor, R	1	0	0	*Brook, John, Marsh, near	5	0	0
*Eckstein, G P	1	0	0	*Haigh, Thomas, Roys Hall, near	5	0	0
*Groom, T	1	0	0	Waterhouse, E J W, Lindley, near	5	0	0
*Tandy, W	1	0	0	*Robson, Isaac, grocer	2	0	0
*Neirson, H and T	1	0	0	*Swallow, Wm, jun, Commercial-street	2	0	0
Pennyfeather, James	0	10	0	Wilson, John, jun	1	0	0
Strong, J	0	5	0	*Lord, Wm	1	0	0
Remmitt, W H	0	5	0	*Sykes, Wm, sen	1	0	0
Smith, J	0	5	0	*Hall, John	1	0	0
Brookhouse, J	0	3	0	*Hall, A	1	0	0
Liddell, Geo	0	2	6	*Burdon, Benj, Westgate	1	0	0
*Houghton, P A	1	0	0	*Robson, T, King street	1	0	0
*Fogg, Chas	1	0	0	*Wormald, John, saddler, King-street	1	0	0
Procter, Sam, Eccles-st.	1	0	0	*Jossop, Joseph, Lepton	1	0	0
*Bowron, J	1	0	0	*Cliffe, Joseph, Bay Hall	1	0	0
*Mercer, Wm	1	0	0	Robinson, T, Cross Church-street	0	13	0
*Smith, John, writer	2	2	0	Sanderson, T, Dock-street	0	5	0
Dobbie, Wm	1	1	0	Jessop, T, Lepton	0	4	0
*Wyse, Wm	1	1	0	*Varvill, M, sen, Micklegate	1	0	0
Wyse, James	1	1	0	*Varvill, Summers, Ebor Works	1	0	0
*Gartshore, J	1	1	0	*Calvert, E	1	0	0
*Adam, R	1	1	0	*Cropper, Wm, Dringhouse, near	1	0	0
Gillespie, Wm	1	1	0	*Epworth, Chas, Precinctors Court	1	0	0
*Hosie, James	1	0	0	*Buchanan, A, Blairbeth, near	2	0	0
*Seymour, W D, 32, Fenchurch-street	10	0	0	*McKindley, Neil, St Rollox	1	0	0
*Howard, Luke, Bruce Grove, Tottenham	10	0	0	*Faulds, R, jun, Townhead	1	0	0
*Wilkinson, Thomas, Alnmothy, by Alnwick	5	0	0	*Finlay, J, 16, Dixon-street	1	0	0
*Chapman, Rev E, Guildford	5	0	0	*Ross, A, 110, George-street	1	0	0
*Miller, R, 34, Tower-street, Tower Hill	5	0	0	McLean, Wm, St Rollox Works	1	0	0
*A Friend to the Agricultural Labourer	5	0	0	*Boyd, C & Son, 72, Clyde-st, Anderston	1	0	0
*Shorter, Wm, Longthorpe Lodge, Hammersmith	5	0	0	*Stewart, J, M D, 4, Albany-street	1	0	0
*Holt, R L, 55, Old Broad-street	5	0	0	*Berry, L, 3, Greenside-row	1	0	0
*Stuart, Wm, 17, Cateaton-street	5	0	0	*Rennie, James, 51, Hanover-street	1	0	0
Hollier, R, Winchester-street	2	2	0	*D J R	1	0	0
Edwards, Ann, Beddington Corner	2	2	0	*Smith, J L, 1, Antiqua-street	1	0	0
*Park, Wm, Seafeld, near Greenock	2	2	0	*Willis, G W, 42, Rankellor-street	1	0	0
*Purchase, Wm, Landport, Portsmouth	2	2	0	*Tod, James B, 5, Fife-place	1	0	0
*Wimble, John, Court House Street, Hastings	1	10	0	*"The Son of a Fine Merchant"	1	0	0
*Brewster, J, 92, East-street, Manchester-square	1	10	0	*McKinley, F, 11, Leith-street	1	0	0
*"The Workmen of East Mill," Brechin, per A L Forsyth	1	7	6	*Cunliffe, R, 50, Great King-street	1	0	0
Thatcher, R T, Albion Coffee-house, 13, John-st, Oxford-st	1	1	0	*Robertson, Wm, Summerhall Brewery	1	0	0
Richards, J, Maize Hill, Greenwich	1	1	0	*A Friend, No. 17	1	0	0
Devonporte, J, 28, Wood-street, City	1	1	0	*Hargreaves, J, Wotley, near	1	0	0
*Anderson, Chas, 130, Ch'apside	1	1	0	A Clergyman	1	0	0
*White, G P, 39, Vauxhall Bridge-road	1	1	0	*Vickers, J, Tuton Hill, Holbeck, near	1	0	0
*H P	1	1	0	*Sandford, Wm, Green Mount-ter, ditto	1	0	0
*Murray, D, 7, Hays-place, St Marylebone	1	1	0	*Robinson, Wm, Neville-street	1	0	0
*Ross, Thomas, 5, Brunswick-place, Brixton Hill	1	1	0	*Wass, W, 14, Marlborough-street	1	0	0
*Long, John, Orms Green, Harrow Road	1	1	0	*Mowbray, Wm, Navigation-street	1	0	0
*Ruston, Wm, Upper Tulse Hill, Camberwell	1	1	0	*Collins, Thomas, Belgrave Gate	1	0	0
*Gregory, Chas, 212, Reg nt-street	1	1	0	*Clephan, E, at Messrs Paget & Kirly	1	0	0
*Hunter, Alex, Dunmurry, near Lisburne, Ireland	1	1	0	*Westfall, S C	1	0	0
*Ashford, Wm, Birmingham	1	1	0	*Blakesley, John, Free-lane	1	0	0
*Holditch, Benj, Lynn	1	1	0	*Palmer, R	1	0	0
*Wrightson, R, High-street, Sunderland	1	1	0	Bell, Chas, baker, Station, Northamptonshire	0	10	0
*Pratt, Thomas, Union-street, ditto	1	1	0	Cazaly, J, 43, Tottenham-court-road	0	10	0
*Butlin, Eliz, George Inn, Luton	1	1	0	Friend	0	5	0
*Price, Chas, Salford, Warwick	1	1	0	Moss, T, Gainsford-terrace, Islington	0	5	0
*Bell, Chris, Whitefriargate, Hull	1	1	0	Harrison, R L, 89, High-street, Portland Town	0	5	0
*Emery, James, surgeon, King-street, South Shields	1	1	0	Harvey, Wm, 8, Castle-street, Falcon square	0	5	0
*Walker, Geo, 2, Kirkgate, Leith	1	1	0	Banks, Mr, George Inn, Weldon	0	5	0
*Sefton, R, Post Vale Wharf, Longport	1	1	0	Bradshaw, Mr, butcher, Corby	0	5	0
*Hodgson, R W, Quay, Newcastle-on-Tyne	1	1	0	Edwards, John, 29, Frederick-street, Hampstead-road	0	4	0
*Nelson, H, Frederick-street, ditto	1	1	0	Kimber, Wm, 127, St John-street, Smithfield	0	3	0
Dann, Thomas, Reigate	1	1	0	Marriot, Joseph, 5, John-street, London-fields, Hackney	0	2	6
*Mansell, John, Bolton-street, Bury, Lancashire	1	1	0	Cook, Wm, 2, Redcross-square, Cripplegate	0	2	6
*Lathwaite, J, ditto	1	1	0	V C M	0	2	6
*Joyner, H S, John, Grays, Essex	1	1	0	Fincham, John, 40, Crescent-street, Euston-square	0	2	6
*Welch, A, Luton, Beds	1	1	0	Parry, G F, 15, London-road	0	2	6
*Brown, R M, Crown-mill, near Walingford	1	1	0
*Hughes, R, Wycomb, Bucks	1	1	0
*Johnson, J W, Troy, Londonderry	1	1	0
*Meikle, David, Merchant, Tarrillon	1	1	0
*Wilde, Wm, Butte-street, Luton	1	1	0
*Chandler, R E, Boham Arms Inn, Hastings	1	1	0
*Grubb, Geo, Ball Inn, Duke-street, Park, Sheffield	1	1	0
*Duke, Geo, Gainsby Fold, Battle	1	1	0
*Bennett, M, Greenfield Paper Mill, Holywell, Flintshire	1	1	0
*Bartlett, T, Week-street, Maidstone	1	1	0

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

W. Paulton, Esq., 67, The Strand.
George Thompson, Esq., 6, Waterloo place.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Highgate house.
Wm. Leaver, Esq., 5, Park-street, Islington.
Samuel Harrison, Esq., 45, Queens-road, Regent-water.
Josh. Lacey, Esq., 26, Chancery-lane.
Wm. Wilson, Esq., 122, Long-lane, Bermondsey.
R. G. Welford, Esq., barrister at law, 6, Chancery-lane.
Richard Smith, Esq., East Temple Chambers.
Richard Taylor, Esq., F.R.S., 10, Red Lion-court.
Dr. James Cardie, Hackney.
John Gadsby, Esq., Bouverie street, Fleet-street.
A. L. Saul, Esq., 67, Fleet-street.
H. Hull, Esq., Exbridge.
Rich. Bunnet, Esq., Covent Garden.
Frederick Farrand, Esq., Priory Villa, Peckham.
Joseph Matson, Esq., Matson's-terrace, Hackney.

In consequence of earnest and repeated applications made to some of the gentlemen whose names appear in the above directory, an Investment Association is about to be formed.

Its object will be principally to afford to persons of limited means facilities for purchasing Freeholds, &c.

In addition, it will serve all the purposes of a general Investment Society, and will be established on the most approved plan. Prospective members may be obtained on application to Mr. J. V. Vinyers, Esq., 26, Chancery-lane, or at the Offices of the Association, East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

A PUBLIC MEETING of this Association will be held on Thursday Evening next, the 24th inst., at the London Mechanics' Institution, Southampton-buildings, Holborn, when the principles of the society will be explained, and addresses delivered by

GEORGE THOMPSON, Esq.,

and

COL. T. PERRONET THOMPSON.

The Chair to be taken at seven o'clock precisely.

Admission without ticket. A few reserved seats for ladies, for which tickets will be required, to be obtained at East Temple Chambers, Whitefriars-street, Fleet-street.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, January 24, 1846.

We have published, in a Supplement, the speeches of Lord F. Egerton, Sir Robert Peel, and Lord John Russell, delivered during the debate on the Address,—a debate that is likely to make the first night of this session one of the most memorable in the annals of England. But, gratified as all Free Traders must be by the frank and honourable acknowledgement of the soundness of their principles, volunteered by the Premier, and by his manly declaration of a change of opinion upon the Corn Laws, it would be dangerous for them to fold their arms and remit their exertion in assured certainty of approaching triumph. The tug of war has yet to come; there were mutterings from the back benches in the lower House; there were blustering threats from the corresponding locality in the upper, which indicate that monopoly has not abandoned all intentions of resistance—perhaps not all hopes of success. Sir Robert Peel's measure is not yet before the country, and we cannot therefore determine whether all its details will be consistent with its professed principles. Even supposing it to be as perfect as the most enthusiastic hope, there can be no doubt that attempts at compromise, and at a frittering away of its efficiency by pretended amendments, will be made during its progress through Parliament. Fresh vigilance and renewed activity are necessary to secure the full measure of our just rights. The harvest is most exposed to danger when the ears are fast ripening—the ship is in most peril when land is declared to be in sight—the great struggle of the race is when the runners come near the goal—and the interests of the nation are exposed to most hazard when a great question is about to be settled. Sir Robert Peel has effectually demolished the fallacies so often repeated at agricultural meetings, and has hurled back defiance to the menaces of disappointed protectionists, but he has not yet brought into issue the great question of his commercial policy—and, what is more important

Printed at the Whitefriars Printing-office, Bouverie-street, in the precinct of Whitefriars, in the City of London, by JOHN GADSBY, printer, of Number 7, Ridgmount-place, Hampstead-road, in the County of Middlesex, and also of Number 4, Fairfield-place, Cheetham-hill-road, in the parish of Manchester, in the county of Lancaster. and published at Number

THE LEAGUE.

No. 122.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1846.

[GRATIS.]

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The great national importance of the debate on the address has induced us, at the last hour, to determine on publishing a supplement, containing full reports of the speeches of Lord Francis Egerton, Sir Robert Peel, and Lord John Russell. Independent of their merits, the disclosures they make, and the principles they enunciate, must secure them a permanent place as historical documents in the annals of the country. Even if we had time and space at our command, the explicitness of the speeches would preclude the necessity of comment; there is no need of recommending them to attentive perusal, but we hope that our readers will preserve them for future reference.

THE ADDRESS.

Lord F. EGERTON said,—In rising, Sir, on this occasion to address the House, for the purpose of proposing an Address to her Majesty in reply to the speech we have just heard read, it is my misfortune that I cannot prefer the same grounds for asking your indulgence which many hon. gentlemen who have undertaken a similar duty have had in their power to plead. A reference to Hansard, and this is the only reference I intend to make to that authority in the course of my observations, testifies, I regret to say, to the fact, that precisely 20 years have elapsed since, under the auspices of Mr. Canning, I stood in a similar situation to that I now occupy. I can truly say, however, that the intervening years have taught me any other Parliamentary lesson rather than that of confidence in my own discretion, or reliance on any powers I possess, as entitling me to claim the indulgence or command the sympathies of this House. I hope, therefore, that on other grounds—on the ground of the importance of the juncture which calls us together, of the difficulty which even the masters of debate in this place must feel in rising to a level with the importance of these circumstances, the House will extend to me that consideration and indulgence which, in 1826, I perhaps had a better claim to ask, but certainly had no greater need to receive. (Hear, hear.) I think it will be for the convenience of the House, that, in the brief review it will be my duty to take of the topics adverted to in her Majesty's Speech, I should, in the first place, shortly refer to the earlier topics of that speech, which I have little apprehension will be regarded with feelings other than those of unanimous concurrence. I have little apprehension that this House, or the country at large, will receive with any other feeling than that of unanimous concurrence and satisfaction, the observations in her Majesty's Speech as to the state of our relations with France. (Hear, hear.) Believing, as I do, that the peace and happiness of Europe, and, more than that—the progress of civilisation and good government throughout the world, depends upon no single circumstance which human sagacity could conceive more directly than on the continuance of amicable relations between those two countries which, I am proud to think, are heading the march of civilisation—believing that any coldness in those relations would chill and retard, and that any positive rupture would throw that progress back in its course, I receive with unalloyed satisfaction that paragraph in her Majesty's speech to which I now allude. (Cheers.) Rejoicing as I do in such a guarantee for the peace and happiness of the world, I must undoubtedly look with proportionate distress and anxiety to any other quarter with respect to which I find myself compelled to speak with less entire confidence as to the maintenance of peaceful relations. I cannot fail to perceive, with deep anxiety and regret the possibility that England may be called upon to maintain her honour, and to assert her right to protect her loyal subjects in every part of the world, however distant, by any other arguments than those of patient, temperate, and friendly discussion. But most especially must I regret the possibility that any difference or difficulty should exist between ourselves and those with whom a community of blood and language forms an union not less binding than those strong ties of mutual requirements and friendly intercourse which have grown up between us to the advantage of both (cheers), and which the results of human skill and invention have so largely, in later years, facilitated and matured. (Renewed cheers.) My only consolation is, that I believe neither the present Government, nor any Government which in the course of political events could hold its place in the councils of this country, could look at any such possible differences with other feelings than an ardent desire to maintain by every means consistent with the honour and the just rights of both nations the most cordial terms of amity and friendship with that great confederation, the United States. (Loud cheers.) Apart from all these considerations, and utterly independent of them, there is no portion of her Majesty's Speech that will, I am convinced, receive more deliberate concurrence on your part than that which suggests for the consideration of this House some extension of our means of national defence. (Hear, hear, hear.) On this subject I will only say for myself individually, that if all allusion to the necessity of that extension had been omitted from the speech, I should have doubted the wisdom and precaution of those who had advised such a course. I pass, however, to other topics which engross more deeply public attention, and with respect to which I should be insincere in saying that I anticipated they would be regarded in this House with the same unanimity which will, I trust, be manifested with reference to those subjects to which I have just referred. I cannot dissemble to myself that I am addressing the House at a juncture when, at the instance of the responsible advisers of the Crown, topics of more than ordinary magnitude, and of more than temporary interest, are suggested for its future and early consideration. I cannot doubt that the intent and bearing of that invitation, coming, as it does, upon a train of political events fresh in the recollection of hon. members, and consequent on those events,—I cannot doubt that that invitation to consider the whole state of those laws which have hitherto regulated the importation of various foreign commodities into this country, will be received without surprise by this House or the country, but with an interest which no length of expectation could have diminished. If I did not concur in the propriety and necessity of that invitation, I could not consistently have undertaken the duty I am now endeavouring to discharge. (Cheers.) [We may here observe that the frequent cheers with which the noble lord's observations on this question were received proceeded almost exclusively from the opposition benches.] That concurrence is, on my own part, unqualified. (Renewed cheers.) But if I had been unable to appear in the situation I now occupy,—if my opinions had been such as would have prevented me from undertaking this office, still I should have hesitated before I incurred the responsibility of pronouncing, by any vote of mine in this House, that those subjects did not deserve that serious and early consideration to which the House is invited in her Majesty's Speech. I have heard many royal speeches read, Sir, by yourself and your predecessors in that chair, and I have heard many addresses in reply moved and discussed in this House, but certainly it was never my fortune to hear any speech which was altogether palatable to all parties in this House. I have, however, frequently seen all parties in the House agree with unanimity to the address in reply to the royal Speech, by the uniform assertion of the principle that no man giving his assent to the address on such an occasion was thereby bound to any subsequent course of action. I hold that even the mover of the address is not more restricted or fettered than any other hon. members as to his future course of action in this House with respect to any questions that may be propounded for its consideration. Upon that principle I might, upon this occasion, deal largely in generalities; but, if the House does not consider it a departure from the strict discharge of the functions I have undertaken, I am anxious to take this opportunity of avowing that, with respect to the important subject so soon to be brought under the consideration of the House, my individual opinions have undergone a considerable change. (Loud cheering.) I am aware my opinions have not that influence or authority with others which would entitle me to inflict upon the House a long explanation or defence of any change or modification which has taken place in them. Still, I feel nothing but that insignificance could shelter those opinions from the inquiry which public opinion claims a right to institute as to the motives of those who, with regard to any matters of great public concern, avow a change in their views and sentiments; and I, for one, should be sorry, even on this occasion, to shrink in any respect from that investigation. (Cheers.) This much, at least, I will say, that no defence of mine would rest upon the example of others, or on any change or modification of opinions which may have been at any former period avowed by those whose eminence in public estimation makes their reputation a matter of consequence to the country at large, while mine is only of importance to myself. The vindication of any modification my opinions have undergone should rest alone upon my observation of events, and a consideration of the state and prospects of the country. (Hear, and cheers.) I have feared and hesitated to interfere with that system of restriction upon imports which I found interwoven with the whole state of our commercial relations. I have, on the best consideration I could give to the state and interests of the country, arrived at the conclusion that the time has arrived when you should take the opportunity—and take it now (cheers)—to reconsider the whole system of those laws which regulate our commercial intercourse (hear, and cheers), with a view of ultimately departing from a principle you have hitherto maintained—a principle which endeavours, by the exclusion, or prohibition, or restrictive admission of foreign commodities, to encourage your home manufacture. (Cheers.) When I use the term "home manufacture," let me not be misunderstood. I consider the products of the earth, as prepared for the food of man, as much a manufacture as any other. (Renewed cheers.) I regard the earth as a machine, and the largest landowners in this country as master manufacturers, and nothing else. (Hear, hear.) Holding these views, I consider that, whether you apply the principle of protection to your system of government, or whether you withhold it, it should be applied or withheld impartially (Cries of hear, hear, and cheers) with regard to all the various departments of the industry of the country. (Renewed cries of hear, hear.) It is my hope and belief, without being acquainted with the details of the measures which may be proposed to Parliament by her Majesty's Government, that when they are propounded to the House I may be able to give them my support. I hope they will be such as, in dealing with this important question, will be compatible with the broad principles I have laid down (hear, hear); and that they will embrace, with a comprehensive and statesmanlike grasp, the various departments of the industry of the country which could come within the terms of my proposition. I have, I freely acknowledge, opposed the proposition of the noble lord (J. Russell) opposite for a fixed duty on the importation of corn, when that measure was intended, as I believed, to be permanently embodied in the statute-book. I have now arrived at the conclusion that restrictions, permanently applied to the introduction of foreign commodities, should no longer be adopted by the Legislature of this country. (Loud cheers.) When the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) brought forward his proposition, I expressed the opinion, which I still maintain, that if you are to apply restrictions to the importation of foreign corn with the object of fixing a certain standard of remuneration for the British cultivator, or creating that steadiness of price which has been anticipated from such legislation, the "sliding scale," as it is called, is the better machinery for that purpose. I have seen reason, as I have already stated, to change my opinions on the policy of these restrictive laws, but I have not departed from the opinion I have always entertained as to the comparative advantage of a fixed duty and the sliding scale. You have felt your way largely in this matter, with respect to the articles of wool, cattle, and timber. (Hear, hear.) I am not going, on this occasion, to trouble the House with figures and statistical returns, but I will venture to say this, that when the great accounts of the country come before you, and you have an opportunity of investigating rigidly the effects of those alterations, you will find that in every important instance the results have been such as to justify the hopes entertained by the success of those changes. I myself have been compelled to be a somewhat close observer of the connection between the prices of provisions and the employment and happiness of the population. (Hear, hear.) Accident has cast my lot in the midst of a dense population, with respect to a large portion of which this accident has made me a distributor of working wages, and I have seen the operation of what I believe to be the connexion between the prices of provisions and the happiness and employment of the people in various conditions. Among the population to which I have alluded when there arose, from natural causes I believe, though protracted beyond their natural limits by derangements in the commercial intercourse with the United States, any difficulty in the state of the labour market for men to find employment at their regular occupations, I, as well as others, have endeavoured at such times to find temporary employment for those who could not obtain regular work. It had happened that, in the course of my endeavours, prices have fallen again, a reaction has taken place, and provisions have become cheap; and but for that I have felt how vain would have been all our exertions to effect that which we had in view. (Hear, hear.) Changes have since taken place, and I, as well as others, have had to struggle with a difficulty of a far less ordinary character—the difficulty of finding labourers for the work we desired to be performed. In the turn of these more prosperous days, I trace again the connection between abundance and employment. (Loud cheers.) However, in the midst of this general tide of prosperity an interruption very recently occurred, and I believe that I can give some history of the occurrence in words better than my own, by referring to a circular which I received by post from Manchester a day or two ago, and which by accident I read, for it is not always that one reads printed circulars. In this circular it is stated that "the elements of permanent advantages were everywhere visible in the year 1844, and that the expectations formed with respect to the year 1845 were realised in the better half of the year; trade was going on, wages rising, &c. (Hear, hear.) Notwithstanding the drawbacks that had to be contended against in the last quarter of 1845, trade was satisfactory on the whole, for profits were realised by our spinners and some of our manufacturers in the first nine months of the year. (Hear.) Those who attribute all the mischief to the late reaction and the exorbitant railway schemes, take a one-sided view of the case, and mistake the effect for the cause. The railway schemes, no doubt, aggravated the evil; but the main cause originated in the deficiency of the harvest, and the failure of the potato crop, at a time when a similar catastrophe occurred on the Continent of Europe, and rendered an immediate supply of provisions almost impossible." (Hear, hear.) I ask any gentleman connected with the manufactures of Lancashire—one who is acquainted with the situation of Manchester, Bolton, or Ashton, whether the period to which this circular alludes did not cause the memory involuntarily to recur to those times in 1841 and 1842, which I do hope will never again occur in this country? (Hear, hear.) I ask whether men's hearts did not fail them for fear of the prospect of anything like high prices occurring again in those manufacturing districts? (Hear, hear.) But I may be told, and fairly told, that the abundance of which I have spoken, and which has contended against the evils which have threatened us, has been co-existent with those restrictive laws which I propose to consider. Others will go further, and say that the abundance is even the consequence of those restrictive laws, and that it may cease and determine with their abolition, or material reduction. Whatever change of opinion I may have undergone, I certainly have no right to question the sense, sagacity, or still less, the sincerity of those who continue to entertain those ideas. The time has been when with equal sincerity I have entertained them myself; but my observation has led me to believe that if you, as a Government, undertake to control and regulate the supply of the means of subsistence to the community, you will find that it is difficult, nay, impossible for you, spread the public table with what profusion you may, to satisfy those who would still retire from the feast with appetites not altogether pleased, that they have had sufficient for their health, and that all that remains for them is to pray that they may be truly thankful. This abundance, which you call sufficient, but which no man can call excessive, is after all but matter of comparison. (Hear.)

"Claudite jam rivos, pueri: sat prata biberunt;" this, indeed, would be a dangerous principle for a Minister to act upon. With regard to the objection, that this country might be made to depend on foreign countries for a supply of food, I do not, when I consider the general state and condition of our relations for the supply of the commodity of food—I do not see in that objection anything which can cause me long to hesitate in any course which, on other grounds, I may think it desirable to adopt. (Hear, hear.) It has been supposed that some vast confederacy of foreign nations might be formed against us, which, at some critical moment, might reduce this country to a state of utter dependence on foreign nations. I do not think the occurrence of this general confederacy at all likely. (Hear, hear.) I do not think that this general raising of bucklers against this country is a danger which ought to enter seriously into our calculation. (Hear, hear.) History would teach us another lesson, if I looked back at the situation of this country when it stood alone against the world in arms. (Hear, hear.) Was England then altogether independent of foreign nations for her supply of food? I think that history will tell us that in the plenitude of Napoleon's power, when he had connected with Austria by marriage, when his influence prevailed in Prussia, when the dreadful example of his victories was hanging over the Northern Powers, and when Europe was at his command, the iron frame of his Continental system still yielded to the strenuous and irresistible pressure of mutual wants. (Hear, hear.) I take the case of 1810. Then there was scarcity, or apprehension of scarcity; and in 1810 our importation of corn from foreign countries was 1,292,000 quarters, of which not less than 581,000 quarters came from France and Flanders; and the men whom Napoleon had raised to the rank of marshals in his successful army were among the parties who ventured on this operation of supplying us with corn. (Hear, hear.) From a passage, too, which I lately read in "Napier's History of the Peninsular War," I find that when the Duke of Wellington planted the English standard, for the first time for many centuries, on French ground—a circumstance one would think likely to raise the resentment of the French against the invaders of their soil—yet at Bayonne they offered their services for the express purpose of virtually the invading army. (Hear.) That some sacrifices may be necessary in making such changes in legislation as would follow the adoption of the principles I advocate, I wish I could deny or dispute, but you must pay some penalty for having maintained and persevered in a contrary system; but I am consoled by the feeling that there never has been a period in the history of this country, and I doubt whether one such will ever occur, in which from temporary causes you would find so many opportunities of absorbing the temporary and local superfluity of labour by the means of the great public works in progress in this country at present. (Hear.) If I look, again, to the extension of our foreign relations, there has seldom been a period which presented, in my opinion, a greater prospect of largely extending our intercourse with foreign countries, promoting thereby peace and good-will, and preventing the effects of mutual animosities between this and other countries. The progress of these great public works in this country will, no doubt, be, in the first instance, beneficial to the labouring population, whose interests and welfare it is our duty to watch over; but I believe that there is no class of the community who will reap greater advantages from a just and proper settlement of this agitated question than that higher class of manufacturers who bear the name of the landed interest. (Cheers.) Whatever might be the circumstances attending the process of the settlement—whatever the throes which might accompany this adjustment—their remuneration would be ample in the removal of a state of intestine dissension, which I cannot contemplate without apprehension. (Hear, hear, hear.) This brings me to a part of my subject which it is difficult for me to approach without, perhaps, under the peculiar circumstances, incurring the suspicion of being influenced by personal considerations. This reason alone would be sufficient to induce me to refrain from originating in this House any topic which could generate any angry discussion on the present occasion. Fortunately, it is not necessary for me to do so; but I may assume, for argument's sake, that there have been proceedings in this country as dangerous and as unconstitutional as the warmest advocates of protection could imagine. Then, I ask, what have you to expect from counter-irritation at such proceedings, with all the instruments and improvements which ingenuity and experience can suggest? A war of bribery and chicanery—a war of the Roses in the reign of Victoria, which, in my opinion, could but terminate in one way, but which, when terminated, would leave this country torn by intestine divisions, and so exhausted as to attract the notice of foreign nations and the enemies of our common country to the spectacle of that exhaustion. (Cheers.) These, in my opinion, are reflections well worthy the attention of Parliament and this House, and I am glad to believe that you will give them that full, deliberate, and dispassionate consideration which is not in the nature of things to be hoped for elsewhere. (Hear, hear.) I believe that elsewhere these questions have been discussed too long in a spirit which makes it difficult to eliminate the truth from the passion and prejudice which surround it. (Hear, hear.) My apprehensions are not confined to the fate of those who, I believe, would be the more immediate sufferers from the continuance of the contests I allude to—the landed interest—but I look further. If I could regard with any unbecoming feeling the great body of manufacturers in this country, by many of whom I am surrounded, and for the value of whose opinion I have never betrayed indifference—if I could consider that the men were unfit for a share in the administration of the government of this country who exhibit great industry, sagacity, and intelligence—if such were my feelings towards the manufacturers, I could wish them no more fatal gift than the monopoly of power in the State by questionable means—by some revolutionary, however bloodless, a convulsion, and by weapons likely to be used in the contest I now contemplate. I see special danger to them, though it is not unlikely that danger would affect other classes. There is something tenuous of life and enduring in land. The storms of popular commotion may sweep over our ancient landmarks, and the tide of popular convulsion may submerge them for a season; but the waters will retire, the mountain waves roll back, and the old limits and landmarks will re-appear, and the fertility of prosperous seasons replace the ravages of disastrous years. I doubt whether it would be so with your abodes of peaceful industry. There is a difference between your machinery and that which comes fresh from the hands of the great Creator of the universe. The latter is less destructible. The trade of agitation is no mystery of difficult acquirement. I can imagine no better pupil in that school than some man of liberal education, of ruined means and no principle, who, goaded by a sense, real or imaginary, of wrongs, and the recollection of fallen fortunes, might be led to become a leader of agitation in the manufacturing districts. Exoritur aliquis nostris ex ossibus ultor. Such a man, with opportunity, might make those chimneys and storied edifices, which I hope may long endure in the manufacturing districts, tremble to their bases. I dread such a system of agitation, which I think may exist if Parliament does not interfere to make a satisfactory, just, and final settlement of this question. (Loud cheers.) There are dark spots and weak places in various parts of our social system: let us not be blind to them, or neglect the duty of exposing them, with the view of mending and improving them. Let us not fling in one another's teeth difficulties, remedial or irremedial, for the sole purpose of party or of faction. Let us not fling in the face of one class a Wiltshire labourer, or a manufacturing labourer in the face of another. To meet the cases of both—to give them in the first instance food—(cheers)—to give them other luxuries which many of them still need—air, water, drainage—to give them all the physical and moral advantages possible; let that be our employment and our duty, and let us endeavour to perform that office by ridding the country of those subjects of angry discussion to which I have referred. (Loud cheers.) With this explanation I express my concurrence in the statement contained in Her Majesty's Speech, and in performing my task I fear I have transgressed too far on your patience. The remaining topics of the speech are not such as I believe will involve any serious differences of opinion in this House, and I think that I shall now best evince my sense of the indulgence and forbearance of the House, by proceeding to move the Address in answer to Her Majesty's speech. The noble lord concluded by moving the Address, which was, as usual, merely an echo of the Queen's speech.

Mr. E. B. DENISON seconded the address.

The Address having been read from the chair,

Sir R. PEEL rose and spoke as follows:—Sir, I would fain hope, that although the course which I take is an unusual one, yet I am acting in conformity with the general wish of the house, by availing myself of the very earliest opportunity of giving that explanation which at no remote period the house would require from me. (Hear, hear.) I would fain hope that I am not obstructing the course of this discussion upon the Address by giving that explanation at this period. But, if no consideration of public advantage could justify this course, yet to the generous feeling of the house it will seem but natural that I should desire that not a moment should elapse before I explain to the house the motives on which I have acted, and the principles which have governed my conduct. (Cheers.) I may feel hurt at having been the object of much accusation upon vague surmise; I may think it unjust to have been condemned without a hearing (hear); I say nothing upon that head. If any momentary feelings of indignation were aroused, the recollection of frequent indulgence, of great confidence, was quite sufficient to efface those temporary feelings. I make, therefore, no reference to particular expressions, or particular accusations. But this I do ask, even while I do not require the reversal of the sentence, I ask for the opportunity, after condemnation, of explaining the motives of my conduct. (Hear, hear.) I ask you to listen at least with patience and indulgence to those facts and that evidence which I shall this night adduce, and which will form the materials on which other tribunals, judging under less excitement, will ultimately pronounce upon the motives and the conduct of men charged with deep responsibility in critical times. (Hear, hear.) I wish to explain what were the grounds which led me, and those with whom I acted, humbly to tender to a gracious Sovereign the resignation of the trust which was committed to us. I wish also to explain what were the circumstances under which that trust was re-assumed, and under which I now appear as the Minister of this empire. (Hear, hear.) Sir, the immediate cause which led to the dissolution of the Government in the early part of last December was that great and mysterious calamity which caused a lamentable failure in an article of food on which great numbers of the people in this part of the United Kingdom, and still larger numbers in the sister kingdom, depend mainly for their subsistence. That was the immediate and proximate cause, no doubt, which led to the dissolution of the Government. But it would be unfair and uncandid on my part, if I attached undue importance to that particular cause. That particular cause appeared to me to preclude further delay, and to require immediate decision—decision not only upon the measures which it was necessary at the time to adopt, but as to the course to be ultimately taken with regard to the laws which govern the importation of grain. (Hear, hear.) I will not assign to that cause too much weight. I will not withhold the homage which is due to the progress of reason and to truth, by denying that my opinions on the subject of protection have undergone a change. (Cheers from the Opposition.) Whether holding a private station, or a public one, I will assert the privilege of yielding to the force of argument and conviction, and acting upon the results of enlarged experience. (Cheers.) It may be supposed that there is something humiliating in making such admissions. Sir, I feel no such humiliation. (Loud cheers.) I should feel humiliation, if, having modified or changed my opinions, I declined to acknowledge the change for fear of incurring the imputation of inconsistency. (Cheers.) The question is whether the facts are sufficient to account for the change, and the motives for it are pure and disinterested. Nothing could be more base on the part of a public man than to protect himself from danger by pretending a change; on the other hand, nothing could be more inconsistent with the duty he owes to his Sovereign and country than if, seeing reason to alter his course, he is precluded from that alteration by the fear of being taunted with it. (Cheers.) Sir, those who contend for the removal of impediments upon the import of a great article of subsistence, such as corn, start with an immense advantage in the argument. The natural presumption is in favour of free and unrestricted importation. It may be possible to combat that presumption, to meet the advocates of free import in the field of argument, by showing that there are other and greater advantages in a system of protection than in a system of unrestricted importation. We all admit that the argument in favour of high protection or prohibition on the ground that it is for the benefit of a particular class is untenable. The most strenuous advocates for protection have abandoned that argument; they rest, and wisely rest, the defence of protective duties upon higher principles. They have alleged, as I have myself allowed, that there were public reasons for retaining this protection. Sir, it became absolutely necessary for me, occupying the public station I do, and seeing the part that must unavoidably devolve on me in the present contest,—it became absolutely necessary for me maturely to consider whether the grounds on which an alteration of the Corn Laws can be resisted are tenable. The arguments in favour of protection must be either that protection to domestic industry is in itself a sound principle, and that, therefore, agriculture, being a branch of domestic industry, is entitled to share in that protection; or, that in a country like ours, encumbered with an enormous debt, and subject to great taxation, it is necessary that domestic industry should be protected from competition with foreigners; or, again, that the interests of the great body of the community—the laborious classes, are not committed in this question, that the rate of wages varies with the price of provisions, that high prices implies high wages, and that low wages are the concomitants of low prices. Again, it may be said, that the land is entitled to protection on account of peculiar burdens to which it is subject. But that is a question of justice rather than of policy. It may be, I have always felt it was so; but you have the power of weakening the force of that argument by the removal of the burden. The first three objections to the removal of protection are objections founded on considerations of public policy. Now, I want to deprive those who, arguing a priori, without the benefit of experience, have come to the conclusion that protection is objectionable in principle—I want to deprive them of none of the credit which is fairly their due. Reason, unaided by experience, brought conviction to their minds. My opinions have been modified by the result of the experience of the last three years. I have had the opportunity of comparing the results which have followed during the last three years from the principle upon which you have been acting for some years past—namely, the gradual removal of protection on domestic industry. I have had the opportunity of comparing the periods of abundance and comparatively low prices with periods of scarcity and high prices (cheers); and I am led to the conclusion that the main grounds of public policy on which protection has been defended are not tenable; at least I cannot maintain them. (Cheers.) I do not believe, after the experience of the last three years, that the rate of wages varies with the price of food. I do not believe, that with high prices, wages will necessarily rise in the same ratio. I do not believe that a low price of food necessarily implies a low rate of wages. (Cheers.) Neither can I maintain that protection to domestic industry is a necessary good. I said last year that I thought these protective duties were evils in themselves. I thought they ought not to be lightly abolished; that the system of protected industry had grown up, and must be tenderly and cautiously dealt with; but it is utterly impossible for any men who have made the changes we have made in the tariff during the last four years, to contend that protection to industry is in itself and abstractedly a public good. Then, as to the other argument, which makes great impression on its first statement—that because we have a heavy debt and a high rate of taxation, we must be protected from competition with foreign industry,—that argument has also been submitted to the test of the last three years, and, so far as the experience of that period can supply an argument, it is this—that a large debt and heavy taxation are best encountered by abundance and cheapness of provisions; that they rather alleviate than add to the weight of taxation. Let us take the result of the experience of the last three years. The result of constantly diminished protection—on wages—on trade and on revenue. First, as to wages. Who can deny the fact that during the three years that preceded the month of October last prices were comparatively low? There was comparative cheapness and plenty, and yet at no period were the wages of labour higher than during that period. (Cheers.) If you take the three preceding years, you will find high prices, and co-existent with high prices you will find low wages. (Cheers.) Well, then, I have six years; I have during the first three years high prices and low wages; I have during the last three years low prices and high wages (cheers); and I cannot resist the conclusion that wages do not vary with the price of provisions. (Loud cheers.) They do vary with the increase of capital, with the prosperity of the country, with the increased power to employ labour; but there is no immediate relation between wages and provisions—or if there be a relation, it is in an inverse ratio. (Cheers.) Now as to trade; as I said, during the last four or five years we have been acting on the admitted principle of removing prohibitions—reducing duties, that is, destroying protection to native industry. (Loud cheers.) That has been the principle, whether right or wrong, on which we have acted—the removal of protection to native industry. Now, what has been the result? I will give you the total amount of exports since the year 1839. The total value of British produce and manufactures exported from the United Kingdom was, in 1839, 53,000,000*l.*; in 1840, 51,000,000*l.*; in 1841, 51,000,000*l.*; in 1842, 47,000,000*l.*; in 1843, 52,000,000*l.*; in 1844, 58,000,000*l.*; that is, the rise from the year when the great invasion upon the protection of domestic industry was made by Parliament was from 47,381,000*l.*, in 1842, to 58,500,000*l.*, in 1844. (Loud cheers.) But it may be said, the China trade made all the difference. Now let us deduct the whole of that trade. In 1842, our exports to all the countries, except China, amounted to 46,411,000*l.*; and in 1844 they increased by 10,000,000*l.*, amounting to 56,000,000*l.* For the last year we can only have the account for 11 months preceding December. In 1843, the exports of our principal articles of manufacture to all parts of the world, including China, amounted to 41,011,000*l.*; in 1844, to 47,312,000*l.*; and during the first 11 months of 1845, to 47,764,000*l.* (Loud cheers.) Such is the state of our foreign exports under this system of continued removal of protection. (Cheers.) Now let me take the revenue (Hear, hear.)—the results of the revenue as bearing on this question—Ought there to be high protection in a country encumbered with an immense public debt and heavy taxation? (Hear.) In 1842, I proposed a reduction in the Customs to the amount of 1,438,000*l.*; in 1844, I proposed a further reduction in the Customs' duties to the amount of 273,000*l.*; in 1845 to that of 2,418,000*l.* I estimated the total loss from these reductions at 4,129,000*l.* How have these expectations been realized? Have 4,000,000*l.* been lost?

The total amount of the loss has been 1,500,000*l.* (Loud cheers.) In the Excise last year there was a reduction of a million in duties; the whole of the glass duties, the whole of the auction duty was taken off. The loss on that occasion was estimated at 1,000,000*l.* Observe, that was no mere reduction of duties; there was no expectation, therefore, of recovering the revenue by increased consumption. I felt confident, that although the glass and auction duties were abolished, still, by vivifying other branches of industry I should derive some compensation. (Cheers.) What will be the fact on the 5th of April? I believe, that notwithstanding the total reduction, the absolute loss of a million—my firm belief is the Excise will this year be more prosperous than ever. (Loud cheers.) Notwithstanding these reductions there has been a salient spring of prosperity which has supplied the void you caused by the remission of taxation. (Cheers.) Well, then, with that evidence before me, could I contend that on account of high taxation or great debt you must necessarily continue high protective duties? I have shown you that my estimates as to loss in the Customs have been already falsified, that the Customs this year amount to nearly 20,000,000*l.*; that, comparing the Customs' revenue of 1845 with the Customs' revenue of 1842, after that diminution of taxation to the extent of 4,000,000*l.*, the Customs of this year, excluding from both years the revenue from foreign corn, are better by 100,000*l.* than in the former year. (Cheers.) But I will take more important considerations than those either of trade or revenue; I take the state of crime in the country. My right hon. friend at the head of the Home Department stated that reductions had taken place in the number of commitments in the year 1842; in 1843 there was also a decrease; and the decrease in the commitments remarkable in 1843 and 1844 continued in 1845. The total number of commitments in 1845 was 24,350, that is 2,237 less than in the lowest preceding year, 1842—a decrease of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the crimes of the preceding year. In 1843 there was a decrease of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; in 1844 a decrease of 10 3-10 per cent.; in 1845 a decrease of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and all this in an increasing population. This decrease of crime in the last year has taken place in all the chief manufacturing districts, and not only in all the chief manufacturing districts, but, with the exception of five, there has been a corresponding and almost equal decrease in all the chief agricultural districts. What is the state of Wales? In Wales the decrease of commitments is more remarkable than in almost any other part of the kingdom. So much for actual crime. With respect to crimes connected with sedition, discontent, and disaffection to the Government,—why, in the last two years the office of the Attorney-General has been a sinecure. There has been no prosecution for seditious libel during the whole of the last year. Government has no right to take credit for lenity; it is because the crime of sedition did not exist. In 1840-1-2-3,—listen to this, and seriously consider it,—there were 1257 persons committed on charges of seditions and riotous offences. In 1843-4-5, only 124 persons were committed so charged, instead of 1257; while, in the last year, I believe there was not one. (Cheers.) In 1845 there were 422 persons sentenced to transportation less than in 1842. In the last three years there were 1701 persons sentenced to transportation less than in the three preceding years. (Cheers.) This has been during a period of comparative abundance, and low prices. Is it possible to resist the inference that employment, low prices, comparative abundance, contribute to the diminution of crime? (Loud cheers.) Now, these are great social advantages; I will not say they have been promoted by,—I say only they have been concurrent with, the diminution of protection to domestic industry—concurrent with comparative abundance. Well, have these advantages been purchased by any serious detriment to that great interest whose welfare ought to be one of the first objects of our concern,—the agricultural interest? Protection has been diminished. I have been the object of repeated accusation and attack for diminishing it, and deeply should I regret if those great social advantages to which I have referred had been accompanied, in consequence of that diminution of protection, with any serious injury to agriculture. (Cheers.) Let us take the four great articles in respect of which there has been a diminution of protection. Foreign flax has, for many years, been admitted at a very low duty into this country. What duty remained we remitted last year. There is now, therefore, a perfectly unrestricted import of foreign flax. In 1824 the duty on flax was 10*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* per ton. It is now absolutely nothing. The reduction having taken place, what was the effect on the price of flax? The price of fine flax in Belfast market in 1843 was 65*s.* to 70*s.*; in 1844 it was 63*s.* to 68*s.*; in 1845 from 65*s.* to 68*s.*; and in January, 1846, from 70*s.* to 80*s.* (Hear.) There was no reduction then made that caused so much alarm, and which it was prophesied would do so much injury as the removal of the absolute prohibition on the importation of foreign cattle. (Hear, hear.) The permission to import at a very low rate foreign cattle, foreign sheep, and foreign swine, was accompanied with many predictions (hear, hear, hear)—predictions that serious loss and injury would be inflicted on the agricultural interest, and it was said that we should deeply regret the day those changes were made and the panic that would arise. (Hear.) Now, has serious injury been sustained by that reduction? There was before that absolute prohibition, and there is now the admission of foreign cattle at a very low rate; and I must on this question, first of all, admit that there has been a gradual increase in the importation; (hear, hear;) I want at the same time to show that concurrently with increase in importation there has been increase in the price of the domestic articles. (Cries of "hear, hear.") In 1844 there were imported 2,500 oxen and cows, and in eleven months of the year 1845 there were not less than 15,000 imported, showing a very great increase; (hear;) have prices in this country been affected either in a corresponding degree or in any by this large importation? In 1844 the contract price for the victualling stores in the navy for salt beef was 3*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*; the contract price entered into for the navy in December 1845, was, I regret to say, 6*l.* 8*s.* 8*d.*; (hear, hear;) the salt pork that was contracted for in 1844 was 3*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.* a tierce, and in 1845 it was 6*l.* 12*s.*; (hear, hear;) the contract price for fresh beef for the navy in 1844 was 1*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*; the contract price for 1845 was 2*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*; (hear;) now, all this increase in price was attended with increased importation; one prophecy, if I recollect rightly, was, that there would be an importation into this country of 3,500,000 pigs, and that the price of salt pork would be immensely reduced; (hear;) there was no article last year that caused so much alarm as lard. (Great laughter.) In 1840 there were 97 cwt. of foreign lard imported into this country. In 1842 the duty was reduced from 8*s.* to 2*s.* a cwt., and there were then imported 48,312 cwt.; in 1844, 76,000 cwt. were imported; and in 1845 the importation had reached above 80,000 cwt. And what has been the price of domestic lard at Belfast during that period? In 1844 it was 48*s.* a cwt.; in 1845 it was 67*s.*; and in January of the present year, notwithstanding the increase caused by this importation, the price has risen from 48*s.* in 1844, to 62*s.* (cries of hear.) Another article of great importance was that of wool. We proposed in 1844 that the duty on foreign wool should be altogether done away with, and we were again met with the argument that wool would suffer from the reduction. But here again there has been a wholly different result. In 1842 there were 45,880,000*lb.* of foreign wool imported; in 1844 there were 65,079,000*lb.*; and in ten months of the last year it amounted to 65,216,000*lb.*—all in consequence of the reduction of the duty. Now, what had been the price of wool? In 1842 the price of South Down wool was 11*d.* per pound; long wool was 10*d.* per pound. In 1843 South Down wool was 11*d.*; in 1844, it was 1*s.* 2*d.*; long wool was also 1*s.* 2*d.*; and in December, 1845, 18 months after the reduction, the price of South Down wool rose to 1*s.* 4*d.* per pound, and the price of common wool was 1*s.* 2*d.* per pound, (hear, hear.) Such has been the effect of those reductions that were made in 1842 and 1844, and which were regarded as a protection to domestic industry. So far as we have experience of the last three years, then, I have shown that, under the removal of protection to domestic industry, the great social interests of the country have been promoted, crime has been less, morality has been improved, and I could also bring conclusive proofs that the public health has been promoted, (cheers.) Our national trade has increased, and our exports have been greater than before; and these we have succeeded in effecting, not only without doing serious injury to those interests from which protection has been withdrawn, but I have shown that the change has been concurrent with an increase in the price of the articles, (hear, hear.) Now, it is right I should state that, notwithstanding the conviction which this experience has brought home to my mind, yet my decided impression was, that on other grounds the charge of considering a change in the present Corn Law ought not to have devolved upon me. (Loud cries of hear, hear.) This I was firmly resolved upon, that I could not this session, on the motion of the hon. gentleman for the consideration of the Corn Laws,—I could not with these convictions which, say as you will, I cannot withhold, have met that motion with a direct negative. (Cries of hear, hear.) I claim no credit whatever for these arguments. My conviction has been brought about by the results of observation and experience. Those who have the merit of having formed their deductions from argument and reason are entitled to all credit on that account; but I claim no title to having made an impression by arguments drawn from any other source than that of experience and observation. If I could not have undertaken the defence of the Corn Laws either upon the public ground of this country being highly taxed, and protection therefore necessary, or on the ground that it was for the interest of the labouring classes that high prices should continue as the guarantee for high wages, so I could not have undertaken it upon the ground that interference with domestic industry must necessarily be to paralyze our commerce. (Hear, hear.) I wish most ardently to have the opportunity of stating to those friends who have honoured me on so many occasions with their confidence, that I can continue this conflict no longer (loud cheers from the opposition benches); that I must devolve it upon other persons more convinced of the strength of their arguments. (Hear.) I question whether, if it had to be defended in another Parliament, it would not have been my duty to commit the defence of protection to other hands, more able to maintain the struggle. I should also have wished that another Parliament should have had the opportunity of considering this question; but there did occur that, during the course of the last autumn, which precluded me from taking that step—that great calamity, the limits of which it was difficult to find, and the consequence of which it was, and I believe still is, difficult to foresee—that great visitation of Providence, the failure to a large extent of the potato-crop in Ireland, and in many parts of England, which made it a great and pressing question with the Government what course it was our duty to pursue in such an emergency towards our Sovereign and the country (hear, hear); whether it was advisable, from the pressure of the circumstances to take immediate measures for meeting the threatened evil? (hear, hear.) It was impossible, with the convictions we entertained, to abstain from adopting some course, if we did not pretend apprehensions of scarcity for the purpose of making an alteration in the Corn Laws, than which nothing could be more base or dishonourable. (Hear.) But you will now have the opportunity of judging and determining in what way I came to that conclusion, seeing that I was induced to advise the unusual course of obtaining that information in the way which shall now be laid before you. I now approach an explanation of the circumstances in which, early in November, the Government was temporarily dissolved, and in which it was re-constituted in the month of December. There are two important periods in giving that information to which I shall refer;—first, the period which elapsed between the 1st of November and the 6th of November, and then the period between the 25th of November and the 6th of December. I propose to read the correspondence by which information was received from different parties in this country and on the Continent, and which appeared to me to justify the conclusions to which I came. The disease which affected the potato crop of this country was also felt in other parts of the world, and in several parts of Europe there were apprehensions of scarcity; for example, in Poland, from which the resident agent for the Government, writing on the 22d of October, said,—“The cost of articles of food is stated to be higher than it has been since 1813 and 1814. The unfavourable results of the harvests, in Podolia, Lithuania, Galicia, and the German Baltic provinces, preclude the hope of foreign aid. No alleviation of the general distress is expected before next autumn.” In a letter dated the 14th of December, Colonel Wynford says,—“The supply of rye and rye flour sent from St. Petersburg is sufficient for the relief of the Livonians, and discontent prevails.” From Prussia, on the 10th of November, the Minister of the Interior informed Lord Westmorland that the potato disease had been observed in almost every part of the Prussian monarchy. From Belgium, dated the 24th of September, the Chambers sanctioned the proposal of the Government to prohibit export and permit import. Egypt, on the 22d of October, 1845, prohibited exportation of all corn arriving at Alexandria after that day. Turkey prohibited the export of all grain from the ports of Anatolia and her Asiatic provinces from the 27th of August, 1845, to harvest time in 1846. Sweden prohibited the export of potatoes from the 15th of October until the next harvest. There was, indeed, at this period a general apprehension of scarcity of provisions extending from Sweden to Egypt, and from Riga to Turkey, and measures were taken to stop their exportation, (hear.) Now, in respect to England and Scotland, this is a part of the information which I have in great abundance. Here is a letter, addressed by a great salesman in London, engaged in the retail trade. I should first state that the earliest account I received of the disease in the potato crop was from the Isle of Wight, where the crop had materially suffered. The gentleman to whom I have referred wrote, on the 11th of August, as follows:—

“Being myself a large grower some years to the extent of 300 acres, in Kent, where I farm, am also a salesman in London, and have been engaged largely in the retail part of the business, I can give you an opinion.

“I received a letter on the 1st inst. from my agent at Ash, near Sandwich, stating the crops were blighted in that neighbourhood, the same as in October last year (it was then only partial in East Kent). On Tuesday last I went down by the Dover 8 o'clock train. On my arrival there I immediately drove all round the neighbourhood of Sandwich, Ash, Wingham, and its neighbourhood, and found the whole of the crop, early and late, not excepting the cottager's gardens, was being entirely destroyed. On my return I could trace it by the side of the whole line to Tunbridge. Have since looked over the tops that come as covering on that article to the different markets, and find that they are all affected. On Thursday last I paid a visit to my farm at Maidstone, and found it had made fearful destruction there, and returned by way of Gravesend. All were alike affected. The same evening I went to East and West Ham, in Essex. Amongst the large growths found it was just appearing. Friday I went to Leytonstone and neighbourhood. All are alike.”

The next letter was in reference to the state of Lancashire, and was from the Rev. Mr. Clay, chaplain to the House of Correction at Preston, dated the 23d of October—

“It is too certain that the potato crop in this part of the country will be a serious failure. I have obtained information from the districts extending as far as Radford and Croston on the south, the Fylde country and Blackpool on the west, and Lancaster on the north, and from all quarters the accounts speak of great injury to the crops, though they vary as to the extent of it. My information, verbal and written, has come from scientific agriculturists, from practical farmers, and from dealers.

“Those among the first-named, who have paid much attention to the facts, estimate the loss, as it exists now, at more than two-fifths. But the progress of the disease is so rapid and its presence so universal, that it is impossible to conjecture what may be the amount of the defalcation by Christmas.”

The next letter is from Mr. Wood, of Yorkshire, and is dated the 2d of October; he says—

“You will regret to hear that the potato disease has now manifested itself in the most extensive manner in this district. Potatoes were selling 10 days since at 2*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.* a bushel of 70*lb.* in York. Yesterday the same weight sold at 1*s.* 2*d.*, owing to the farmers bringing an extra quantity to market.

“I have consequently had several pits opened on this estate, and I fear that before Christmas we shall not have a sound one; what the poor are to live on I cannot guess. I know you will be anxious to have accurate information, and therefore have ventured to give you this account.”

To turn now to Scotland. I received a letter from the hon. member for Dumfriesshire, which was as unfavourable as any I had previously received. Mr. Hope Johnstone, in a letter dated the 22d of November, says—

“I am sorry to say, that in so far as my own observation has gone, the disease appears to be progressing. I have today examined a large quantity of potatoes grown on some of the best and driest soils in this neighbourhood, and have not found one potato in twenty untainted, while three-fourths are quite unfit for human food. These have been carefully housed, and have never been exposed to damp since they were taken out of the ground. In Dumfriesshire also the decay is going on rapidly.”

These were some of the accounts received in the months of October and December as to the state of the crop in Britain, and I will now direct your attention to Ireland, where so large a proportion of the people subsist upon potatoes. (Hear.) Here is a report made to the Government by Mr. Lucas, Sir R. Routh, and Professor Kane, stating that the numerical proportion of the Irish population that may be considered practically to live exclusively upon potatoes, include certainly 4,000,000. (Hear.) And, I would ask, would the Government be justified in acting carelessly in reference to a calamity which threatened the existence of 4,000,000 of people? (Hear, hear.) The first of these letters which I shall read is from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. He had been sending us almost day by day accounts from the whole of the constabulary force, who are spread over the whole of Ireland. It was the duty of my right hon. friend and myself to devote our days and nights to the reading of these accounts, for the purpose of finding what was the real state of Ireland. I shall not enter into details; they were nearly all concurrent; it will not, therefore, be necessary for me to enter into details; but I will state the impression made upon the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and I will state the communications which he made to her Majesty's Government here. On the 17th of October Lord Heytesbury writes to the Secretary of State—"Even if the crops should turn out to be as bad as is now apprehended, it is not thought that there will be any immediate pressure in the market. There will be enough saved for immediate consumption. The evil will probably not be felt in all its intensity till towards the month of February or the beginning of spring. I am assured that there is no stock whatever of last year's potatoes in the country." And so deep on him, who is chiefly responsible as Lord-Lieutenant for the tranquillity of Ireland, was his impression of alarm, that not a day scarcely passed that he did not reiterate the warnings he had already given. I now state these things that they may be placed on record, in order that if you say now "there is no danger," you may be enabled to judge of the reasons which operated upon me. On the 17th of October the Lord-Lieutenant wrote that letter that on the 20th was followed by this—"Our accounts continue to be of the most discouraging nature. They are regularly transmitted to Sir James Graham's office. One of the most embarrassing circumstances attending the disease is, that potatoes dug up to all appearance perfectly sound, after a short time begin to decay, and very soon rot altogether. Under such circumstances it is impossible to form any decisive opinion as to the amount of the calamity. This was on the 20th. On the 24th he writes—"From the accounts which reach us I should be inclined to say that the progress of the disease has in some localities been checked, but I dare not lay too great a stress upon this, for we constantly receive satisfactory reports of the state of the potatoes when dug, and learn a few days after that they have all rotted in the pits. It is this insecurity that forms our greatest difficulty. We do not know, and cannot know the extent of this evil." On the 27th he says—"We are most anxious for the result of the deliberations of the Cabinet upon the state of the potato crops in Ireland; the reports from various country gentlemen and public bodies continue to be of so alarming a nature that it seems desirable that something should be done, if it be only to tranquillise the public mind, and diminish the panic. Everything is rising rapidly in price, and the people begin to show symptoms of discontent, which may ripen into something more. (Hear, hear.) Should we be authorised in issuing a proclamation prohibiting distillation in grain? This is demanded on all sides." In reply to this, we stated to the Lord-Lieutenant that in his answer to the address of the city of Dublin, read to him by the Lord Mayor, he had expressed his opinion that there was no immediate pressure in the market, and we stated that this was apparently at variance with the statements contained in the letters I have just read. He answered, on the 8th of November—"It is perfectly true that I did, in my answer to the Lord Mayor, say that there was no immediate pressure in the market; but you must not give too wide a meaning to that observation, which had reference merely to his demand, that the exportation of grain should be prohibited, and the ports immediately thrown open. My meaning was, that there was nothing so pressing as to require us to act without waiting for the decision of the responsible advisers of the Crown. But the danger may be upon us before we are aware of its being near, for, as I said in a former letter, the sudden decay of the potatoes dug up in an apparently sound state, sets all calculation at defiance. Some precautionary measures must be adopted, and adopted promptly—for there is danger in delay. As the digging of the potatoes advances, we see it more clearly; and I regret to say that Professor Lindley, when he took leave of me yesterday, told me that he doubted very much whether the potatoes would keep through the winter." On the 11th of November the Lord Lieutenant says—"The accounts we receive of the progress of the potato harvest from the constabulary are still very unsatisfactory, but those from the resident magistrates are rather less unfavourable." But then, in a postscript to this letter, he says—"Since this letter was written, later reports have been submitted to me, in which even the resident magistrates now appear to be of opinion that the disease is extending, and the evil much greater than they had imagined it to be. The heavy rains of the last few days have done infinite mischief." The last of these letters of the Lord Lieutenant, which I shall read, is one dated the 17th of November—"The disease progresses apparently unchecked by any of the precautions adopted, and the ill-intentioned leave nothing undone to irritate and exasperate the people. A very bad spirit prevails in many of the provinces. If we had to do only with a short crop, we might calculate with some degree of certainty upon the time when the pressure would be felt; but how rely upon any calculation when the potatoes are perishing in the pits? When the evil day of scarcity does come, it will probably come with fearful rapidity. We must not allow ourselves to be taken by surprise." Such being the state of our information with respect to the state of the disease in Ireland, I do hope that those who may have been disposed precipitately to condemn will make allowance for those who were charged with the duty of watching the effect of this calamitous visitation, and of considering what were the prospects before them for the future. It may be said these are official reports, and therefore less to be relied on. Let us, then, take the communications we derived from other quarters, from gentlemen unconnected with the Government. These must be unobjectionable. The secretary of the Royal Agricultural Improvement Society of Ireland made a communication to the Government, and he says—"I beg leave to send you an extract from a Dublin morning paper, which will give you a correct account of the measures which the council of the society have adopted respecting the prevailing disease in the potato crop. I beg leave also to state that when I issued a circular about a month since to the secre-

aries of about 120 local societies in connexion with the central one, I got several answers from persons stating that the disease was not then apparent in their immediate neighbourhood, but I have since received letters from most of them, stating, that upon digging the crops, they found the disease in almost every quarter; and I may safely say at present that there is not a county in Ireland that is not more or less affected by it. I shall barely add, Sir, that the greatest panic appears to exist in all parts of the community, and those who know the country best, are most puzzled how to act. One thing, however, I think is certain, that enough has already transpired to justify the most prompt and energetic measures on the part of the public and the Government." This is the language of the secretary of the Royal Agricultural Improvement Society of Ireland, and he had very ample means of forming an opinion. Now I will read the communications we received from others: Lord Montague writes—"Take it, however, at the least, I do not recollect any former example of a calamitous failure being anything near so great and so alarming as the present. Generally, we have seen the means of carrying our people forward at least till summer approaches, and till we were within two or three months of the new crop. The case is very different now, and in some places I know not how the peasantry will get through the winter in very many cases. On the 31st of October, the Duke of Leinster presided at a meeting in Dublin, where the following resolutions were passed:—"That the committee do respectfully represent to the Lord-Lieutenant, that it has now been ascertained beyond a doubt, that famine, and consequent pestilence, are immediately imminent, unless the Government shall, without hesitation or delay, take the most prompt measures to provide food for the people, and to organize means for the distribution of support in each locality throughout the land. That we respectfully call upon his Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant forthwith to order the ports of Ireland to be opened for the importation of Indian corn, rice, and other articles suited for human food;" and, on the 5th of November, I had a communication from Lord Clare, that gives an account to the same effect. Now, at the first appearance of this disorder, we thought it advisable to appoint two gentlemen, Professor Lindley, and Dr. Lyon Playfair, to investigate the matter. They were entirely unconnected with Ireland, and they were to give their own account of what they should observe, and their impression with respect to the state of the disease. They went to Ireland and travelled through several counties, and on their return my right hon. friend had an interview with Professor Lindley, the result of which was so alarming, that we decided that Professor Lindley and Dr. Playfair should place upon record their opinions; and, accordingly, on the 5th of November, they wrote a letter, in which they state—"During our stay in Ireland we carefully examined such official papers as were transmitted to us from the Castle. We consulted persons acquainted with the facts of the disease. We visited the district lying between Dublin and Drogheda, and inspected various potato fields and stores in the counties of Dublin, Louth, Meath, Westmeath, and a part of Kildare. Judging from the evidence thus collected, and from what we have seen of the progress of the disease in England, we can come to no other conclusion than that one-half of the actual potato crop of Ireland is either destroyed or remains in a state unfit for the food of man. We, moreover, feel it our duty to apprise you that we feel this to be a low estimate. We would now add, melancholy as this picture is, that in all probability the late rainy weather has rendered the mischief yet greater. It is also necessary to direct your attention to the quantity of seed potatoes which must be reserved for the coming year, if the cultivation of this plant is to be persevered in. We can state that on an average one-eighth of a crop is required for planting the same quantity of ground, so that in fact only three-eighths of the crop can, in our view, be at this moment assumed to be available as food." The remaining five-eighths had been destroyed, or been reserved for seed. I must remind the House that there are two periods, one reaching from the 1st to the 6th of November; the other from the 25th of November to the 6th of December; and, in justice to those who dissented from my opinions, I must say that on any advice I gave, no information derived from letters received since the 6th of December has or could have any bearing. These letters, many of them, explain that the state of the crop continues the same, and relate also to England. Now, many Cabinets were held between the 31st October and the 6th of December. On the 1st of November, there was no agitation, no petitions had been presented, but it appeared to me that these reports from the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, the example of foreign countries, the example of Belgium, whose merchants had cleared the market at Liverpool of rice, almost in a day, justified the Government in taking measures before it was too late, either by closing the ports by an Order in Council, or by calling Parliament together in a fortnight, to obviate the impending evil. That was the advice I gave on the 1st of November. There would have been an advantage in the plan of taking the responsibility of issuing an Order in Council, and trusting to obtain an indemnity from Parliament afterwards, and I was prepared to take that responsibility; but I did not insist on that course; but I stated that I was prepared to call Parliament together immediately, and advise Parliament that for a limited period the restrictions on importation should be suspended. (Hear, hear.) I did not anticipate that this would compel a reconsideration of the tariff; but I considered that the effect of calling Parliament together during the period of the suspension of the duties, would compel the reconsideration of this question. My advice at that period was not taken. Only three of my colleagues concurred with me, and we separated on the 6th of November, I reserving to myself the power of calling the Cabinet together, with the hope of convincing them, that if my alarm was confirmed by subsequent events, my advice ought to be taken at a late period. So far as I was concerned, that was the time for me to have tendered my resignation. I can truly say, that if I did not do so, it was upon public consideration that I acted. (Cheers.) I felt that it was my duty to adhere to my post when there was a possibility of my advice being acceded to. I felt it was a positive duty not to evade the difficulty. I might have said, that overruled by the great majority of my colleagues, I cannot take the responsibility of continuing in office, but I determined not to abandon my post. I determined to remain, that if there was a probability of an adjustment of this question I might bear my part; I determined, therefore, to remain. The Cabinet re-assembled on the 25th of November. The evidence I received in the interval did not in the slightest degree diminish my apprehensions. We had during the interval, with the unanimous consent of the Cabinet, taken extraordinary measures for acquiring certain information; we had issued a commission for that purpose, and on the 25th of November it became necessary to consider what instructions should be issued to that commission. Those instructions were determined on. I stated at that time that it appeared to me that the issuing of these instructions was inconsistent with a determination to maintain the present Corn Laws, and that I could not consent to the issuing of these instructions to the commission, without reserving on my own part the power to propose to Parliament some measure of immediate relief. The instructions were issued, and again I brought under the consideration of the Cabinet what I had pressed on them on the 1st of November, namely, the suspension of the restrictions upon importation, either by means of Orders in Council or by calling Parliament together. But at that period my own position, I admit, was entirely changed. The lapse of time, the increase of agitation, and other circumstances had occurred materially affecting my own position. I had been overruled in the Cabinet. The noble lord opposite had in the interval written his letter (a laugh); and, giving him credit for the best intentions, I must say it was a letter which, after what had occurred in the Cabinet, did most materially affect my position. (The right hon. baronet was here very indistinctly heard for about a minute.) He then proceeded as follows:—"We were taking, as it appeared to me, a natural and reasonable provision, not merely against a great disaster, but against the possibility of a great calamity, and it was impossible for me, or those who gave advice to me that the potatoes would fail, to avoid taking such precautions as would justify us in the eyes of the country. I felt, therefore, on the 26th of November, that nothing but the support of an united Government—after the letter of the noble lord (hear, hear)—would give a chance to me to pass such a measure as I thought advisable. After that letter I should appear to be adopting the proposition of the noble lord. On the 22nd of November his letter appeared, and that act of mine on the 26th November, would have appeared to be a servile acquiescence in his views. I would not have abandoned the post of danger if I had been supported by an unanimous Government; but that was not the result of our deliberations. One of my colleagues, one for whom I feel the sincerest regard, for whose public qualities I felt, and now feel, the highest respect; he took from the first the most entirely opposite views. His views were most sincere, I am sure, and adopted, after great deliberation, and he was convinced that the danger had been greatly magnified, and that no sufficient reasons had been brought forward for having recourse to Orders in Council. I thought that the adoption of extraordinary measures would compel the reconsideration of this question. That was my opinion. In these circumstances, my noble friend would have felt it his duty, and he was not the only member of the Government who would have felt it his duty, to resign; and believing, as I did, that their resignation would be followed by that of others, and thinking, too, that it was highly probable that, in the attempt to settle this question, I should fail, and that, after vehement contests, and the new combinations that would be formed, probably worse terms would be made than if some other person were to undertake the settlement of the question, I felt it my duty humbly to tender my resignation. (Hear, hear.) That resignation was accepted by her Majesty, and her Majesty of her own choice immediately sent for the noble lord the member for London. The noble lord undertook the task of forming an Administration. I believed that I was then in the situation of a private Member of Parliament—that I was reduced once more to the ranks; that I was at liberty to act as I thought right; and I don't hesitate to say that in that capacity I would have done all that I could to promote the settlement of this question. (Loud cries of "Hear.") There appeared every probability of the duty of adjusting this question falling upon the noble lord, and in my capacity of a private member of Parliament I would have done all I could to facilitate its final settlement. On Thursday, December 18, it was intimated to me that the noble lord had undertaken the duty of forming an Administration; and on the 19th I received from her gracious Majesty a communication stating, that as my relation to her Majesty was about to terminate, she desired again to see me for the purpose of taking a final farewell. I went to Windsor Castle, on the 20th of December, for that purpose. Before waiting on her Majesty I was apprized by the noble lord that his efforts to form a Government had failed. Her Majesty informed me that so far from taking farewell of me, she was obliged to require me to continue my services. (Hear, hear.) The colleagues who differed from me not having advised the formation of a Government on the principles of protection, and the noble lord (from causes to which I think it unnecessary to refer) having signified to her Majesty that he had failed, her Majesty asked me whether I intended to persist in tendering my resignation? I don't hesitate to say that I informed her Majesty on the instant that I should return as her minister, and that I should withdraw my resignation. I accordingly did return to London as her Majesty's minister, and did resolve upon meeting Parliament prepared to submit those measures which I thought necessary in the emergency which had occurred. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") Having reason to expect that the noble lord to whom I formerly referred would be precluded from lending his assistance to the Government as reconstructed, I felt it my painful duty to accept his resignation. My other colleagues felt it their duty to assist me in the arduous task I had undertaken. (Hear, hear.) I have given notice that on the earliest day it is my intention to submit to the House of Commons some measures of the greatest importance connected with commerce. It is my firm determination not to anticipate the discussion of these measures, though I am aware that my explanation will be incomplete without them. I must ask you still to suspend your judgment, but I have been desirous to disconnect as far as possible a great political question from mere personal and party explanations. (Hear, hear.) I do hope, after having referred to the evidence in possession of the house, that although many may think that the conclusions to which I and others have come respecting the danger may have been erroneous, they will not be too confident. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") I advise them to recollect that we have yet seven months to pass before there will be any new supply of food. Better accounts may be coming in from some quarters, but I ask them not to form too precipitate an opinion. Some persons had suggested the introduction of Indian corn as a remedy; this was impossible. At the present moment the duty on Indian corn is regulated by the duty on British barley. This might seem very odd, but such was the law. Suppose that on the meeting of Parliament a proposition had been made to admit Indian corn duty free, what would have been the consequence, supposing such a state of things to arise in Ireland which I anticipate as possible? What would be the effect upon the great agricultural interest, supposing we had agreed to touch the present

Corn Laws on some slight point like Indian corn, and refuse to admit the slightest relaxation in regard to that nobler species of grain, namely, corn? (Hear, hear.) For my own part, I would rather keep the present system intact, and refuse to touch Indian corn, and fight the battle of protection with respect to other grain. (Hear, hear.) As I said before, that even after the severe labour of last session almost every hour of my time since has been devoted to watching chances and reading evidence night and day, so as to be able to guard against a heavy national calamity. I confess it does seem hard to find myself the object of accusations—(loud cries of hear, hear)—of accusations of being unfaithful to the interests of the community in general, or to any special or peculiar interests. (Hear, hear.) I have over and over again attempted to define the relation in which I think I stand towards parties, towards the community, and towards this House; and yet I have observed it stated over and over again that I am under some kind of personal obligation to a certain party for having placed me in the office I now hold. I see it over and over repeated that the same power which elevated me is powerful enough to displace me; and I am constantly menaced with the threat, that they will remove me from power. (Hear.) Now, I do affirm that there is a material mistake, both as to the extent of the obligation and the severity of the penalty. I owe no personal obligation to any man, or to any body of men, for being compelled to submit to the toil, and to make the sacrifices which official duty gives me. (Hear, hear.) I by no means undervalue the distinction of my position; but let there be a distinct understanding as to what is the real notion of the obligation which I owe for being placed in power. Its value, allow me to say, does not consist in the power of distributing honours. That is inseparable from the office of Prime Minister, and cannot be diverted from it; but believe me, that the possession of the power of advising the Sovereign as to the highest rewards and the highest offices is ill compensated by the invidious duty of selection, and the disappointments which every selection unavoidably occasions. I value not power for the privilege it confers of distributing patronage. (Hear, hear.) As to personal objects, let me say it without arrogance, I have none. I have served four Sovereigns—George III. and his three successors. In the reign of George III. my office was of so subordinate a character, that it was impossible for me to attract the notice of my Sovereign; but during the reign of his three successors, George IV., first as Regent, and then as King, William IV., and Victoria, it has been my fate to hold some of the highest offices in the state. I have served them in critical times, and under difficult circumstances. They have each taken far too favourable a view of any services I have rendered; but to each of those Sovereigns I have said, with every feeling of dutiful and grateful acknowledgment, that there was but one favour—one distinction—one reward they had it in their power to confer,—the simple assurance that I had been a loyal and faithful servant. (Hear, hear.) If power have any value, it is because it gives increased opportunities for rendering public service. It is this which constitutes the real value of official power, and I think I can say with truth that in intention, at least, I have not abused it. (Hear, hear.) I and those with whom I act have tried to use it for the promotion of the public interest and the advancement of the common good. We cannot charge ourselves with having acted at variance with true principles. Of Conservative policy. We cannot think that it was at variance with Conservative policy that we attempted to repair the disasters of Cabul, and to restore in the Indian army a spirit which had been checked by the misfortunes of Afghanistan. (Hear, hear.) We cannot think it inconsistent with Conservative policy that we laboured to assuage the animosities which have so long prevailed between this country and our powerful neighbour. In the speech, which was read to-day from the throne, her Majesty expresses her desire that the cordial understanding which so happily exists between this country and France may always be made conducive to the promotion of the interests of humanity, and to secure the peace of the world. It surely is not inconsistent with true Conservative policy that we were enabled to insert that paragraph (hear, hear;) that we have tried not to efface the recollection—the glorious recollection, of military exploits and great achievements—but to extract from those glorious recollections everything that can provoke international enmity; that we have tried to engage in a rivalry, not on the field of blood, but on the field of honourable competition for the advancement of commerce and the improvement of the social condition of mankind. (Hear, hear.) It surely is not inconsistent with Conservative policy that we have laboured to increase the foreign trade of the country by removing prohibitory duties,—that we have reduced taxation and yet have increased revenue. (Cries of hear, hear.) Is it inconsistent with a true Conservative policy that we have discouraged agitation and extinguished sedition,—not by coercive laws, but by creating an impression on the part of the great body of the people that we, the rich and powerful, are ready to take our full share of the public burdens, and relieve them of oppressive taxation? (Hear, hear.) The conduct of Government is an arduous and a difficult undertaking. I may, without irreverence, be permitted to say, that, like our physical frame, our ancient constitution is "fearfully and wonderfully made," that it is no easy task to insure the harmonious and united action of monarchy, aristocracy, and a reformed House of Commons. These are the objects which we have attempted to accomplish, and I cannot think they are inconsistent with a pure and enlarged Conservatism. (Hear, hear.) Power for such objects is really valuable; but for my own part I can say with perfect truth that, even for these objects, I do not covet it. (Hear, hear.) It is a burden far above my physical, infinitely above my intellectual strength. The relief from it with honour would be a favour, and not a punishment. (Cheers.) But while honour and a sense of public duty require it, I do not shrink from office. I am ready to incur its responsibilities, to bear its sacrifices, to confront its honourable perils; but I will not retain it with mutilated power and shackled authority. (Cheers.) I will not stand at the helm during the tempestuous night, if that helm is not allowed freely to traverse. I will not undertake to direct the course of the vessel by observations taken in the year 1842. (Loud cheers.) I will reserve to myself the unfettered power of judging what will be for the public interest. I do not desire to be the Minister of England; but while I am Minister of England I will hold office by no servile tenure (loud cheers); I will hold office unshackled by any other obligation than that of consulting the public interests, and providing for the public safety. (The right hon. gentleman sat down amidst loud and continued cheering.)

Lord J. Russell.—I think it necessary to rise at an early period of this debate in explanation of my own conduct during the recent negotiations. For that purpose I applied to the right hon. gentleman to lay before her Majesty my humble application that I might state in my place in Parliament the circumstances which attended the late attempt to form an Administration. I stated, at the same time, that if it were more convenient to the public service, and conducive to the purposes of the right hon. baronet as to any measures he might have to bring forward, that I should postpone that explanation to any later day, I should be ready to comply with the right hon. gentleman's inclination on that subject. The right hon. gentleman not only informed me that her Majesty was graciously pleased to comply with my application, but that it would perfectly accord with his own convenience that I should make that explanation at the commencement of the session. I now, therefore, proceed, having that understanding, and trusting, if I do now make that explanation, and if I should find it necessary to refer to some measures which are now pending, I shall stand excused in the eyes of the right hon. gentleman, in consideration of the willingness I expressed to postpone it if he should so wish it. But before I make that explanation I think it necessary to refer to a letter which he has mentioned in the course of his statement of the circumstances which led to his resignation of office. I feel it necessary to refer to it, not only because the right hon. gentleman has said that it caused him some embarrassment in his proceedings, (a laugh,) but also because it was by some supposed to have been written for a very different purpose. (Hear.) Sir, it happened to me, in consequence of private affairs, to go to Edinburgh at the latter end of October last. Early in November, the Lord Provost and corporation of Edinburgh did me the honour to confer on me the freedom of that city, and invited me to a public meeting to receive it. I addressed those who conferred on me that honour, and at the same time I took especial care not to refer in my speech to any measures that might at the time be under consideration. The Lord Provost expressed to me immediately afterwards his regret that I had not expressed my opinions on the subject of the Corn Laws, and he added, that it was the wish of a number of the citizens of Edinburgh to give a public dinner, to which I should be invited to attend. I told him I was unwilling to receive that honour, and that, among other reasons, having formed a very strong opinion as to the course which ought to be pursued as to the Corn Laws, I could neither be silent in justice to my own opinion, nor could I declare fully and freely that opinion without some risk of embarrassing the public councils of my Sovereign. (Hear, hear.) But I found, by the public prints, and by the London Gazette, that her Majesty's servants had met; that they had been in consultation for many days; that no result appeared; that it was confidently reported that no proposition had been adopted, or even made; and there was also the regular announcement in the Gazette of the further prorogation of Parliament. Under these circumstances, I did think that the ministers were not performing their duty to their Sovereign and to their country. It was my opinion that it was advisable to call Parliament together to consider the state of the Corn Laws, having seen—for it was not confined to the Government—many statements of the failure of the potato crop, and more especially the uncertainty in which Ireland was on that subject, (Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman stated to night that the commissioners appointed by the Government found, that as regarded the kind of food which is the sustenance of four millions of the people, four-eighths of the crop were supposed to be seriously injured, that one-eighth of it was necessary for seed, and that there remained only three-eighths of the crop of the year for the food of the people. I did consider such a state of things most alarming. It now appears that I was not alone in that opinion, but that at the time when I was refraining from a public expression of it, the right hon. gentleman himself had formed an opinion at least equally strong, and, in conjunction with three of his colleagues, had expressed that opinion in the Cabinet Councils. (Hear, hear.) Sir, it was not for me to know that such an opinion had been expressed. I could only gather from the consequences of the decision of the Cabinet—that is to say, from its inaction—that no decision had been come to. It was in that state of things that the letter I allude to was published. It was published on the 26th of November, and it did state very strongly my opinion on the subject of the Corn Law, and it also expressed my opinion, that as the Government seemed to be inactive, it would be necessary for the public to express their opinion in a constitutional manner, in order that they might obtain the remedies which seemed necessary. If the facts and opinions of the right hon. gentleman were correct, I cannot but think that I was justified in so stating my opinion to the public. (Hear, hear.) I know that some persons of low minds have supposed that I had intended, as it was called, to advertise for office by expressing that opinion; but nothing was further from my thoughts than that intention. (Hear, hear.) But I did wish that there should be such an expression of opinion that the Government should be compelled, by its constitutional expression of it, to yield to that opinion, and save the country from very serious evils. It appears that on the 26th of November the right hon. gentleman himself urged that the ports should be opened for the admission of grain, and that the Corn Laws themselves should be considered. Sir, unfortunately (for I think it was a misfortune), the Cabinet did not agree to that opinion, and there was a difference, the extent of which he did not explain to-night, but which was to such an extent that the right hon. gentleman thought he could not usefully carry on the government of this country. On the 6th of December the Minister resigned. On the 8th, at night, I received from her Majesty a command to wait on her at Osborne-house, in the Isle of Wight. I arrived in London on the 10th, and on the 11th I proceeded to the Isle of Wight. Now, of course it could not but appear to me that her Majesty had received the resignation of her Ministers, and that she wished to consult me as to the formation of an Administration. I felt that in any ordinary circumstances the only thing I could usefully do would have been to decline that commission. The party to which I belong were in a minority of from 90 to 100 in the House of Commons. I could not think that it would be for the public service to expose her Majesty to the chance of an arrangement which must very soon lead to another change. (Hear.) I do not wish to enter into the causes why in the present Parliament the numbers of those who generally agree with me in opinion are inferior to those who follow the right hon. gentleman; but I must state, because it is my opinion, and I cannot conceal it, that during the time we were in the Administration our motives never received a fair construction (hear), and our measures never received an impartial consideration (hear) from those who are our political opponents. (Hear, hear.) But be that, Sir, as it may, the result being that we were in a minority, I could not consider that it would be for the public service that we should form a Government. Sir, I was no sooner admitted to an audience of Her Majesty, than she informed me she had sent for me to undertake the formation of a new Administration. I at once stated to her what I now state, that those I acted with were in a minority. Her Majesty replied by putting into my hand a paper, which she said the right hon. gentleman had given to her just before, the day before I believe, stating generally the reasons why he had resigned, and stating also that he would be ready in his private capacity to give every assistance and support to whatever new ministry her Majesty might choose for the settlement of the question of the Corn Laws. (Cheers.) Sir, I immediately stated to her Majesty that the perusal of that paper altered the state of the question, and that if her Majesty would permit me I would consult those I was in the habit of acting with, and ascertain from them what their sentiments were as to our duty to her Majesty. I immediately came back to London, where I consulted a few persons who were within reach, and who were of opinion that it was very desirable, if possible, to know exactly the nature of the measure which the right hon. gentleman had in contemplation. The right hon. gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was good enough to call on me, and to inform me generally of the state of this country and of Ireland, and to give me all the information it was desirable for me to know. I stated to him the wish of my colleagues. He next day stated to me that the right hon. baronet now at the head of the Government did not think it would be convenient for the public service that he should state the details of the measures he proposed on the subject of the Corn Laws. I then again called together those with whom I am in the habit of acting, and stated that I would endeavour to frame an outline of a measure on the Corn Laws, and communicate it to the right hon. gentleman, in order to ascertain whether it was a measure which would meet with his support. Now, I may be asked, and therefore I will state it at once, what prospect I can have of carrying any measure of the kind? I have already stated that my opinion was that it was not advisable for me to attempt to form an Administration, but when there was a prospect of a settlement of the Corn Laws, which the right hon. gentleman thought with his Administration he was not likely to effect, I did consider that such a settlement would be so great an advantage to the country,—that to obtain it would put an end to so much of discontent, while it would be the source of so much future good, that I should be justified in encountering great risks for the attainment of such an object. But there was another and a further question. Suppose I were to have proposed a settlement of the corn question, should I attempt it without endeavouring to get such a majority of this House as would influence the House of Lords, or should I propose to her Majesty to dissolve Parliament and obtain the triumph over their opinions by public opinion expressed at the elections? (Hear, hear.) Sir, I confess it appeared to me that if it were possible to obtain a settlement of the Corn Laws without having recourse to a general election, without putting in strife the various interests, commercial and manufacturing, against the landed and agricultural, that would be the course most for the benefit of the country. But it was impossible that I could obtain much concurrence in this House unless I had not only the support of those who agree with me, and of those who support the cause of absolute Free Trade, but also that of the right hon. gentleman and a considerable number of those who usually support his measures. The right hon. gentleman, in a letter which her Majesty showed me (and which I would read if the right hon. gentleman wished me), said for reasons which I think cogent, that it was not, in his opinion, desirable that a person out of the service of the Crown should be consulted on the details of a measure which would be submitted on the responsibility of the Government. I had then to consider what was the kind of measure which, if I formed a Government, it would be our duty to propose. I thought it necessary to hold a consultation with those with whom I was accustomed to act; in the first place, because the letter to which I have already alluded was written from a strong feeling of public duty, and an apprehension of public danger, and when only two persons with whom I happened to be in immediate relation were cognisant of my intention. I thought it necessary therefore to consult with those who usually act with me, and who were dispersed in different parts of the country, as to how far they were agreed on the question, before I undertook so arduous a duty as the settlement of the Corn Laws, that I might avoid the risk of forming a Government, and putting the country to great inconvenience, when there was a chance of the measure not being assented to by my colleagues. Sir, the grounds on which, in the letter to which the right hon. baronet has referred, I stated my opinion that the Corn Laws ought to be settled, were, first, that the proposal of any duty at present, without a provision for its extinction in a short period, would only prolong a contest, already sufficiently fruitful of animosity and discontent. (Hear.) I stated also that neither the Government nor the Legislature could ever regulate the corn markets with the benefit that would result from entire Free Trade; but I also said, let the Ministers propose such a revision of taxation as would in their opinions render the public burdens more just and equal, and let them add any other regulation which a cautious and scrupulous forbearance might suggest. Those were the general principles on which I proposed the consideration of the question as to the Corn Laws. Perhaps I can best explain my views by reading a letter which I addressed to Her Majesty, a part of which was referred to by the right hon. gentleman. I cannot read it without referring to some measures which the right hon. gentleman is stated to have in contemplation. I should state that I repeat them from memory, because of the first letter of the right hon. gentleman, which was shown me by her Majesty, I never had a copy. This is the letter which I sent to her Majesty:—

“Chesham place, Dec. 16, 1845.

“Lord John Russell presents his humble duty to your Majesty, and has the honour to submit to your Majesty the following considerations:

“Sir Robert Peel's letter to your Majesty, communicated to Lord John Russell at Osborne House, offers the support of Sir Robert Peel to his successors, provided their measures should be founded on certain principles, which are there explained, and framed in a spirit of caution and forbearance towards the interest to be affected.

“The measures which Sir Robert Peel had in contemplation appear to have been the present suspension of the duties on corn—a repeal of the Corn Laws at no remote period, preceded by a diminution of duties; relief to the occupiers of land from burdens by which they are peculiarly affected, as far as it may be practicable.

“Upon full consideration of these proposals, Lord John Russell is prepared to assent to the opening of the ports, and to the fiscal relief which it was intended to afford.

“But upon maturely weighing the second proposal, that by which duties would, after a suspension, or temporary repeal, namely, be re-imposed and again diminished, there appears to him to be grave objections to such a measure.

“The advantage given thereby to the land appears to him more apparent than real; the uncertainty of prices in future years will be aggravated, and the prospect of a complete Free Trade would be still kept in the distance; the prospect alarming the farmer, and the distance irritating the merchants and manufacturers.

“In this view he finds that many persons deeply engaged to the maintenance and support of the agricultural class entirely participate.

“So great an object as the settlement of this question might indeed have been held sufficient to justify the support of Sir R. Peel's Administration, had they proposed such a measure. But, as Lord J. Russell is placed at present, he could not himself propose a measure against which the weight of argument, as well as public opinion, appears to him to preponderate.

“Had the harvest been plentiful, and corn cheap, it might have been very advisable to have diminished the duties gradually, but the restoration of a duty after suspension has all the appearance of the re-enactment of a protective law.

“Lord John Russell humbly submits to your Majesty that should the proposal of an immediate repeal, instead of immediate suspension and ultimate repeal of the Corn Law, preclude Sir Robert Peel from affording that support to the new Government which he so spontaneously and handsomely offered in his letter of the 10th of December, Lord John Russell must humbly decline the task so graciously confided to him by your Majesty.

“Lord John Russell concurs with the reasoning of Sir Robert Peel, which shows the inexpediency of pledging him to the outline of a series of measures.

“The measures for fiscal purposes, therefore, would have to be considered in detail by those alone who may be in your Majesty's service.

“Lord John Russell trusts that your Majesty will attribute the reluctance which he feels to undertake the Government without a previous knowledge of the opinion of Sir Robert Peel to his very deep sense of the injury the country may sustain from the rejection of a measure of such vital importance, and not to a desire to obtain a security for those who may be in power.”

Her Majesty was graciously pleased to answer my letter the same evening, informing me that she had sent to Sir R. Peel, and that she understood the motives by which I was guided in endeavouring to procure support for the great measure which I had undertaken to propose. All I shall say in this place is, that those rumours which were circulated, that I was unable to bring those I consulted to an agreement on the subject of the Corn Laws, were utterly unfounded. (Hear, hear.) Those I consulted—all, with the exception of my brother, the Duke of Bedford, persons who had belonged to her Majesty's Privy Council, and had been in the Cabinet during either the present or the former reign—entirely concurred with me in the sentiments expressed in my letter. Her Majesty next day desired I would attend her at Windsor Castle; and when I then explained the difficulty which I felt, she put into my hands a letter from the right hon. baronet, which, if he has no objection, I will read.

SIR R. PEEL.—I have no objection.

LORD J. RUSSELL then read the following letter from Sir Robert Peel to her Majesty:—

“Whitehall, Dec. 17, 1845.

“Sir Robert Peel presents his humble duty to your Majesty, and takes the earliest opportunity of acknowledging the receipt of your Majesty's letter of yesterday, which reached him at a late hour last night.

“Sir Robert Peel feels assured that your Majesty will permit him humbly to refer to the communications he has addressed to your Majesty since his tender of resignation, as an evidence of his earnest desire to co-operate in a private capacity in the adjustment of the question of the corn laws.

“In the letter of Lord John Russell to your Majesty, he expresses his concurrence in the reasoning of Sir Robert Peel, which shows the inexpediency of pledging Sir Robert

Peel to the outline of a series of measures connected with the settlement of that question.

“Lord John Russell requires, at the same time, that Sir Robert Peel should give assurances which amount substantially to a pledge, that he will support one of those measures, namely, the immediate and total repeal of the corn laws.

“Sir Robert Peel humbly expresses to your Majesty his regret that he does not feel it to be consistent with his duty to enter upon the consideration of this important question in Parliament, being fettered by a previous engagement of the nature of that required from him.”

Now, Sir, (continued the noble lord), I think the right hon. gentleman has somewhat misunderstood the letter which I addressed to her Majesty. What I wanted was, not a previous pledge on the part of the right hon. gentleman; but what I thought was, that the right hon. gentleman having stated the general nature of the measure he proposed—if we afterwards proposed a measure going beyond what he was prepared to bring forward—if he should then find himself precluded from supporting it, we should incur the same evil I have already alluded to. What I wished from the right hon. gentleman was, that he should not feel himself precluded from taking the measure into consideration when brought into Parliament. The letter I have just read, though it proceeds on a misunderstanding of my letter, seems to amount substantially to this—that the right hon. gentleman was quite ready to consider, and did not regard himself as precluded from supporting such a measure, if brought before Parliament by her Majesty's ministers. On considering that letter, those with whom I consulted, as well as myself, were of opinion, that though the task was one subject to great risk, though it was full of danger and hazard; yet, placed as we were, we should run that peril, and assure her Majesty that we would undertake the task.

When I came to that determination, I was by no means blind to the very heavy responsibility which lay upon me. I have already said that I wished the question of the Corn Laws settled; but I wish that settlement to be effected, if possible, without a violent struggle between different interests in the country, by the full and deliberate consent of Parliament. I was aware—I hardly know how I should express that opinion—but I was aware that many politicians, and many who care little about politics, parties connected with the great manufacturing towns, and interested in the question, as well as men who sit on this side of the House, who are of the Liberal party, whatever their various denominations, had declared, when the question was put to them whether they were disposed to support a measure brought forward by Sir R. Peel for the repeal of the Corn Laws, that they should not hesitate to do so, having more at heart the success of the measure than the advancement of the interests of any political party (hear); while, on the other hand, I was also aware that there were men who followed Sir R. Peel, who would follow him and give him their confidence so as to maintain him in power, but who would not vote for any measure founded on the same principle. (Cheers.) Now, I must state this, because it is a fact, that the opinions to which I refer in favour of such a measure were conveyed to me, not only by many persons who were personally known to me, but by many others whose names I had never heard—persons connected with Manchester and other places, who were especially anxious for a settlement of the question. (Hear, hear, hear.) I thought it would be incurring great hazard and risk to take upon myself to act upon a different opinion. (Hear, hear.) But I certainly thought that while the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues who supported him in the Cabinet would promote a settlement of the Corn Laws, there were many others, such as the noble lord who moved the Address to-night, that would give me their support if they thought the measure suited to the circumstances of the country, though I was not the person who possessed their political confidence. But we felt we had a great risk to encounter, and that if we should fail in our attempt, if we proposed a measure only to give rise to a long protracted struggle, or some new Administration should be formed to begin a new settlement of the question, and propose a new measure, I knew that on us would fall the blame of having attempted what we could not accomplish. While, then, having this difficult task before me, I felt it was necessary that all those with whom I consulted should be ready and willing to take part in an Administration, to bear the risk and encounter the opposition to which they would be exposed, and to give their co-operation and advice as official Ministers of the Crown—I must say that the disposition of those with whom I consulted in general—I must bear this testimony that they looked only to public objects, that they did not consider whether it was for the advantage of their party or of themselves that an Administration should be formed, but that they did consider above all, and over all, the great questions which they were called upon to decide. I, therefore, told her Majesty on the 18th of December, that I was ready to undertake the formation of an Administration; but on the following morning, after I had endeavoured to make my arrangements, I found that one of those with whom I had consulted, had objections which it was impossible to overcome, and that I should lose his assistance in the Administration which I proposed to form. I do not think it necessary to enter on the grounds of those objections, it is quite enough to say that they had power to deprive me of the assistance of his services. His name has been frequently mentioned, and I see not why I should not state that I refer to Lord Grey. With the highest respect for Lord Grey, for his great talents, for his courage and his honesty, I should nevertheless not have thought, on an ordinary occasion that the loss of a person, even of his importance, should have prevented me from undertaking the formation of a Government. But when I take in view the risk which was to be encountered, and the necessity which existed that we should all go together on this great question—when I considered that my noble friend was among the first of those acting with me in Parliament, who declared that he regarded no other measure but complete free trade in corn adequate to meet the exigencies of the country—when I put all those things together, I did think that the task of forming a Government, leaving out my noble friend, was a task which I was not justified in attempting. I could not but consider, that if my noble friend was absent from that Ministry, all kinds of interpretations would be put upon his absence and the Ministry be weakened at its very commencement. Considering, therefore, the absolute necessity, as I thought there was, for complete agreement, considering the importance of the person who could not take a part in the Administration, I came to the conclusion that it was necessary for me to give up the task which Her Majesty had graciously confided to me. Some may say the attempt might have been made to remedy that difference. But I had to consider that for more than eight days the country had been kept in expectation—that that the want of a Government was a very serious evil—and that if I could not succeed in forming an Administration, the right hon. gentleman would in all probability think it his duty to attempt effecting a settlement of the question. It was in this mind, therefore, that I waited upon Her Majesty on the morning of the 20th of December, and made the following communication to Her Majesty:—

“Chesham-place, Dec. 20, 1845.

“Lord John Russell presents his humble duty to your Majesty, and has the honour to state that he has found it impossible to form an Administration.

“Lord John Russell was aware from the first moment when your Majesty was pleased to propose to him this commission, that there were very great difficulties in the way, which it required the most cordial co-operation on the part of his friends, and the firm support of a large portion of those who followed Sir Robert Peel, to surmount.

“Lord John Russell has had solely in view the settlement of the question of the Corn Laws, by which the country is so much agitated.

“Those who have served your Majesty and your royal predecessor in Cabinet offices during the administrations of Lord Grey and Lord Melbourne, who were now in political connection with Lord John Russell, were consulted by him. They agreed on the principles by which they would be guided in framing a measure for the repeal of the Corn Laws. Thus one great difficulty was surmounted. But, as the party which acts with Lord John Russell is in a minority in both Houses of Parliament, it was necessary to ascertain how far they were likely to obtain the support of Sir Robert Peel.

“Your Majesty is acquainted with all that has passed on this subject. Lord John Russell is quite ready to admit that Sir Robert Peel has been willing from the commencement to the end to diminish the difficulties in the course of a new Government prepared to attempt the settlement of the corn laws. But Sir Robert Peel could not, of course, rely on the support of his political friends, should the proposed measure be in their eyes dangerous and unwise.

“In this uncertainty of obtaining a majority in the House of Commons, it was absolutely necessary that all those who were prominent in the political party to which Lord John Russell is attached should give their zealous aid, and act in concert in the new Administration.

“Lord John Russell has, in one instance, been unable to obtain this concert, and he must now consider that task as hopeless, which has been from the beginning hazardous.

“Lord John Russell is deeply sensible of the embarrassment caused by the present state of public affairs. He will be ready, therefore, to do all in his power, as a member of Parliament, to promote the settlement of that question which in present circumstances, is the source of so much danger, especially to the welfare and peace of Ireland.

“Lord John Russell would have formed his Ministry on the basis of a complete Free Trade in corn, to be established at once without gradation or delay. He would have accompanied that proposal with measures of relief to a considerable extent of the occupiers of land from the burdens to which they are subjected. But he will be little disposed to insist, as a member of Parliament, on what may seem to your Majesty's advisers an impracticable course. The country requires, above all things, an early and peaceable settlement of a question which, if not settled, may in an adverse state of affairs cause a fearful convulsion.”

I owe a debt of the deepest gratitude to her Majesty for the gracious manner in which she entrusted me with the task of forming an administration, and for the facilities which she was always ready to afford with the view of lessening the difficulties of the task I had undertaken. Her Majesty has imposed upon me a burden of obligation which I cannot sufficiently acknowledge. I would say, in reference to the right hon. gentleman's offer of assistance, that it was entirely spontaneous; and as to his subsequent communications, there was nothing that tended to make my task more difficult. (Hear, hear, hear.) With regard to my noble friend Lord Grey, I am exceedingly sorry that I was not able to overcome his objections; but, in justice to him, I should certainly state that they did not arise from any objects of a personal nature, but that they were of a public nature, and were stated by him in what he felt to be the discharge of a public duty. (Hear, hear.) As to the question now in agitation with regard to the Corn Laws, I do hope we may be able to come to such an agreement as may afford the country the hope of its peaceable settlement at the present time. (Cheers.) At agricultural meetings I have with no inconsiderable surprise seen it alleged that the danger had been exaggerated, and therefore that the protecting laws should be left as at present. But do the gentlemen who use such language never carry their thoughts forward? Do they never consider that, if it has pleased Providence to visit us with an affliction lighter than was at one time dreaded, such may not always be their consolation; that there may come a time when scarcity will be undoubted—when it will come home to the eyes, the understandings, and the feelings of every man—when the prospect of famine may be too real and too near not to appal the stoutest hearted amongst us? And do they wish to wait for such a time? (Hear, hear.) Do they think it desirable that a settlement of the Corn Laws should be delayed till a season shall come when we shall have no power of choice, no discretion left to be exercised as to the nature of the measure, but when the multitude will imperiously demand the instant abrogation of the laws which limit the supplies of food. Is there any one who has watched events that will say the law of 1842 is sufficient to provide for the food of the people, and that a measure for the free admission of foreign corn not is required? The House has heard what the author of the law has said to-night. The House has heard what the right hon. gentleman has stated as the result of his observations and experience. He, with his natural talents; he, with his acquired experience; he, placed at the head of affairs, with that heavy responsibility weighing upon him which he has so truly described, which involves the highest honour and trust to which a subject can attain, but which is at the same time the most grave if not the most alarming of responsibilities. (Cries of hear, hear.) I do trust, therefore, we are about to see a settlement of this question. When the right hon. gentleman brings forward his measure, I shall perhaps have some observations to make, both as regards the nature of the measure itself, as to the provisions which may accompany it, and as to the inexpediency of waiting, even to the present time, before the repeal of the law of 1842 was proposed. For the present I refrain from all such topics. I must, however, refer to another subject which is always in my mind whenever I think of public affairs—I mean the subject of Ireland. I will not deny that I feel I should have been enabled to place the government of that country in the hands of persons who, by conciliation and firmness, would have tempered and allayed many of the evils which weigh on that unhappy country. I did think, if I did succeed in carrying a bill for taking off restrictive duties on corn and various manufactures that I might have been able to propose a large and comprehensive scheme on the subject of Ireland, which would have been the foundation of future peace. (Hear, hear.) I did certainly indulge in such dreams. I cannot assent to any opinions in favour of the wisdom of the Government's conduct as to Ireland from the time they came into office till the present day. (Hear, hear.) I see now, according to the Queen's Speech, that dreadful acts of premeditated assassination call for some new law. I shall be ready to support measures calculated to suppress such crimes. But there are in Ireland adverse associations—one asking for that dangerous, and I think fatal measure, the repeal of the Union; the other issuing addresses, from which it appears they consider partiality should still be the rule, and that their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects are not entitled to the same favour from the Legislature as the Protestants. I am sorry to say I do not think anything has been done or been doing to establish that peace, or procure for this country that affection, which are so earnestly to be desired. I shall not enter further on that subject. I have stated the transactions which took place when her Majesty was pleased to call on me to form a Government—the reason why I was unable to do so—my views of the policy which has been pursued in Ireland. I have now only to say, that whether in office or out of office, I shall be ready to give my hearty assent to measures which I think are for the benefit of the country in whatever quarter they are proposed. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. D'Israeli followed Lord John Russell in a speech replete with bitterness and satire, and after a short speech from Mr. Miles, and one or two agricultural members, the address was voted without opposition, and the house broke up about half-past ten.

LORD RADNOR'S REPLY TO LORD BROUGHAM IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

The Earl of RADNOR confessed that he was somewhat surprised and indeed startled by the energetic and unqualified terms in which his noble and learned friend, who had addressed the house at such length (Lord Brougham), had reprobated the notion that a government should adopt measures in deference to "pressure from without." He was a little surprised that such an objection should come from such a source. (Loud cries of "hear, hear.") However, he was far from expressing his dissent from much that his noble and learned friend had said upon this point. He concurred with his friend in thinking that it was a deplorable thing that a government should never take a wise, a judicious, or a salutary step, unless under the coercion of pressure from without. (Hear, hear, hear.) It was indeed very much to be lamented, but how could it be helped? This state of things could not be avoided so long as there was a government in this country which would not or could not lead the public mind (loud cries of "hear, hear")—a government which did not address itself to the common sense and sound judgment of the community, and which never thought of enforcing its measures by reason and argument. Such a government must always yield to "the pressure from without." (Hear, hear, hear.) He admitted with sorrow and shame, that for many years back it had been too much the practice of Governments in this country to introduce salutary measures only under the compulsion of that description of influence which his noble friend had designated "the pressure from without;" (hear, hear;) it was a lamentable fact, but not the less a fact. He would be glad to know by what means had all those great measures been carried through Parliament which his noble and learned friend had supported so powerfully by his eloquence in by-gone days? Was it not by the pressure from without? (hear, hear;) how had the Reform Bill been carried, he should like to know? (hear, hear;) how, but by the pressure from without? (hear, hear;) how had the abolition of slavery been accomplished? (hear, hear;) how, but by the pressure from without? And was it not notoriously true that it was by the like means that the repeal of the orders of council had been effected, and that the Catholic Emancipation Bill, after encountering for many successive years the most desperate opposition, at length obtained the sanction of the Legislature? He would wish to ask his noble and learned friend before he left his place, to what circumstance he attributed the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts? Would his noble friend hesitate to reply, "To the pressure from without" (loud cries of "hear, hear")? He (the Earl of Radnor) lamented that the fact should be so, for it was a fact by no means honourable to our rulers; but it must of necessity occur in every country where the people outstripped in intelligence the government which was in possession of the helm of the state (loud cheers.) He must be pardoned if he took leave to observe, that in his opinion nothing could be more unfair or more unjustifiable than the attack which his noble friend had made upon the leading members of the Anti-Corn-Law League (hear, hear, hear.) He had denounced the raising of voluntary contributions; but, in so doing, he had very wisely and properly made a reservation in favour of collections for charitable purposes. Amongst such collections he (Lord Radnor) hesitated not to class the collection which was made by the League (hear, hear, hear.) Of all things in the world, the raising of money with a view to the demolition of the detestable Corn Laws was, in his opinion, the most charitable (hear, hear, and loud cheers.) But nothing could be more absurd (under favour be it spoken) than his noble friend's doctrine with respect to the levying of contributions. (Hear, hear.) If that doctrine were to hold good, a contribution of money for the purpose of constructing a railway would be unconstitutional; (hear, hear;) so too would the subscription which was now on foot for the purpose of improving the dwellings of the metropolitan poor;

(hear, hear;) so too would a collection for the erection of a church or public edifice of any kind; in a word, there was no conceivable purpose for which men, in the exercise of their own discretion, might think fit to subscribe their own money, which would not be absolutely and scandalously unconstitutional, if the doctrine of his noble and learned friend were to pass current. (Loud cries of Hear, hear, and cheers.) His noble friend had peremptorily asserted that it was unconstitutional to subscribe to the Anti-Corn-Law League; but, with all possible respect for his noble friend, he would take the liberty of denying this assertion. (Hear, hear.) He (Lord Radnor) was himself a subscriber to the Anti-Corn-Law League (hear, hear), and so far from thinking that he had done anything in the least unconstitutional, he was decidedly of opinion that he could not have done anything more consistent with Christian charity than to have subscribed (hear, hear, hear.) He considered that every penny was given in charity which was given to get rid of these detestable Corn Laws (hear, hear, and cheers.) This was his deliberate opinion, and he was prepared to justify it. It was not the fact that the leaders of the League were collecting money for the purpose of buying votes. They had no such intention. They bought no votes. They were engaged in a great national movement, and the object of collecting this money was to carry on a profound and wisely-devised project of agitation for five years longer if necessary; but they traded not in votes nor in rent-charges (hear, hear, and cheers.) They used their influence and their powers of persuasion to induce the people to purchase what would entitle them to votes (hear, hear, hear.)—They exhorted them to lay out their money in a manner which would enable them to give expression to their opinions, and that too in a way which would have influence with the Legislature; and what could there be more legitimate—what more constitutional than this? (Hear, hear.) Was he to be told there was anything unconstitutional or illegitimate in a man's endeavouring to give weight, currency, and circulation to an opinion which he had conscientiously conceived, and which in his heart he believed to be founded on truth and justice? (Hear, hear, and cheers.) It was monstrous to say so. The League did not traffic in votes, they did not buy and sell them (hear); they did not take advantage of the 50*l.* clause in the Reform Act, nor did they split up property to make votes, (Hear, hear.) There was nothing unconstitutional in their proceedings. It was unconstitutional to say to the contrary (hear, hear, and cheers.) He begged leave to ask his noble and learned friend whether he considered it unconstitutional to agitate (hear, hear)? His noble friend should be the last in the world to say so. (Hear, hear, hear.) Had not his noble friend agitated—zealously and powerfully agitated—for the abolition of the slave trade (hear, hear)? Was he not the prominent man in that agitation (hear, hear)? Was he not the great leader in it (hear, hear)? And when it was at length carried, who was there who rejoiced more cordially at the success of the measure than he (hear, hear)? His noble friend had insinuated that the leaders of the League were actuated by base and mercenary motives—that, in fact, they only consulted their own profit and aggrandisement. It was no such thing. (Loud cries of "hear.") To their own great loss and inconvenience, to the great peril and insecurity of their business, which they were obliged to neglect, they, with vast expenditure of time, money, and labour, with singular disinterestedness, and remarkable honesty of purpose, devoted themselves to the Anti Corn Law movement, simply because they were convinced that the repeal of that hateful code would be of the utmost benefit to the public in general. It was a little too hard that the motives of such men should be misinterpreted, their characters calumniated, and their intentions misrepresented. The League was first instituted in the year 1839, and originally consisted of seven Manchester gentlemen. Since then it had made gigantic progress in the favour of the people, and had already attained an eminence which commanded an enforced respect. And wherefore was this? because the people saw that the cause which it advocated was the cause of justice, honesty, and wisdom (hear, hear.) He (Lord Radnor) for one was resolved to support the League to the utmost of his ability. (Hear, hear.) He was sorry that the Government should be led and coerced in this way; but as long as their Government was one which did not yield to argument and the dictates of reason, so long must it of necessity submit to the influence of the pressure from without. (Hear, hear, hear.) His noble friend was somewhat contradictory in his speech, for fierce though the attack was which he made upon the League, he actually commenced his address by expressing his gratification that there was a prospect of the country's enjoying the blessings of Free Trade. ("Hear," and cheers.) How long would it have been before the country would have enjoyed those blessings were it not for the exertions of the League? (Loud cries of "Hear, hear, hear.") Were it not for those exertions his noble friend would have been obliged to delight the House with his eloquent speeches in favour of Free Trade night after night for many a weary session in vain. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) But through the influence of the League, the "pressure from without" had been brought to bear on the Government, and the Government must yield to that pressure, or woe to them and woe to the country. (Hear, hear.) The majority of the people were in favour of the League, and he (Lord Radnor) rejoiced in the contemplation of the measures which the Government, no doubt, intended ere long to bring forward. In conclusion, he would again declare his conviction that the Anti-Corn-Law League were actuated by no unworthy—no mercenary views—that they did not mean to do anything unconstitutional; but that they agitated because they knew that agitation was absolutely necessary; and there was a time when his noble friend was of the same opinion too. (Hear, and cheers.)

"The Rev. Mr. Spencer, a clergyman of the Church of England, is lecturing on Temperance and the Corn Laws of Great Britain. We should think he had better be employed in preaching the Gospel and administering the sacraments, to which he has been set apart by the Holy Ghost." We find the above in the Calendar, the Episcopal paper published in this city. Isn't it "rich?" What has the Gospel to do with the vulgar work of saving the drunkard and feeding the starving?—The Liberator, (N.Y.) Dec. 19.

KIRKALDY.—A movement towards a subscription in aid of the League Fund has been commenced here to-day, and already a sum of upwards of 1500*l.* has been collected.

THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

We have heard many good friends to the cause in Southampton express an anxiety to do something in aid of this great movement. We would advise them to call an early preliminary meeting—let all who attend resolve themselves into a committee, appoint one of their members treasurer to receive and forward subscriptions, put down their own names immediately for what they purpose to give themselves, and then set about canvassing their friends out of doors for assistance. Subsequently a soirée might be held similar to that held two years ago in aid of the former fund, at which some gentlemen actively connected with the League would no doubt attend, and then the subscription might be extended. Other necessary details the committee would of course be able to arrange, but unless the Southampton subscription amount to at least 1000*l.*, (of which, be it understood, only 200*l.* would have to be paid down), we shall say that our fellow-townsmen will not have done their share in the work of emancipating British industry from landlordly and dealer thralldom, and will have no title to participate in the glory of the coming triumph.—Hampshire Independent.

We are happy to announce that the friends of Free Trade in this town, have set about in good earnest to get up subscriptions for the purpose of emancipating British Industry. Two gentlemen commenced canvassing on the afternoon of Tuesday last, and before evening a sum was entered on the subscription list which justifies the conclusion that Whitehaven will not, in proportion to its size, be a whit behind our neighbours. We shall be able to advance something more definite on the subject in our next number.—Whitehaven Herald, Jan. 17.

It will be seen that the amount subscribed in Dundee was (to last night) nearly 2500*l.* We are happy to learn that at least 500*l.* more is expected. Limited, however, as the friends of Free Trade here have been, we are informed that those in Kirkcaldy have been still more so, which is another noble example for other places to imitate. At a private and preparatory meeting held in Kirkcaldy on Wednesday evening, 1000*l.* was subscribed in a few minutes, Mr. Fergus giving 400*l.* of it; and yesterday forenoon the subscriptions amounted to 1700*l.*, and much more is expected. From such an example, we hope that those in Dundee who have not yet come forward and declared their subscriptions will now do so.—Dundee Advertiser, Jan. 16.

Up to this about 18,000*l.* has been subscribed in Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee; and the Fund may now be stated altogether at 150,000*l.* It is pretty evident, therefore, that the towns and districts which do not make their subscriptions, soon will be deprived of the honour of assisting, in so far as the raising of the 250,000*l.* is concerned, in giving this last blow to the stronghold of monopoly.—Glasgow Argus, Jan. 19.

ABERDEEN.—We understand that subscriptions are about to be opened in this place, in aid of the Quarter of a Million Fund, now being raised throughout the country, for giving the coup de grace to that most iniquitous of all legislative abominations, the tax on bread.—Montrose Review, Jan. 16.

FORFAR.—The Anti-Corn Law Association here is again roused from its usual state of quiescence, by the news received from head-quarters. The committee have resolved upon convening a public meeting, getting up a subscription for the general fund, and otherwise making "a strong pull," in the hope that it will be the last.

William Marshall, Esq., M.P., for this city, has directed his name to be entered in the Carlisle subscription list to the Anti-Corn Law League Fund of a Quarter of a Million, for the sum of 300*l.*

ST. ANDREWS.—MR. ELLICE, M.P.—Mr. Ellice met his constituents here in our Town Hall, on the evening of Friday last. The Hall was crowded to excess, and our member, by his manly and straightforward conduct, pleased all. On the motion of Bailie Brown, seconded by Dean of Guild Sims, Bailie Wright took the chair, and having expressed in a neat Free Trade speech the object of the meeting, Mr. Ellice at great length entered upon the all-engrossing topic of Free Trade, particularly in the staff of life. He also explained the part he had taken and votes given by him in the last session of Parliament, in the manner he had done the previous evening at Cupar. Mr. Ellice, in conclusion, stated that he had neither the wish nor the intention to change his connexion with our burghs, whatever rumour might say to the contrary, so long as his constituents were satisfied with his Parliamentary conduct, which should be, as in time past, that of a free and independent member, anxious to legislate, not "for the few," but "for the many."—Fife Herald, Jan. 15*th*.

SHEFFIELD.—MR. WARD'S ADDRESS.—On Thursday, the 15*th* inst., Mr. Ward paid his seventh annual visit to his Sheffield constituents, and addressed a crowded meeting at the Town Hall, giving an account of his political stewardship, and of the various public questions which had been agitated during last session. He declared that his policy was progressive, and that he considered the great question in which the country was now engaged as much a struggle against monopoly in votes as against monopoly in food. "You will recollect," said Mr. Ward, "That I am now speaking as a man connected with land. Everything I have in the world depends upon it. If I take a wrong view, I am destroying the comfort of my life, and the fortunes of my children. I have every reason to weigh the thing nicely and accurately; and I say conscientiously and honestly, that I have not the least apprehension as to the issue. I believe that we shall do better with Free Trade. I believe that you will do better, and we shall do better because you do better. The thing acts and re-acts. What we want are wealthy, well-employed customers. (Cheers.)" A motion was put from the chair, and carried by a universal show of hands, expressing the thanks of the meeting to the honourable gentleman for his annual visit, and respectfully requesting him to support, to the utmost of his power, any measure which may be proposed in the approaching session, for a total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws.

THE QUALIFICATION MOVEMENT.—We understand that the committee of the Anti-Corn-Law League, in this city, expects that fully 100 freeholds will be purchased in East Cumberland, in time to admit their owners upon the Register for next year. A great number have also been taken up for West Cumberland.—Carlisle Journal, Jan. 17.

At Bradford, the election of two Free Traders appears secure. The requisition to Mr. Busfield and Col. Thompson has nearly 550 signatures, besides 250 promises that have not signed; the total on the register being 1800, and less than five-sixths usually voting. Meanwhile the process of addition is going on.

CORRESPONDENCE.

RENT OF LAND IN SURREY.
To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

London, January 15, 1846.

SIR,—It is a favourite assertion of the "protectionists" that the Corn Laws are for the benefit of the tenant farmers and labourers.

Having frequently heard eminent practical farmers in Scotland maintain that the only gainers by the Corn Laws are the corn factors, the wish to ascertain the correctness of the assertion led me to make a few inquiries.

The first answers I received were so favourable to a change, and the wish so earnestly expressed that a ministry should come into power with a Free Trade measure in their hand, that I was disposed to deny the allegation altogether. My informant was an owner as well as tenant of land, the value of which he had increased by draining and other improvements.

The next replies I received were of an opposite kind. A farmer who holds land which in Scotland would readily yield a rent of 50s. to 3*l*. per acre, for which he pays 27s. per acre, declaimed loudly against any chance of a reduction in the price of wheat by the advent of Free Trade. With very ordinary cultivation, his land has upon it fine Swedes and good wheat; and from seven acres of hop land he sold hops enough last year (the crop elsewhere being very deficient) to pay two-thirds of two years rent of the whole farm. In very many farms in this part of the country, the land is either not at all, or most insufficiently drained; even where the soil is deep and of a productive nature, they never subsoil-plough it. In a large number of the farm yards, placed on sloping ground, at the lower side you may see an open pond, into which all the valuable liquid manure is allowed to run; thus "wasting their sweetness on the desert air." By an intelligent gentleman, resident in the county, I am informed that the average rent of land in Surrey does not exceed 17s. per acre, the rates which fall on the tenant being under 2s. 6d. per pound of rent. Even admitting that the lighter soils will only yield 30 bushels of wheat to the acre, is not a tenant with inadequate capital incapable of doing justice to his land and to derive as large a return as he ought, while the proprietor is a loser by receiving from him a rent below the value of his land? In many cases it is not capital, but industry, which is wanting; and in these the Corn Laws are a boon as a protection to native idleness.

Not to occupy too much of your space, in my next I shall advert to the case of the labourers, the other supporters claimed by protectionists for the Corn Laws.

I shall conclude in the eloquent words of Mr. Rutherford, M.P. for Leith, in a late address to his constituents at Musselburgh, that "deep and large as are the other benefits that will result from the total repeal of the Corn Laws, we may look upon the putting down of that which separates one great class of the community from the other classes, and which will unite them in the bonds of common brotherhood, as one of the most important blessings which can be conferred on this country."

I remain, Sir, yours &c.,
A PROPRIETOR OF LAND IN SCOTLAND,
On a Visit in Surrey.

THE DISTRIBUTION OF SHEETS, BLANKETS, AND SMOCK-FROCKS, TO MANY OF THE STARVING PEASANTRY OF OXFORDSHIRE AND BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—Those Free Traders whose favours I have had the honour to acknowledge, through the medium of your "great fact" paper, will, I doubt not, be pleased to hear that ten deserving and needy labourers on the Duke of Buckingham's estate, have each been supplied this week, by me, with a good linen frock, and others have been supplied with sheets and blankets. I assure your many readers that I have not spared myself, but have gone from hovel to hovel, day after day, to see and examine for myself, the untold and unreasonable sufferings of the Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire peasantry. I shall just describe the real condition of three or four families in the village of Oakley, near Brill, Bucks.

1st. George Hepburn has a wife and three children; wages six shillings a week on the roads; pays poor's rates and highway rates!!!

2nd. William Winter has a very sickly wife and two children; they live in a hovel, in the wall of which there is a large hole, but not an inch of glass; the starving and wretched family live, sleep, and perish on the same damp floor!! This poor man pays poor's rates and highway rates out of 6s. or 7s. a week. He works on the roads, but as I had to write in the dark at the door, and was compelled to use my hat for a writing table, I cannot tell whether my figure is 6s. or 7s., but I believe the poor man's wages are only 6s. per week.

3rd. Samuel Tebby has a wife and three children; works on the roads; wages 7s. a week, out of which he pays 1s. 6d. a week for rent!! There is, therefore, remaining only 5s. 6d. a week, out of which the poor man has to support himself, his wife, and three children this winter.

4th. John Hubbock has a wife and three children; works on the roads; wages 6s. a week, out of which he pays 2*l*. 10s. a year house rent, and about 8s. a year rates and taxes!! Brethren! Free Traders! friends of the poor! read this case, and sigh for your brother! Angel of mercy, weep over this Buckinghamshire labourer! If we deduct house rent and taxes, and allow 3d. per week for soap, and 3d. for candles, we shall find that this man, with his wife and three children, have 1d. per head per day to live on, and 1d. per week over!

What a blessing it is that he has a few potatoes for his poor wife, who has just been confined with her third child.

I understand that some of the duke's faithful servants are greatly disturbed by the seasonable gift of beds, smock-frocks, sheets, and blankets, which have been distributed by me to the poor of Brill and its neighbourhood. I have many touching applications for beds, &c., from places in Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire every day.

I find that cheap as the Bible is now, many of the poor peasantry in the villages are not able to pay for a small copy of the Word of Life, and consequently I have resolved to give a small pocket Bible to such of the poor creatures as I may meet with, and find unable to pay for, but able and willing to read that best of books.

Thanks to those benevolent Free Traders who have put it into my power to add this delightful work of faith to my many and various other refreshing though arduous labours in the cause of the poor peasantry.

Thirty-five cwts. of coals, and a number of sheets, blankets, and smock-frocks have been distributed by me this week in the village of Launton, Oxon.

I am, Sir, yours very faithfully,

WM. FERGUSON,
Minister of the Independent Congregational Church, Bicester, Oxon.

Jan. 14, 1846.
[The Rev. Wm. Ferguson, minister of the Dissenting church, Bicester, Oxon, begs to inform the poor man's real friends that he has received "Tom Thumb's" letter, and another letter, containing 5*l*. from "J. S. P." and other friends, at West Bromwich, and a third letter containing a post-office order, to the amount of 1*l*. 9s. 6d., from H. Young, Esq., and other Free Traders; also a parcel containing 17 smock frocks (and more promised) from friends in town. Mr. Ferguson begs to tender his grateful thanks to his friends for their seasonable and benevolent gifts to the poor and starving peasantry in parts of Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire, and assures them that the peasantry of every denomination in his neighbourhood shall be looked after by him. His grateful thanks are also hereby tendered to Mrs. Darwin, Bromley; J. Finch, Esq., London; J. Keighley, Esq., London; W. Shrewsbury, sen., Esq., Redford, Notts; and to Luke Grimson, Esq., Loughborough, Leicestershire, for their kind gifts to the poor in the neighbourhood of Bicester, Oxon.—Jan. 19, 1846.]

[We are requested to correct a mistake in publishing the letter of Mr. Hoyland in our paper of the 3d inst.; for 10*l*. read 10s.]

CLOTHING FOR THE POOR AGRICUL-TURAL LABOURERS.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—It is the conviction of my own mind that there can be no person who, having read the statements in THE LEAGUE, giving such a sorrowful account of the awful destitution and truly miserable condition of the poor agricultural labourers in Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire, made by that most amiable and charitable of men, the Rev. Wm. Ferguson, of Bicester, Oxon, without having at once enlisted their sympathies with him, in his benevolent exertions, or without feeling an anxious desire to place it in his power "to help those who cannot help themselves," and to aid him in his efforts to obtain for them some clothing, to protect them from the inclemency of the season.

When I suggested, in a former communication, the plan for making up and distributing flock beds to the wretched agricultural labourers, I was conscious they would prove very acceptable; and I hope the present communication may meet with your approbation.

Now, Sir, I believe that there is not a single subscriber to the League Fund, but what has some good old clothes thrown aside, which the would gladly give to those miserably clad labourers, if proper means were adopted to convey them. I have mentioned this to several of my friends who gave flocks for the beds, and they cordially approve of the suggestion, and promise to assist in carrying it into effect. The plan that I propose for collecting and conveying the clothes is this, viz, that one of the ante-rooms, in the Free Trade Hall, Peter-street, Manchester, should be opened, and a man be engaged there to receive the parcels that might be sent in by any benevolent persons; and for him to see to the immediate forwarding of them to the address of the Rev. Wm. Ferguson, of Bicester, Oxon, or any other known friends, who would see to a proper distribution of the same. And I think the ladies, who are generally first and foremost in relieving distress, might abundantly manifest their charity on this occasion, by sending articles, or clothing of any description, which would add to the comfort of these miserable creatures.

That important meeting of agricultural labourers which took place at Goatacre last week must upset the flimsy arguments of the protectionists, who contend that the Corn Laws are for the especial benefit of agricultural labourers. I assure you I feel glad to see that the thousand men who attended that meeting are moving in the right direction.—I am, Sir, yours

ALEXANDER TAYLOR,
Greenacre's Moor, near Oldham, Jan. 14, 1846.

P.S. You will greatly oblige me by forwarding the enclosed half sovereign to poor Wm. Parry, of Charlton, who had to walk twenty miles to the meeting to tell his heart-rending tale of distress, and which ought to be read with the greatest attention.

GOATACRE LABOURERS' FUND.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

8, Powis-place, Jan. 15th, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—It may be that many of your readers may desire to do something in behalf of the brave men of Goatacre, but may have no means of forwarding their assistance to them. I beg to say that I shall be happy to add any funds that may be entrusted to me for that purpose to others which I have received. I would they were more. I have put myself in communication with the chairman of the Goatacre meeting, David Kell, as to the best mode of applying whatever may be raised, and shall be happy to render an account of my stewardship to all who like to subscribe through me.—I am dear Sir, yours truly,

P. A. TAYLOR, Jun.

Coalbrookdale, Jan. 21, 1846.

SIR,—I have much pleasure in forwarding to you the result of subscriptions in aid of the Quarter of a Million Fund from this neighbourhood, so far as we at present know the amount.

The members of the Free Trade Committee, and others, met in Coalbrookdale last evening, and the subscriptions in the room amounted to 205*l*. 15s. I will furnish particulars when the proceeds of a canvass of the district shall have been brought in.—I am, yours respectfully,

G. Wilson, Esq.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Otley, near Leeds, Yorkshire.

SIR,—Our noble-minded and philanthropic neighbour, Francis Hawksworth Fawkes, Esq., of Farnley Hall, has, since the Leeds meeting, directed his name to be placed upon the subscription list for the place towards the Anti-Corn-Law League Fund for 100*l*.

This patriotic gentleman is one of the largest landowners, and greatest of land improvers, in Yorkshire.—I am, Sir, yours obediently,

EDWARD BARRET,
20th January, 1846.

Brechtin, January 17th, 1846.

SIR,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your circular of the 19th ult., reminding me that my yearly subscription was again due. I submitted it to the consideration of my fellow workmen, when, without hesitation, they agreed to add their mite to the Quarter of a Million League Fund.

Enclosed is the amount of their subscription, which, although comparatively small, will testify their belief in the noble principles so ably advocated by THE LEAGUE. I am also instructed to give you and the other champions of Free Trade their best thanks for the able refutations you have given to the arguments of the monopolists about dear bread and high wages, and to congratulate you on the great success you have already obtained, particularly in the 40s. free-hold movement, a movement so well adapted to make monopolists quake and tremble.—I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

A. L. FORSYTH.

By order of the workmen of East Mill, Brechin.

George Wilson, Esq., Chairman of the National Anti-Corn-Law League.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Glastonbury, 19th Jan. 1846.

DEAR SIR,—You will much oblige by inserting in the next LEAGUE, that the nine beds were duly received by me, and distributed. They were very thankfully received; and we have had many applications for more. Should there be eight or ten more that could be sent, they would be very acceptable. The labourers here are as bad off as they are in Wiltshire. I sincerely thank the League on behalf of those who received the beds; and remain your obedient servant,

THOS. RALLS.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Paisley, 12th January, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—I see the "Norwich Weaver Boy," and other writers, have stated that the monopolists want compensation before they will give up the Corn Laws. Will you be kind enough to present the following account, and urge payment before they receive a single farthing? In doing so, you will oblige

A PAISLEY WEAVER CALLANT.

Messrs. the Dukes Wellington, Richmond, and Co., Drs. to England, Ireland, and Scotland.

To 30 years' plunder at 36,000,000*l*. per annum,
1,080,000,000*l*.

REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS.

The publication of a manifesto by Mr. James Adam Gordon, one of the largest landowners in the county of Somerset, in favour of a repeal of the Corn Laws, has spread dismay throughout the Protectionist camp in that county, and must by its natural and legitimate influence upon society tend very much to diminish, if not entirely to neutralise, the attempts which Mr. William Miles and the bread tax party are making to stir up a feeling against the Anti-Corn-Law movement. A few years since Mr. Gordon was an avowed advocate of protection, and was then triumphantly pointed to by those holding consonant opinions as one of the pillars of their strength in Somersetshire, and the western counties. What can they say now? Mr. Gordon is as wealthy, as talented, and as powerful as he was in 1841. He is still the lord of very many thousand acres of land, still holds the manorial rights of Abbots Leigh, Portbury, St. George, Portishead, and North Western, and still moves in the same influential circle. This manifesto is regarded by the friends of repeal as one of the most important signs of the times that has yet appeared; and its influence upon the election for East Somerset—come when it may—can scarcely be over-valued. It is in the shape of a letter to the Earl of Waldegrave, who had invited Mr. Gordon to join the protection movement, and is subjoined:

"TO THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF WALDEGRAVE, EAST HARPTREE COURT, &c.

"My Lord,—I have the honour to acknowledge your lordship's invitation to become a member of the Somerset Protection Society. More than a year ago I declined a similar invitation from Mr. Miles and Sir Alexander Hood, and I have many more reasons for doing so now. In 1841, I was a strenuous protectionist; under the circumstances of that time I am persuaded I acted rightly. Those of 1846 are widely different, and I am as well satisfied with the reasons which compel me to advocate a repeal of the Corn Laws as any one can be for retaining his former opinions against it.

"I have ever placed the utmost reliance on Sir Robert Peel, and see no grounds for departing from it now. In his hands I have no fear whatever of the result, and even when farmers have not gone very deep into the subject, I daily find them admitting that any state is better than that, of the uncertainty and agitation of which all parties are now the victims.

"I believe, with Sir Thomas Lethbridge, in his letter to the Duke of Richmond, that 'protection is a thing gone by,' and I hope your lordship will pardon my suggesting a doubt of the policy of protectionist landlords putting arguments and weapons into their tenants' hands to use against themselves, for the reduction of their rents, when the inevitable repeal shall have taken place.

"I have the honour to be, my lord, your obedient servant,
"JAMES ADAM GORDON.

"Naish, Bristol, Jan. 8, 1846.

REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS.—A petition, of which the following is a copy, is now lying for signature at the Guildhall, in Tiverton:—

"To the honourable the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled. The humble Petition of the undersigned inhabitants of the Borough of Tiverton, in the County of Devon: Sheweth, that in the opinion of your petitioners, the laws which prohibit the free importation of foreign grain and provisions, are most oppressive to the great mass of the people, and destructive alike to the true interests of agriculture and commerce; they, therefore, earnestly petition for their total, unconditional, and immediate repeal."

—Devonshire Chronicle, Jan. 20.

Printed at the Whitefriars Printing-office, Bouvierie-street, in the precincts of Whitefriars, in the City of London, by JOHN GADSBY, printer, of Number 7, Ridgmount-place, Hampstead-road, in the County of Middlesex; and also of Number 4, Fairfield-place, Cheetham-hill-road, in the parish of Manchester, in the County of Lancaster, and published at Number 67, Fleet-street, in the parish of St. Dunston-in-the-West, in the City of London, by ABRAHAM WALTER PALTON, of Number 67, Fleet-street aforesaid.—Saturday, January 24, 1846.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 123.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1846.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 87, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

PETITION! PETITION! PETITION!

At a numerously attended meeting of the Council of the League, held on Thursday morning last, Mr. Wilson in the chair, the proposed measures of Sir Robert Peel were discussed at some length. Congratulations were exchanged at the progress which the great question has made in the minds of the most distinguished statesmen of all parties. With respect to the measure itself, several parts of it elicited expressions of satisfaction; but the feeling of regret at the re-enactment of the sliding-scale was universal. The meeting was addressed, among others, by Messrs. R. H. Greg, Alderman Kershaw, J. B. Smith, A. Prentice, J. Heywood, H. Rawson, J. Whitaker, W. Bickham, T. Woolley, &c. All were of opinion that the League and its friends should stand firm to the principle of immediate and total repeal; and the following resolution, recommending universal petitioning, was unanimously passed:

"Resolved,—That the announcement of a new Corn Law renders it desirable that the friends of Free Trade throughout the kingdom should originate petitions for the total and immediate abolition of all laws imposing duties on foreign corn and provisions."

THE MINISTERIAL MEASURE.—IMMEDIATE REPEAL BEST FOR THE AGRICULTURIST.

Before entering on a criticism, the necessity for which we would most gladly have been spared, of the details of the great measure now before Parliament and the country, our first words must be of congratulation. It is a triumph indeed! The night of Tuesday, the 27th January, will ever be memorable in the annals of the English people, as the date of a grand popular success. The principle of monopoly is finally and for ever surrendered. The principle of perfect and absolute Free Trade is broadly announced, as the basis and canon of all British legislation, present and future. And this, not "in the abstract," but in act and fact. Free Trade—entire Free Trade—is to go at once on the statute-book. The First Minister of the Crown, with the delighted and enthusiastic concurrence of his usual opponents, and with the aid of a sufficient number of his political supporters to leave no doubt as to the eventual result, stakes his Ministerial existence on getting "Total Repeal of the Corn Law" written in an Act of Parliament. Again we say, this is a triumph indeed; and most earnestly and heartily do we congratulate those whose intelligence, union, patient waiting, and indefatigable working have won it—THE INDUSTRIOUS CLASSES OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE. THEY HAVE DONE IT ALL. Unaided by aristocratic countenance or patronage, or by the co-operation of political parties and Parliamentary politicians, they have leagued themselves together in the hands of a common allegiance to true and just principle—they have extorted from a once hostile Government, one concession after another—and now, all the outworks having been long since carried, the inner citadel itself is thrown open, on terms of capitulation which, however unsatisfactory in some essential points, have the merit of explicitly recognising the totality of the national demand.

We regret deeply being unable to offer an unrestrained support to a measure, of whose intent and spirit we cannot but speak in terms of warm approval, and which, as an immediate practical relief to the commerce and industry, the poverty and hunger of the country, is of the very greatest value. As regards the first necessities of human life—the only items of the Ministerial plan of which we have now to speak—the measure introduced by Sir Robert Peel on Tuesday night is large, comprehensive, and bold. If the execution is whimsical, arbitrary, and self-contradictory, the design is admirable for its breadth and daring. On the all-important articles Indian corn, or maize, colonial corn, meat (salted and fresh), and cattle, we have total and immediate repeal of protective duties. On foreign corn we have total repeal, not immediate. Our rights are guaranteed us in reversion; in presenti, we are asked to content ourselves with a rather large instalment. A certain filmy and shadowy-looking "protection" is still to linger among us, for three years longer, in the shape of a new Corn Law, which seems as if it were intended to give us a parting taste of the thing in all its various modes and forms. The combination is ingenious. A little of everything. In name and nature, a "sliding scale"—in practical present operation, a 4s. "fixed duty"—in eventual result, a "vanishing scale." We have not had so mild and innocent a Corn Law these 50 years, as in this variegated miscellany of every species of the Corn Law genus. If we cannot praise it, we have no difficulty in saying, that we are sure it means no harm.

This new Corn Law of Sir Robert Peel's does, however—with all its seeming mildness and innocence—contain most serious and even fearful powers of mischief; and we cannot but hope, even yet, that the author of the largest, boldest, and most sweeping measure of commercial freedom ever proposed by a British statesman, will see reason, before all is over, for giving to this really grand reform that completeness and self-consistency which, as we now proceed to show, are essential securities for its practical well-working.

We approach this most important question of the IMMEDIATENESS of that total Free Trade which the Ministerial plan promises in no spirit of hostility either to the Government or the landlords. Nor is it for the mere sake of theoretical and logical consistency, nor from any fanatical zeal for the literality of our own well-known shibboleth, that we now urge this matter on the most grave consideration of the Ministry, the legislature, and the country. It is not even on the score of justice to the bread-eating public, that we now earnestly and anxiously deprecate this last attempt at a Parliamentary Corn Law. We rest our argument solely and exclusively on the interests of those agricultural classes for whose benefit this device is especially intended, and on the national safety and well-being as involved in the prosperity of the cultivators of the soil. That the rights of the consumer are identical with the policy which we urge on grounds altogether independent of them, is but one illustration the more of the unvarying coincidence of strict justice with true expediency.

We contend that the proposed postponement of a Free Trade in food until the 1st of February, 1849, is perfectly needless to the agriculturist—certainly injurious, to a greater or less extent—and fraught with the most disastrous contingent possibilities, or probabilities, of evil, both to the agriculturists and to the country.

The thing is needless. The farmer does not want this three years' "interval of preparation." Granting that an interval of preparation is desirable in such cases—granting that sudden legislative changes in the conditions under which any branch of industry or trade is carried on are injurious to those engaged in it—still we say, it is needless. The farmer has actually got his interval of preparation—and Parliament need not trouble itself. Under the peculiar circumstances of the present season, the change cannot be sudden—if Parliament will only let it alone. There is not the slightest possibility of any sudden change, injurious to the farmer, taking place for the next six or eight months. If the Corn Law were totally repealed to-morrow, and our merchants instantly began sweeping the markets of the world bare of their surplus wheat—still there would be no sudden change for the farmer. No perceptible shock would, or could, be given to prices. The best informed men in the corn trade are confident that in any case prices will, on the whole, keep rising from now until after next harvest. They must. There is not the corn at this moment in the world that could hurt the English farmer. Over the greater part of Europe, scarcity has been officially proclaimed for some months past. America has a surplus, but it is only a chance surplus, bearing no sort of proportion to our needs. America did not know that we were coming, and has therefore made no preparation for us. For such surplus as there happens to be, we shall have our European neighbours competing with us as purchasers;—they have already (under favour of the sliding scale) outbid us at our own doors for the foreign corn in our bonded warehouses. Make the change now—and the farmer will not feel it. Actually he would not know it, if the newspapers did not tell him. Were it possible to legislate with closed doors and "in confidence"—if the Corn Law could only be scored out of the statute-book sub silentio—the farmers would not encounter anything in his market day experience that could lead him to suspect, or imagine, that any change whatever had taken place. Why, if Sir Robert Peel had the creating of the circumstances under which he would legislate for the instant and total abolition of protection, he could not improve on the circumstances that are ready made to his hands. Repeal the Corn Laws, totally and for ever, in February—and the very worst that can happen is a panic that will be over before the end of March. The farmer may be dull at abstract principles, but he knows a fact when he sees it. He will soon come right when he finds that he has actually got the dreaded Free Trade, and that, after all, it makes no such great difference.

We turn to the other side of the picture.

Suppose that Sir Robert Peel's measure becomes law, in its present shape—i. e., suppose the enactment, for six months certain, and an indefinite period afterwards, of a four-shilling fixed duty. Suppose the first angry and ignorant panic which this change will produce—and which will be every whit as violent as any total-and-immediate-repeal panic—to be fairly over, and the farmer to have experimentally discovered the baselessness of his terrors. There is another panic yet to come. A fatal day is yet before him, in the not very remote future—a day which the legislature itself will have taught him, by the elaborate ingenuity of its precautions, to regard with anxious apprehension. On the 1st of February, 1849, all protection will suddenly cease, and he will be turned finally adrift. On the 1st of February, 1849, the dreaded competition with the "untaxed foreigner" will really begin—that competition which the English farmer will have been expressly taught, by the very Legislature that ordains it, to anticipate with all manner of doubts and fears—and which the foreign agriculturist will have been encouraged, on the same authority, to look forward to with eager and triumphant confidence.

Well, the 1st of February, 1849, arrives; the ports are open, and the competition of British and foreign farmers begins. Very possibly there may be no great harm done; the day may go off well. There may have been a season of rather scarce supplies, or extraordinarily active demand; prices may have been at or above 53s.—the duty consequently at four shillings—and importations large and regular. In that case, there will be no very violent or alarming change. The 1st of February, 1849, may be a not very extraordinary day, after all.

But it is at least equally possible that the 1st of February, 1849, may be the commencement of a period of unexampled distress and ruin for the whole class of farmers—a distress and ruin reacting, in the most fearful way, on the entire community. For that 1st of February, 1849, be it remembered, the foreign agriculturist will have been making his preparations; an "interval of preparation" for the British farmer will also have been an interval of preparation for his rival. The untaxed foreigner's preparations will moreover, beyond all doubt, be made on the very largest scale that a poverty-stricken and unscientific agriculture will allow. Europe and America will strain every nerve to be ready to reap golden harvests in the El Dorado of the British corn market. Now, suppose that the years 1847 and 1848 should be years of abundant harvests in Great Britain—i. e. years of moderate prices—i. e. years of the maximum ten-shilling duty. Europe and America, in that case, will keep their corn at home. They will wait for the 1st of February, 1849. They will have large stores ready to come in at the death of the sliding scale. And then they will pour in upon us their hoarded and accumulated supplies—supplies provided expressly for us, but artificially excluded by our ten shilling duty—pour them in just when we do not want them, and when our own farmers are struggling with heavy stocks and low prices. Then there really will be a panic—a panic almost realising the gloomiest bodings of the landlord imagination—a panic covering the agriculture of the world. The foreigner will be grievously disappointed and disheartened—and will think twice before trying the lottery of the English market again. He will be deterred from sowing and growing on such an uncertainty. The English farmer will be frightened and exasperated beyond measure. He will of course throw it all on "Free Trade"—and the supposed cause of his distress being a permanent one, i. e. will presume on the permanence of the effect. He will withdraw the remnant, if any, of his wasted and dwindling capital from a pursuit which, he will say, Parliament has decreed shall never be remunerative again. Both at home and abroad, agriculture will be grievously discouraged. Both at home and abroad, cultivation will diminish. And the end will be, that, in the years 1850 and 1851, we may be suffering a frightful crisis of scarcity and distress, commercial embarrassment, and fiscal collapse;—the whole of which will be charged by the agriculturists on "Peel and Free Trade"—while the real cause will be that Sir Robert Peel wanted faith in Free Trade, and was over-cautious and timid in the application of its sound and enlightened principles.

All this gloomy array of possible, or probable, calamities may be for ever made impossible, if Sir Robert Peel will do the right thing now. Perfect faith in just and true principles will be perfect safety. Give the English farmer no "interval of preparation" beyond that which nature has given him already, in the fact of European scarcity—and the foreign farmer will have no interval of preparation for deluging us with the possible accumulations of a couple of overflowing harvests. Let Europe and America see at once what the English market really is, in its natural state. Let them try their experiments, season by season, and year by year, and feel their way as they go on. There will then be no hoarding for a given day—no extravagant agricultural speculations, reacting in agricultural distress and public scarcity. If Sir Robert Peel will only believe, with a full assurance of faith, that he is RIGHT—thoroughly and altogether right—in his Free Trade principles, it will save a world of mischief.

Most fervently do we trust that the agriculturists and the country may yet be saved from that fatal legacy of peril and possible disaster, which an expiring protection threatens to bequeath to both. It is a great satisfaction to us to be able to feel assured that this most important argument will be stated, with all possible force and clearness, in the House of Commons. Our friend, Mr. Villiers, will doubtless be at his post when the time comes, to press his well-tryed, and now all but successful motion—never again to be met with a "direct negative"—for the total and immediate repeal. We cannot but believe, that, thus grounded and supported, it will be found irresistible. Sir Robert Peel has the same end in view with ourselves. He has the deepest imaginable interest in the success and credit of his Free Trade legislation. Even the purpose and intention of his new sliding scale—to make the change gradual and easy to the farmer—is one that we approve and concur in. The only difference is about the means. We think his new sliding scale is perfectly needless for its object, and will grievously frustrate, instead of furthering it. We do believe he will think so too, when the argument is fairly brought before him in the House of Commons. We feel a strong hope that, even now, we are on the verge of that full and final success which will at once close and crown our labours, and dissolve our League.

The question, How ought the people to deal with the Ministerial scheme? is a most grave and important one; but it may be answered in the fewest words. The people will pursue precisely the same course which they have followed with so signal a success for the last seven years. They will talk of nothing, petition for nothing, think of nothing, but total and immediate repeal. They will be everywhere in readiness for a dissolution of Parliament, and a general election, should their lordships of the Upper House think the experiment desirable. They will be watchful, active, and self-relying;—remembering that, as everything that has been done has been done by them, so they will have—directly by the franchise, or indirectly by opinion—to do every thing at last.

THE "COMPENSATION."

Sir Robert Peel has certainly managed this matter very cleverly. It was his "chief difficulty," and he has put forth his best skill in its solution. By carefully and repeatedly protesting that his measures of "compensation to the agricultural interest" are not meant to be compensatory (except incidentally, and, as it were, by accident), but to promote certain objects of "general social utility"—as, for example, to induce a more economical and profitable management of local business, to "do justice to the labouring man," to facilitate "improvement in the criminal law," and to mend the quality of education in the Union workhouses—he at once forecloses all inquiry as to the adequacy of the compensation, on the one hand, and the right to compensation on the other. In fact, he does not, strictly speaking, raise the question of compensation at all. All the incidentally, or accidentally, compensatory arrangements which he proposes, are (with, perhaps, one exception) to be discussed on their own merits, as so many independent legislative topics; each of them to stand or fall, according to its independent fitness or unfitness for its professed purpose of special public utility. The Free Trader may vote for, or against, any or all of them, on grounds unconnected with the Free Trade question. Some of the proposed arrangements are manifestly good, and will probably be adopted by all parties with tolerable unanimity. On others, there may very likely be a difference of opinion—as on the law of settlement, which is one of the most difficult problems in legislation. Of course, we cannot, on a subject like this, attempt to anticipate, or suggest, the line to be taken by our friends. Every just and humane mind will be anxious to amend the law, if practicable, so as to render its operations more beneficial to the working man, and more equitable between the town and rural districts. It is not, however, a League question, and we abstain from discussing it. On these matters we willingly adopt Sir Robert Peel's judicious suggestion. We leave them to be dealt with separately, on grounds independent of the large national question with which they are casually associated.

We have hinted the existence of one exception from this safe and prudent rule. One of these quasi-compensatory provisions—the proposed loans for draining and agricultural improvement—seems to stand in more than a merely casual relation to the Free Trade question. The avowed object of this loan system—that of "enabling the agriculturist and the labouring man to meet the competition which will be raised up against them"—distinctly brings it within the scope of our criticism. As the "competition will be the League's doing, the League is bound in honour to give the country fair warning of any attempt, actual, or possible, to put a price on the competition. Really it is somewhat alarming to hear of treasury loans to the landlord. This exchequer-bill affair has, on the face of it, a decidedly ugly look. We don't at all like the idea of the landlords getting their fingers into the public purse. Loans to meet competition strike one, on first sight, as bearing a strong family likeness to protection against competition. On general grounds, we have quite a horror at State loans to private individuals. Loans of this description are marvellously apt to be metamorphosed, when the public is not looking, into gifts. The generous and confiding country never sees its cash again. Of all creditors, the State is the unluckiest. There was the Irish church, and its loan of a million—never paid from that day to this. There was the West India interest, and its loan of 15 millions—which the State good-humouredly changed by a stroke of the pen into a free gift of 20 millions. Seriously we don't like the notion of State loans to the landlords—especially as our statesmen (so the Duke of Wellington reminded us the other day) are landlords themselves, with a fellow-feeling for the order.

The thing reads well enough, no doubt. "Good security," "sufficient" security, "ample" security—the best arrangements for annual payment of interest, with "instalments of the principal"—"no loss," at least, no "ultimate" loss, "to fall on the public." Still, we don't like it. If the security is good, they may get the money any morning in Lombard Street, at 3½ per cent. Not the least occasion for coming to Downing Street. The worthy British public never yet made a good thing of the money-lending business.

We are well satisfied to know that the people understand this sort of thing infinitely better now than they did some years ago, and that no very serious mischief is likely to be done by a Legislature and Government which are fast learning the respect due to popular intelligence. We doubt, in fact, whether any mischief is really intended. The Premier is a shrewd financier, and likes dearly, as a First Lord of the Treasury should, to take care of the people's money for them. Still, the bare intimation of such a scheme ought to excite the utmost vigilance and jealousy on the part of our representatives in Parliament; and it should furnish the middle and industrious classes with an additional incentive to persevere in qualifying themselves for an active share in the Government of their country.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURES.

The League, from the very commencement of its career, has proclaimed its hostility to every form of protection, whether manufacturing or agricultural; and there is no member of our body that is not ready to support the Premier in the abolition of all such duties. As applied to the staple branches of industry, fabrics of flax, wool, and cotton, protection was not only nugatory, but delusive. How could we be protected against the competition of foreigners in our home markets, when we were able to undersell them in their own? The abolition of such a mockery can only be regarded as a tardy tribute to common sense; and we should scarcely have deemed it worthy of comment had not the Premier so shaped his proposition as to leave room for misapprehension, or perhaps dangerous error. In giving up their claims to protection, the manufacturers literally abandon nothing. Experience has shown them that protection is not only unjust to consumers, but injurious to producers. Like the hug of the bear, it destroys the object that it seems to fondle. Whatever a former race of manufacturers may have thought, the present generation has discovered that the protection was useless when inoperative, and mischievous when brought into action. In most branches of our national industry, we may say of Sir Robert's concession of Free Trade in linen, cotton, and woollen fabrics, as was said of Pope Gregory's reformation of the calendar, "He has found out an evil that does nobody any harm, and devised a remedy that will do nobody any good." Articles of clothing cannot be rendered cheaper by his measures; for, with some very trifling exceptions, articles of clothing are cheaper at this moment in England than they are in any part of the world. Were this not the case, we should be unable to export them.

In minor branches of industry, designated by Lord Ashley as "the small interests," it is probable that any sudden change of system may produce some derangement of capital and employment; but this can only be temporary, and it will be more than compensated by the increased demand for labour which must follow from the establishment of a natural and healthy system of trade. In the case of the bootmakers, to which Sir Robert Peel alluded, protection has acted as a check and discouragement to ingenuity and economy. The author of the "Shoemaker," in Knight's industrial series, has stated that the reliance of the London bootmakers on protection has induced them to neglect several improvements adopted by their brethren in Paris, which save material and ensure a better fit. Taking durability into account as well as fashion, we much doubt whether the feet could be covered more cheaply in Paris than in London; and, so far as our experience has gone, the reverse is the case.

The case of the coachmakers appears to have been misunderstood by the Premier. If English coaches are dearer than Continental, it must be added that they are much better, as those who have gone through the misery of French and German posting can abundantly testify. In fact, as English coaches are notoriously exported, it is clear that the superiority of their quality must be deemed more than an equivalent for a higher rate of price. At the late Free Trade meeting in Southampton, Mr. Andrews, one of the most extensive coach-builders in England, expressed his regret, not because Sir Robert Peel had diminished protection, but because he had not abolished it altogether.

The branches of industry connected with fashionable life in London are abnormal. Those who pay are taxed for the deficiencies of those who do not pay; a sufficient amount of insurance to cover risk from bad debts must form an element of the price charged by most tradesmen in the metropolis. Free Trade cannot remedy this anomaly; it belongs to a very different branch of economics, the relations between credit and cash payments.

Sir Robert Peel appears to have misled some of the agriculturists, by dwelling on the sacrifice of protection to be exacted from the manufacturers. They at once jumped to the conclusion, that they could find among the manufacturing and operative classes some parties to whom protection was, or appeared to be, valuable, and that they could count on these as new allies. But the Premier gave them a little additional information, which ought to have corrected the mistake into which his earlier statements might have led the protectionists. He told them that Free Trade in corn would not diminish the wages of labour; and he appealed, as we have done, to the experience of the last three years, to prove that cheapness of provisions had produced a rise, and not a fall, in the money-rate of wages.

But the great fact is, that labour, as measured by results, is cheaper in England than in any part of the world. If an English artisan gets more for his week's work than a German or a Frenchman, he adds more value to raw material than any other European could give to it in double the time. Englishmen, in free competition, cannot be reduced to the Continental rate of wages until their skill is reduced to the Continental level of skill. While they continue ahead in enterprise, knowledge, and ingenuity, they must necessarily have the superiority in earnings; and one of the worst evils of protections and restrictions consisted in their depriving English artisans of this fair and adequate remuneration.

It is only justice to the manufacturers to say, that they anticipated Sir Robert Peel in repudiating the protection of which he proposes to deprive them; and it is only fair to the squires to inform them, that a crusade, in favour of protection, undertaken in the manufacturing districts would be more hopeless than an attempt to revive the claims of the House of Stuart. The delusion is not merely antiquated—it is utterly forgotten; the very tradition has perished. The operatives have learned by bitter experience that the meaning of monopoly is starvation; and of protection, famine. They will not listen to the voice of the charmer who comes to tell them that looms ought to stand idle, and that spindles should cease their revolutions. They cannot be indoctrinated with the belief that diminished employment will raise the rate of wages, and we warn the aristocratic lecturers that they will not find audiences so patient of nonsense as those which assemble in Steyning, or are packed in Chichester. The operatives are a reasoning class; they have courage to pronounce their opinions—if indeed there be any yet really ignorant of their recorded sentiments in favour of Free Trade.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

Second Week, ending Saturday, January 31.

The Parliamentary week opened, on Monday, with an exceedingly characteristic speech from the Duke of Wellington. It was promised that ministerial revelations would be made on that evening; and all the world (i.e. the political world of London) were eagerly anxious to hear the illustrious Duke state his own share in the transactions which led to the resignation and the resumption of office by Sir Robert Peel. His grace's speech is so pithy, so illogical, so absurd, and yet so straightforward, that we insert it here, and recommend it to the perusal of our readers:

The Duke of WELLINGTON: My lords, I rise to give an answer to my noble friend's question. (The Duke of Richmond.) But, my lords, in doing so, although I can answer positively only for myself and for my own motives, yet I must, in order to state them clearly to the house, state generally what passed in her Majesty's councils; and I may therefore be under the necessity of detaining your lordships upon the subject, but your lordships may rely upon it I will detain you for as short a time as possible. My lords, when the accounts were received from Ireland and from different parts of Great Britain of the state of the potato crops, in the course of last autumn, and of the inconvenience likely to result from that state in different parts of the country, my right honourable friend at the head of her Majesty's Government considered it his duty to call together his colleagues, in order to consider the reports which were sent to him. Accordingly he did so; he laid these reports before his colleagues, and made to them certain propositions for the adoption of measures which he considered it necessary that her Majesty's Government should adopt, either to avoid or to limit the evils likely, in his opinion, to occur in consequence of those misfortunes. One of the measures suggested by my right hon. friend was, that her Majesty's servants should recommend to her Majesty an Order in Council to suspend the operation of the existing Corn Law, so as to open the ports for the admission of corn duty free. My lords, it is not necessary that I should discuss the motives stated, or the grounds upon which this recommendation was founded; but, however, I was one of those who considered this measure not necessary to be adopted at that time. I considered that the misfortune that had occurred, and which undoubtedly had the effect of depriving millions, I may say, of a large part of the provision made for their food for the year—that the misfortune was not exactly a deficiency of food. Millions, it is true, had been deprived of their food, but still there was no deficiency of food according to all accounts—no deficiency of food in the country. That which was required, in my opinion, was, that arrangements should be made, as had been made therefore, for finding the means of employment (hear, hear), and for finding the means of rewarding them for their employment, and giving them food (hear, hear). My lords, besides, it appeared to me that in the provisions of the existing Corn Law, if it was desirable that the ports should be opened, the provisions of that law itself would provide for that measure (hear, hear, from the Duke of Richmond). As soon as ever the price of any particular article of grain should rise and reach to such an amount as it would appear there was not sufficient for the wants of the country, the law has provided that such grain should be admitted at a nominal duty. Under these circumstances, it appeared to me to be unnecessary to suspend the law; and upon that ground I was one of those who certainly objected to that proposition. At the same time, and I was most anxious for it, the Government unanimously proceeded to adopt all the measures to form a commission in Ireland, and to instruct that commission with regard to the measures to be adopted for giving employment to the people, for procuring food for them in ordinary payment of that employment, and all those measures which upon former occasions had been found so beneficial and so effectual. My lords, I believe that all these measures have been adopted. They are not new to the public servants of this country; they have been effectually adopted; and it is to be hoped that the great inconvenience apprehended as the result of this misfortune will be avoided. My lords, in the course of the discussions upon this measure, it was certainly intimated that the suspension of the Corn Law must render the renewal of it very difficult; and it was certainly intimated that it might be necessary to make an essential alteration of it. Subsequently, my lords, when the instructions were agreed upon to be given to these commissions established in Ireland, as I before stated to your lordships, my right hon. friend intimated his opinion of the absolute necessity of making an essential alteration in the Corn Law. I believe everybody admitted that some alteration was necessary—that an alteration upon certain points was necessary. I think there is no doubt about that. That was admitted by all (hear, hear). But in the opinion of my right hon. friend it was necessary to make an essential alteration in the existing Corn Law. Many members of the Cabinet objected to the suggested alterations, and there was a strong difference of opinion upon the subject. As for my part, my lords, I certainly was of opinion that it was desirable to avoid making any alteration—any essential alteration—in the Corn Law; but, my lords, I confess that in my individual position, I considered a union of opinion in the Cabinet as essential, upon account of the safety of the Government itself. Having served England now for above fifty years, in high public stations, I consider it my duty, upon all occasions, to endeavour to promote its service; and I did every thing in my power to reconcile the differences of opinion among my colleagues, and to preserve in union a Government which enjoyed the confidence of the Sovereign, of the public, which has served the public so steadily, and enjoyed the confidence of both Houses of Parliament. I considered it my duty to make every effort to preserve union in the Cabinet, to reconcile differences of opinion, as the best service I could render to the Government in the circumstances in which I was placed, and in which the Cabinet was placed upon this subject. My lords, unfortunately in these efforts I did not succeed; and the result was a determination upon the part of my right honourable friend that he would submit to her Majesty the resignation of his office, and that he would recommend to her Majesty to endeavour to form another Government. My lords, this course was adopted after a discussion whether it was most advisable that he should come down to Parliament and make his proposition for an alteration in the Corn Law, having a divided Cabinet, in which the majority were against the proposition, or whether it was not best, and most for the interest and convenience of her Majesty, that he should proceed at once and intimate to her the position in which he stood, and express his desire that her Majesty would permit him to resign his office, and that her Majesty would form another Government. That course was discussed. I certainly was one who thought it was desirable he should resign his office before going to Parliament with a divided Cabinet. I believe that all the members of the Cabinet were of the same opinion. I was of that opinion, and I know others were; and accordingly my right honourable friend took that course; he waited upon her Majesty, informed her of the situation in which he found himself, and recommended to her Majesty to form another administration. Her Majesty sent for a noble lord, and that noble lord, I understand—indeed I know did make an endeavour to form an administration. That endeavour did not succeed. Her Majesty then thought proper to write to my right hon. friend, to desire him to resume his situation, which he still held, until another administration was formed. My right hon. friend wrote to me—I was in the country at the time—and informed me he had been sent for, and that her Majesty having desired him to resume his situation, he had determined, happen what might, if alone, he would enable her Majesty, as her Minister, to meet her Parliament. My lords, I highly applauded the course taken by my right hon. friend on that occasion; and I determined that I, for one, would stand by him (hear, hear, and laughter). I did so because I felt it to be my duty to the Crown to endeavour to be of service; and I did think the formation of a Government, in which her Majesty would have confidence, was of infinitely greater importance than any opinion of any individual on the Corn Law or any other law (laughter). My lords, that moment my right hon. friend wrote to me, and desired me to attend a meeting of the Cabinet that evening, which I did. I applauded the conduct of my right honourable friend. I was delighted with it. It was precisely the course which I would have followed myself under similar circumstances, and I accordingly determined that I would stand by him. My lords, at the same time that I did this I knew well the position in which my right honourable friend stood in relation to the Corn Law. I knew well, that in consequence of his having resigned his office into her Majesty's hands, because he could not prevail upon his Cabinet to support him in the material alteration of the Corn Law which he considered necessary, those who were employed to form a Government must have had a knowledge of the particular circumstances under which my right honourable friend had resumed his office, and, my lords, how could my right honourable friend, under these circumstances, go into the House of Commons and again defend the Corn Laws, as he had done only in the preceding July (loud cries of hear, hear, from the cross benches)? How could he go into Parliament and defend the Corn Law against those gentlemen who were informed that his opinions on the subject had been altered, and who,

of course, would have reproached him with a fresh alteration of opinion in going down to support the existing law? I knew well, therefore, that when I told my right honourable friend that, I would stand by him in the resumption of his Government, that in doing so I must be a party in the proposition for the material alteration of the Corn Law. It could not be otherwise. I knew it. When I did it I knew it (hear). Thus, my lords, so far I have accounted for my own conduct. And, my lords, I wish your lordships would have so far confidence in the position in which I stand, as to rest assured for this evening that the proposition of my right honourable friend, although it will involve a material alteration of the Corn Law, will be a proposition satisfactory to the country, satisfactory to the friends of my right honourable friend, and one which will give such advantages to the landed interests, as the landed interests have a right to expect in the general arrangements of the country (hear, hear). My lords, my right hon. friend is himself a great landed proprietor. His pursuits are those of agriculture; he is related in friendship and in association with many of your lordships, and it cannot be supposed that under such circumstances he would betray the interests of a body with which he is so united, and which possesses so great a stake in this country (hear). No, my lords, I venture to predict that your lordships will be deceived when you hear what the proposition is which my right hon. friend has to bring forward, and which will be made known in the course of a very few days, and your lordships will then see whether or not he has betrayed his duty in recommending such a measure to you. But, at all events, whatever that information may be, I say that, situated as I am in this country, rewarded as I have been by the Sovereign and people of England, I could not refuse to serve her Majesty in assisting to form a Government when I was called upon, to enable her Majesty to meet her Parliament, in order to carry on the business of the country. On that ground, as it appears from my statement now to you, I claim from your lordships an acquiescence in the principle which I lay down, namely, that I positively could not refuse serving my Sovereign when called upon to do so (hear, hear). My lords, I have no doubt when these measures come to be laid before you that they will give satisfaction to your lordships, neither have I any doubt but that they will meet with general approbation from the country (hear, hear).

On the Duke of Buckingham expressing his regret that the Duke of Wellington should have become a member of a Free Trade Government, the noble Duke exclaimed, that he did not know what a Free Trade Government meant! The Earl of Radnor thus criticised the conduct of the Government:

The Earl of RADNOR could not help observing that there was one question which he was surprised had not been asked by any person during the present explanations. The question he alluded to was, what measures and precautions had been taken to avoid or obviate the calamity alluded to by the noble duke (hear, hear). The noble duke, in the course of his speech, said that many millions would be deprived of their food in consequence of the disease of the potato crop. They all knew that the alarm on the subject was so great, that it was known that the First Lord of the Treasury, so far back as the end of October, made a proposition to the Cabinet to issue an order in council for the opening of the ports. Divers Cabinet meetings were held to consider this subject, as was known to the public, for it was so stated in another place; and all these Cabinet meetings separated without coming to any other determination than to issue a commission to inquire into the state of the potato crop in Ireland. All, therefore, that was done tended to excite alarm throughout the country. It did excite such alarm and apprehension. The Cabinet separated on the 6th of November, and did not come together again until the 25th. This appeared to him to be rather an extraordinary proceeding at a period when the country was under a well-grounded apprehension of famine. Was it not, he would ask, extraordinary that the Government should, at such a period, separate without doing anything to relieve the apprehensions of the country, or to obviate the danger which threatened? The Cabinet met again on the 25th of November. After some meetings it came to no determination, and they were told that this arose from the circumstance that the noble lord, the member for the City of London, had published a letter, in which he said that he thought that something should at once be done. The majority of the Cabinet then declared that they would not do anything, however they had been told that they ought to do something. This did not appear to him to be a rational proceeding (hear, hear). It looked very like the act of a spoiled child, who said, "Oh, you tell me that I should do such and such a thing; I therefore will not do it." He wanted to know what they had really been about. The apprehension of the effect of the failure of the potato crop existed on Oct. 31, and it was still felt at the present moment, according to the statements in the papers. Something had been said in ridicule of the failure of the potato crop, but the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, only on Friday last, said, do not talk in a tone of ridicule about rotten potatoes, for you will find it to be no joke if you wait two months. From October, however, they had waited three months; and from everything that had fallen from the noble duke, it appeared that nothing had been done, although every alarm had been excited. It appeared that the cabinet met again and again, came to no determination, quarrelled amongst themselves, and separated, leaving everything alone. The noble duke had told them that millions were deprived of a large portion of their customary food; now every one knew that potatoes constituted a large proportion of the food of the people of Ireland. As for the proposed alteration in the Corn Laws, he feared much, after what had fallen from the noble duke, that it would not be of such a nature as he could approve of. With respect to an observation made by his noble friend the noble marquis, he (the Earl of Radnor), for one, did not know and could not understand what were the burdens that fell peculiarly on the landed interest, and for which compensation should be made to them. He trusted that nothing of this kind would be acceded to without the strictest inquiry, and if this was instituted he doubted very much whether any case could be made out.

The measures which, according to the Duke of Wellington, were to give satisfaction to both the House of Lords and the country, were stated by Sir Robert Peel on Tuesday evening.

On that afternoon, the scene outside the House of Commons, and within its walls, was animating and exciting. The House was crowded, both by members and strangers. Amongst the latter were a large number of peers, all anxious to hear the statement of the Prime Minister; but the most remarkable visitant was his Royal Highness PRINCE ALBERT. The Prince was accompanied by the Earl of Jersey, who is Master of the Horse, and whose eldest son, Lord Villiers, member for Cirencester, is married to Sir Robert Peel's eldest daughter. His Royal Highness, the Duke of Cambridge, uncle of the Queen, sat beside the Prince; and the party remained during the three hours and a half which were occupied by Sir R. Peel's speech; they paid great attention to its statements, and left the House the moment the First Lord of the Treasury sat down. There was nothing, however, in the entry or the presence of the Prince which marked out the attendance of his Royal Highness as different from that of any private gentleman who might desire to witness the debates of the House of Commons. So far, therefore, this was constitutionally correct; and it is against constitutional etiquette to allude to the opinions of the Sovereign on any matter under the deliberation of Parliament. Still, when it is considered that the rights of the people are opposed by a wealthy and powerful aristocracy, it is gratifying to know that the QUEEN is, from a careful study of the writings and publications of the advocates of Free Trade, a most decided advocate of commercial freedom; and so far as she is concerned, the cause will receive her energetic, anxious, and earnest support, consistently with that decorum which it is necessary for the Crown to observe.

Sir Robert Peel's speech occupied, as we have stated, nearly three hours and a half in delivering. Throughout, scarcely a cheer hailed it from what used to be the Ministerial benches. All the support he received, in the way of applause, came from the ranks of the Opposition. Though his plan is disfigured by many small blemishes, it was still great enough to stagger the agriculturists; even Mr. Becket Denison, who seconded the address, is stated to have muttered that it was too large for him. The crowning defect of the plan is, that though it provides for the ultimate total repeal of the Corn Law, yet it protracts it for a period of three years, keeping up a subsidiary sliding scale, for which the agriculturists do not care a rush, and which checks the support of the advocates of Free Trade. Stripping Sir Robert Peel's statements of all their rhetoric, and reducing them to naked propositions, the following is what he now proposes to effect:

He proposes the repeal, or the material reduction of all protective duties on manufactured articles; and he calls on the manufacturers cheerfully to submit to this on these grounds—first, that Adam Smith, and other great authorities attribute the origin of the restrictive system to the commercial classes, and they should now show their sincerity in wishing for its removal; and secondly, that by the new tariff, all duties on raw materials have been abolished or mitigated, with the exception of tallow and timber, which are to be added to the list. The duty on Russian tallow is to be reduced from 3s. 2d. to 1s. 6d., but the reduction on timber is to be a gradual one, the nature of which is not to be stated for a few days, as information is still incomplete.

The duty on the coarser fabrics of linen, cotton, and woollen is to be altogether abolished; on the finer, to be reduced from 20 to 10 per cent. The duty on silk manufactures is hereafter not to exceed the maximum of 15 per cent.; on ornamental paper hangings, to be reduced from one shilling to twopence the square yard; on foreign carriages, from 20 to 10 per cent.; on foreign candles and soap the reduction is one half; on boot fronts from 3s. 6d. to 1s. 9d., on boots from 1l. 8s. to 14s., on shoes from 14s. to 7s. per dozen pairs, and on straw plait from 7s. 6d. to 5s.

French brandy, Geneva, and other foreign spirits: the duty to be reduced from 22s. 10d. per gallon to 15s.

Retaining his objection to the introduction of slave-grown sugar, Sir Robert Peel proposes to strike off 3s. 6d. from the differential duty on foreign free grown, believing that our colonies can bear increased competition. Thus, foreign free-grown Muscovado will be reduced from 9s. 4d. to 5s. 10d., and clayed from 11s. 10d. to 8s.

Agriculture: Indian corn and buckwheat to be admitted duty free. This is a boon to the agriculturists, Sir Robert Peel pointing out that beautiful dispensation of Providence, by which manure is rendered the fertiliser of the soil; while the rising price of rape and linseed justify the free introduction of nutritious food for fattening cattle.

Butter and Cheese: the duties to be reduced by one-half; thus, on butter from 1l. to 10s., and on cheese from 10s. to 5s. The duty on foreign hops, which, by the tariff of 1842, was reduced to 4l. 10s., is to be still further reduced to 2l. 10s. Provisions, as fresh and salted meat, pork, and vegetables, duty free.

The duty on live animals, fixed by the new tariff, is to be abolished, and foreign cattle are to come in duty free.

CORN: in lieu of the present sliding scale, the following to be substituted:

When the average price of wheat is 48s., the duty to be 10s., the duty falling by one shilling with every shilling of rise in price, till on reaching 53s., the duty is to be a fixed one of 4s.

This mitigated scale is to last for three years; and, by a positive enactment, to disappear on the 1st of February, 1849, leaving for the future only a nominal rate of duty.

By this new scale, foreign wheat, which at present prices pays a duty of 16s., will only pay 4s.; and keeping the ratio between wheat and other grain, oats, barley, &c., will be admitted at a nominal rate.

All British colonial wheat and flour to be forthwith admitted at a nominal rate of duty.

As a compensation, or rather alleviation for this great change, some local burdens are to be revised, with a view to their economical collection and application.

The highway rates, which are now under the control of 16,000 local functionaries, are to be placed, by union of parishes, &c., under the management of 600; and their applicants more effectually supervised.

The law of settlement to be altered, so as to give every resident of five years in towns a status, and thus save rural districts from a flood of pauperism, thrown upon them in times of commercial and manufacturing revulsion.

Various other charges to be taken off county rates, and placed on the consolidated fund, as expenses of convicted prisoners, of prosecutions, &c., which are to be wholly or partly borne by the State.

The State to encourage agriculture by lending money, at a moderate rate of interest, on adequate security, for the drainage and other improvement of estates. The newly-constituted board for the inclosure of commons, and the Exchequer bill commissioners, to be the machinery for this purpose.

In the speech in which Sir Robert Peel made these propositions, he illustrated his object in various ways, and enforced it by different arguments.

We have, however, given the fullest report of his speech in the Supplement to THE LEAGUE; and must, therefore, refer our readers to that portion of the paper for these particulars.

A debate of some length ensued after Sir Robert Peel sat down; and it was arranged, chiefly on the suggestion of Mr. Stafford O'Brien, who asked for time, that the debate on Sir Robert Peel's propositions should be postponed till Monday, the 9th of February. But the more ardent agriculturists were not to be balked. Mr. LIDDELL, one of the members for North Durham, and son of Lord Ravensworth, got up, and, though he has hitherto shown himself a tolerably pliable Ministerialist, broke out in denunciation of Sir Robert Peel. The House, however, paid little attention to a speech evidently prepared before the orator heard the plans of the Prime Minister. Honourable members were eagerly engaged in conversation, and the voice of Mr. Liddell was heard with difficulty above the hubbub. Still, his opposition is indicative of the degree and extent of opposition which Sir Robert Peel will encounter from those who were once his political friends and supporters.

The Earl of March, eldest son of the Duke of Richmond, spoke out in a more rabid spirit. He assured Sir Robert Peel that his measures would receive his "most strenuous, violent, and unceasing opposition!" The word "violent" caused a loud burst of laughter. But this scion of the house of Lennox was not satisfied with this. He demanded from Mr. Sydney Herbert, the Secretary of War, and a member of the Cabinet, why he had abandoned the cause of protection, and how he could explain his conduct to his constituents of South Wiltshire.

Mr. Sydney Herbert instantly rose; and, it must be admitted, that in personal appearance, style, and favour with the House, he has a great advantage over the Earl of March. He is young, tall, handsome; his style of address and of speaking have an easy, natural, unaffected grace, which conveys the impression, not of great intellectual power, but of that true gentlemanly spirit and feeling which possess such fascination for every Englishman, no matter what may be his politics. Then Mr. Sydney Herbert is half brother and heir apparent to the Earl of Pembroke; in his own right he has large landed property, and is, withal, a generous holder of the powers which Nature and Providence have placed in his hands. So, when he assured the House that, at the proper time, he would be able amply to vindicate his "disinterestedness," his honour, and his faith, in giving a hearty and honest support to Sir Robert Peel's measures, a burst of cheering from both sides of the House indicated the spirit in which his defence was received.

But, grave as was the occasion; deep as ought to have been the interest felt; the night did not pass without an exhibition of buffoonery, as if to convince the House that the despairing agriculturists could afford to die in a fit of laughter. The redoubtable Colonel Sibthorp rose, and, with stolid gravity, informed the House that he had received a letter, marked "private and confidential," but which, nevertheless, he would read pro bono publico. This letter was one purporting to come from the Anti-Corn-Law League, inviting him, as a FREE TRADER, to secure a freehold qualification for Surrey! The horror of the gallant Colonel was ludicrously rich. But a more startling, striking, and amusing incident occurred.

All of a sudden, Sir John Tyrrell appeared at the table, opposite to Sir Robert Peel, as if he had installed himself leader of her Majesty's Opposition. The effect of the apparition was magical. Roars of laughter welcomed the droll, sturdy, consistent champion and representative of the "agricultural mind," who proceeded gravely to tell the Prime Minister that "he felt much as a soldier might have been imagined to feel in the Peninsular war, if the Duke of Wellington and a great part of his staff had gone over to Marshal Soult (great laughter). The right honourable baronet in his speech from the throne (laughter)—he meant the Royal Speech—and when he spoke of the Royal Speech he was reminded of what a farmer said to him yesterday, when he was out hunting (laughter). He said that Sir Robert Peel would only pull in front; he would neither go in the shafts nor in the middle; and if the country was not prepared to receive his dictum, he would do his best to force his measures. His (Sir J. Tyrrell's) complaint was that the right honourable baronet had not, by an appeal to the country, placed those who followed him in the same position they were in before. He then called the Government "the Potato Peel Government," and accused the Prime Minister of compromising, not with the agriculturists, but with the Anti-Corn Law League.

Ultimately, the debate was adjourned till Monday, the 9th of February.

On Thursday night, a rambling debate was originated by the Duke of Richmond, in the House of Lords. He accused the Anti-Corn Law League of systematic bribery and interference with elections; to which accusations Lord Kinnaird replied with much spirit, owning himself a member of the League. The noble lord, while defending the League, said he would not, of course, make himself responsible for the language of every individual member of the League; and presumed that the Duke of Richmond would not make himself responsible for every sentiment uttered at Protection meetings. But the Duke of Richmond,—who is certainly not a coward, if he be not a wise man, and who is in the habit of constantly reminding people that at Waterloo he received a bullet through some part of his body—bravely and chivalrously declared that he would take upon himself the responsibility of every sentiment uttered at every meeting of every Protectionist Society! On this Lord Kinnaird reminded the very gallant Duke that, in that case, he must make himself responsible for much that was utterly unchristian, unkind, and absurd.

This short debate, however, was rendered remarkable by a declaration of opinion from Earl Grey on the Ministerial policy. The noble earl, as Lord Howick, constantly gave a bold, unhesitating support, in the House of Commons, to the motions of Mr. Villiers and Mr. Cobden; and now, as a peer of Parliament, he is as unhesitating as ever. As a landowner, he said, the only portion of the Ministerial measure of which he was afraid, was the three years of transition. This modified temporary sliding scale was a mere mockery of protection. He was not afraid of competition in agriculture; and he wished to be exposed to it at once. But the transition state would render nugatory all satisfactory arrangements between landlord and tenant; while, instead of at once opening the ports, at a time when all foreign stocks were low, they were building up an obstructing dyke which, for three years, would more or less exclude foreign importation; and then, after a three years' preparation, suddenly let it in as a flood. He also ridiculed the "compensating" portion of the Ministerial scheme, as utterly unworthy of association with so great an experiment as the removal of all protection.

Lord Ashburton admitted that the doctrines of Free Trade were the doctrines of common sense; but thought the country was in too artificial a state to bear the application of common sense! Lord Ashburton's mind possesses a very peculiar quality of "judicial imbecility." Throughout his long life he would never have made himself up on any public question, had it not been for the external weight of his "breeches pocket." When he was Mr. Baring, a member of the House of Commons, and the head of one of the greatest mercantile firms in the world, the weight of his breeches pocket inclined him to Free Trade: and accordingly, in 1815, he presented the well-known petition of the merchants of London, in which the doctrines of Free Trade are laid down in the most lucid manner. But now that he is a peer and a landowner, he doubts, and doubts, and doubts, if this country can bear the application of the principle of common sense!

In the House of Commons, the debate of Thursday night turned on the Ten Hours' Bill; which Lord Ashley has once more got leave to introduce. Sir James Graham, in assenting to its introduction, expressed himself doubtful whether or not capital and labour could bear any farther interference; and hoped that the noble lord would not ask for a decision on its merits, until the higher and more important question of the laws which regulate the importation of food had been disposed of. After some discussion, leave was given to bring in the bill.

IMPORTANT DECISION IN THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, IN FAVOUR OF THE LEGALITY OF THE NEW QUALIFICATION VOTES.

On Thursday, Lord Chief Justice Tindal delivered judgment in those cases bearing upon 7 and 8 of William III., commonly called the Splitting Act. The opinion of the Court was, where the conveyances were bona fide, the votes were valid and good. His lordship said he saw nothing improper in this mode of enfranchisement, but it appeared to him a VERY LAUDABLE ACT ON THE PART OF THE PEOPLE OF A FREE COUNTRY. The judgment was read, and occupied more than an hour in the delivery. We regret that we cannot this week give a full report of this important judgment, but shall do so in our next number.

REJOICINGS.—The Conservatives of Preston did not ring the bells on the receipt of the Queen's speech. How is this?—Preston Guardian.

SIR ROBERT PEELE AND FREE TRADE.

(From The Times.)

The chief characteristic of the Premier's plan is its elaborate attempt at equalisation. It embraces every class, and touches every article. That, of course, is a circumstance which ought to be taken into account previous to any positive judgment on the plan; for we ought always to know what is intended. Sir Robert Peel intends to deal equal justice and equal protection to all parties, town and country, great and small. He has himself been the centre of universal solicitation, and now every one of his fellow-countrymen, not to say every member of the whole human family, may feel himself the object of special solicitude. So careful and expansive a work is likely to run into minutiae, and betray an unostentatious equilibrium. Such is undoubtedly the case with Sir Robert Peel's third new tariff. The balance is excessive. As in old-fashioned gardens, tower answers to tower, walk to walk, tree to tree, urn to urn, so in this scheme every interest shows a parallel series of modifications. It is a diminished protection pervading all ranks and conditions of men. We are all let down a peg lower. Everybody must console himself for the diminution of his own status by looking at every man and thing in the universe—i. e., in Sir Robert Peel's tariff. He will see that they are let down as well as himself, and though he has suffered an absolute curtailment, yet comparatively he is much where he was before, and so much the better for the general reduction. To construct so vast and complicated a system is no small proof of courage; but it demands equal courage to criticise. We must count up the sum of a hundred protections before we venture to pronounce our own insufficient. Some people would have preferred a simpler fabric; but simplicity was not the Premier's object, any more than it is the object of those old cathedral clocks on the Continent, which tell not only the time of the day, but the time of earth, sea, and sky, sun, moon, and stars, the time of human affairs, and of everything that goes, or can be imagined to go. The Premier's scheme is a microcosm of commerce and finance. Like as in a Gothic building, its multiplicity of parts and exactness of proportion are as much its merits as the greatness of the whole.

The first fear that suggests itself is, that so vast and minute an adjustment is above the powers of mortal man. It is really impossible to apprehend all the conditions necessary to the perfect unanimity of the change. One of the Bridgewater treatises enumerated, we think, twenty-two conditions of the inanimate universe, which, arbitrary as they might be, were yet all necessary to the actual constitution of man. He could not have been other than what he is without a change in the whole. Now, it would require an unusual degree of presumption to specify all the changes necessary to make man, for example, ten times as big and as strong as he is. Yet that attempt is not so very unlike Sir Robert Peel's "equitable adjustment."

The agriculturist expects a dreadful downfall in the price of his corn, or that if he has a short crop he will not now enjoy the natural compensation of a high price. Let us see the multifarious equivalent which the watchful Premier has provided for him. He is to save ten or fifteen per cent. in the material of the clothes worn by himself, his family, his servants, and his labourers. If he has not a dairy of his own, he will gain by the reduction on butter and cheese. He will pay a trifle less for his sugar, his rice, his brandy, his soap and candles, and 50 other little things. If he does not get a cheap gig from Brussels, or a drawing-room paper from Paris, he may still combine economy and taste in a French tea-tray and tea-service. Whether the labourer is likely to benefit by these latter reductions, we will leave his patron, the landowner, to decide. The farmer, then, is to get his clover seed and his rape seed and his oil cake a good deal cheaper; and he has the option of cheap Indian corn, "rice feed," and we know not what other nutritious delicacies for his "beasts" or his pigs. If he has a family, his daughters will get their millinery from Paris without the alternative of ruin or smuggling. His roads are to be better and cheaper. When the disorderlies of his parish steal his poultry, or rob his potato bed, they will be prosecuted wholly at the national charge, their twelve-months' keep in prison will be no addition to the rates. The nation will help to pay the doctor's bill for the parish, and the schoolmaster's salary for the union children, besides some other small matters. What is more important than all, the farmer need not be under daily apprehension of such and such a man and his family falling back on his parish. They've been five years in the town, and are safe. Nor is it necessary to explain how this comfortable security may be made the object of prospective arrangements.

All this is on the farmer's own supposition. We think that neither his loss nor his equivalents will be considerable. The more probable result is, that the whole scale of prices will be tolerably sustained; and as for the local taxation, after all, prosecutions and gaols and outcast paupers are not a very large item of agricultural expense. Still the farmer must feel that he is in careful hands. He is the tender object of a thousand anxious cares and delicate attentions. He is propped up on every side that he shall not fall, and shielded on every side that the blasts of Heaven shall not blow upon him. We have frequently assured him that his fears are visionary; that the avalanche of corn which is to overwhelm him is not yet housed, or grown, or in the earliest stage of preparation. But if the catastrophe should come, then he will have his consolations. "If the sky should fall," then, as the ancient proverb says, "he will catch larks."

Nor is it likely that any interest, either great or small, to adopt a new distinction, will suffer more than the farmer by the new tariff. The manufacturers want no protection for those articles of general use which it seems the special vocation of the Anglo-Saxon race to make for the world, and which are the great basis of our national wealth and power. In the more common fabrics, whether of cotton, linen, wool, or silk, we beat our neighbours, far and near, in every open market, and ad fortiori in our own. As for the higher productions of taste and skill, we shall never compete effectually till we have learnt to compete in the school of fair and close competition. English art and enterprise will not receive any permanent injury from the importation of foreign and more elegant fabrics and patterns, and the consequent spread of fashion and refinement of taste.

The "small" interests, the thousand and one male and female handicrafts, may safely rely on their present amount of prosperity, such as it is. The danger of foreign competition is balanced by the reduced cost of materials. The shoemaker and the glove-maker compete with the foreigner on more equal terms. The very "small" interests, however, the hand-loom weavers, the stockings, the seamstresses, and such other helpless people, cannot be relieved by special laws, and are the very last persons to benefit by protection. It is a mistake to treat them as substantial and integral classes. They are rather the unfortunate, the incapable, the unskilled, and perhaps the intractable portions of society, such as society always will contain, and always will deposit in the depth of wretchedness and toil. To "protect" them by legislative enactments is to protect, to multiply, to perpetuate misery. Their only chance is to be absorbed in higher and more productive occupations; and the best aid the State can render them is to give those higher and more productive occupations a securer footing and an ampler scope. Indeed, whatever common cause some deluded agriculturists may attempt to make with other classes in favour of protection, they will not easily persuade them that the present measure is not an immense and universal relief.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

We are glad to be able to state that the opinions which we expressed of Sir Robert Peel's plan, immediately upon its being propounded, are identical with those which, upon communication, are found to prevail amongst the members of the Liberal party. Those defects of the scheme to which we adverted are fully felt, and it will be perfectly right to take any opportunity that may present itself of getting rid of them, provided that the attempt to do so involves no danger to the great measure of abolition itself. We are strongly convinced that it would have been wiser and better, and in a merely political point of view quite as safe, for Sir Robert Peel to have proposed at once the establishment of a Free Trade in corn, without the petty clogs and conditions which he has chosen to attach to it; and as discussion develops antagonist opinions, we think it may yet become manifest, even to himself, that he has only marred the gracious aspect of a noble reform, by contrivances which will be either wholly inoperative, or be very slightly felt, and which in any case neither will be, nor deserve to be, much valued by anybody. But whatever success may attend efforts to amend the plan, and whatever shape its details may assume when the time comes for the final struggle, there can be but one opinion amongst Free Traders as to the importance of combining and putting forth their whole strength to ensure the success of a measure which virtually establishes a Free Trade in corn at once, and provides for the speedy removal of every, even nominal, restriction, of which the temporary existence may be suffered.

With regard to the immediate proceedings of the House of Commons, though the country can badly afford to wait for the legislative realisation of principles which public opinion, the unanimous convictions of all our leading statesmen, and pressing national exigencies demand to have placed on the statute-book with the least possible loss of time, we are not disposed to find fault with the Premier's concession to the application for postponement made on Tuesday night. We can only express our wish that the interval thus given will be wisely employed. We trust that our landlords will avail themselves of this period of leisure, to take a calm and prudent survey of their position, resources, responsibilities, and permanent interests. They will not, we hope, merely look to their own powers, real or supposed, of temporary obstruction, but to the consequences of a possibly successful exercise of those powers. They must not imagine that the great question now before Parliament and the country can, by any conceivable amount of violence of protectionist agitation, be put back to where it was, one year, one month, or one week ago. The whole collective statesmanship of the empire has now, once for all, committed itself in this struggle—has definitively sanctioned and legitimated the national demand for commercial freedom—and the only possible consequence of resistance can be an extremely brief postponement of an inevitable result, purchased at the cost of an exasperating and disorganising war of classes.

We are sure that all prudent and sober-minded protectionists must see this. We trust that no timidity, indolence, or false shame will prevent them from strenuously using their influence to counteract the suggestions of the more hasty and passionate members of their party. It must be quite superfluous for us to tell such of the landlords as are capable of watching the signs of opinion, that the adjustment now proposed by Sir Robert Peel is the most favourable to their pretensions that any statesman could venture to offer with the slightest prospect of its being accepted by the country. It falls short of the measures of public demands and expectations. It is not exactly what the country looked for. It will, we cannot doubt, be very generally regarded as, on the whole and under all circumstances, a satisfactory settlement; but it will only be so regarded because it is a settlement, offered by a Minister who is presumed to have the power of giving immediate effect to his purposes. We are not at all sure that the popular feeling on the matter will go much beyond contented and pleased acquiescence. The satisfaction will, we should hope, be nearly universal; but we are afraid that any enthusiasm on the subject will be very partial. Let any serious doubt be thrown on Sir Robert Peel's power to give immediate legislative reality to the scheme of adjustment proposed last night, and we may look for a sudden and vast accession, both of force and of bitterness, to the best organised and most formidable popular movement that this country has ever seen. To say that the defeat of Sir Robert Peel's measure would involve the certain loss of that temporary and qualified protection which it offers to the agriculturists, would be little to the purpose; for we believe all agricultural interests would be the better without this apparent boon. But it would involve evils in the presence of which all the gains of protection, as estimated by the most imaginative agricultural arithmetic, become utterly insignificant. We could then look only for an indefinite extension and continuance of agitation which, under the influence of such an irritant, would merge its merely commercial and industrial character in an organised effort to alter the present distribution of political and social power.

All good men must deprecate such a result; all thoughtful men must see it to be inevitable under the circumstances we have supposed. We trust we do not presume too far on the prudence and patriotism of English landlords, in expressing the hope that a large and influential portion of them will use their utmost exertions to avert the disasters consequent on a re-opening of this question now. The present interval for consideration and reflection will, we fervently hope, be spent, by very many of those to whom the agricultural community look for counsel and guidance, not in fanning the flame of a hopeless agitation, but in smoothing and facilitating a settlement which will terminate an anxious political question; close a harassing social controversy; heal an exasperating social quarrel; and enable the country to meet, as calmly and hopefully as may be, a grave public calamity that has long been rapidly approaching, and may soon be present with us in all its strength and bitterness.

THE GOATACRE MEETING.
Just published, price One Penny, or 5s. per 100.
A VERBATIM REPORT OF THE MEETING OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS AT GOATACRE, printed in a tract form, 12 pages.
Sold at the LEAGUE Office, 67, Fleet-street, London; and by J. Gadsby,
Newall's Buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

While we congratulate our readers on the progress of the subscriptions to the Quarter of a Million Fund, and on the effect that they have obviously produced without and within the walls of Parliament, we must impress upon them the necessity of not relaxing in their exertions, now that the crisis of our great struggle has arrived. The victory is not yet won; all the resources, and all the energies of the League, will be required, before complete success can be achieved. A dissolution of Parliament appears to be imminent; and the battle of Free Trade will have to be fought inch by inch on the hustings. We are anxious to urge on our friends the importance, not only of subscribing freely, but of subscribing early. The manifestation of strength will often decide the course of the wavering and the doubtful; but, above all, our subscriptions are the best proof that we are thoroughly in earnest, and that we shall not cease to labour until every link of the fetters imposed on British industry is struck off, and every restriction on the supply of food to the people completely annihilated.

PRESTON.

From an announcement in another column, it will be seen that the subscription in aid of the League fund has been commenced in this town, in a very spirited manner.—Preston Chronicle, Jan. 24.

In the column referred to, the following liberal subscriptions are recorded, and others solicited:

	£	s.	d.
Thomas Miller	500	0	0
George Smith	225	0	0
John Hawkins	250	0	0
William Eccles, Bamber Bridge	250	0	0
Henry Miller	200	0	0
Thomas Ainsworth	200	0	0
J W Dall and Son, Samesbury	100	0	0
John Evans, Chipping	50	0	0
Livesey & Son, Preston Guardian	50	0	0
Robert Ascroft	50	0	0
Michael Satterthwaite	50	0	0
Richard Dixon	50	0	0
G H	50	0	0
J R	50	0	0
John Heaton	50	0	0
Napier and Goodair	50	0	0
Charles Wilson	25	0	0
— Fletcher, Leyland	25	0	0
Joseph Haslam and Sons	25	0	0
Y Z	20	0	0

DURHAM AND NORTHUMBERLAND.

The Jarro Chemical Company have subscribed 50l. to the Quarter of a Million League Fund; H. E. F. (per Mr. D. Liddell), 10l. 10s.; Mr. L. Hedley, Villa-place, Mr. Stephen Lowrey, Mr. John Hewitson, Mr. William Wilson, Mr. James Stephen, Mr. Pringle, jun., and Mr. John Potts, (Gateshead) 5l. each.—Gateshead Observer, Jan. 24th.

Mr. John Ormston, of Newcastle, has renewed his subscription of 1l. to the League; also the following Free Traders in Sunderland.—William Bell, Esq., Ford House, Mr. W. T. Bell, High-street, Mr. Henry Armstrong, Union Bank, Mr. Thomas Robson, Cumberland-terrace, Mr. Ralph Dauson, High-street, Mr. George Hardcastle, Norfolk-street, and 'A Friend,' Monkwearmouth. Capt. Ganlet, of the brig Dorothy, Sunderland, has subscribed 5s.—Ibid. Jan. 24th.

WHITEHAVEN.

Whitehaven—a town which presents a striking instance of the disastrous effects of monopoly—is showing signs of laudable activity in the movement for emancipating trade from the unwholesome operation of prohibitory laws. A meeting is in contemplation in aid of the League Quarter of a Million Fund, and it is expected that the services of Mr. Falvey will be secured for the occasion. As a proof that the inhabitants are by no means deficient in the spirit which has been so nobly displayed in Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, and Glasgow, we may mention that two gentlemen connected with the Anti-Monopoly Association of Whitehaven, collected, in one afternoon's canvass, last week, no less than 200l. With such evidence of the progress of sound principles as this, may we not hope that, assisted by that ancient constitutional weapon, whose efficacy has been so recently discovered, (the creation of 40s. freeholds) our brethren in the west will be at no distant day enabled to throw off the yoke of the domineering house of Lowther?—Carlisle Journal, Jan. 24.

DUNDEE.

We have much pleasure in reporting the continued progress of the League Fund subscriptions here. Since our last paper, sums amounting to nearly 500l. have been subscribed. The following is the list:

	Reported in our last,	£2242	12	0
John Brown, merchant	100	0	0
Kinnmond, Hutton, & Steele, engineers	25	0	0
A Friend	25	0	0
Peter Duncan, merchant	20	0	0
James McGavin, merchant	20	0	0
W Kirkland and Son, wood merchants	20	0	0
A Free Trader	10	0	0
J Paton, jun, merchant	10	0	0
C Guthrie, Tivbank	10	0	0
Anti-Monopolist	10	0	0
— and Muir, farmer	10	0	0
James Brothers, merchants	10	0	0
James Russell	10	0	0
James Houston, merchant	10	0	0
James Brown, merchant	10	0	0
Wilson and Aberdeen, machine-makers	10	0	0

Haddon and Patterson, merchants	20	0	0
John Duncan	10	0	0
W Martin, jun	10	0	0
R A Miller, merchant	10	0	0
W Halley, merchant	10	0	0
C Smith, wright	10	0	0
Edmond Baxter, writer	10	0	0
James Fenwick, shipowner	5	0	0
A Friend (F)	5	0	0
Dr Gray	5	0	0
W Shaw and Son	5	0	0
W Bett	5	0	0
A Shipowner	5	0	0
Baillie Moyes	5	0	0
John Stevenson, dyer	5	0	0
James Miln, merchant	5	0	0
A Free Trader (B)	5	0	0
James Dundas, merchant	5	0	0
James Spankie and Co, merchants	5	0	0
A M'Walter, Reform-street	5	5	0
A Free Trader (I)	5	0	0
James Miller, Bullion	5	0	0
John Cooper, baker	5	0	0
A Friend (I)	5	0	0
A Manufacturer	5	0	0

£2712 17 0

—Northern Warder, Jan. 22.

ARBROATH.

The subscriptions in this place to this giant fund have commenced on a scale corresponding to the vast amount required. One gentleman, we believe, of this place, has given 100l., and his example is being followed by others in sums proportionally large. Arbroath is Free Trade to the core; and we doubt not in proportion to its size, that its sum total will not stand lowest on the list.—Northern Warder, Jan. 22.

CARLISLE.

W. Marshall, Esq. M.P. for this city, has directed his name to be entered in the Carlisle subscription to the Anti-Corn-Law League Fund of a Quarter of a Million, for the sum of 300l.—Carlisle Journal.

LIVERPOOL.

The Liverpool contribution to the Corn Law League, now amounts to nearly 17,000l.: and it is expected that it will exceed 20,000l.

HORSHAM.

A subscription of nearly fifty pounds has already been raised by the friends of Free Trade, towards the above fund.—Sussex Advertiser.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SHEFFIELD INDEPENDENT."

SIR,—A friend of the Anti-Corn-Law League received, on Monday last, a circular, requesting his aid and assistance to the Anti-Corn-Law League Fund. Accordingly he, with another friend, canvassed the little neighbourhood of Loxley, when, in a few hours, they got the sum of 22l. 10s., every shilling of it from working men; one man contributed 2l., and eleven men 1l. each, and the remainder in 10s. and 5s. each. I feel confident that if the country was canvassed in a similar way, there would be many thousand pounds got, that perhaps will not be got if neglected.

Yours respectfully, A FREE TRADER.

Loxley, Jan. 14. P.S. We have not done yet

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Jan. 28, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

*Kershaw, Leese, and Co, High-street, Manchester	200	0	0
*Chadwick, James, Eccles, near do	200	0	0
*Pilkington, Brothers, and Co, Blackburn	200	0	0
*Buckley N and Sons, Carr Hill, near Moseley, Saddle-word	100	0	0
*Steiner, F, Hyndham House, near Accrington	100	0	0
*Hyde, Sons, & Sowerby, Dukinfield, nr Manchester	60	0	0
*Mason, Thos and Sons, Ashton-under-Lyne	60	0	0
*Thicknesse, Ralph, Wigan	50	0	0
*Grundy, J and E, Manchester	50	0	0
*Brewis, Sam and Co, 40, Spring Gardens, do	50	0	0
*Langworth, Browne, & Co, Salford	50	0	0
*Hargreaves, Wm, Grange, 199, Shaw-st, Liverpool	40	0	0
*Richardson, Wand Son, 4, Meal-street do	40	0	0
*Johnson, W and Co, Wigan	40	0	0
*Petrie, J and Co, Rochdale	40	0	0
*Smith, B and Sons, Manchester	30	0	0
*Jackson, E and J do	30	0	0
*Walker, John, Stand, near do	20	0	0
*Johnson, H, jun, Staleybridge	20	0	0
Hunter, Thos, Chapel Walks, Manchester	20	0	0
*Hampson, J, solicitor, Norfolk-street, do	20	0	0
*Benson, G and Co, Staleybridge	20	0	0
*Ackroyd, Wm, Altringham, near Manchester	20	0	0
*Potter, J and T, Wigan	20	0	0
Chadwick, James, Rochdale	20	0	0
*Chadwick, Thomas, do	20	0	0
*Darbishire, S D, Brown-street, Manchester	20	0	0
Scarr, Petty, and Co, St Ann's-square, do	20	0	0
Devonport, E D, Capesthorn, near Macclesfield	20	0	0
Dyson, John Fernley, Stockport	20	0	0
*Midgley, James, Rochdale	20	0	0
*Dutton, John, Hull	12	10	0
*Cunliffe, Ellis, 10, Princess-street, Manchester	10	0	0
*Walker, P, Patricroft, near do	10	0	0
*Mason, J, Charlton-pl, Oxford-rd do	10	0	0
*Gill, T and Son, 10, Cross-street do	10	0	0
Turner, J, Godley, near do	10	0	0
Chadwick, J and Co, Rochdale	10	0	0
*Kershaw, J, Glossop, Derbyshire	10	0	0
Gaskell, Holbrook, Patricroft, near Manchester	10	0	0
Grafton, Smith, J do	10	0	0
*Pagnu, Ogden, & Co, ditto	10	0	0
*Openshaw, John, Hope-street, Bury	10	0	0
Peacock, G, Holm's Vale, near Bury	5	0	0
*Wetherall, Aaron, Bank-parade, Salford	5	0	0
*Leigh, Silas, Worsley, near do	5	0	0
Barr and Turnbull, Mill-street, Ancoats, do	5	0	0
*J O, do	5	0	0
*Molnereux, Thos, Kirby-street do	5	0	0
*Webb, T do	5	0	0
*Seel, Sam, Quick, Saddleworth	5	0	0
Pixton, J S, 209, Chester-road, Hulme, Manchester	4	0	0
*Percival, D, King-street do	4	0	0
*Ryder, Wm, Brighton-place, Oxford-road do	4	0	0
Norton, A and Co, Oldham-road do	4	0	0
*King, Jno, Chepstow-street do	2	2	0
*Pollard, J, Quay Side, Newcastle-on-Tyne	2	2	0
*Thompson, James, Wray, near Lancaster	2	2	0
*Pickering, Wm, 37, George-street, Con M, Manchester	2	0	0
*Latham, Wm, Warden House, Newton Heath, do	2	0	0
*Hordern, D, 3, Walton Buildings do	2	0	0
*Taylor, J J, Rev, York-place, Oxford-road do	2	0	0
*H E F, Newcastle-on-tyne do	2	0	0
*Watson, J, 87, Moss-lane, Hulme do	2	0	0
*Blackwell, M, 136, Gt Ormound-st, Hulme, Manchester	2	0	0
*Whitehead, T, Walk, Rochdale	2	0	0
*Cornall, J, Stanley-street, Bury, Lancashire	2	0	0
Cooper, G, Delph, Saddleworth	2	0	0
*J S, Manchester	2	0	0
*Watson, R, 179, Deansgate, Manchester	2	0	0
*Hollis, Wm, Northampton	2	0	0
*Bamber, Thomas, Blackburn	2	0	0
*Hampson, R, Manchester	2	0	0
*Priston, Wm, Atherton-st, Prescott	2	0	0
*Trotter, T, Lydney, Gloucestershire	2	0	0
*Trotter, J, Blakeney, near Newnham, ditto	2	0	0
*Wood, J, 69, Church-street, Huddersfield	2	0	0
*Sneyd, T, Belmont, near Leek, Staffordshire	2	0	0
Gee, J, Melbourne-terrace, Adelphi-street, Salford	2	0	0
Kinross, T, farmer, Dunblane, N.B.	2	0	0
*Jones, E, High-street, Whitchurch, Salop	2	0	0
Marsh, Peter, 6, Scotland-place	2	0	0
Johnson, J B, 67, Scotland-road	2	0	0
*Thomas, Richard, Whitechurch, Salop	2	0	0
*Kershaw, J, Pymrose Hill, Greenacres Moor, nr Oldham	2	0	0
*Hadfield, J, Ashton, near Warrington	2	0	0
*Brook, Wm, Pavement, Todmorden	2	0	0
Brand, W F, Wigan	2	0	0
Brand, R C, do	2	0	0
*Haslam, Roger, St George's-street, Bolton	2	0	0
Towers, T, Greengate, Salford	2	0	0
*Fingle, J, 38, Gull-street, Sheffield	2	0	0
*Shaw, Wm, Dukinfield, near Ashton-under-lyne	2	0	0
*Potts, J, High-street, Gateshead	2	0	0
*Holmes, Wm, Rye Hill, Newcastle-on-Tyne	2	0	0
*Hedley, R, Villa-place do	2	0	0
*Watson, Joshua, jun do	2	0	0
*Hewitson, J, Side do	2	0	0
*Pringle, W S, Collingwood do	2	0	0
Barrow, P, Prescott	2	0	0
*Kilvington, J, Wilton, near Hull	2	0	0
*Harrison, Asa, Drake-street, Rochdale	2	0	0
*Tweddle, Saml do	2	0	0
Cox, S, Birmingham-street, Walsall	2	0	0
Mackinson, Hugh, Knowley-street, Great Bolton	2	0	0
Harwood, John, Deansgate do	2	0	0
Dean, John, Silverwell House do	2	0	0
*Blinkhorn, B, 39, Worcester-st, Hulme, Manchester	2	0	0
*Hampson, R, Chester-street do	2	0	0
*Fox, Richd do do	2	0	0
*Lee, John, King-street do	2	0	0
*Hood, D, 29, Brazen-nose-street do	2	0	0
*Higgin, R, Teneriffe-street, Broughton do	2	0	0
*Woodward, A, 33, Mill-street do	2	0	0
*Jones, Mr, 135, Oxford-road, Con M do	2	0	0
*Wells, Wm, Fountain-street do	2	0	0
*Clegg, W and I, 23, Oxford-street do	2	0	0
*Gray, J, Chester-street, Hulme do	2	0	0
*Young, G, 21, Bloom-street do	2	0	0
*Whitely, James, Medlock-street, Hulme do	2	0	0
*Baker, John, Downing-street do	2	0	0
*Wright, Isaac, 4, Upper Brook-street do	2	0	0
*Wignall, Wm, John-street, Hulme do	2	0	0
*Schofield, J, 42, Moss-lane do	2	0	0
*Dixon, R, Mather-street do	2	0	0
*Castle, James, Dukinfield, near do	2	0	0
*Brook, Mr, 2, Upper Brook-street do	2	0	0
*Francis, Wm, Tatbury-street, Every-street do	2	0	0
*Askew, Wm, Victoria-place, Bury New-road do	2	0	0
*Murray, J, nr Chain Bridge, Low Broughton, do	2	0	0
*Evans, J, 99, Market-street do	2	0	0
*Boden, J, Hilton-street do	2	0	0
*Boden, J, Rowland Hill, Oldham-street do	2	0	0
*Newton, Isaac, 45, Hilton-street do	2	0	0
*Hay, Nish, and M'Kean, Oxford-street do	2	0	0
*Cryer, Hugh, 6, Miller-street do	2	0	0
*Howarth, James, 17, Oxford-street do	2	0	0
*Oldstock, James, 40, Moss-lane, Hulme do	2	0	0
*Yardley, J, Gloucester-place, Hulme do	2	0	0
*Peattie, J, Cryer's-buildings, Butler-street do	2	0	0
*Holland, J, Middleton, near do	2	0	0
*Bowers, T, Post Office, Hollinwood, near do	2	0	0
*Wolstencroft, R, 1, Tirol-place, Cornbrook-park, Stretford-road do	2	1	0
Wilcock, Ann, Downing-street do	2	0	10
Middleton, M, Burlington-street do	2	0	10
A Friend, Downing-street do	2	0	5
McMillan, S, 28, do do	2	0	5
Ashurst, J, 20, do do	2	0	5
Hurst, Wm, 10, Oxford-street do	2	0	5
Blackley, D, 29, Clarindon-street do	2	0	5
Sykes, J, 69, Booth-street West do	2	0	5
Sumner, E, Hulme do	2	0	5
Fielden and Whitaker, 78, Gt Jackson-street do	2	0	5
Parkinson, H, 16, Medlock-street do	2	0	5
Kay, Mr, Brook-street do	2	0	5
Chapman, T, Chester-street, Hulme do	2	0	5
Hardy, J do do	2	0	5
Unsworth, J, 9, Chester-road do	2	0	5
Caldwell, J, 95, do do	2	0	5
Fielden, Wm, 183, do do	2	0	5
Hinchcliffe, J, 60, Worcester-street do	2	0	5
Acton, J, 12, Stretford New Road do	2	0	5
Sherrick, Peter, 178, Dean's-gate do	2	0	5
Fenton, J, London Works, Smethwick, near Birmingham	2	0	5
Williamson, J, St Ann's Square do	2	0	4
Cubitt, Wm, Rushmore-road do	2	0	4
Plews, Mrs, Downing-street do	2	0	2
Bunting, Wm do do	2	0	2
Thier, Mr do do	2	0	2
Wilde, Wm, 63, Moss-lane do	2	0	2
Wylde, J R, Brook-street do	2	0	2
Cavannah, J, Hulme, near do	2	0	2
Holt, J, 98, Medlock-street do	2	0	2
Leyden, John, 81, do do	2	0	2
Hulme, Mrs, 178, do do	2	0	2
Walker, W, 171, do do	2	0	2
Walker, Wm, 131, do do	2	0	2
Smith, S, 137, do do	2	0	2
Pitt, T, Dukinfield, near do	2	0	2
Appleyard, Mr, Brooke-street do	2	0	2
Bowden, J, 23, Clarendon-street do	2	0	2

Mellor, G. Chester-street, Hulme, ..	do	0	2	6
Flatcher, Mr ..	do	0	2	6
Goodison, Mr ..	do	0	2	6
Mesham, Mr ..	do	0	2	6
Henton, T. Hardman-street ..	do	0	2	6
Ogden, Mr, 95, Chester-road, Hulme ..	do	0	2	6
Pettries, Miss, 187, ..	do	0	2	6
Cooper, Mr. Chester-street, Hulme ..	do	0	2	6
Spier, J, 168, Medlock-st., ditto ..	do	0	2	6
Goodall, F.T, 20, Medlock-street ..	do	0	2	6
Silverwood, C, 111, ..	do	0	2	6
Owen H, 103, ..	do	0	2	6
Stringfellow, J, 49, ..	do	0	2	6
Sundry Small Sums ..	do	1	16	0

Burton, Daniel and Co. ..	do	20	0	0
*Stone and Kemp ..	do	10	0	0
Chadwick, John Hebuss ..	do	5	0	0
*Mellalieu, Samuel ..	do	2	10	0
Ashworth, John, jun ..	do	2	0	0
Boardman, Robert ..	do	2	0	0
*Hughes, John ..	do	2	0	0
*Thorneley, John, draper ..	do	1	1	0
Lees, W S ..	do	1	0	0
*Brown, E K ..	do	1	0	0
Rushton, John ..	do	1	0	0
Kemp, Clement ..	do	1	0	0
*Wolstencroft, Geo, Blackley ..	do	1	0	0
*Mellalieu, H ..	do	1	0	0
*Harrison, James, jun ..	do	1	0	0
Butterworth, Geo ..	do	1	0	0
*Wolstencroft, J, corn dealer ..	do	1	0	0
Heywood, Wm ..	do	1	0	0
*Lancashire, John, Long-street ..	do	1	0	0
Whitehead, John ..	do	1	0	0
Wolstencroft, Samuel ..	do	0	10	0
Mellalieu, R ..	do	0	10	0
Lawton, Wm ..	do	0	10	0
"A Friend" ..	do	0	10	0
Booth, John ..	do	0	5	0
Longworth, Wm ..	do	0	5	0
Ridings, Wm ..	do	0	5	0
Hill, T ..	do	0	2	6
Whitaker, T ..	do	0	1	0

*Brown, Wm, Chapel-street ..	do	200	0	0
*Thorneley, J D, Brunswick-street ..	do	20	0	0
Wood, Miss E G, Suddbrook Hill ..	do	20	0	0
*Lea, G B & Co, Kidderminster ..	do	12	10	0
*Workmen in the employ of Messrs J and B Walker, Hamilton-lane, Price-street, Birkenhead, Cheshire ..	do	11	9	0
*Cooke, Isaac, 1, Exchange-buildings ..	do	10	0	0
*A Friend to the Anti-Corn-Law League ..	do	10	0	0
Wood, H, Goree, Toxteth Park ..	do	10	0	0
*Hughes and Ronald, 33, Dale-street ..	do	7	10	0
*Gillham, Chas, 101, Lord-street ..	do	5	0	0
*Smith, James, 51, Hope-street ..	do	5	0	0
*Maxwell, J, Much Woolton, near ..	do	5	0	0
*Z ..	do	5	0	0
*Bretherton, E, South John street ..	do	5	0	0
*Seel, James, 31, Frederick-street ..	do	2	2	0
*Crichtley and Deverill, 140, Park-lane ..	do	2	0	0
*Mellor, Miss, 99, Shaw-street ..	do	2	0	0
*McIntyre, P, Dr, 25, Slater-street ..	do	1	1	0
*Barstow, Thomas, 43, Fleet-street ..	do	1	1	0
*Roberts, Wm, 44, Mill-street ..	do	1	1	0
*Tinker, E, 5, Scotland-road ..	do	1	1	0
*Reynier, J, 29, Exchange-alley North ..	do	1	1	0
*Johnson, W, Apothecaries Hall, Birkenhead ..	do	1	1	0

*Shepherd, J, 132, Scotland-road ..	do	1	1	0
*Hutton, J, 39, Grafton-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Rees and Jefferys, 14, Prices-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Barlow, C, 1, Cleveland-square ..	do	1	0	0
Eastwood, E, 5, South-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Seddon, James, 5, Daulby street ..	do	1	0	0
*Hornblower, Francis ..	do	1	0	0
*Edwards, Jos, Duke street ..	do	1	0	0
*Cooban, J, 104, Scotland-road ..	do	1	0	0
*Baylis, Dr, 79, Mount Pleasant ..	do	1	0	0
*Baker, T W, 4, Roe-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Hutchinson, G, 2, Nelson-place, Duke-street, Edge Hill ..	do	1	0	0
*Graham, W H, architect, Birkenhead Cheshire ..	do	1	0	0
*Swann, Wm, 27, Norton street ..	do	1	0	0
*Reid, James, 61, Bold-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Wright, T, 16, Gloucester-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Oldfield, R H, 24, Pleasant-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Kenny, T, 97, Whitechapel ..	do	0	10	0
*Fleming, R, 22, Lime-street ..	do	0	10	0
*Stewart, W, 35, Moorfields ..	do	0	8	0
*Barker and Dobson, 75, Paradise-street ..	do	0	8	0
*Archer, J, 78, Dale-street ..	do	0	5	0
*Baylis, Mrs, 79, Mount Pleasant ..	do	0	5	0
*Clayton, Wm, 71, Whitechapel ..	do	0	4	0
*Perks, Chas, 143, London-road ..	do	0	4	0

Knowles, T ..	do	0	10	0
Webster, P ..	do	0	10	0
Leddra, G ..	do	0	5	0
Johnston, Wm ..	do	0	5	0
Bartley, J ..	do	0	5	0
Whitfield, Janet, Mrs ..	do	0	5	0
Lowe, James ..	do	0	5	0
Hector, P ..	do	0	4	0
Bartley, Geo ..	do	0	2	6
Brownbill, D ..	do	0	2	6
McCarrow, Barnabas ..	do	0	2	6
Reeves, Benjamin ..	do	0	2	6
Robinson, Chas ..	do	0	2	6
Gannon, Edward ..	do	0	2	6
Owen, S ..	do	0	2	6
Glover, Wm ..	do	0	2	6
Roscow, Wm ..	do	0	2	6
*Small Sums subscribed ..	do	0	18	6

Leigh, Ralph, Standish Gate ..	do	5	0	0
Aspinall, Joseph ..	do	5	0	0
Aspinall, John, Wigan Lane ..	do	5	0	0
Park, Wm and Co, Ironforge ..	do	5	0	0
*Alexander, James, Queen-street ..	do	2	0	0
Waddington, R ..	do	2	0	0
*Brown, Michael, Dog and Partridge Inn ..	do	1	0	0
*Fairclough, James, Rodney-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Wall, Thomas, bookseller ..	do	1	0	0
Raniers, Wm ..	do	1	0	0
*Collison, T, pawnbroker ..	do	1	0	0
*Leadbitter, E, Rodney ..	do	1	0	0
*B R ..	do	1	0	0
Acton, Wm, Standishgate ..	do	0	10	0
*Greenwood, Wm, jun, Oxenhope ..	do	4	0	0
*Greenwood, Wm, sen ..	do	1	0	0
*Greenwood, James, Woodlands ..	do	1	0	0
*Pickles, R and Son, Oxenhope ..	do	1	0	0
*Kershaw, Brothers, Leeming ..	do	1	0	0
*Aykroyd, John O, Throstle-st ..	do	0	8	0

*Hays, R, Hazel Grove, near ..	do	10	0	0
*Hays, W H, near ..	do	1	0	0
*Wharmby, Timothy, near ..	do	1	0	0
Hallworth, T, near ..	do	1	0	0
*A Friend ..	do	1	0	0
*Goulden, W T O, Windmill-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Wood, James, jun, Hazel Grove, near ..	do	1	0	0
*Smith, J, sen, Bosden Fold, do ..	do	1	0	0
*Burrows, John, Stockport Moor, do ..	do	1	0	0
*Bottoms, Wm do do ..	do	1	0	0
Gosling, Josiah ..	do	0	10	0
Watkinson, John ..	do	0	5	0
Healey, Rev S ..	do	0	4	0

Barnsley District

*Harvey and Co ..	do	30	0	0
*Kaye, Wm and Son, Clayton West, near ..	do	6	0	0
Huddersfield ..	do	4	0	0
*Russell, James, Nether Holand, near ..	do	4	0	0
*Shepherd, Wm ..	do	4	0	0
*Clark, J, Kersforth Hall ..	do	4	0	0
*Taylor, Wm and Sons, Rodbrook, near ..	do	4	0	0
*Parkinson, J S ..	do	4	0	0
*Canter, J ..	do	4	0	0
*Allatson, Geo ..	do	2	0	0
*Taylor and Park ..	do	2	0	0
*Newman, Edw ..	do	2	0	0
*Shaw, J, Foundry ..	do	2	0	0
*Parker, E, Stairfoot, Commercial News Room ..	do	2	0	0
Parker, Chas, Stairfoot ..	do	2	0	0
*Jackson and Holdham ..	do	2	0	0
*Carmley, J, manufacturer ..	do	2	0	0
*Pigott and Newton, ditto ..	do	2	0	0
*Richardson, T, ditto, Loncar House ..	do	2	0	0
Marshall, Benjamin ..	do	1	0	0
*Brady, Edw ..	do	1	0	0
*Smith, G, linen manufacturer ..	do	1	0	0
A Friend, per G Smith ..	do	1	0	0
*Craik, R ..	do	1	0	0
*Bromley, Edw ..	do	1	0	0
*Allatson, G, jun ..	do	1	0	0
*Carter, J, at Mr Naylor's ..	do	1	0	0
*Matthewman, J ..	do	1	0	0
*Rycroft, J ..	do	1	0	0
Morley, T ..	do	1	0	0
*Fridd, James, Bank ..	do	1	0	0
*Guest, T ..	do	1	0	0
Riddsdale, Wm ..	do	1	0	0
*Brown, A, reed maker ..	do	1	0	0
*Goodworth, Wm, and Brothers ..	do	1	0	0
*Elliott, J ..	do	1	0	0
*Hill, Benjamin ..	do	1	0	0
*Dale, T ..	do	1	0	0
*Pepper, T, Monk Bretton, near ..	do	1	0	0
*Smith and Davies, dyers ..	do	1	0	0
*Taylor, James, druggist ..	do	1	0	0
*Royston, Wm, iron warehouse ..	do	1	0	0
*Harrison, Chas ..	do	1	0	0
Smofitt, Mr, grocer ..	do	1	0	0
*Gelder, J ..	do	1	0	0
*Jackson, G ..	do	1	0	0
*Walker, Mark, Monk Bretton, near ..	do	1	0	0
Byrd, David ..	do	1	0	0
*Bickers, Sykes ..	do	1	0	0
Traviss, Geo ..	do	1	0	0
Dennis, Joseph ..	do	1	0	0
*Steele, James ..	do	1	0	0
*Fridd, Wm, linendraper ..	do	1	0	0
*Wood and Perkes, Worsbro' Dale ..	do	1	0	0
*Ostcliffe, John, near ..	do	1	0	0
*Raywood, R R ..	do	1	0	0
*Spencer, H J ..	do	1	0	0
*Porter, J, St George's-place ..	do	1	0	0
Russell, Geo, Nether Heyland, near ..	do	1	0	0
*Russell, Ward and Co, Old Mill ..	do	1	0	0
*Parkinson, W R ..	do	1	0	0
*Milner, J C, Thurlstone, near ..	do	1	0	0
*Aked, T, Clayton West, nr Huddersfield ..	do	1	0	0
Moorhouse, Wm, jun, Thurlstone, near ..	do	1	0	0
*Buckley, James ..	do	0	10	0
*Saville J and Son ..	do	0	10	0
Workmen at Wood and Perkes ..	do	0	3	3

Subscriptions received from Friends to the cause, sitting in a small room called the Snug, Fleur-de-Lis Inn, T Robinson, Angel-street ..	do	3	9	0
*Workmen frequenting Robert Daff's, Boot and Shoe Inn, Pinstone-street ..	do	3	1	6
*Greaves, Wm, South-street, Park ..	do	2	0	0
Subscriptions from the Milton's Head Inn, Allen-st, J Morewood, landlord ..	do	1	12	0
Persons frequenting the Ball Inn, Green Lane, James Eyre, landlord ..	do	1	2	6
Seven Workmen in the Edge-tool trade at Sheaf Works ..	do	1	0	0
*Pitt, John, Waingate ..	do	1	0	0
*Outram, J, Black Swan, Snig Hill ..	do	1	0	0
Fordham, John, Castle-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Osborne, J, Sussex-street ..	do	1	0	0
Atkin, Geo, Barber Nook ..	do	1	0	0
*Gray, Geo, Phillips-road ..	do	1	0	0
Morton, James, Cornhill ..	do	1	0	0
*Hanger, Chas H, 18, Union-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Russell, John, Clarence-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Jackson, Wm, ditto ..	do	1	0	0
*Shortland, G, 70, Carver-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Hughes, James, Russell-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Yates, J, Howard-street ..	do	1	0	0
Harrop, J, West-street ..	do	1	0	0
Sellers, J, Sussex-street ..	do	1	0	0
Ritchie, James, Spring-lane ..	do	1	0	0
*Unwin, Chas, West Bar ..	do	1	0	0
*Hoyland, E, The Edge ..	do	1	0	0
Heathcote, G, Manor Castle Inn, New Edward-street ..	do	1	0	0
*Moorhouse, J, 127, Devonshire-street ..	do	1	0	0
Rhodes, H G, Fulwood ..	do	1	0	0
*White, Samuel, 11, Regent-street ..	do	1	0	0
Hill, Abraham ..	do	0	10	0
Harrison, Wm, Townhead-street ..	do	0	10	0
Foster, G, West-street ..	do	0	10	0
Wild, T, Fargate ..	do	0	10	0
Hague, S, Eldon-street ..	do	0	8	0
Hughes, J, 12, Russell-street ..	do	0	8	0
Ellis, James, George street ..	do	0	8	0
X Y Z ..	do	0	5	0
Whitworth, W R S ..	do	0	5	0
Millar, T, 82, Scotland-street ..	do	0	4	0

Sheffield.

Graham, Messrs, and Co, Milton Iron Works, near Sheffield ..	do	2	6	0
*Jubb, J, and others, do ..	do	1	0	0
*Graham, W do ..	do	1	0	0
*Fletcher, John do ..	do	1	0	0
*Deighton, J do ..	do	1	0	0
Smith, A do ..	do	1	0	0
*Mitchell, Wm do ..	do	1	0	0
Powell, J do ..	do	1	0	0
*Allott, J do ..	do	1	0	0
Balmforth, M do ..	do	1	0	0
*Smithson, T do ..	do	1	0	0
Parker, J do ..	do	1	0	0
Brown, J K, Hayland ..	do	1	0	0
Wood, Wm do ..	do	1	0	0
Pepper, R, Stubbins, do ..	do	1	0	0
Knowles, W, Hayland ..	do	1	0	0
Vickers, J do ..	do	1	0	0
Sundry Persons, Milton Iron Works ..	do	0	11	2

	Graham, Messrs, and Co, Milton Iron Works, near Sheffield	2	0	0
	*Jubb, J, and others, do	1	0	0
	*Graham, W, do	1	0	0
	*Fletcher, John, do	1	0	0
	*Deighton, J, do	1	0	0
	Smith, A, do	1	0	0
	Mitchell, Wm, do	1	0	0
	Powell, J, do	1	0	0
	Allott, J, do	1	0	0
	Balmforth, M, do	1	0	0
	Smithson, T, do	1	0	0
	Parker, J, do	1	0	0
	Brown, J K, Hayland	1	0	0
	Wood, Wm, do	1	0	0
	Pepper, R, Stubbins, do	1	0	0
	Knowles, W, Hayland	1	0	0
	Vickers, J, do	1	0	0
	Sundry Persons, Milton Iron Works	0	11	2

Collected by
Jos. Parker.

Greenock	*Graham, John, merchant, Grey-place	1	1	0
	*Black, Archibald, Shaw-place	1	1	0
	*Lindsey, Andrew, merchant	1	1	0
	*Reid, James, worsted spinner	1	0	0
	*Arbuckle, Jas, farmer, Carlsburn-st	1	0	0
	*McFarlane, M Thos, farmer, do	1	0	0
	*Aitken, R, tallow chandler, Charles-st	1	0	0
	*Hunter, John, fish merchant, do	1	0	0
	*Houston, W L	1	1	0
	Stewart, Archibald, Garthand-st	1	1	0
Paisley	*Russell, William, dyer, Bladda	1	0	0
	*Thomson, Andrew, manufacturer	1	0	0
	*Rule, Robt, Causeyside	1	0	0
	*Park, Allen, farmer, Gockstone	1	0	0
	*Kirkland, J, manufacturer, 13, Canal-st	1	0	0
	*Pinkerton, Alex, Muslin-st	1	0	0
	*Martin, W, manufacturer, Causeyside	1	0	0
	*Lang, Alex, jun, manufact, George-st	1	0	0
	*The Workmen of S. Frost, Broad-Lane Iron Works	1	5	0
	*Eadon, George, Fargate	1	1	0
Sheffield	*Cutts, Joseph, 25, Hermitage-st	1	0	0
	Stamforth, S, Queen's Head, Sheaf-street, Park	1	0	0
	*Sheldon, T, and Son, Trafalgar-place	1	0	0
	*Sheffield, Mr. Dentist	1	1	0
	*Robinson, G, Draper	1	1	0
	*Gillbanks and Co, grocers	1	1	0
	*Bowman, E, surgeon	1	0	0
	*Johnston, Thos, at Messrs Dixons	1	0	0
	*Blenkinsop, William, Dalston Low Green, near	1	0	0
	*Rutherford, J, land agent, Lambton nr	2	0	0
Carlisle	*Murray, Thos, iron founder	2	0	0
	*Murray, Geo, chemist	1	0	0
	*Murray, Geo, jun	1	0	0
	*Burn, Thos, innkeeper	1	0	0
	Walton, Ralph, butcher, Lumley, near	1	0	0
	*Cawthorne, Jno, builder do	1	0	0
	Crawford, Robt, farmer, Fleets, near	1	0	0
	Sowerby, G, coal owner, Walridge, nr	1	0	0
	Murray, Thos, artisan	0	5	0
	Smith, James	0	5	0
Kelso	Harrison, Clement	0	2	6
	*Wilson, W C, sen, Bridge-street	1	0	0
	*Wilson, W C, jun, do	1	0	0
	*Wilson, James, Earlstoun	1	0	0
	Wilson, John, Jun, Lindley, near Huddersfield	5	0	0
	Lord, William do	5	0	0
	Sykes, William, Sen do	5	0	0
	Hall, John do	5	0	0
	Hall, Abraham do	5	0	0
	Renton, Henry, Rev, Secession Manse, Kelso	5	0	0

* Those names marked with an asterisk are renewed subscriptions.

SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR THE WILTSHIRE LABOURERS.
Taylor, A., Greenacre Moor, near Oldham, for Wm.
Perry, of Charlton	0	10	0	0
Duke, Geo., Battle	0	5	0	0
Harris, James, Clapham	0	2	6	0

BEDS FOR AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.
Stovin, Mr, South Western Railway, Vauxhall	0	5	0	0
Duke, Geo., Battle	0	5	0	0
Rieshall, J	0	5	0	0

The following names in our last week's Subscription List were either erroneously spelt, or appeared with misdescriptions in the addresses. As given below they are correct:—In LEAGUE, No. 122, for J. Mather, R. Mather, and D. Mather, 58, Mount Pleasant, Hollywell, read John Mather, Richard Mather, and Daniel Mather, 58, Mount Pleasant, Liverpool; for Miss Mather, and Miss Jane Mather, 58, Mount Pleasant, Hollywell, read 58, Mount Pleasant, Liverpool; for G. and J. Rawdon, Old Hall, read Christopher and James Rawdon, Old Hall-street; for Messrs. James Kitt, Sons, and Co., read Messrs. James Still, Sons, and Co.; for F. Pennington, Exchange Chambers, read Exchange-street, East; for J. Harvey, Hamilton Hall, Waverton, read Wavertree; for A. Kurk, Bootle, read Andrew Kurtz; for P. Quirk, Court House, Brombo, read Brombo, Cheshire; for Peter M'Muldron, 5, Heintier, read 5, Hunter-street; for J. Bradburn, 91, Bradburn-street, read 91, Dale-street; for T. Brocklebank, Rufford, read Rufford-street; for Ralph Brocklebank, Rufford, read Rufford-street; for S. Thornley, 22, Claremont-street, read Clarence-street; for Mrs. Matthews, Waverton, read Wavertree; for McClellan and Lee, Princess-street, read Prices-street; for R. Waylie, 2, India-bridge, read India-buildings; for P. G. and J. Heyworth, Rufford, read Rufford-street; for E. T. Welch, 59, Paradise-street, read E. and T. Welch; for R. Bright, 72, Bole-street, read Bold-street; for T. Carter, 4, Temple Boss, read Temple-buildings; for E. Jackson, 7, Deighton-street, Bristol, read Ebenezer Harris.

In the Birmingham list of Subscriptions it should have been stated, "From the Clerks and Foremen of London Works, Smethwick, near Birmingham."

The following gentlemen have sent in their names to 67, Fleet-street, as Subscribers to the Quarter of a Million Fund:—

	£	s.	d.
Strutt, Edward, M P,	350
Strutt, Anthony R	350	1050	0 0
Strutt, John	350
Brown, Henry, Esq, 13, John-street, Minorities	100	0 0
Crowley, A C S, and H, Alton	100	0 0
Crowley, C S, Croydon	100	0 0
Crowley, H do	100	0 0
Ashton, Yates	100	0 0
Acton, Joseph, Wigan	100	0 0
Colvin, James, Esq	50	0 0
Seymour, William Digby, 32, Fenchurch-street	50	0 0
Sykes, C, and Sons, Lindley, near Huddersfield	50	0 0
Wood, John, 17, Cumming-street, Pentonville	25	0 0
Pocock, J P, Upon Lavell, Heytesbury	25	0 0
Darwin, Chas, Dawn Bromley, Kent	25	0 0
Waterhouse, Ed J W, Lindley, near Huddersfield	25	0 0
Miller, Robert, Tower-street, Tower-hill	25	0 0
A Friend to the Agricultural Labourer	25	0 0
Hold, Robt L, 55, Old Broad street	25	0 0
Stuart, Win, 17, Cateaton-street	25	0 0
Swinburne, E, Tranbeck Bridge, Kendall	20	0 0
James, Walter, Luton	20	0 0
Landles, Jno P, Honey Lane Market, Cheapside	10	10	0
Hawkins, J, 68, Bishopsgate-street	10	10	0
Bell, John, 35, Old Broad-street	10	0 0
Pitt, Robt, Newerk Foundry, Bath	10	0 0
Bass, Abraham, Burton-on-Trent	10	0 0
Baker, G B, Dunster	10	0 0
Green, Charles, Darlaston	10	0 0
MacIntosh, R J, West Stratton, Hants	5	0 0
Downing, G W, 21, Guildford place, Wilming-ton-square	5	0 0
A Z, Edinburgh	5	0 0
X Y do	5	0 0
Boarer, R W, Folkestone	5	0 0
Willie, William, Bude-street, Luton	5	0 0

Wilson, John, Jun, Lindley, near Huddersfield	5	0	0
Lord, William do	5	0	0
Sykes, William, Sen do	5	0	0
Hall, John do	5	0	0
Hall, Abraham do	5	0	0
Renton, Henry, Rev, Secession Manse, Kelso	5	0	0
Chandler, Dennis, 68, Mark-lane	5	0	0
1323 Register, East Surrey	5	0	0
Taylor, P A, Jun, 8, Power's-place, Queen-square	5	0	0
Allen, William, 62, Warren-street	5	0	0
Brown, Richard, M, Crowmarsh-hill, near Walling-ford	5	0	0
Chatterton, G, 21, Beaufoy-terrace, Edgward-road	5	0	0
Fairford, H, S, 25, Lloyd's-square	5	0	0
Agnes, J, and J, W, Hays, near Bromley	5	0	0
Rickwood, W, Horsham	5	0	0
Agate, James, do	5	0	0
Agate, Mrs, do	5	0	0
Stanford, J, Mrs, do	5	0	0
Mitchell, Henry do	5	0	0
Pollard, William do	5	0	0
Lintott, William do	5	0	0
Thornley, R, Wrexham	5	0	0
Yewdall, David, Eccleshill	5	0	0
Darby, William, Lyndhurst-road, Peckham	5	0	0
Butler, R, 15, Pickering-place, Paddington	2	10	0
Hutton, William, Eccles-hill	2	0	0
Thornton, Samuel, do	1	0	0
Fenton, William do	1	0	0
Honywood, Drew, Horsham	2	0	0
Ashdown R, Rev do	1	10	0
Vans, Joseph do	1	10	0
Potter, Benjamin do	1	0	0
Pollard, Richard do	1	0	0
Potter, Rowland do	1	0	0
Gretton, Thomas	1	0	0
Gretton, T, J,	1	0	0
Bentley, J,	1	0	0
Mansfield, J,	1	0	0
Craddock, J,	1	0	0
Potter, Robert	1	0	0

LETTER FROM MR. COBDEN TO THE TENANT FARMERS OF ENGLAND.

TO THE FARMING TENANTRY OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

GENTLEMEN,—The question for you now to determine is, Shall the repeal of the Corn Law be gradual or immediate? Deny it who may, this is the only question that deserves a moment's consideration at your hands. Public opinion has decreed that protection to both agriculture and manufactures shall be abolished; and Ministers and statesmen have at last reluctantly bowed to a power from which there is no appeal. Let no designing or obtuse politicians delude you with the cry that the House of Lords, or a dissolution of Parliament, can prevent the repeal of the Corn Law. All men of average sagacity are now agreed that Free Trade in corn and manufactures is inevitable. How, then, shall we apply this new principle?—timidly and gradually, like children; or boldly and at once, as becomes men and Englishmen? Upon this point, I wish to submit to your consideration a few remarks which I believe to be of the utmost importance to your interests; they are offered in good faith by one who has sprung from your own ranks, and who, although deemed by some to be your enemy, will, I hope, live to be regarded as a promoter of the independence and prosperity of the farming tenantry of the kingdom.

The Government measure proposes to abolish the Corn Law in February, 1849, putting on for the three intervening years, a new scale of duties, sliding from 10s. to 4s. The moment this law is passed, the duty will drop from 15s. to 4s. Here will be change the first, fright the first, and with many, I fear, panic the first. But there will be no settlement. You will not be able to foretell whether the duty during the years 1847 and 1848 will be 4s. or 10s. It is quite probable that, in February, 1849, the duty will be 10s.; if so, on the 1st of that month, it will drop again suddenly, from 10s. to 1s. Here will be change the second, fright the second, and, possibly, panic the second. The fall of duty in these two changes would have amounted to, first, from 15s. to 4s.; next, from 10s. to 1s.; making, together, 20s.; but, mark, if the duty were immediately reduced, from 15s. to 1s., the fall would be only 14s. So that by this clumsy contrivance, you are not only to be kept for three years in a state of suspense and embarrassment, and exposed to double panics, but are liable to a drop of 20s., instead of 14s., duty; you are actually subjected to the shock of the withdrawal of 6s. more of protection!

But this is only a small part of the danger to which you will be exposed by the delay. From the moment that the new Corn Law is passed foreigners and corn importers will begin to make preparations for the day of its extinction; they dread a sliding scale in any shape, owing to former losses, and will keep their eyes steadily fixed upon the 1st of February, 1849.

What a precious policy is this which advertises for three years to all the landowners and speculators of the entire world, offering them a premium to hold back their supplies, and then to pour upon our markets, in one day, a quantity of corn which, but for this contrivance, might have been spread over 12 or 18 months! And what may your fate be under these probable circumstances? Supposing the crop of 1848 to be abundant in this country, you will be liable, in the spring of 1849, to the sudden and unnatural influx of the corn accumulated by foreigners for this market, which must be sold here, having no other market; thus beating down prices artificially, to the loss of all parties, but more especially of the British farmer.

How different would be the operations of an immediate repeal of the Corn Law. There would then be no stock of foreign corn waiting for the opening of our ports. Nobody expected last year in Poland or America that the English Corn Law would be repealed—nobody prepared for it; not a bushel of grain was raised upon the chance of such an unlooked-for contingency. Is there an intelligent farmer in the kingdom that will not at once exclaim, "If we are to have a repeal of the Corn Law, give us it this spring, when the foreigner is unprepared for it, and when not a single quarter of corn sown after the news reaches him can be brought to this market in less than 18 months."

But the present is, beyond all comparison, the most favourable moment ever known for abolishing the Corn Law. If ever it could be repealed without even temporary inconvenience to the farmer, this is the time. There is a scarcity at present over nearly all the Continent. One half of Europe is competing for the scanty surplus stock of grain in America. Millions of our countrymen are deprived of their ordinary subsistence by the disease of the potato, and they must be sustained at the public expense upon a superior food. Do what we will, we cannot, during the present year, secure low prices. Abolish the Corn Law to-morrow, and still wheat must rise during the spring and summer. If the farmers had the power of ordering time and circumstances, they could not contrive a juncture more favourable to them than the present for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Law. Nay, I believe that if the Corn Law could be abolished by a secret edict to-morrow, the farmers would never make the discovery of open ports by any injurious effect produced upon their interests.

I cannot believe that Sir Robert Peel is favorable to the gradual repeal; he supported it by no other argument in his speech than the fear of panic amongst the farmers; but he has told us again and again, in proposing his former alterations in the tariff, that he believes all such changes are less injurious, if suddenly made, than when spread over a period of years. I have the strongest conviction, derived from his own past changes in the tariff, that he is right. Why then should you, in deference to unfounded fears, be deprived of the benefits of experience? If you speak out in favour of an immediate settlement, who will oppose your wishes?—Not the Government: they are anxious, so far as public opinion and the exigencies of the moment will allow, to conciliate your favour: Not the great landed proprietors, whose interests and yours are in this respect identical, who desire also, on political grounds, to put a period to an agitation, the prolonged duration of which they believe to be injurious, and who would willingly take any step which shall at once consult your interests and dissolve the League.

Let me entreat you to take this subject into your instant and earnest consideration. Do me the justice to believe that I have no other object in view in writing this letter but to serve your interests. If you should be induced to concur in its views, you will avoid the only danger to which, in my opinion, the farmers were ever exposed from the repeal of the Corn Law—that of the transition state. From the first I have always entertained and expressed the conviction that Free Trade, far from permanently injuring the farmers, would ultimately tend to their prosperity and independence. I never disguised from myself, however, the temporary evils to which they might be exposed in the change. But let us unite in seizing the present opportunity, and the triumph of sound principles may be achieved without the bitter ingredient of one particle of injury to any class or individual. From the most exalted personage in the realm down to the humblest peasant, all may witness, with unalloyed pleasure, one of the greatest victories ever achieved over past prejudice and ignorance, whilst each class may derive peculiar gratification, at the close of our long domestic struggle. The Sovereign may glory that her reign was reserved for the era of a commercial reformation, more pregnant in its beneficial consequences to the destinies of mankind than all the wars of her illustrious ancestors; the landed aristocracy will see in the consummation of our labours, an opening for the resumption of their social influence based upon the only sure foundation—the respect and confidence of the people; whilst to the middle and industrious classes will be presented a constantly widening field for the employment of their peaceful energies, together with greater means and more leisure for that moral amelioration which, I trust, will accompany their improved physical condition.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen, your obedient Servant,
 RICHARD COEDEN.
 London, 30th January, 1846.

FREE TRADE MEETINGS.

SECOND FREE TRADE DEMONSTRATION OF THE WORKING MEN OF LIVERPOOL.

At the meeting held in Clayton-square yesterday evening week, it was stated that, in consequence of the shortness of the notice given for convening that meeting, another would be held, for the purpose of allowing a still larger number of the labouring classes an opportunity of publicly expressing their opinions upon the great question of Free Trade. Accordingly, the second meeting was announced for Wednesday evening last, in Williamson-square; and the publicity given to the proceedings of Thursday having excited considerable interest, preparations were made for one of the most numerous assemblages ever witnessed in this town.

A drizzling rain had fallen during the greater portion of the day; and at seven o'clock, when the square began to fill, the wet had increased considerably. Nothing daunted, however, the poor men kept their places—the bands came up, bringing with them thousands of people, and at half past seven o'clock the immense square was at the very least two thirds filled. The rain, by this time came down almost in torrents, the wind extinguished some of the gas lights, and the atmospheric appearances were altogether so unfavourable to proceeding, that the committee deemed it prudent to put it to the assembled thousands whether they should go on, or adjourn to the first fine evening. Several insisted that they should proceed "if it rained cats and dogs"—a sally which was received with loud laughter; but the necessity was imperative, and the crowd quietly dispersed.—Liverpool Mercury, Jan. 23.

ADJOURNED MEETING.

The adjourned meeting was held on the evening of Thursday, the 23d, when the elements were scarcely less unfavourable than on the previous evening, a notice of which is reported above. The arrangements were much the same as before noticed, with the addition of a canvass covering to the platform, which protected the chairman, speakers, and reporters from the rain. The bands from the north and south ends again brought up thousands of the working-classes, whose ardour seemed in no degree abated. The enthusiasm which prevailed was of the most exciting nature, and the immense concourse who thronged the square conducted themselves with the most perfect good humour—like men in earnest in the good work in which they were engaged.

Mr. HAMILTON MCGREGOR said: Workmen of Liverpool, this is rare weather for umbrella-makers. I hope they will have plenty of trade and profit by it. Her Majesty assembles Parliament to-day to consider what is necessary for the good of the nation, and we have assembled to-night for the purpose of telling them that the measures which we think they should adopt, must be adopted, and quickly (cheers). I therefore propose that the chairman of last night, Mr. John Wainwright, a shipwright, of Liverpool, and a right good fellow, take the chair.

Mr. JOHN PRICE seconded the motion; and it was carried by acclamation.

The CHAIRMAN then called upon Mr. John Simmons to read the placard announcing the meeting, which was as follows:

"The aristocracy want all: they have the Colonies, the Army, the Navy, the Law, and the Church, and yet they demand a share of the poor man's loaf. 'Notice.—A second open air meeting of the working-classes will be held on Wednesday evening next, Jan. 31, 1846, at half past seven o'clock, in Williamson-square, to take into consideration the best means of securing the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws. Two bands of music will be engaged, one of which will leave St. James's Market-place, and the other the north end of Scotland-road, at seven o'clock precisely, to accompany thousands of the working-men of Liverpool to the place of meeting. A journeyman shipwright is expected to preside, and a number of working-men will address the meeting, when it is hoped the most perfect order will prevail, as on the occasion of our last meeting. God save the Queen! The committee of the working-men meet every evening, except Sunday, at No. 25, Tarleton-street, near Williamson-square, where all communications may be addressed to the committee. Signed, on behalf of the committee of the working-men, William Simmons, secretary."

The CHAIRMAN then proceeded. It gives me great pleasure in seeing such a number of my fellow working men assembled together on such a grand occasion as the present one. Never, in all my life, had I so great an honour conferred upon me as in presiding over so vast an assemblage of my fellow working men. I hope and trust, gentlemen, that none of you will disgrace this meeting by any kind of disorderly conduct (hear, and no, no). I hope that, as men of Liverpool, none of you will forget your character as men. I hope that none of you will disgrace the town wherein you live by letting it go forth to the world, through the means of the public press, that the working men of Liverpool could not hold a meeting on such a glorious occasion as this without being annoyed by any portion of the working classes (hear). Gentlemen, I will not fill up your time by making any further remarks, and I hope and trust the greatest order will be maintained by you, and I pledge myself to do my endeavours towards keeping that which is so requisite on the present occasion (cheers).

Mr. JAMES BROWN, a journeyman tailor, was next introduced to the meeting. He said, "Gentlemen, the resolution which I have the honour of proposing is as follows:

"That the working men of Liverpool in open air assembled do hereby declare that our earnest desire is to be permitted the free exercise of our skill and exertions for the support of our families. That thousands of our fellow men, in all parts of the country, who have neither sufficient work nor food, though willing and anxious to work, have our deepest sympathy. We, therefore, join in the demand now making in every part of the kingdom for the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws, believing and asserting most emphatically our opinion, that the Corn Laws tend only to demoralise the people and intercept the blessings of a kind Providence as the reward of honest and persevering industry."

Gentlemen, continued the speaker, at this time last night the Duke of Wellington was giving his Parliamentary dinner, and I hope they were considering the best means of giving to the poor cheap bread; but if not, we'll oblige them to do so (cheers). The placard calling this meeting has informed you that we are met here to take into consideration the best means of seeking a total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws; therefore, no matter what may be the result of to-day's proceedings, you must persevere in agitating until you erase for ever from the statute book the iniquitous and damnable laws that cramp the commerce, the bane of industry, and the curse of this country, and create more misery and poverty than any hell-born minister could ever imagine (great cheering). Persevere, peaceably and energetically, until every restriction, every prohibition on the food of man shall be removed for ever; and in the name of this great meeting—in the name of the suffering thousands of our fellow-countrymen—in the name of the Goatsacre agricultural labourers of this kingdom—and in the name of the half employed and half-fed operatives of this and other large towns, I call on Sir Robert Peel to let the people enjoy what he has asserted we have a right to, that which we now demand as our right—the privilege of buying in the cheapest, and selling in the dearest market (cheers). I call on him to knock the fetters off our commerce, to give a fresh impetus to industry—to let the people of this country prosper if it can only be done by a repeal of the Corn Laws (cheers). At a meeting lately held in Brighton, over which the Duke of Richmond presided, he quoted an extract from a speech delivered by Sir James Graham in 1838. It was to this effect:—"If you repeal the Corn Laws you make England the workshop of the world, but you become dependent on foreigners." The Duke of Richmond acquiesced with Sir James Graham, and I acquiesce with the Duke of Richmond in one thing. We want exactly to make England the workshop of the world, for nature has designed her to be so, and we have every power to make her so. But the Duke goes further, and says—"Do not be dependent upon foreigners. Where does he get his tea and coffee, and things of that sort? Where does he get his principal supply of beef, pork, and butter from? Let him ask Lord Lyndhurst, and perhaps he will say it is the alien Irish that supplies it—a nation under the parental care of our Government—an integral portion of Great Britain—and one which, according to Lord Denman, contains upwards of four millions of people in a state of starvation—a nation, as Karl, a German traveller, said, whose inhabitants are worse clad and fed than any other people. On that very ground I for one am one that will not claim for myself what I would not give to another; and I call on Sir Robert Peel to adopt prompt, early, and energetic measures to improve the international condition of Ireland (hear). I call on him to adopt such measures as will prevent famine and disease from striding through the land; for, if not, individual as I am, I will be amongst that crowd that will raise their voice, and call "Ireland for the Irish" (vehement cheering). Many will say this is irrelevant to the question, but I maintain it is not; for are not the Irish people sending their representatives over to help us in achieving this great question?—consequently, we ought to extend our sympathies towards them (great cheering). The Duke of Richmond said the friends of the League dare not call an open air meeting. I think you will all admit the Duke of Richmond is a perverter of truth, and on this platform, and on the authority of this meeting, I call the Duke of Richmond a liar (loud cheers). The Duke of Richmond, moreover, said to his dupes, that if the Corn Laws were repealed, they would be transplanted into Manchester, to be placed into those scenes of iniquity and vice, the manufactories of Manchester and Leeds. But I would tell him there is, perhaps, as much morality, and more, about the factories of Manchester than about Goodwood and its neighbourhood. He had an automaton in strings there, a person named Fruen, to say there was no deficiency in the wheat crop, and that the potato disease was greatly exaggerated. I will put another name to him, and call him "Premeditating Ruin"—(roars of laughter)—and ask if he intended to give the curry powder of the Duke of Norfolk to feed the Irish with till next March? Mr. Miles, at the same meeting, said—"O, the cry of cheap bread is low wages;" but that is a fallacy. I come now to a much more homely person, the editor of the Standard. He called the meeting we held in Clayton-square a farce. (It's a lie). Why? Because one of our speakers said he had enough and to spare; but if that is the sympathy, the philanthropy, and the charity of the editor of the Standard, I will have none of it. A little further on he said this meeting was only composed of 500. Now I wonder how many he will say is here to-night. (Is he here?) No matter what he says; I care not a pin for the vile slanders of the lying editor of the lying Standard (loud and continued cheering.) The speaker concluded by reading the following lines:

What do we want? Our daily bread;
 Leave to earn it by our skill:
 Leave to labour freely for it,
 Leave to buy it where we will.
 For 'tis hard upon the many,
 Hard—unpity'd by the few,
 To starve and die for want of work,
 Or live, half-starved, with work to do.
 What do we want? Our daily bread;
 Fair reward for labour done;
 Daily bread for wives and children;
 All our wants are merged in one.
 When the fierce fiend Hunger grips us,
 Evil fancies clog our brains,
 Vengeance settles on our hearts,
 And Frenzy gallops through our veins.
 What do we want? Our daily bread—
 Sole release from thoughts so dire;
 To rise at morn with cheerful faces,
 And sit at evening round the fire;
 To teach our babes the words of blessing,
 Instead of curses, deep though mute;
 And tell them England is a land
 Where man is happier than a brate.
 What do we want? Our daily bread:
 Give us that; all else will come:
 Self-respect and self-denial,
 And the happiness of home;
 Kindly feelings, education,
 Liberty for act and thought;
 And surety that, whatever befall,
 Our children shall be fed and taught.
 What do we want? Our daily bread;
 Give us that for willing toil:
 Make us sharers in the plenty
 God has showered upon the soil;
 And we'll nurse our better nature
 With bold hearts, and judgment strong,
 To do as much as men can do,
 To keep the world from going wrong.
 What do we want? Our daily bread,
 And trade untrammell'd as the wind;
 And from our ranks shall spirits start,
 To aid the progress of mankind.
 Sages, poets, mechanicians,
 Mighty thinkers shall arise,
 To take their share of loftier work,
 And teach, exalt, and civilise.
 And so we want our daily bread;—
 Grant it;—make our efforts free;
 Let us work and let us prosper;
 You shall prosper more than we.
 And the humblest homes of England
 Shall, in proper time, give birth
 To better men than we have been,
 To live upon a better earth.

HAMILTON MCGREGOR, a printer, in seconding the resolution, said he felt great pleasure in having the opportunity of addressing them, being acquainted with them, and their interests being mixed up with his own. He would just refer to what his predecessor had alluded, some remarks in the Standard,—and read from that paper the following quotation:—"You may farcify anything—even the evidence of misery;—and the open air meeting got up by the operatives of Liverpool—got up on Thursday evening, in Clayton-square, has farcified even the telling meeting of the labourers of Wiltshire. The speakers at the latter place were men whose startling details of their suffering and neglected condition, we could be amazed and grieved at; the speakers at the former exhibit nothing like reality of suffering, by which the poor agriculturists were prompted to plead their case before mankind." Now, my fellow-operatives, these men, like ourselves, met under the canopy of heaven, but they were not so well clad as we! When they are, we may rejoice with them. If the editor of the Standard calls the meeting of Thursday last a farce, will he call this an interlude or a tragedy? Speaking of the Wiltshire men, the editor says,—"The one was the prompting of those real and truthful feelings of wretchedness, the expression of which is ever eloquent; the other was the maudlin raving of simulated suffering." Now, if we are mad, continued the speaker, certainly there are a great number of madmen here to-night. He perhaps expected us to come like Falstaff's regiment, all clad in rags, and not unlike the Wiltshire men! I should like to know what the editor of the Standard means by 'superiors'—cut-throats, I suppose. If so, he did well to say we had our superiors in that respect. He talks of Religion and the Church, now I was a listener at the meeting last week, and did not hear either mentioned. Our religion is a cheap loaf and a good one. This same gentleman endeavoured to abuse us, and dealt most uncharitably with us. We shall exercise charity towards him, and pity him. Long may he live an editorial life, and live in peace; we wish him every happiness this world can confer, and may the printer's devil inscribe to his memory on the tombstone, "Here lies the martyr of curry powder!" The speaker continued—We have met here to say that justice ought to be done to the working men of Liverpool and England. We wish no longer to see the widow's tears flow in greater channels. We wish no longer to see the poor man's child cry for bread, and the little ones in nakedness. Our cause is a common one, and a good cause. He would call their attention to a circumstance which occurred in Liverpool two years ago. The Cheshire cow-keepers finding that the cowkeepers of Liverpool could not supply the town with milk, sent over large quantities, but the people of Liverpool did not say "You must sell your milk at 5d. per quart instead of 4d." Oh no. It was just the same with respect to bread bought in the cheapest market, and sold in the dearest. "I expect," concluded the speaker, "the people of England, from the Land's End, in Cornwall, to John O'Groats, in Scotland, will cry, Down with the Corn Laws, and no surrender."

ROBERT JONES, a labouring man, then came forward, and spoke as follows:—Fellow workmen, I recollect about seven years ago when this question was first agitated in Liverpool, what small meetings we got, and I feel that the cause has progressed rapidly, as shown by the numbers I see around me on the present occasion. Working men at that time knew very little of these things. It shall, however, be my duty this evening to show you some of the evils of the existing Corn Laws so far as to know that it is necessary we should seek for their repeal (cries of hear, hear). Fifty years ago we had all England in a state of commotion, in consequence of a war. The landlords of England, seeing the great stake they themselves had in the country,—for what have we to fight for?—what has the working man to fight for?—he has no stake—well, the landholders of England, having seen the aristocracy swept away in France, said, “We will maintain the war, and bear the expense of it.” How did they fulfil their word? They expended 800 millions of hard-earned money of the sons of toil, and sacrificed millions of the lives of human beings, and then, instead of bearing the expense themselves, threw it on the shoulders of the working-men (hear, hear). In 1815 the war was at an end, happily for us, and we concluded we were to have peace and plenty; for I recollect, as I was a big lad at the time, that millions were half-famished. At that time I fetched potatoes for my mother at a distance of three miles, costing 7s. 6d. per measure, and flour was only two pounds for a shilling. As I said, we expected peace and plenty. During the war millions of money were expended, the landholders were in want of money, and a property-tax was put on to help to maintain that war (hear, hear). They were right in doing so. But then at the end of the war what was the first Act that was carried? Why, it was the repeal of the property-tax. They took the burden off their own shoulders, and threw it on the backs of the working-men (hear). Thirty millions of pounds sterling, of which the landholders had spent the capital, was thrown on the working-men of England (hear, hear). The landlords had also raised the rents to three times what they were when the war began. The Corn Law was then passed; and I ask you whether you think that was a just law to the working-classes?—and, as sure as God’s in heaven, that law has been productive of more misery, wretchedness, want, wickedness, crime, and everything that was bad, than any law that had ever emanated from the mind of man (cheers). The effect of that law was to make food scarce; and I should say to any man that has a voice in the Legislature, that it is one of the most wicked things that can be conceived of to make food scarce. There is no way of making an article dear but by making it scarce. I know it to my sorrow, as I have a family of 13 children. The Legislature have made food scarce, and it behoves us to come forward and try to repeal those laws which have made food scarce and dear (loud cheers). It has been told us over and over again—and as ignorant, simple working-men, sorry am I to say we have been led to believe it—that the price of food regulated our wages (hear). Every man of 40 must be aware that every four, five, or six years there has been a scarcity of food, and with it a scarcity of work, and then wages have gone down; and the consequence has been, that we have not had work even at low wages. A Quaker gentleman at Carlisle had heard this repeated so often that he was determined to ascertain whether it was true or not, and in 1836, 37, and 38, he went to a certain number of shops in the city of Carlisle, and the result was, that in 1836, when wheat was 40s. per quarter, the amount of the wages paid was 151,000*l.*; in 1837, when wheat was 60s., it fell to 92,000*l.*; and in 1838, when wheat was 70s., it came down to 51,000*l.* So you see this showed the fallacy of such an argument—(hear, hear)—only one-third of the amount being paid when food was dear to what it was when food was cheap (cheers). We must be convinced, if we look at these things, that they are all false from the beginning to the end. Another thing was, that when food was dear a great portion of the poor man’s earnings were expended for that alone, and clothes and other necessities could not be had, causing a decreased demand for manufactured goods. What are we contending for from early morn till late at night? Simply for food, and shelter, and raiment. And why should we not then raise our voices against the laws which prevent us from selling our labour to the best advantage? To show the amount paid when food is dear, we need only state that there are in this country five millions of families, and if each had to pay two shillings per week more, then it would come to 25,000,000*l.* more for food alone in one year (hear, hear). There is this 25,000,000*l.* taken from the labour market, that ought to go for clothing and other things that we stand in need of (hear, hear). Another proof of the benefits of Free Trade is, that during the last year, owing to cheap food, 14,000 houses had been built in this town, thus employing builders, joiners, plasterers, and workmen of every description, (cheers,) all getting good wages. It had been said that a repeal of the Corn Laws would bring down the price of grain to almost nothing, which, however, would not be the case, as in a short time all things would find their level, and it would realize a steady price. As to scarcity in a case of war, that was preposterous. They need only look at the means taken by Napoleon during the war to stop supplies coming into this country, and how signally he failed; even his own soldiers were clothed with manufactures from this country, and we had plenty of corn from all parts. Only let us have Free Trade, and make the world a nation of shopkeepers, and you may bid defiance to war for ever, and all nations would be happy and prosperous. He concluded by exhorting them not to cease agitating till the odious Corn Laws were swept from the statute book. (Loud cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN then read the motion, and put it to the meeting, when it was carried amidst the loudest cheering.

Mr. SIMMONS came forward to propose a memorial to her Majesty. He said that it had been his intention to have entered more fully into the subject this evening, but he had been prevented by not having had an opportunity of speaking sooner. He spoke for some time, and concluded by reading the following memorial:—

“The memorial of the working men of Liverpool to her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, of Great Britain and Ireland:—We, your Majesty’s most humble, most loyal, and affectionate subjects, being confident that your Majesty entertains the greatest sympathy for the suffering poor of this country, beg to express our most sanguine hopes that your Majesty’s attention has been drawn to the present high prices of all kinds of provisions arising from the failure of the corn and potato crops, and to express our humble opinion to your Majesty that the Corn Laws act most injuriously on the interests of your memorialists, who have no means of providing for our families but through our earnings, that our request is most simple, and we beg most respectfully to say that surely ‘as much food as man can buy with as much wages as a man can get, for as much work as a man can do, is not more than the natural and inalienable birthright of every man whom God has created with strength to labour and with hands to work.’

“Praying that your Majesty may espouse the cause of the poor in the proper exercise of your royal prerogative, and that the choicest temporal and spiritual blessings may ever rest on the person of our beloved Queen, that your Majesty may long live in the warmest affections of the people of this great empire.” &c., &c.

Mr. HINDS seconded the adoption of the memorial; and after a vote of thanks being passed to the chairman, the meeting broke up about half past nine o’clock. Before separating, however, three cheers were given for Cobden and Bright, three for Russell and Palmerston, three for Villiers and Ewart, and three for the Queen.

DROGHEDA.

Monday last, pursuant to requisition, a meeting of the inhabitants of Drogheda and its vicinity, convened by the Mayor, was held in the Tholsel to “Petition Parliament for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.” Long before the hour of meeting, the Tholsel was crowded almost to suffocation.

Amongst those present were, Sir Wm. M. Somerville, Bart., M.P.; Patrick Boylan, Esq., Mayor; Wm. Campbell, Esq.; T. C., (ex-Mayor); Rev. Mr. O’Farrell, O.S.F.; Rev. Mr. Connolly, O.S.A.; Daniel Brady, T.C.; Stephen Drew, T.C.; John Connolly, T.C.; Patrick Conway, T.C.; Patrick Kelly, T.C.; John Magee, Esq., solicitor; Alderman Rogers; Anthony Keapock, T.C.; Patrick Byrne, T.C.; John Collins, T.C.; David Morton, Esq.; Robert Skelly, &c.

Mr. CAMPBELL came forward and said,—It gives me great pleasure to move that our respected and esteemed Mayor be called upon to preside over this numerous and respectable meeting (loud cheers).

Mr. MAGEE having seconded the proposition, it was carried with acclamation.

The MAYOR, on taking the chair, said—Fellow-townsmen, I return you thanks for the position you have placed me in—at the head of this respectable meeting (hear, hear). About ten days since I received a requisition, signed by the Roman Catholic Primate, several clergymen, gentlemen, merchants, and other inhabitants of the town, requesting me to call this meeting. I felt it to be my duty at once to comply, and named as early a day as was convenient (cheers.) I am glad to see so large an attendance, and I shall be happy to listen to any remarks, or put any resolution which may be moved and seconded. The question of the Corn Laws is a very important one, and one which at the present time is exciting a great deal of attention. I shall not occupy your time by pointing out the necessity there is, as expressed in the requisition, for the “total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws”—(hear, and cheers.) This will be done by the speakers, who will address the meeting: I will merely say that I entirely concur in the object for which you are assembled (cheers.) I hope that the speakers will confine themselves strictly to the object for which the meeting was called. The Mayor sat down loudly cheered.

Mr. BRADY, T.C., moved, and Mr. DREW, T.C., seconded, that Mr. Marron, Editor of the Argus, be appointed to act as Secretary.—Carried with loud cheers.

Mr. MARRON returned thanks, and expressed his fullest concurrence in the object of the meeting. He stated that Sir Wm. Somerville, who had been invited by the committee of arrangements, would attend; and read the following letter which he had received from Mr. Cobden:

“National Anti-Corn Law League,
Manchester, 15th January, 1846.

“DEAR SIR,—I feel much obliged to you for your letter with the enclosed requisition calling the meeting in Drogheda against the Corn Law; and it is especially gratifying to see the names of your Catholic primate and clergy amongst the requisitionists. I shall take the opportunity of alluding to it at our great meeting in the Free Trade Hall this evening, in hopes that it may not be without its effect in the way of example in other quarters, and remain, dear Sir,

Faithfully yours,

“Patrick Marron, Esq.” RICHARD COBDEN.

Mr. HUGH CARRAHER (an operative weaver), rose to address the meeting. He said—It has fallen to my lot to move the first resolution at this meeting. I will read it first, and say a few words on it afterwards. [Mr. Carragher here read the resolution and proceeded.] It requires no eloquence on my part to enforce the necessity of adopting this resolution. This, we all know, is no ordinary year. The potato crop, which formed the staple food of the people of this country, has been a total failure. Men of all parties and of all politics, in the country, admit this to be the case. Where, then, are the people to find food? (cries of hear, hear). It is notorious that the Irish people are the worst fed people in the British dominions. It is not because of the soil not being productive (cries of No). It is because of the poverty of the people. How can we provide good food when the price of it is beyond our reach, and this is caused by the laws we are assembled here to-day to have repealed (hear, hear). Some say that the Corn Laws benefit the farmer, but this I do not believe. I know farmers holding 20 and 30 acres of land who never taste meat from year to year in their houses. Are these Corn Laws then of service to them. Do they add to their comforts? (cries of No, no). In my own locality, on account of the want of employment, the people have suffered from distress and sickness—the latter brought on by eating bad potatoes, for they could not get good ones for want of money. I know of one or two having died through this means (hear, hear, and sensation). Those persons possessing means in the locality contributed as far as in them lay to relieve the sufferers’ wants, but this was still of little avail when so many stood in need. If the Government want proof of the wretchedness in which the people are placed at the present time I would direct attention to the fact that the Poor Law Guardians of the Drogheda Union, to prevent the spread of disease, had to open a fever hospital. And when the matter stands so bad at the commencement of the year, what must be the state of things in summer?

A Voice—Potatoes are not to be got.

Mr. CARRAHER—Look to every county in Ireland, and see how the people are suffering. It is no use for the Government to coerce the people; if they want to preserve peace the way to do it is to give the people food. [A noise of persons rushing in prevented the speaker from going on for a short time. Mr. Richard Shiel, of Ardeath, was one of those who entered now.] Mr. Carragher in continuation: Mr. Chairman, I am particularly glad of the interruption. I felt that I was not thoroughly aware of all the evil effects of the Corn Laws upon the farmers, and I am glad to see so influential a gentleman as Mr. Shiel enter the meeting (cheers). In Ireland, the people look for bread by agricultural employment—in England and Scotland they do not to such an extent, they have manufactures; the price paid for labour in Ireland is consequently much less than is paid in England; indeed, the hire paid an agricultural labourer is, in the best seasons, not more than adequate to keep him in potatoes. What must be his condition now with his potatoes rotten, and very little employment to provide money to replace them. If the Corn Laws were repealed, his situation would not be so bad; for besides lowering the price of provisions it would encourage more work in the country (hear, hear). He (the speaker) felt the injurious effects of the Corn Laws, for from his earnings he was not able to provide good food for his family and himself. He hoped Sir Robert Peel would manfully support the repeal of these injurious laws. (Here Sir Wm. Somerville entered, and was enthusiastically cheered.) Mr. Carragher continued: Sir William, on behalf of the furnishing people of Drogheda, I thank you for attending here to-day (cheers). It is an earnest of what you will do in your place in the House of Commons—

Sir Wm. SOMERVILLE: Allow me to say one word before the business of the meeting goes further (hear, hear). I thank you most gratefully for the reception I have met with on my coming in to the meeting. I felt it to be my duty to be here to-day, to ascertain from you what your opinions were with respect to the Corn Laws, that I should know how to act, as your representative, when the subject came before the house (hear, hear). I will listen to what you have to say, and at the close I shall offer a few observations of my own. Sir William sat down loudly cheered.

Mr. CARRAHER again resumed—It is fearful to contemplate the condition of the country. The people cannot get food—they can’t get employment. It was said some time ago that railways would furnish ample employment; I grant they will give some employment, but the employment they will afford will not be sufficient to engage millions. We shall have the poor-houses crammed. No fewer than fifty-five persons applied for admission into the poor-house of the Drogheda Union last week on one day. Nothing but the greatest distress could force those persons to seek relief there. The Irish people would almost sooner starve than enter these poor-houses, conducted upon the principles they are. Here all the social ties are broken—trampled down. The ties of wedlock which are holy—the ties of parentage—yes, all the better feelings of our nature abused (cheers). If the people have employment they will not enter the poor-house. If the Corn Laws are repealed it will be easier for the poor to live. If the Government think they will sustain a loss by repealing the Corn Laws, let them tax the luxuries of the rich, and leave bread, the luxury of the poor, within their reach. By doing this they will increase the loyalty and affection of the people to the throne, and confer a blessing on the land. Mr. Carragher now proposed the adoption of the first resolution, and withdrew amid loud cheering.

Mr. P. HENRY (manufacturer) rose and said:—Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I beg leave to second this resolution, proposed by our esteemed townsman Mr. Carragher. I rejoice that it fell into so good hands; I am glad of having so able a colleague, for he has left me nothing to say (hear, hear, and laughter). I honestly and fearlessly say that from the wages paid, and the price of provisions, the humbler classes cannot support their families—a man can scarcely maintain himself. I know it for certain—I have men employed myself. They are not supported as they ought to be; it is impossible for them to live under the present circumstances. (Hear, hear.) I would say in the present state of things that men of influence who labour to support the laws which raise the price of bread are murderers of their fellow men. I would say this if I were at the cannon’s mouth. (Loud cheers.) I say that when fifty six persons are found in one day to seek admission into our poor house, it is lamentable. I am poor-law warden since the poor house was opened, and I ought to know something of the circumstances of those who go into the poor-house. I have known persons to work for 4d. and 5d. a day, breaking stones, sooner than go there. Not a few, who were in a starving condition, I had to induce by persuasion to seek the shelter which this roof affords. Mr. Carragher has told you truly that the people would sooner work for the smallest sum by which they could live than go into such an unnatural prison. (Cries of hear, and cheers). Repeal the Corn Laws and the poor houses will soon be empty. There was no doubt the Corn Laws would be repealed if the working people assisted, as they ought, such men as Cobden and O’Connell. In doing this it was not necessary to resort to violence; peaceable means were those to be adopted. The course was to petition—a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether, and I defy all the power in England to resist you. Mr. Heeny concluded by saying that he felt much pleasure in seconding the resolution. (Cheers.)

The resolution was now put from the chair, and unanimously carried.

Mr. CAMPBELL came forward to propose the next resolution, and was loudly cheered. He said—Mr. Mayor, and fellow-townsmen, I have the honour of being entrusted with the second resolution, which I will read to this meeting. (Mr. Campbell read the resolution and proceeded.) Gentlemen, with the language of that resolution I fully concur. I do think that if ever the time has arrived that the Corn Laws should be repealed that time has come (loud cheers). There can be no doubt now of the failure of the potato crop in Ireland, nor that all classes of her Majesty’s subjects must be seriously affected by the increased price of provisions, and there is just reason to fear that the poor may by this failure be reduced to absolute starvation, and that the concomitant evil of pestilence and riot may overrun the land unless the corn and provision laws are immediately repealed—(hear, hear, and cheers). It is not my intention to go into any lengthened detail as to the baneful effects produced by the Corn Laws upon all classes of the people. The speakers who preceded me have pointed out, I think, very forcibly and plainly, that these laws were passed to the detriment of the bulk of the people (cheers). In times of distress I have often visited the cabins in the outlets of this town I have often seen a man with his wife and family gathered round what is commonly called a schuddle, a wicker basket, upon which were placed some potatoes with salt for kitchen. This was the meal for breakfast, dinner, and supper. I felt at the time, as I do still, that the sooner this state of things was remedied the better, and it could not take place too soon (cheers). But this consummation so devoutly to be wished can never be brought about so long as the Corn Laws remain unrepealed. If the people have but patience, and bide their time, I venture to predict there are good days in store for them.

A VOICE: They’re long a coming.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am delighted to see your excellent member come amongst you to-day, as he has done, and to see you greet him with warm hearts; such a reception he is entitled to at your hands. Next to Mr. O’Connell, Ireland does not possess a better representative in the Imperial Parliament. He will convey to the House of Commons the sentiments expressed here to-day by his constituents (hear, hear, and cheers). I know I speak the feelings of the people of Drogheda when I say, they are thankful to him for attending, at much inconvenience and upon this inclement day, at this important meeting (cries of hear). In the House of Commons he will be under the guidance of my

Lord John Russell, and encouraged by that excellent nobleman Lord Morpeth, who has ever been an upright, straightforward public man; and last, though not least, he will be backed by that invincible champion of Ireland, O'Connell (loud and continued cheering)—and depend upon it, before six months go by, the Corn Laws will be numbered with the things that were—

A VOICE: Say six weeks.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It will not be the fault of Sir William Somerville, or the fault of the people's friends, if it be not sooner. Mr. Campbell concluded by saying, that he felt much pleasure in proposing the resolution he held in his hands (cheers).

Mr. KELLY, T.C., having seconded the resolution, it was put and carried unanimously.

Rev. Mr. O'FERRALL next came forward, and was greeted with loud applause. He said: Mr. Mayor and gentlemen, a resolution has been put into my hand, which I feel great pleasure in moving for the adoption of this meeting. [The reverend gentleman here read the resolution, and proceeded.] Mr. Mayor and Gentlemen: I did not come here to make a speech. It is not more than half an hour since I made up my mind to attend; I am not, then, prepared to speak at any length. I have considered it to be my duty to be present, having signed my name to the requisition, which was presented to our worthy chief magistrate to convene this assembly, as also to express my fullest detestation of those laws, which, by preventing Free Trade in corn and provisions, are particularly injurious to Ireland; because, in the words of the resolution, "they promote that violent competition for land which leads to so many murders and various other crimes." Let us look to the source of the commission of these crimes in Ireland—Is not land the cause? Do not the tyrant-landlords throw their tenantry out of their houses in order to make more money of the land by the encouragement of the Corn Laws (hear, hear, hear, and cheers). I have very little to add to what has been already said. Every one in Ireland knows that it is unjust and contrary to the law of God to withhold or keep food from the people. If I were prepared, or had time, I could adduce various proofs from the sacred Scriptures in support of this. For the present I would refer you to the book of Ecclesiasticus, xxxiv. 25. "The bread of the needy is the life of the poor: he that defraudeth them thereof, is a man of blood" (hear). Then, my good people, may we not consider those who maintain the Corn Laws as defrauding the poor of bread, and therefore, "men of blood" (loud cries of hear, hear, and applause). I am rejoiced to think that those laws must be soon abolished. Every ministry that is formed in England must yield to the wishes and demands of the people, when made in a constitutional manner (renewed cries of hear). I consider you, presiding over this meeting, Mr. Mayor, a happy circumstance. It is the first public meeting, since your coming into office, in which you were in the chair; and called for the purpose this meeting is, namely, that of charity and justice, I doubt not but your year of office will be regulated by conduct which, while it increases your popularity, will be no less pleasing in the sight of Heaven (loud cheers). There is another feature in this meeting which must be regarded with pleasure by the people—I allude to the attendance of Sir William Somerville, who has been ranked next to the Liberator himself as the advocate of Ireland in the Imperial senate. Not unfrequently has his voice re-echoed through the halls of St. Stephen's, demanding justice for this country (loud cheers). He will go, as has been remarked, from this meeting, carrying with him the feelings and the wishes expressed here to-day. Notwithstanding that he has a large interest in the support of the Corn Laws, from his being an extensive land proprietor, he has come amongst you determined to cast every selfish interest aside, and to be your representative in reality—to tell Peel and Russell, no matter which of them is at the head of affairs, that we must necessarily have the Corn Laws repealed (cheering for some time). I was not prepared, as I told you, to make a speech—take the will for the deed—and allow me to withdraw by saying I feel great pleasure in proposing the resolution which I have read (loud and continued cheers).

Mr. HUGH O'NEILL (an operative shoemaker) rose to second the resolution. He said—Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in seconding this resolution it will be perhaps expected that I should give a history of the Corn Law, and its evil effects upon society. I will endeavour to do so as briefly as possible (hear, hear). I believe it had its origin about the year 1815, and was intended as a sort of remuneration to the owners of land and the farmers for the taxes they were called on to pay in order to support an expensive war which was carried on by the then Government against France. But instead of being a boon to the small farmer, it has proved a very great evil, for it has driven him from the land to the bog and the roadsides, and made paupers of his family, in too many instances (hear, hear). The painful accounts furnished by the different commissions, instituted from time to time by the Government, demonstrate very clearly that instead of the condition of the labouring population having been bettered by the protection afforded to agriculture, it has grown worse. Every day the calamities of the people are becoming greater. We wait in suspense for the Government to do something to ameliorate our condition. We were promised employment for the labouring classes from extensive works of drainage, and from the formation of railways; but we have not seen these things yet. The Lord of the universe ordained that man should earn his bread by the sweat of his brow; but many of the poor starving people of this country cannot get employment or bread (hear, hear). The condition of the people of this country has been at the lowest for years—their food such as is given to swine. Well did that great political writer, Cobbett, remark that a failure in the potato crop would be ruinous to the United Kingdom. We have melancholy proof of the truth of this at present. But can it be thought that the people will starve, and tamely yield to death? Forbid it justice—forbid it Heaven (loud cheers). I know of my own knowledge a man in this town (and who is at present at this meeting, I believe) with a wife and two children to be obliged to subsist for nearly two days upon one pound of oatmeal made into gruel or thin stirabout (sensation). I regret that I do not see in attendance the Poor Law guardians; there are a few of them present; but the greater number of them have thought fit to absent themselves. A great many of them in my mind, and to all appearance, guard the law, and not the poor (loud cheering and laughter). See how the guardians at Edenderry have acted; they passed a resolution in favour of the ports being opened; no such resolution was resolved on by the guardians of the Drogheda union (cries of shame). I also regret that the J. P.'s, whose duty it is to quiet the people, and teach them to respect the laws, have kept aloof from this meeting too; but more than all I am astonished to see the absence of some of our Liberal Corporation—gentlemen who will be coming into town to-morrow or next day to seek for Aldermanic gowns (cheers).

The Mayor said he begged to interrupt the speaker for a moment. There was upon that day an important meeting of the steam packet company, at which many gentlemen who would attend at their meeting were obliged to be—

A VOICE: It is here they ought to be.

Mr. O'NEILL in continuation: To return to my subject. I regret that I have gone so far; but I must unburthen myself of the load I have (cheers and laughter). In the state in which we are placed at present it is small consequence to us who is Prime Minister—whether Peel or Russell—who can first repeal the Corn Laws is the Premier we want (cries of hear, hear). It is said that the Duke and Peel are at handy-cuffs (at least so the newspapers tell us)—if this turns out to be true there must be a delay, or Peel go out of office. The Duke of Norfolk, however, with great keenness and foresight, has hit upon a plan to quiet the people till the Ministry can agree. He has discovered a patent invention, this is it—He says a little cayenne pepper and salt thrown upon water will keep the stomach warm (laughter and shouts of disapprobation). I know I would wish to see the Duke amongst those by whom I am surrounded, working with a spade and fed at meal times on bad potatoes and curries (loud laughter). I am sorry, said Mr. O'Neill, that "the blood of all the Howards" has descended so low—but the working classes are not so simple as to prefer the Duke of Norfolk's curries to bread. Mr. O'Neill after apologising for occupying the time of the meeting so long, and stating his full concurrence in the resolution proposed, sat down, loudly cheered.

Mr. CONNOLLY, T.C., moved that a petition founded on the resolutions proposed be forwarded to both Houses of Parliament.

This resolution was seconded by Mr. CONWAY, T.C., and carried unanimously.

Mr. MARROW (the secretary), now read the following draft of a petition:—

"To the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled: the petition of the inhabitants of Drogheda and its vicinity

"Most respectfully sheweth—

"That it has been officially declared by the report of her Majesty's Commissioners appointed to inquire into the law and practice in respect to the occupation of land in Ireland, that an immense mass of the people of Ireland, in ordinary years, suffer under the deepest state of destitution—potatoes, their food—water, their drink—and to whom a blanket is a luxury; your petitioners, therefore, humbly suggest that a tax, whereby the price of food is enhanced to such a people, is cruel, impolitic, and unjust.

"That your petitioners, from the testimony of trustworthy persons, clergymen of every creed, magistrates and poor law guardians, and from their own knowledge, believe that an extraordinary disease has destroyed a very large proportion of the potato crop, which the persons so described had as their only food; and they must, therefore, be reduced to famine this year; and it is feared that pestilence may thereby ensue, and starvation riots take place. And further, that in consequence of the said disease in the potatoes, all classes of her Majesty's subjects in Ireland may be seriously affected by greatly enhanced prices for every species of provision, unless the Corn Law duties are immediately and entirely repealed.

"Your petitioners further believe that the laws preventing a Free Trade in corn and provisions are peculiarly injurious to Ireland, inasmuch as they foster and promote a ruinous competition for the possession of land, by which many murders and various other crimes have occurred, and are like to occur; and that this eagerness for land indirectly, but with certain effect, diminishes the employment of agricultural labour—because farmers grasp at large quantities of land, which they have not capital to till, instead of employing labour to cultivate a lesser quantity in a better manner.

"Your petitioners, therefore, respectfully beseech your honourable house to give relief in the premises, by immediately and completely repealing all laws imposing a tax upon corn and provisions—and your petitioners will ever pray."

Mr. DREW, T.C., moved that the foregoing petition now read be adopted, which was seconded by Mr. HAND, and unanimously carried.

Mr. MAGEE (solicitor) rose and said—I beg leave to move that this petition be entrusted to our representative Sir Wm. Somerville for presentation in the House of Commons, and to the Earl of Radnor for a like purpose in the House of Lords (hear). Of the manner in which Sir William has executed the trust reposed in him, it is unnecessary for me to speak, as you all know it perfectly. He has represented you faithfully and honestly; indeed, a more highly independent, honourable, or talented gentleman you could not select for your representative in the British dominions. Sir William's first connection with the electors of Drogheda was as creditable to them as it was honourable for him; he did not canvass them, or seek their suffrages; they invited him. I had the honour of being one of the deputation nominated to wait on him for that purpose. We were instructed to put various questions to him; and to show Sir William's manly, straightforward independence of mind, and integrity of purpose, I will just mention that one of these questions was, whether he would vote for a repeal of the Corn Laws (hear, hear). He said he would not pledge himself to vote for their repeal, but would reserve to himself the right to consider the question when brought before the house; now, how did Sir William act with regard to this question? Notwithstanding that he is a large landed proprietor, he voted with those who were for the total abolition of those laws (hear, hear). In conclusion I have only to add, that he was always found at his post when the interest of his constituents required it, and particularly when his vote or his interest was required to obtain full and ample justice for Ireland (cheers).

Mr. BRADY, T.C., having seconded the resolution, it was put and carried unanimously.

Sir Wm. SOMERVILLE, Bart., M.P., now came forward, and was received with loud and protracted cheers. He said: I came here not to obtrude my sentiments on the question which you have met to consider, but to hear what were yours. I have listened with attention to the resolutions as they have been put forward; and, if I may judge from the manner in which they have been received, the Corn Laws are no favourites of yours (loud cheers, and hear). Mr. Magee has told you that when I had the honour to be requested to stand for the borough of Drogheda, the deputation that waited on me wished to know my sentiments on the Corn Law. I did not at that time pledge myself, because I thought I had not given the subject that consideration which it required—not that I was in love with the Corn Laws, but I wished calmly to consider the question before I gave my decision on it (hear, hear). I went to the House of Commons, and from the arguments I heard there, I came to the conclusion that those laws were contrary to the great principles of truth and justice, and my resolution was formed never to give any vote contrary to these principles (cheers). Such would be my determination whether I was a landlord or not—such was the resolution which I thought it my duty to come to—and I trust that my course has not been such as to displease me to the possession of your esteem (loud cheers). I will continue to consider it, not as a landlord (though being one), but as to its effects upon the mechanic and the trader and the great bulk of the people. You are aware of the course this question run not long since. There was a proposition made to have a fixed duty; when that proposition was made I voted for it, not because I thought it as good a measure as I wished for, but because I believed it an improvement on the previous system (hear). The proposition was, however, scouted by the Tories—they defeated the party who introduced it, and they brought Sir Robert Peel into power; but in doing so, I believe you will agree with me in saying, "they cut a rod to whip themselves" (cheers and laughter). If I read the signs of the times aright, he will propose a very extensive change indeed—in fact, if he does not he cannot hold the office of Prime Minister of England in six months (loud cheers). For myself I will say that if you declare for the repeal of the Corn Law—if you instruct me that they are injurious to the people of Drogheda, the measure for their removal shall have my support (cheers). I have always given my best attention to every request emanating from the people, and I may add that under our complicated system of representative Government, I considered it my duty particularly to attend to the wishes of the humbler and the poor classes from the fact that they have not votes (cheers). Some persons might perhaps say, "This man has no vote—no influence—why should you take any trouble to oblige him?" I have always thought that because he had not this privilege or this influence he the more required protection and assistance (loud cheers). On the first occasion upon which the question of a change in the Corn Law was proposed after I entered Parliament, I voted in favour of the measure, and as I was an Irish landed proprietor, my remarks were taken up by the press and commented on. I even received an anonymous letter, the writer of which paid me the compliment of very seriously asking me, was I mad?—I—an Irish landlord, to vote against the Corn Laws? (Laughter and cheers.) I heard the arguments in the House of Commons on both sides of the question; and I will say that the opponents of the Corn Laws had the best of it. There is no man who could for a moment stand up to oppose the reasoning of Mr. Cobden on the question (cheers); next to the great leader of Ireland—there is no man of higher reasoning powers—no man of more indomitable energy, and his influence in England is only second to the influence possessed in Ireland by the leader of the Irish people (loud cheers for Mr. O'Connell). With the influence and energy of Mr. Cobden, backed by the leader of Ireland and many of the Irish people, the fate of the Corn Laws is sealed (cheers). It is unfortunately too true that when the Corn Laws were carried in Parliament at the point of the bayonet, the system was made the basis of many of our commercial and monetary arrangements, so that it might appear dangerous to shift the basement lest the whole fabric should fall (hear, hear). But I feel satisfied that, after all, it is better to make the change; the entire social system will be made more firm—more secure. The change will, I have no doubt, be ultimately for the benefit of all classes—but especially for the mechanic. (Hear, hear.) You have done me the honour to entrust your petition to me for presentation. I see your meeting is composed of men of high respectability, and of the mechanics and working classes, who have so deep an interest in the question. I will present that petition, and I have no doubt it will have much effect, as every petition coming from Ireland on this subject must. (Hear, hear.) I do not anticipate that the landlords shall suffer so much as they seem to fear, nor do I suppose it will have that injurious effect upon the farmers which they seem to dread; as to the agricultural labourer, his condition is already so bad that we might suppose that no change could make it worse. (Hear, hear.) There can be no doubt that the political barometer just now points to change—there are some threatening indications of storm, but I trust that they shall speedily pass away, and that the ultimate result will be such as none will have reason to complain of. (Cheers.) I have before me full evidence of your opinion on these laws; but even if you were favourable to their continuance, I would think it my duty to come in here to warn you that the change must come. I would consider it but an honest part to come here and tell such of you as might advocate these laws, that they must fall—they are doomed, and I again repeat my belief that no interest will suffer so much as is feared. It would indeed be a gratification to me to support the law if it could be proved to me that they are not contrary to justice, that they are beneficial to all classes of society; but until some conjuror comes forward in the House of Commons and proves that beyond dispute, I feel bound to vote for their removal. I now beg leave to return my best thanks to you, Mr. Mayor, and to the several gentlemen around me—to Mr. Campbell, Rev. Mr. O'Ferrall, Mr. Magee, and to the meeting generally for the very kind manner in which I have been received here to-day. I return to you all my best thanks for the forbearance you evinced towards me when I was unable to attend in my place in Parliament (cheers). I can only assure you that that forbearance shall spur me on to do everything that may be in my power to advance the interests of Drogheda and its inhabitants. To all my constituents I must return my warmest thanks—they have treated me not merely as their representative, but as their personal friend. I can only reciprocate those feelings, and assure you, one and all, that the confidence, forbearance, and friendship which I have received at your hands shall never be forgotten by me. The hon. baronet resumed his seat amid the most enthusiastic applause.

The Mayor having now vacated the chair, Mr. Campbell was called thereto.

Rev. Mr. CONNOLLY came forward to propose the next resolution, and was greeted with loud and continued cheering. He said—I sincerely thank you for this warm reception. A resolution has just been given me which I feel great pleasure in moving; it is to the effect that the marked thanks of this meeting are due, and deserve to be given, to Patrick Boylan, Esq., Mayor of Drogheda, for his dignified conduct in the chair, and his anxiety on all occasions to promote those measures which have for their object the amelioration of the condition of the poor (hear, hear, and cheers). Gentlemen, our worthy Mayor is well known to you. It is not the first time for him to be engaged in the works of charity—his services during the time of cholera are well known to and appreciated by the inhabitants, and the part he has taken in the meeting of this day, adds to his many claims upon the gratitude and esteem of the people (hear, hear, and cheers). It has pleased Providence this year to afflict you by the failure of the potato crop—you have only to be directed by such men as your mayor, and your excellent representative. Wait with patience—do nothing rash—place your confidence in Heaven, and everything will yet be to your wishes (hear, hear). Gentlemen, I again thank you for the enthusiastic manner in which you received me, and in conclusion, let me ask of you one favour, that is—to give three hearty cheers for that excellent gentleman, the Mayor, your chairman (loud cheering for several minutes).

Sir WILLIAM SOMERVILLE begged permission to second a vote of thanks to their worthy and excellent Mayor. The people of Drogheda were alive to his intrinsic merits, and conferred upon him the situation of honour to which he is so well entitled. I have the honour of his friendship, and it is with the greatest pleasure I second the resolution (cheers).

The MAYOR, in handsome terms, returned thanks to Sir William Somerville, Rev. Mr. Connolly, and the meeting, for the vote of thanks passed to him.

Mr. MAJOR: Before this highly respectable meeting separates, I beg to move that the marked thanks of this meeting are due, and hereby given to our representative, Sir William Somerville, for his attendance here this day, and his former services in Parliament.

Mr. DANIEL BRADY claimed the privilege of seconding this resolution, which was put and carried by acclamation. The meeting then separated in good order.

GREAT MEETING OF THE COUNTY OF LANARK.

(From the Glasgow Argus.)

A meeting of the county of Lanark, convened by his grace, the Duke of Hamilton, lord-lieutenant, in compliance with a requisition numerously signed, was held in the County Hall, Hamilton, on Monday, at 12 o'clock. The meeting was well attended, and amongst those present we observed the following noblemen and gentlemen:

Lord Belhaven; Sir J. E. Colebrooke, Bart.; Sir W. C. Anstruther, Bart.; Sir Norman M. Lockhart, Bart.; Sir Henry S. Stewart, Bart.; Hon. Major Cochrane; William Lockhart, of Milton Lockhart, M.P. for the county; James Lumsden, Lord Provost of Glasgow; Messrs. Farie, of Fairlie; Greenshields, of Kerse; Campbell Douglass, Glasgow; John Fife, merchant, Glasgow; David Mackinlay, Glasgow; Robert Stewart, of Omoa ironworks; Geo. Wilson, of Dalmarnock; John Wilson, of Auchineden; Wm. Mills, merchant, Glasgow; John Mure, of Provan; James Dunlop, of Clyde ironworks; Colin R. Dunlop, ditto; Charles Stirling, merchant, Glasgow; Robert Bartholomew, ditto; James Couper, ditto; J. P. Reid, ditto; W. P. Pitt, ditto; Andrew Galbraith, ditto; Alexander Couper, ditto; J. S. Blythe, ditto; Wm. Brown, writer, Glasgow; James Davidson, of Ruchill; Robert Finlay, of Easterhill; James McCall, of Duldowie; Walter Black, Provost of Hamilton; Duncan Swin, Hamilton; Wm. Paterson, Hamilton; H. Houldsworth, of Coltness; Andrew Jackson, of Park; John Whitehead, one of the magistrates of Glasgow; David Chapman, merchant, Glasgow; Wm. Bankier, Provost of Calton; John Robertson, merchant, Glasgow; George Ord, ditto; William McLean, of Plantation; William G. Mitchell, of Carwood; Thos. R. Scott, Castlemaids; Wm. Murray, of Monkland; John Wilson, of Dundyan; John Wilson, jun., of Dundyan; George Crawford, writer, Glasgow; North Dalrymple, of Cleland; Patrick Graham, of Limekilns; Wm. Clark, of Easter Moffat; John Tennant, of St. Rollox; Wm. Gebbie, of Halburn; Alexander Graham, of Capilly; John Webster, Woodhall; John Hamilton, of Fairholm; Henry McCall, Jr., of Daldowie; James Barr, of Almeida Hill; Geo. Stirling, merchant, Glasgow; Walter Buchanan, ditto; John Clark, of Kirkland Park; John Marshall, of Machan; D. O. Marienski, member of the town council, Hamilton; Wm. Moubray, ditto; John Davidson, Airdrie; and a number of the inhabitants of the county of Lanark.

Lord BELHAVEN said, in consequence of a letter which had been received, he believed that they need not expect the attendance of his Grace the Duke of Hamilton; he therefore begged leave to propose that the Hon. North Dalrymple, of Cleland, be requested to take the chair.

The motion was seconded by Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE, and unanimously agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN then called upon Mr. MARR to read a letter from his Grace the Duke of Hamilton.

Sir NORMAN McDONALD LOCKHART said, before the business commenced, he would beg leave to propose that the Clerk be requested to read the sedentary.

Mr. MARR then read a list of the names of the Justices of the Peace, Commissioners of Supply, &c., present.

Mr. ALEX. GRAHAM said, might he be permitted to take the liberty of asking, if they were going to take down the names of all the persons present? He observed that this was a meeting called to take place in this county—it was taking place—and he presumed that every person here had a right to take part in the deliberations, and in any vote which might be come to (cheers). He thought it a work of supererogation, therefore, taking down the names of each individual, for on coming to any division, it would be the sheep going to the right, and the goats to the left.

Mr. JAMES DAVIDSON said the question seemed to be, whether they were to have universal suffrage or not.

Mr. GEBBIE, of Strathaven, suggested that the requisition calling the meeting should be read, in order to settle the point as to who should be present and take a share in the proceedings.

Mr. MARR then read the following:—

"County of Lanark, 8th Jan., 1846.

"My LORD DUKE,—We, who have signed this requisition to your Grace, feel anxious that an opportunity should be given to this county of expressing its opinion on the present state of public affairs. When we consider the many and varied interests of this great county, and the duty which we owe to the industrious and rapidly increasing population employed in agriculture, in commerce, and in manufactures, all of whom are suffering from an erroneous and pernicious system of monopoly and protection, destructive alike of the real interests of the county, and the welfare of our people, we are desirous of expressing our sentiments on this important question, and for this purpose request your Grace will call a general meeting of the county, to be held at Hamilton, on an early day."

The notice was in these terms:

"In consequence of the above requisition, I hereby call a general meeting of the county of Lanark, to be held at Hamilton, on the 19th of January, at 12 o'clock.

"HAMILTON & BRANDON, Lieut.

"Hamilton Palace, Jan. 9, 1846."

The Chairman said from the terms of the requisition he supposed every one present would have a right to vote. It was a general meeting of the county.

Mr. BROWN, writer, Glasgow, maintained that it could not be a meeting of the county of Lanark unless a sederunt was taken down of the persons who had a right to be present. Unless this were done, individuals might come here from Kilmarnock, Kirkintilloch, Pollockshaws, and other places not in the county, and swamp the meeting, who did not belong to the county at all. In that case, it might be a meeting in the county of Lanark, but not of the county of Lanark.

Mr. A. GRAHAM said, it was a general meeting of the county of Lanark, and he did not believe any gentleman would take part in the proceedings, except he had an interest in the county.

Mr. McCALL said, if it was a general meeting of the county, he considered it as poor a turn out as ever he saw in his life. The hall, he considered, would not hold above 1000 persons, and if it had been meant for a general meeting of the county, some suitable place of meeting should have been provided.

After considerable discussion, it seemed to be understood that every one present had a right to take part in the deliberations, and to vote in any division that might be come to by the meeting.

Lord BELHAVEN rose to move a resolution in accordance with the object for which the meeting had been called, and in doing so said: Mr. Chairmen and Gentlemen, This point being now settled, I rise to bring before your attention the object for which this meeting has been called, and I will be as brief as possible in explaining my views on the subject, which I have no hesitation in saying, is of the highest importance of any that a county meeting could be called to deliberate upon. You have already heard the letter of the Duke of Hamilton, in which he declares that he entertains the same principles of Free Trade as he held 30 years ago, when he signed the celebrated protest drawn up by Lord Grenville in the House of Peers (cheers). In asking you, then, to turn your attention to this question, I may begin by stating that we are now arrived in this country at a state of matters in which to stand still is impossible (cheers). If we know anything at all of the opinion of public men on this question, we know this, that men of all sides and of every shade of politics have arrived at the conclusion that the Corn Laws cannot last (cheers). We can arrive at but one conclusion, and that is, that the Corn Laws cannot be continued any longer. Whether their repeal is to be accompanied by the general adoption of Free Trade is another question; but it is a question upon which we ought to deliberate and decide, by declaring it as our opinion that Free Trade as a general principle ought to be adopted by the politicians of this country (cheers). If we consider the vast interests involved in this country (in connection with the object of our meeting), of the first importance as regards merchandise and manufactures—interests which in a few years have raised this country to a pitch of prosperity which I may almost say is unequalled in any other county in Scotland—and which no county of similar extent can have any pretensions to; if we look to that great branch of industry which has risen within the last 20 years—if we consider the immense value of it, not only to the districts where it is in operation, but to the whole country—I (I mean the iron trade of this county)—if we look to the individuals who, I may say, have created that trade—if we consider the ability, industry, and talent brought to bear upon it, so as to raise it from utter insignificance to be one of the staple trades of this country, we must come to the conclusion that we owe a debt of gratitude to those men for their energy and enterprise—and that we are not entitled to stand in the way of the means by which that and every other description of manufacture in the country may be improved and increased (cheers). In considering this question, then, as far as relates to Free Trade in corn, is there any proprietor of land—is there any occupant of land, who will say that there is any benefit either to the one receiving or to the other paying his rent, apart from the general prosperity of the country—or is there any one who does not acknowledge that the one receives his rent best, and the other is best able to pay his rent, when trade is in the most flourishing condition (hear, hear)? And does not that prove that agriculture, and commerce, and manufactures, can only thrive by the encouragement of these reciprocal interests which exist among them? We, then, of the agricultural classes have as great an interest in supporting everything that benefits commerce and manufactures as in supporting that which benefits ourselves. Let us ask, then, what advantages we have gained from these Corn Laws? Will any man take the trouble to look back to the year 1815, when the agriculturists declared that it was impossible for them to get on unless wheat was maintained at 80s. a quarter; and considering the fact that since that time, even with the Corn Law protection, it has been at prices varying from 70s. to 60s., and almost down as far as 50s. a quarter, still we continue to grow wheat, and a larger proportion of it than we ever did. Whence, then, is the advantage we have derived from this protection? At one time we have abundance, at another a scarcity. We have no trust or confidence in any settlement that can be made of this question but one. We have seen the duties vary four or five times, the law having been changed so many times, till at last, as I believe, the time is now nearly arrived when they will be totally repealed (cheers). I should take the liberty, then, of urging on the agricultural interest the propriety of considering well whether or not it would be for their own benefit that they come forward willingly and cheerfully, and desire to see protective duties taken off, not only corn, but every other article of impost (hear, hear). Let the great principles of Free Trade be adopted as the only principles on which trade can flourish. I hope, and trust, and believe, that the agricultural interests will suffer in no way because they are afforded less protection, provided the same measures are meted out to the manufacturing and commercial interest (hear, hear). Lord Belhaven then read the resolution. His Lordship reserved to himself the liberty of reply to any observations which might afterwards be made.

WALTER BUCHANAN, Esq., merchant, Glasgow, said he had great pleasure in seconding the motion. He and his friends from Glasgow, who were now present, had long laboured in the cause of Free Trade, and to them it was a matter of great gratification to attend this meeting, to see gentlemen of such standing in the county as their honourable chairman and the noble convener of the county now coming forward, and adopting the same views. He and his friends, therefore, looked on the present meeting with deep interest, as it showed the time had now come when all classes felt it their duty to unite in order that the triumph of the great cause might no longer be postponed. For some years the repeal of the Corn Laws and the cause of Free Trade generally had been looked upon as a political question. This was no longer the case. It was notorious that the Conservative Cabinet of Sir Robert Peel had been broken upon the question of Free Trade; and the Premier, with those enlightened opinions which he has often expressed, and that prescience of which he has shown so many remarkable examples, seems now to be satisfied that the question of Free Trade in corn can no longer be delayed. There could be no doubt that this was still made a leading question in the newly-formed Cabinet, though perhaps not to the full extent; and it was therefore the duty of all classes to let Sir Robert Peel and the Legislature know their opinion on the question; as, if supported by the country, they might still hope for his persevering in the measures he had originally devised. It was important that Glasgow should co-operate with the county of Lanark, as from its importance as a manufacturing and commercial county, it must produce an important influence on the county at large. If the landlords of this country would examine their rent rolls for one hundred years back, they would find that the improvement they now exhibited was consequent on the extension of the manufactures of the country, and particularly on the progress of the iron trade. After alluding to the benefits which railways were conferring on the country, he said that these, as tending to promote the prosperity of trade in general, were joined in by all political parties, and he could not see why the question of Free Trade should be an exception. The railways were intended to increase our trade, and if a prostration of trade should occur, railways would suffer as they had done in 1841 and 1842. He would refer to Mr. Wilson, Mr. Baird, Mr. Dixon, or any other of the great iron manufacturers, if it were possible to carry out, under any system, the manufacturing capabilities of the country, except under that of complete freedom of trade (cheers). While such was the state of the case as regards capitalists, was there no reason why Free Trade should not be adopted so far as the working classes were concerned? The increase of wealth in the country was not more evident than the increase of population. Look for instance at the Airdrie district, the chiefest of the iron manufacture—look at the seats of the cotton manufactures, and see the extent of the increase of the population of late years, without a corresponding increase in the extent of cultivated soil on which the people must depend for food, and it would be impossible for any one to affirm that the country was independent in regard to a supply of corn. The question then was, would they continue to expose the country to those periodical prostrations of trade which produced so much misery in this manufacturing country? Being satisfied that Free Trade alone would meet evils of which they had so much reason to complain, he cordially seconded the motion. (Cheers.)

Mr. LOCKHART, M.P. said, he felt it his duty to attend on this occasion, in order to make a few explanations. He wished to state to the requisitionists, very few of whom he knew, and most of whom never took any part in the business of the county before, that the question which had called forth this meeting had already been decided by the county of Lanark. He presumed he had been sent to Parliament as member for this county because he was friendly to the employment of their own people, and was opposed to placing this country in dependence upon those who were their friends to day, but might be their mortal enemies to-morrow. Very recently a meeting of the county was held in the county town, and a petition was agreed upon in favour of the existing protection to agriculture, which was presented to the House of Lords by his grace the Duke of Hamilton, and he (Mr. L.) had the same honour in the House of Commons; and he would venture to say that that petition was as respectfully signed as any petition which ever emanated from this country, and showed that the intelligence, the wealth, and the industry of this county were all opposed to the wild principles of Free Trade (hear, hear, and disapprobation). No circumstances had arisen in the meantime to induce him to change his opinion. It might be that this meeting had been got up for the purpose of forwarding the views of those connected with the League. The time at which the requisition was first handed about, and the mysterious and obscure terms in which it was couched, seemed to favour this idea; but he would venture to say, that the county of Lanark would never submit to be dragged at the tail of the Anti-Corn-Law League (hear, hear, and hissing). He said, the county of Lanark would never submit to be dragged at the tail of the Anti-Corn-Law League (great disapprobation). The requisition stated, that this country was suffering from an erroneous and pernicious system of monopoly and protection. Now, he would appeal to all present, whether in their experience the country was ever in a more prosperous state. That this was ascribable to various causes, he did not deny; but still he would appeal to them if the country was ever in a more prosperous condition. It was partly attributable, he believed, to the railway speculations, but partly it was the consequence, that during the three successive years past they had been blessed with abundant harvests. The repeal of the Corn Laws would destroy this prosperity for the future, for it would throw all the inferior lands of this country out of cultivation, and would throw hundreds of thousands of agricultural labourers out of employment. He was surprised the noble Lord had not entered a little upon that point when he made the proposal he did. He saw a gentleman from Strathaven in the meeting, where the farms were improved at so much expense and trouble; and were the Corn Laws repealed, the ground would be converted into its original moor, and the whole country would return to what it was a hundred years ago (laughter and disapprobation).

The CHAIRMAN insisted on the meeting being more orderly, and allowing the honourable gentleman to proceed with his observations.

Mr. LOCKHART said he was much obliged to the Chairman, but he could assure them he was not at all offended at what had taken place. He was perfectly ready to take his share of any ridicule which might be cast upon him in consequence of the views which he entertained, for he was perfectly satisfied that he had the cause of truth and the cause of the working-classes at heart in everything which he did, and he believed all who knew him would give him credit for this being the case. Mr. Buchanan had stated truly that agriculture derived a great deal of support from manufactures, but did not manufactures derive benefit from agriculture? He appeared to forget that three-fourths of the manufactures of this country were consumed at home, and if they knocked down the agricultural interest they would diminish the means of the landlord, throw the labourers of the country out of employment, and seriously injure their home demand, to enable them to grasp the phantom of Free Trade. It might be said that they could send their goods abroad, but it was not in their power to command other nations. All the nations of the earth differed in almost everything. They differed in their laws, and they differed in the mode of collecting their revenue, but they all agreed in this—to give protection to the industry of their own people. It was a principle with them, and with all the enlightened statesmen of Europe, to give employment to their own people in preference to employing the inhabitants of other countries. Could they expect, therefore, that other countries would abandon this principle because Great Britain abandoned it? He had heard it said that if they declared for Free Trade the whole world would follow their example; but what was the fact? He would ask the noble lord (Belhaven) in what manner the adoption of this principle was met in 1842? That year they made extensive alterations in their tariff. The duties on corn, said to be prohibitory, were greatly modified, and various other prohibitory duties were abolished or diminished. The whole system was altered, and greatly in favour of foreign nations. Now, in what manner were these approaches to Free Trade met? Why by no less than six hostile tariffs. The nations of Europe and America all took the alarm, and instead of coming forward in the manner expected, drew more closely the bonds of protection around their own people; and various attempts made since to induce them to relax their system of prohibitory duties had signally failed. An impression was abroad, from the speeches delivered elsewhere, that agriculture was the only protected interest; but there was no man in this room who did not derive benefit from protection. Take the case of the silk weaver. He joined in the cry of cheap bread, but when he did so he did not recollect that his master had a protection of 25 or 30 per cent. on his goods, which enabled him to pay workmen double the wages paid in France. He observed two watchmakers amongst the requisitionists, and he would like to ask if they were aware that there was a protecting duty of 20 per cent. on watches, and 10 per cent. on clocks? Shoemakers were likewise protected; and he recollected that some of the very men who now clamoured for the Corn Laws being abolished, were quite alarmed at the proposal to reduce the duty on foreign shoes. The Strathaven shoemakers wished their own trade protected; but they had no hesitation to take away protection from the cheese and butter of the Strathaven lairds, to whom he owed his custom. Were this system of Free Trade adopted, he would strongly recommend those gentlemen to get their boots and shoes from France—they would get them better made, probably—and their Strathaven friends might be reduced to the position of cobblers, and only get old boots to mend. Mr. L. went on to show that the effect of doing away with agricultural protection would be to lower the wages of the working-classes in this country to the same level as those paid upon the Continent; for he maintained it would be impossible for the landowner in this country to pay his labourers 10s. a week, while the foreigner only paid 4s., if the parties were to be called upon to compete on equal terms. America, he granted, was an exception; but there they had the command of unexhausted land, and pastures of boundless extent. After referring to the condition of Ireland from the failure of the potato crop, and to the fact that during all the 10 years the Whigs were in power, they never proposed any reduction of the import duties, or any repeal of the Corn Laws, he concluded by making an analysis of the requisition, for the purpose of showing that few of the gentlemen whose names were upon that paper had any great interest in the county. Amongst 336, only 13 were commissioners of supply, and only 51 electors.

Sir E. COLEBROOKE, M.P. for Taunton, in rising to move the next resolution, which, he said, was merely a sequel to the one which had been proposed by Lord Belhaven, said the remarks which fell from the hon. member for the county in regard to Lord John Russell having changed his opinions on the subject of the Corn Laws, came with a bad grace from a supporter of Sir R. Peel's Government, seeing that that hon. gentleman, who had been carried into office by the protectionists, had made the greatest advances of any party in power in the direction of Free Trade principles. If the opinions of Lord John Russell, therefore, were open to taunt, certainly those of other parties were not less so. He did not think, however, that the present was the time in which they should use party taunts. He believed that he spoke the opinion of all who are favourable to the principle of Free Trade, that they are anxious to join any party favourable to these views, and nothing would give him greater pleasure, in his place in Parliament, than to support Sir R. Peel in carrying this measure. It was the opinion of the requisitionists, that in submitting resolutions to a country in which are united so many various interests, mining, manufacturing, commercial, and agricultural, that no class should be called upon to give up protection when all were prepared to do the same. If the principles of Free Trade were good, they ought to be extended to every article of import; and in conformity with this opinion, he had to submit the resolution which he would propose for the adoption of the meeting. The hon. gentleman proceeded to refer at some length to the doings of Sir R. Peel's Government during the past three years, whereby important reforms had been introduced into the laws affecting importation. He well remembered the representations made by various parties who considered that they would be affected by these alterations from being exposed to foreign competition. The fears of these parties, however, had been dissipated. Notwithstanding the difference of wages paid by the manufacturers of this country compared to those on the Continent—notwithstanding the heavy burdens of taxation, and the operation of hostile tariffs to which the hon. member for the county had alluded, the manufacturers of this country carried more than fifty millions of their manufactures to various parts of the world. The agriculturists were still desirous to lean in sloth and indolence on the state-protection, and still holding out the idle threat that unless the soil is protected, and corn kept at a dear rate, their millions of acres will be thrown out of cultivation. (Hear, hear.) It became the agriculturists to take their position along with the other great interests of the country, and not stand out for any exclusive privilege. He saw no room for a middle course with regard to this matter. Nothing would be satisfactory but a repeal of the Corn Laws. Three years ago the case was different. There then existed a strong party, not merely among the agriculturists, but among the commercial classes, who would have been favourable to a middle course, and would willingly have adopted it, but after the last three years' discussion they had been shown the rottenness of that cause that relied on protection. He knew, if they might judge from what was passing at the present time in many of the agricultural districts of this country, that there were many members of the Conservative party who would gladly do anything that would enable them to support the Government in compromising this question, and anything that would prevent their supporting the views of the gentlemen of the Anti-Corn Law League. But he submitted to the meeting where was the possibility of supporting any modification of these laws? (cheers.) He thought the fate of the measures introduced three or four years ago by the present Government must satisfy them that no fixed duty, and no mere modifications of the sliding scale would command the smallest confidence of the people of this country—would be regarded by any interest, whether commercial or agricultural, in any other light than as a stepping stone to a final repeal (loud cheers). Now, if a total repeal was to be carried he must take that opportunity of saying, in the presence of manufacturers as well as agriculturists, that in his own opinion, the sooner it was carried the better (continued cheers). He had come slowly into these views, he willingly admitted. He admitted there was much to startle persons in so great a change as that proposed, for which the agricultural mind was not prepared. But he thought this with regard to its bearing upon the agricultural interest. He thought that the past experience of the Corn Laws, constantly changing, never giving any prospect of permanency to the farmers, must make them sick of patching up this system by any modification or gradual reduction (loud cheers). He thought the tenant farmer had suffered deeply under this system, for when high wages were obtained, the higher average, whatever it might be, had gone in the shape of higher rent to the landlord (hear, hear). He did feel that the effects they had already experienced from the patching up of prices, and thus interfering with the natural course of trade in these matters, must convince them of the danger of attempting now to patch up the present system (cheers). But, if a change was to be brought about, he thought it should be done in such a way as that the tenant farmer should at once see what the result of it would be (hear). He did not himself apprehend that the repeal of these laws would produce so great a fall of prices as was apprehended (hear). He believed that Free Trade in the end would not disappoint the expectations of its promoters (cheers). He believed it would lead to a fairer and fuller supply of the great necessities of life; but he was bound to say that he believed it would not produce so violent a change as to place any person in the smallest difficulty in competing with foreign nations (hear, hear). He thought the production of corn in this country, the great article of food, would always fall behind the increase of our population. Look at what took place in regard to the introduction of foreign cattle under the new tariff. It was only four years since the alteration took place; but it was only within the last year the change had produced any perceptible effect; 25,000 head of cattle, or thereabouts, had been introduced. But we have a million more mouths to fill since the introduction of the new tariff (hear). Looking at that case, he was justified, he thought, in assuming that, while our population increases at the rate of 1000 a day, the productions of this country would always lag behind the increase of the population (cheers). If any great evil was to take place, he did say that they ought to be allowed to know the result at once. The position of the tenant farmer would then be known; he would know the nature of the change; he would at once be able to go to his landlord, and call upon him for a modification of the engagements on which he has entered. Public opinion would support the demand, and he did not think there existed the landlord that would venture to resist the demand. But if the tenant farmer falls from the proposal for a gradual repeal, there would never be any change in any one year—never be a reduction of the scale in any one year, that would enable the tenant to go to his landlord and attribute it to the alteration in the law. He did say, therefore, that it was the clearest interest of the tenantry throughout the whole country, that if a change is to be introduced in this law, it should be done at once—that there should be no attempt to patch up the protective system—that the principles of Free Trade should be carried out at once, and that the tenant farmer should have an opportunity of going at once to his landlord. (The hon. member was loudly applauded on resuming his seat.)

The Hon. JAMES LUMSDEN, Lord Provost of Glasgow, said: He had not intended to take any part in the proceedings of this meeting, and the more especially as it appeared to be rather an unpleasant circumstance to the county gentlemen, that persons from Glasgow should mix with them in endeavouring to express the public opinion of the county. In this instance, however, he felt that he should be privileged to be a partaker in the promotion of a meeting for the advancement of a cause that would prove so beneficial to manufactures, commerce, and agriculture. At the same time, he was proud to know that his grace, the Duke of Hamilton, in addition to giving them an opportunity of meeting together so near to the city of Glasgow, had also expressed his own adherence to those principles of Free Trade for which he had contended in more youthful years. The worthy member for the county (Mr. Lockhart) had referred to a meeting held lately in Lanark, at which certain resolutions had been come to on this subject. Now, that meeting might be all very well in its own way, when held in a small town at a distance from the great mining, manufacturing, and agricultural districts of Lanarkshire; but it was quite another matter here (cheers). Concurring as he did in the object of this meeting, and in the clear and satisfactory arguments of Sir E. Colebrooke in favour of Corn Law repeal, he begged leave to second the resolution of the hon. baronet, and while he did so, to express the hope that the next time his grace of Hamilton called a county meeting, it would be in a locality such as this town, at which the inhabitants of Glasgow and the surrounding districts might conveniently appear and express their sentiments (cheers). He begged further to inform the hon. member for the county, that even were another meeting to be held at Lanark, the proceedings, so far as the county gentlemen were concerned, would not be allowed to be so unanimous as they had been.

The Hon. Major COCHRANE said, I regret that Sir E. Colebrooke did not advert more at length to the results that would take place in the event of a total repeal of protection on all articles. My impression is, that that part of his speech was merely given as a scape-goat, in order to attract the attention of parties from the manner in which the League has been supported at this meeting to-day (disapprobation). If all the duties on imports were repealed, the whole of the articles of the world would come into this country—food and products of every kind (hear, hear). Now, the being possessed of a general system of cheap articles in a country does not necessarily imply the prosperity of that country. I have seen many countries where almost all articles are remarkably cheap, but much misery was prevalent in those countries, notwithstanding that they were free from an immense pressure of debt, and of the interest payable upon it. Now, I would ask any gentleman, or any person in this room, if every article, not only of consumption but of luxury, including every implement of material employed in art or otherwise, be so cheap, would not a small quantity of circulating medium be sufficient to supply the wants of this country (hear, hear, from the protectionists)? If, therefore, there was but a small circulating medium required, how is the Government to raise the 52 millions of taxes? I contend the thing is utterly impossible. I also contend that the price of land and the value of its produce are the standard of value in this country. Reduce the value of land and of its produce, and every other thing must come down to a level. It is human hands that produce articles of every description. These hands must be supported—and food to man is the chief article of expense to him and his family. If that food is dear, of course every article which he manufactures must be proportionally high; and his employers must give him a very considerable wage out of that high-priced article. But if food is cheap, and the man's body is supported by that food, he can afford to labour for a lower rate of wages. Therefore he can manufacture articles cheaper, and the whole system will come to this, as I said before, that the circulating medium will be reduced to a very limited sum—the Government will thus be unable to raise taxes for its supplies, and the consequence will be a national bankruptcy (laughter and disapprobation). With respect to the duty on corn, it may be supposed that the ten or fifteen shillings average is entirely lost, because the Government gets it. But I can tell you it is not lost to the country because the Government gets it. For it is quite obvious if the Government were to give up these fifteen shillings, the farmer must give up fifteen shillings of the price of his quarter of wheat. On that ground it may be said the manufacturers and other parts of the population would gain. But what will they gain? Not the thirty shillings which the Government and the farmer lose—they'll gain the half of it, what the farmer loses. Therefore, they would be robbing Peter to pay Paul, and they would lose the fifteen shillings to pay the foreigner. A repeal of the Corn Laws would ruin the farmer and the agricultural interest, and deprive the Government of a revenue which it stands most in need of. The fifteen shillings Government gets are not thrown away, and the labourer, with the wages he receives in this country, can afford to purchase food when corn is at 15s. a quarter. But look at the condition of the Irish squatters, who, if the bread loaf was at a farthing, could not purchase it. Then, I say, let the meeting address the Government to keep on the Corn Laws (disapprobation)—let them say to the Government there is a duty on corn at present of 15s. a quarter—let that remain; but send any quantity to Ireland, so that its inhabitants may be supplied with food, with which they cannot supply themselves. Remember that if you deprive the Government of the 15s. tax, a tax must be put on to support them. Then you deprive the farmer of his fifteen shillings, and come upon him for his proportion of the tax to feed the people. Now, is that a rational position? I say it is the very reverse. After arguing that the most injurious consequences would arise were we dependent for a supply of food upon foreigners, who, he contended, would hoard up the corn in order to get high prices for it, the hon. gentleman continued: It would have been much better if we had created no alarm on this subject at all (a laugh). It is a fallacy to suppose that we are to have cheap bread and the farmers not be injured. It is very well to say the landlord must bring down his rents, and that it is not a farmer's question. But look at the condition of the landlords, particularly in Scotland, where many title deeds are locked up in Edinburgh (loud laughter). The very first step after this would be that the whole of their property would be put into the market, and the manufacturers, who are coming forward just now, purse-proud with their thousands and tens of thousands, would buy up their estates (hear, and loud laughter). Is that just? Is that what any Englishman or Scotchman with a heart would wish to see? The members of the League are endeavouring to carry this question by their thousands and hundreds of thousands. What next? The next thing you will hear of will probably be that the House of Lords will throw out any bill sanctioning the free importation of corn, and the League will then raise another quarter of a million with the view of obtaining a victory over the Lords. I say the League is a revolutionary body (hisses and hooting). The League will not rest (hisses)—the League will not rest until [the remainder of the sentence was lost in the hissing which followed]. That is my opinion, and with the expression of it I sit down.

Sir HENRY STEWART denied that the agriculturists had been idle—doing nothing for the last few years. By means of societies they had done much for the improvement of agriculture, and not less than 1½ millions had been invested in guano to increase the productiveness of the soil, in order to keep pace with the population. It was, in fact, well known to all, that produce had increased in proportion to the population. If by any means they reduced agricultural produce here, they would do incalculable injury, not only to the landlords, but to the working classes, and throw their destinies into the hands of foreigners.

Mr. JAMES MCCALL, of Daldowie, said: The question was, whether the people of this country were to be protected against foreign invasion in regard to their corn and their manufactures? It was impossible that this country—with its large debt, its high taxes, and its paper currency, which so much reduced the value of money, and made them believe they paid higher prices for their food—could compete with foreigners if there was a Free Trade. Let them take away the paper and substitute gold, and corn would then be cheaper even than it was in France (hear, hear). For the last two years there had been vast improvements in agriculture; and greater quantities of provisions were now raised in proportion to the population than at any former period; and more manufactures were now exported than ever were before. They never had such a flourishing home trade as at this moment. If so, would they attempt a theoretical experiment which had never been heard of in any other country? They ought to pause before they passed any resolution opening up the country, not only to the importation of corn, but to every other article which gave employment to the industrious classes of the community. He would ask the industrious classes if they were not at present getting more wages, and were not better now than they had been accustomed to? (No, no.) If they were not getting better wages (no, no, less wages). Well, then, if you are not getting higher wages at present, your masters are not doing their duty (hear, hear, and cheers). When the country was in such a state of prosperity as it was, the masters ought to give higher wages, and if they did not, with such an extent of railways going on, the working classes might not only get employment, but such wages as they chose to ask (hear, hear). The national debt was a great burden on the country, and to meet the interest, they required a great national currency; and because they paid in a depreciated currency, people imagined they paid higher than in other places. Sir Robert Peel wished to put an end to small notes, but they would not allow him; but if they had the Free Trade they wanted, they would not only lose their small notes, but their large notes along with them.

The CHAIRMAN then put the question, by a show of hands on the first resolution, the hands in favour consisting of nearly the whole meeting, those against not exceeding 15 or 20. This having been declared carried,

The question was put in the same way on the 2d resolution, and not more than half-a-dozen hands were held up against it. Both resolutions were then declared carried.

Mr. PATRICK GRAHAM, of Limekilns, moved that a petition, founded on the resolutions, should be forwarded, through his Grace the Duke of Hamilton, to the House of Lords, and another, by Sir E. Colebrooke, to the House of Commons.

Mr. JOHN WILSON of Dundee said, it must be gratifying to the noble Duke, as well as those of the county opposed to monopoly, to find that his Grace, thirty years ago, entered his protest against the pernicious Corn Laws. He is now the only surviving peer who signed that celebrated protest—it was at a time, too, when those opposed to protection were but few in number—when, among the Members sent from Scotland to the House of Commons, there could only be found two, viz. Lord Archibald Hamilton, and Lord Panmure. With regard to the object of this meeting—the taking into consideration the pernicious consequences of monopoly and protection—the resolutions which have just been moved, and the able arguments which have been adduced in support of them, render it unnecessary for me to trouble you with any observations of mine (hear, hear, hear). There is one point, however, which has not been very clearly brought out, namely, the difference between protective and other import duties. Many of those who formerly upheld the Corn Laws, now say—“If you take off the tax on corn, which is our protection, you must take off the tax on other articles of import as well; you must take off the tax on the articles which I buy—the tax on sugar, on tea, on wine,” &c. Now, the principles of Free Trade is—take off these taxes by all means, but none of these is so obnoxious as that on corn. The tax on corn goes to protect the corn growers of this country, and goes but a small way in aiding revenue, while the taxes on tea, sugar, and wine, are not protections, because neither of these articles are produced in this country; these taxes, therefore, go to make up the revenue, but the tax on corn, as I have already stated, goes but a small way in this, as is easily illustrated, viz.—Take the duty on corn at ten shillings per quarter, before it comes into this country, there requiring to be added to the price it cost at Dantzic or Odessa the freight and this ten shillings duty—that is the net amount of what goes into the pockets of the landlords, and does not benefit the revenue. Not so the taxes on tea, sugar, and wine. These go directly towards making up the revenue, and are alike to all. The tax on corn is paid into the pockets of the landlords out of the pockets of the manufacturing and industrious classes. It is a class tax, for it benefits the few at the expense of the many. It benefits the protectionists, who have monopolised the seats around this table, at the expense of the manufacturing and industrious classes, who are obliged to stand behind their chairs. (Laughter and cheers.) To make it an equal tax, the same duty should be levied on home-grown corn as on that which is imported. But let us take a more general and Free Trade view of the evil effects of the existing Corn Law on this country (cheers, and cries of “Hear, hear.”) Great Britain, from its geographical position in relation to the different nations of the world, is particularly well situated for exchanging the productions of the different climates. The very shape of the island is in its favour, being longer than it is broad, with navigable rivers on each side, penetrating to near its centre—added to which are her commanding harbours—and united to all these advantages she possesses the element of manufacture in a greater degree than any other nation in the world, (the principal of which are its coal and iron,) without which, no nation can be great, and with which and good laws, limits can scarcely be set to a nation's advancement. (Cheers.) Allusion has been made by the mover and seconder of the first resolution to the iron trade, and to its prosperous condition; but were it not for the railways which have so recently sprung up in this country, the iron trade would probably have been at this moment in a languishing condition, in consequence of the import duties, which prevent its finding its way into foreign countries. With the exception of Holland, no foreign country will now admit our iron duty free—in France and Spain, the duty is now more than the cost of production in this country, which amounts also to a prohibition. In America the import duty on pig iron is above 40s. per ton; and the Germans, who were the last to lay on a protecting tax, last year imposed an import duty of 20s. per ton. Now, I believe, all these import duties have been laid on in consequence of the import duties we lay on the produce of these countries, and particularly on their corn. The result is, that in consequence of our refusing to admit their corn, they refuse to admit our manufactures, and thus both countries are injured. From the iron district around us, there was exported in 1843 above 60,000 tons of pig iron to Germany, but during the last year, I believe, there has not been 1000 tons exported to these states, and that in consequence of the “Zollverein” laying on a 20s. duty. Another evil that may arise from the maintaining of these laws, is the inimical feeling they engender in those countries with whom we are most likely to go to war, France and America. We tax the wines and brandies of our nearest neighbours, the French, their silks, and their corn, so as to make them retaliate on us by taxing our iron, our coals, and our cottons. On the produce of America we lay an import tax likewise, while they, in return, lay a high tariff on our manufactures; and an occasion has now arisen which may form a pretext for a most sanguinary war, that of the disputed territory of the Oregon. I cannot contemplate such a war without horror; I have no fears for the issue, even though France were to join them—but what scenes of bloodshed would such a war lead to—for in proportion to our advancement in civilisation, we have at the same time advanced in our power to destroy our enemies. I hope and trust matters will not come to this—but the best way to prevent it is by abrogating the Corn Laws, and thus paving the way to a general reconciliation (cheers).

Mr. A. GRAHAM, of Capillie, said that they must have observed that the hon. member for the county had met with two disappointments on this occasion—the one, that the present meeting was not constituted like his favourite one at Lanark, so as to enable him to carry resolutions, however stringent, for maintaining the fullest agricultural protection—and the other, that nobody had dared to reply to his question, “How could a farmer, paying 10s. a week of wages to an agricultural labourer compete with one paying 4s.?” As to the first he should have thought it a great gratification for him (Mr. L.) to meet the people of Lanarkshire of every rank and occupation (hear, hear)—and he was astonished that one, who had informed them that some years ago he was elected the member for the county, should not consider himself the representative of all classes, instead of only some of those called the gentlemen of this county (hear, hear). As to the question of competition in the case of different rates of wages which he had at first put so pointedly to him (Mr. A. G.) and which he had just repeated with an air of such assured triumph, he might presume that the hon. member had heard of a country not very far distant, commonly called Ireland (laughter), where an agricultural labourer receives 5d. a-day, which, multiplied by 6, makes 30 pence, or, in other words, 2s. 6d., which is 1s. 6d. less than 4s. (cheers). And who ever heard that a Scottish farmer dreaded to enter the great corn market of Britain, and compete with an Irish farmer? And what is there about an Irishman less dreadful than a Pole? (hear, hear.) But as it has been with cattle so shall it be with corn. When the tariff came out it was the cry of the Highlands that cattle could no longer be properly bred. Cattle bought in at markets before the tariff were sold at Whitsunday, after its commencement, at 10s. to 20s. a head of diminished price, with the loss of keep to boot; and how fared it at this moment with home-bred cattle after so short an interval, and with a rapidly increasing introduction of foreign stock? Too many could not now be bred, and prices never were higher (loud cheers). His excellent friend, Sir H. Stewart, plumed himself on the fact, that farming societies improved agriculture, but he would ask why had the landholders of England at length imitated the Highland society of Scotland? Was it to benefit the public, by increasing and cheapening their food (hear)? Or, was it even for the pleasure of beholding better cultivated fields? No, it was because that, wise in their generation, the landlords inwardly say and confessed to themselves what they dared not publicly avow, that the Corn Laws were doomed (cheers), and that it was requisite for rents of future years that the tenantry should be taught to combine science with art, and so make up for protection (cheers). His young friend mentioned, as a proof of agricultural improvement, the large purchases of guano. He thanked him for the word (hear, hear). Was he (Sir H. S.) aware that on the introduction of guano the public dung of Edinburgh brought 1500l. less than the year before? And had any sliding scale been adopted for dung, so as to protect this home product of Edinburgh from competition with the foreign guano product of distant rocks in the sea (cheers and laughter)? If justice is to rule the legislation of this country, either a protective import duty should have been put on guano, or the citizens of Edinburgh should have been relieved of 1500l. of the corn tax (hear, hear). He utterly scouted the idea that the abolition of the Corn Laws would make agriculture cease (hear, hear). 80s. was thought the lowest price at which wheat could be grown; it fell to 60s., and still wheat was grown; it fell to 50s., and still the farmer grew it; it fell to 40s.; yes, to 38s., and wheat was still grown; and the lower the price fell, the greater breadth was sown (hear). He thoroughly believed that the abolition of protection would not ruin, but increase and improve agriculture (hear). The necessity, whether real or believed, for increased exertion, would force on more and better drainage; the plough would not be beat down and converted into some manufacturing instrument, but it and every other implement, with all their adjuncts, would be improved; and the only competition a Scottish farmer would have to fear would be the farmer of the south, when the abolition of protection opened the eyes of the English landlord to the expediency, propriety, and justice of granting him a lease—(hear)—and of assisting him in improvement (cheers). He would say, that if any tax were to be imposed on corn, under whatever name and of whatever amount, it must be for revenue, which was for the good of the State, and not for rent, which was for the good of the landlords—one of whom he happened to be (much cheering).

Major COCHRANE and other gentlemen again addressed the meeting, amidst considerable manifestations of impatience.

Lord BELHAVEN said,—Before the meeting closes, I should wish to say a few words, chiefly in explanation of some part of what I stated before, which I think has not been altogether understood. Before I allude to that, however, I must say one word with respect to what fell from my honourable friend, the member for Lanarkshire. I certainly did regret to hear the statement made by him, because I think of all men here, that statement with respect to this meeting came from him with the worst possible grace (loud cheers). I am sure my honourable friend could not mean—and yet it is difficult for me to construe it otherwise—I hope he did not mean, that because there happened to be but 13 Commissioners of Supply who signed the requisition calling this meeting, that the meeting is an unimportant one. The requisition, said the honourable member, was signed by only 13 Commissioners of Supply; he then stated what these Commissioners of Supply were; that, in fact, only nine of them possessed any property. Now, I think I am not saying too much, when I state that in this county we have a right to consider, that as my honourable friend is the member for the county, he is the representative of all. I am sure we all wish to pay him respect as such, although many of us may differ from him in matters of politics. And I am sure if any of us wished to have any business done in Parliament, he would be as ready to do it as any individual would be (cheers). But there was another observation which the hon. gentleman made, which I was also sorry to hear from him; and I must at the same time say, when I allude to these observations, it delights me to think they were not echoed back by any person here (cheers). The observations to which I refer are contained in the statement of the hon. member, that we are desirous of dragging the county of Lanark at the tail of the Anti-Corn-Law League (hear, hear). To that statement, gentlemen, I make no reply. I stand here, and I hope that we, as the county of Lanark, stand here upon our own principles, alike independent of the Anti-Corn-Law League and of the present Government—(loud cheering); and yet I might throw out the taunt that my hon. friend (Mr. Lockhart), who was elected to support the protection to agriculture then existing, did support a measure which did take away part and parcel of that protection (hear, hear). Now, what is it we ask him to do? We ask him to co-operate in any measure that may be proposed for taking away the whole of that protection—(cheers)—and I think we have some right to expect that he will do it, because he has so far set the example of voting for a portion of it.

The resolution was agreed to.

Sir E. COLEBROOKE then moved a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was carried by acclamation.

Three cheers having been given for Lord Belhaven, the meeting broke up.

FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

DIRECTORS.
A. W. Paulton, Esq.,
Richard Potter, Esq.,
William Leaver, Esq.,
William Wilson, Esq.,
R. G. Wellford, Esq.,
Sidney Smith, Esq.,
Samuel Harrison, Esq.,
Dr. James Curle, Esq.,
John Gaskin, Esq.,
R. Hull, Esq.,
Richard Burnett, Esq.,
J. Matson, Esq.,
TREASURER.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Highbury-terrace, Islington.
SECRETARY.
George Thompson, Esq., 6, Waterloo place.
MANAGERS.
Messrs. Prescott, Grote, & Co.
SOLICITORS.
Josh. Ivimey, Esq., 29, Chancery-lane.
SEALERS.
Mr. Frederick Farrand, Priory Villa, Peckham.

Prospectuses may be obtained, gratis, on application at the Society's Office, East Temple Chambers, Whitechapel-street, Fleet-street. The Rules (6d. each), will be ready on Tuesday evening next, and may be had as above.

Persons desirous to join the Society are requested to make application immediately. The Society's Offices will be open for receiving subscriptions and the general transaction of business, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from 6 to 9 o'clock.

Owing to the pressure on our space, we have been compelled to omit our Correspondence and several other articles until next week.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, January 31, 1846.

His Grace the Duke of Richmond deserves credit for boldness; he has declared himself ready to become responsible for every thing that has been said or done at protection meetings, including the comparison of the Premier to Satan, and the holocaust of the Times newspaper. Men have taken strange means of immortalising their names at different periods; Empedocles threw himself into a volcano, and Erostratus fired the temple of Ephesus; the Duke of Richmond's plunge is only into mire, and his highest feat of arson is the burning of a morning journal. While seeking historic fame for himself, he revives the memory of the circumstances in which the Richmond peerage originated; it was a reward to a French courtesan, for inducing a profligate monarch to betray the honour of England; and it would seem as if the implied condition of its maintenance had been hostility to the interests of the English people. With him the Corn Laws are as sacred as the tyranny of Louis the Fourteenth, which La Quenouille was sent from Paris to support; artificial scarcity is to him what Le Grand Monarque was to her, a cause to be maintained at all hazards, in which doubt was blasphemy, and wavering, impiety. The parallel even goes further, for a part of the policy which La Quenouille bequeathed to her descendants was to insist on a dissolution of Parliament. Representatives he deems bound to consult their constituencies on every great question, but more especially when such a constituency happens to be a “Great body corporate of one,

Important omnes solus.”

The duke himself happens to be one of those “plural units,” and under this general recommendation he hides a delicate hint to the dual representative that a vacating of his place would not be undesirable.

The rambling abusive speech to which we have referred, of course repeats the groundless calumnies against the League which have been a thousand times refuted. The absurd charge of spending the League Funds in bribery at elections, was properly and promptly demolished by Lord Kinnaird; but the duke had not the manliness to retract his charge, or acknowledge his error.

We should scarcely have noticed this display of imbecile fury had not the reference made to the number of petitions in favour of protection shown the importance of the recommendation of the Council published in the first page of our paper. We must take every constitutional means of evincing the national determination to get rid of those laws which are the bane of agricultural, not less than of manufacturing industry. The policy of La Quenouille was shattered into atoms by an indignant people in 1688; and the policy of her descendants must meet a like fate in 1846.

We regret to find in the report of the same debate a speech attributed to Lord Ashburton, who led the van in opposing the Corn Laws in 1814. He is not the only example of a statesman sacrificing as a peer the honours he won as a commoner. Chesterfield said of Pulteney, when he became Earl of Bath, “he was sent into the Lords, that great hospital of incurables, and sunk into insignificance and an earldom;” and Pulteney was but a melancholy type of a Baring and a Brougham.

One lesson which may be deduced from this debate is the necessity for continued, and even increased, vigilance and exertion on the part of the Free Traders. A dissolution is menaced; let us be prepared for the event. Ducal monads may send up their butlers, their stewards, or their land agents, to announce their will to the House of Commons, but the people have sufficient power to defeat these uninvited servants if they firmly resolve to stand by the cause of justice and freedom. We know that such is the determination of Free Traders, and all that is required is the energy of their action.

NEW WORK BY MISS MARTINEAU.

In 3 Volumes, price 10s. 6d.

FOREST AND GAME LAW TALES.

By HARRIET MARTINEAU.

Second Edition, price 3s. 6d. cloth.

LIFE IN THE SICK ROOM. ESSAYS. By AN INVALID.

Edward Moxon, 44, Dover-street.

BATTLE OF WATERLOO, &c.—THIRD EDITION.

This Day, price 3s. 6d. in cloth.

RECOLLECTIONS OF MILITARY SERVICE.

In Germany, Holland, and France, in 1813, 1814, and 1815; including some details of the BATTLES OF QUATRE BRAS AND WATERLOO.

By THOMAS MORRIS.

(Late) Sergeant 2d Battalion 7th Regiment.

A singularly interesting volume, written with great talent and judgment, yet bearing all the marks of being what it professes to be.—John Bull.

Elphingham Wilson, 11, Royal Exchange.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND DURING THE THIRTY YEARS' PEACE, 1815-1845.

To be completed in Twenty-four Monthly Parts, and in Two super-royal 8vo Volumes, with Portraits on Steel, and Maps: forming a Continuation of "The Pictorial History of England."

Part I., with a Map of Europe, and a Portrait of the Duke of Wellington, price Two Shillings, will be published on the 31st of January, 1846.

London: Charles Knight and Co., 22, Ludgate-street; and sold by all Booksellers.

DOUGLAS JERROLD'S SHILLING MAGAZINE.—

Contents of No. XIV.

Confessions of Richard Grainger.
The Standard of Progress.
Death and the Hangman.
Man and Beast.
English Scenes and Characters.
A Memoranda of Martin.
The Homeward Bound.
His Majesty, the Public.
The Labourer's Gathering.
The Worth of State-manship.
The Confessions of an Old Picture.
The Mission of the Press.
A Story of the Allotment System.
Hedgehog Letters. By the Editor.
Reviews of Books, &c. &c. &c.

Vols. I. and II., neatly bound in cloth, price 7s. each, are now ready.

London: Published at the Punch Office, 85, Fleet-street.

New Pocket Magazine.

On the 1st of February will be published, price 6d., with Illustrations, Number Two of the

ALMANACK OF THE MONTH, A Review of Everything and Everybody.

Edited by GILBERT ASHLEY, a BECKETT.

Among the principal contents of No. 2 will be found Notices of all the Principal Occurrences of the Month, including the Great Event of the Month—The Debut of the Month—The Play of the Month—The Pamphlet of the Month—The Exhibition of the Month—The Concert of the Month—The Improvement of the Month—The Book of the Month—The Abuse of the Month—The Talk of the Month, &c. &c. &c.

Books, &c. for Review, and Contributions for the Editor, may be addressed to the Punch Office, No. 85, Fleet-street; where the Almanack of the Month is published.

New and Revised Edition of "OLIVER TWIST," in Ten Monthly Parts.

On the 1st of February will be published, price One Shilling, with Three Illustrations on Steel, (uniform with "The Pickwick Papers,") Part II.

OLIVER TWIST. BY CHARLES DICKENS. Illustrated by George Cruikshank.

This Edition has been carefully corrected by the Author throughout, and it will contain the whole of the original Illustrations.

London: Published by Bradbury and Evans, 50, Fleet-street.

This Day is published, price 2s. 6d.,

THE PROSPECTIVE REVIEW, a Quarterly Journal of Theology and Literature.

"Respectable, Aspiring, Prospective."—St. Bernard.

No. V.—Contents:

ART. I.—The History of Egypt.
II.—Explanations. A Sequel to the Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation.
III.—French Deists.
IV.—Universal Salvation out of Inherent Depravity.
V.—The Forty Shilling Frechold.
VI.—Theodore Parker's Discourse of Religion.
VII.—Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches.

London: Chapman, Brothers, 121, Newgate-street.

NEW EDITION, FOR 1846.

Now ready, royal 32mo., 4s. 6d., bound and gilt.

THE PARLIAMENTARY COMPANION for 1846

(fourteenth year.) By CHARLES R. DONN, Esq., author of "The Peerage, Baronetage, and Knightage," "The Manual of Dignities," &c. This new edition will include full and complete biographical accounts of the twenty-seven new members, all the corn law pledges, ministerial changes, &c.

Whittaker and Co., Ave Maria-lane.

Just published, in fcp 8vo (pp. 498), with steel plate and 251 Woodcuts, price 6s. cloth, or 6s. 6d. bound.

MANUAL OF NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, with

Recapitulatory Questions on each of the (II) Chapters, and a Dictionary of Philosophical Terms. By JOHN L. COMSTOCK, M.D., and RICHARD D. HOBLIN, A.M., Oxon. Author of a Dictionary of Medical Terms, and of Manuals of Chemistry and of the Steam Engine.

Contents:—I. Philosophy of Matter. II. Mechanics. III. Hydrostatics. IV. Pneumatics and the Steam Engine. V. Acoustics. VI. Optics. VII. Astronomy. VIII. Electricity and Galvanism. IX. Magnetism and Electro-Magnetism.

This Manual is intended as a First Course Text Book in Proprietary Schools and Colleges, or other Establishments where Students are prepared for the profession of Civil Engineers, the Military and Naval Colleges, and the Universities; also for first year Medical Students.

Adam Scott (late Scott and Webster), Charterhouse-square.

CORNER'S NEW HISTORICAL WORKS, for School and Family Reading.

Each History, commencing with the earliest authentic records, is continued to the present time, fully and minutely, also, the Manners, Customs, and States of Civilisation of the People.

England and Wales; five fine plates, and map, 4s. 6d.
Ireland; three fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.
Scotland; three fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.
France; three fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.
Spain and Portugal; three plates, and map, 3s. 6d.
Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; with two fine plates and map, 2s. 6d.
Germany and the German Empire; 3s. 6d.
Turkey and the Ottoman Empire; 3 fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.
Poland and Russia; with three fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.
Italy and Switzerland; three fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.
Holland and Belgium; with two fine plates, and map, 3s. 6d.

The object of these works—peculiarly suited to Schools and Families—is to furnish the reader with a faithful History of each Nation, interspersed with an accurate account of the Religion, Customs, National Characteristics, State of Civilisation, and Domestic Habits of the people, in various periods of their history—to attract the attention of the rising generation by purity of language and clearness of detail; and thus render easy and pleasant the attainment of a knowledge of the leading events of history.

London: Dean and Co., Threadneedle-street; and, by order, of all Booksellers.

Price One Shilling, by post, One and Sixpence.

WHAT TO EAT, DRINK, AND AVOID. Addressed to the Nervous and Dyspeptic. By R. J. C. CRAWFORD, M.D., Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, &c. Sherwood, 22, Paternoster-row, and all Booksellers, or direct from the Author, 31, Arundel-street, Strand.

Just published, price 1s., the Fourth Edition (translated from the Nineteenth French Edition),

CONSTIPATION DESTROYED; or Exposition of the natural, simple, agreeable, and infallible means, not only of overcoming, but also of completely destroying habitual Constipation, without using either purgatives or any artificial means whatever (discovery recently made in France by M. Watson), followed by numerous certificates from eminent physicians and other persons of distinction. Free by post, 1s. 6d.

Sold by James Youens and Co., Tea-dealers, 45, Ludgate-hill, London; and by all Booksellers in the United Kingdom.

GENTLEMEN'S WINTER DISS.

BURCH and LUCAS, Tailors, 53, King William Street,

London Bridge, opposite the Statue of William IV. Waterproof

Over Coats, of the newest designs and best materials, kept ready, and made to order in the most approved style, at the lowest possible price for Cash.

The workmanship of every garment may be relied on being well and elegantly finished, the whole being made under the immediate superintendence of the Proprietors, who, being fully conversant with the trade, and having over the shop a general sale, and which is entirely excluded from this Establishment.

An extensive and fashionable assortment of Dress and Great Coats, Summer Over Coats, Cloaks, Waistcoats, and Trousers, kept ready made.

53, King William Street, London Bridge.

THE CARE OF THE HAIR may be unceasing, and its cultivation superintended by the most unquestioned skill and judgment, but without a genial growth and condition of the material to work upon, every effort will be fruitless. The most timely-scented locks that defied every effort of art may be converted into luxuriant tresses by the application of OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA, which has thus become the indispensable appendage to every fashionable toilet. 3s. 6d., 4s., and 12s. per bottle. No other prices are genuine. Oldridge's Balm, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand, London.

10 VOTES FOR MIDDLESEX.

MR. W. C. KNIGHT, Appraiser and Undertaker (12, Alfred-place, Newington Causeway), begs to call the attention of the Public to the above. Forty Shilling Freeholds can now be accommodated to this extent at about the price of the funds, and without the trouble of going to the City for their £2, as it will be paid either at Mr. Knight's office, or by the tenants of the property in possession.

150 VOTES FOR EAST SURREY.

MR. W. C. KNIGHT, Appraiser and Undertaker (12, Alfred-place, Newington Causeway), begs to call the attention of the Public to the above. Forty Shilling Freeholds can now be accommodated to this extent at about the price of the funds, and without the trouble of going to the City for their £2, as it will be paid either at Mr. Knight's office, or by the tenants of the property in possession.

FREEHOLDERS' BUILDING SOCIETY

Manchester. Shares, £60. Subscription, 10s. per Month.

John Brooks, Esq., President. Alderman Elkannah Armitage.
Alderman William Harvey. W. Rawson, Esq.
Alderman Charles J. S. Walker. W. Evans, Esq.

Bankers—Messrs. Cunliffe, Brooks, and Co., Market-street.
Solicitors—Mr. John Hewitt, 47, King-street.

SECRETARY—Mr. William Jackson Keighley, 9, Princess-street, Manchester.
The object of this Society is to assist the middle and industrious classes to obtain Freehold Dwelling-houses of their own, and more especially to create a spirit of independence in the latter, and to induce habits of economy in all who have a surplus of income beyond providing for their current requirements.

4100 Shares have now been taken up. It is evident this Society will be very large, so as not only to afford a good profit to those who have savings to invest, but to supply ample funds to such as wish to borrow money. From the present amount of Shares the Trustees will have to receive £2000 every Calendar month, which, according to the constitution of the Society, has to be lent out to members of the Society on real or leasehold security, so that not only may small Shareholders be at once accommodated, but those whose circumstances render it desirable may take up £2000 or £3000 at once.

It is evident that those who wish to borrow money prefer this Society, for Shareholders holding 50 Shares have given bonuses averaging £16 2s. 1d. per Share, in order to have their Shares (£60 each) advanced to them at once.

One peculiar feature in this undertaking is the facility afforded to Building Societies, who, when the County Council is the first to choose, may purchase Shares for building with, the monthly subscription may be reduced to 2s. 6d.; thus leaving a surplus of rent beyond the encumbrance on mortgage sufficient to give a qualification.

The second Meeting of the Society will take place at the Free Trade Hall on the 1st of February, at half-past three o'clock, when a public meeting of the members and friends will be held; prior to which shares may be taken up at the Secretary's Office, 9, Princess-street, Manchester, by payment of One Month's Subscription; from whom copies of the Rules and Prospectuses may also be obtained.

National Tableau of Public Interest, which has been Eight Months in Preparation.

THE Royal Family at Home, consisting of the Queen and Prince Albert embracing their Four lovely Children. The Grouping and Colouring by Madame Tussaud, the Models and Portraiture by Mr. F. Tassaud, the Costumes by Mrs. F. Tassaud, is now added to the Collection.

—BAZAAR, Baker-street, Portman-square.

"This is one of the best exhibitions in the metropolis."—Times.

Admission, 1s.; Napoleon Rooms, 6d. Open from 11 till 4; and from 7 till 10.

DEANE'S DOUBLY-REGISTERED STULOS

COFFEE-POT.—The strictly scientific construction of this article involves two simple processes, which, by their rapid and certain action, secure a run of rich, boiling, aromatic, and brilliant coffee within five minutes. When the interior cylinder is first filled with boiling water, the latter drives out all the cold air from the body into which the extract instantly follows. The cylinder is then closed, and time, and in ascending to the top of the pot, the tall column of small diameter is, by a well-known law of pneumatics, instantly emptied into the pot below, and the coffee is at once ready for use.

GEORGE and JOHN DEANE, opening to the Monument, 46, King William-street, London-Bridge.

COMMERCIAL, PRIVATE, and FAMILY BOARD-

ING ESTABLISHMENT, 33, Charter House Square, Aldersgate Street, City, near to the General Post Office, conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Worthington. Gentlemen and Families visiting London can have Private Apartments, and all the comforts and retirement of Home, the premises being large and very commodious, and the situation particularly quiet, healthy, and agreeable. The fare is liberal, and all charges are on the low possible scale. Differences, with Cards and Terms, may be had on application. 11 B.—Principal entrance to the square through Carlisleian-street, Aldersgate-street, opposite the Three Cups Inn.

MECH'S RAZORS, STROP, and PASTE, for 11s.

4, Leadenhall-street, London. Pair of Razors, 7s.; strop, 3s. 6d.; Paste, 6d. The razors warranted or exchanged if not approved. Those who find shaving painful and difficult will do well to try the above, it will be known that Mech's has been used by the most successful razor-shavers in every operation. Superior Shaving Brushes, Naple's Soap, and every article of first-rate quality for the Toilet. Caution.—Do not buy any Strop as genuine unless Mech's name is on them, there being so many counterfeits. Elegant Case of Razors, for presents, from 25s. to 10 guineas. Ivory-handled and Scotch Strops.

BERDOE'S WATERPROOF OVER-COATS, and

OUTSIDE GARMENTS of all kinds—guaranteed to exclude any rain whatever. More than seven years' extensive trial of these well-known garments, has enabled the public to form its own opinion respecting them; what that is, is best shown by their established and constantly extending sale, and the numerous competitors their success has produced, some of whom, among other similar attempts to mislead, actually attach to their garments W. B.'s name and label. General price from 40s. to 50s. An extensive variety kept to select from, or made to order at a day's notice. All sloop and inferior goods strictly excluded. W. BERDOE, Tailor, Over-coat Maker, and Waterproof, 69, Cornhill (north side).

THE GOLDEN FLAX CRAVAT COLLAR.—"THE SINGLE BANDS" may be worn with the customary cravat—giving increased warmth and compactness, by substituting linen bands in place of the unsightly and troublesome cravats, and avoiding the unsightly parting and irritation of the usual collar at the back of the neck, by one linen band passing through the other.

"THE DOUBLE BANDS" need no additional cravat—in one article is combined both collar and cravat.

In both kinds "The Pure White" is obtained by the use, exclusively, of "THE GOLDEN FLAX" linen.

N.B.—Each cravat collar bears the name of "John Paterson, London, registered 29th August, 1845," and may be obtained at any of the principal hosiers and drapers in London and the country.

THE PERFECT SUBSTITUTE FOR SILVER.—

The high estimate formed by the public during the ten years RIP-PON and BURTON'S chemically purified material has been before it (made into every useful and ornamental article usually made in silver, possessing, as it does, the lustrous, elastic purity and durability of silver, has called into existence the deleterious compounds of "Albata Plate," "Berlin Silver," and other so-called substitutes; they are at best but imitations of the genuine articles manufactured, with the view of satisfying the purchaser, by Rippon and Burton, and sold only by them.

Table Spoons and Forks, full size, per Pattern. Threaded King's Pattern. Pattern. Pattern. dozen 12s. 0d. 28s. 0d. 30s. 0d.
Dessert ditto ditto 10s. 0d. 21s. 0d. 25s. 0d.
Tea ditto ditto 8s. 0d. 11s. 0d. 12s. 0d.
Gravy ditto ditto 3s. 0d. 6s. 0d. 7s. 0d.

NICKEL-ELECTRO-PLATED.—THE REAL NICKEL SILVER introduced and made up by Rippon and Burton, when plated by the patent process of Messrs. Elkington and Co., is beyond all comparison the very best article, next to sterling silver, that can be used for any of the useful material itself, and the high character of the method of plating, the public have a guarantee that the articles sold by Rippon and Burton (and by them only), are, as it regards wear, immeasurably superior to what can be supplied at any other house, while by no possible test they can be distinguished from real silver.

Taspoons, per dozen 18s. 0d. 32s. 0d. 34s. 0d.
Dessert Forks 30s. 0d. 40s. 0d. 42s. 0d.
Dessert Spoons 30s. 0d. 40s. 0d. 42s. 0d.
Tea Spoons 40s. 0d. 50s. 0d. 52s. 0d.
Table Spoons 40s. 0d. 50s. 0d. 52s. 0d.

Tea and coffee sets, waiters, candlesticks, &c., at proportionate prices.

All kinds of replating done by the patent process. Detailed catalogues, with engravings, as well as of every ironmongery article, sent (per post) free.

Rippon & Burton's Stock of General Furnishing Ironmongery is literally the largest in the world. They regret they cannot employ any language which will convey an adequate impression of its variety and extent: they therefore invite purchasers to call and inspect it. Rippon and Burton, 29, Oxford-street (corner of Newman-street). Established in 1826.

NUMBER ONE, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD.—

As real goodness is not helped by praise, nor injured by reproach, so the BLACK TEA, at 4s. 6d. per lb., sold by DAKIN and COMPANY, owes its popularity solely to its intrinsic excellence.

Orders from the country forwarded Carriage Free.

HAPPY DISCOVERY.—THE VEGETABLE APE-

RIENT SUGAR PLUMS, avoiding all nausea or unpleasantness, can only be had in London of Mr. Hewitt, Confectioner, 188, Regent-street, price One Shilling per box. If sent by post a penny stamp must be forwarded in addition.

JONES'S £4. 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES

warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week, are selling at the Manufactory, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset-house. They combine the truth of a mathematical instrument with the elegance of an ornament of each article of the "Post-office order" for 1s. above the price, a Watch will be sent free for any part of the kingdom. Read Jones's "Sketch of Watch Work," sent free for a 2d. stamp.

THE ATRAPILATORY, or LIQUID HAIR DYE;

the only dye that really answers for all colours, and does not require re-dyeing but as the hair grows, as it never fades or acquires that unnatural red or purple tint common to all other dyes. ROSS and SONS can, with the greatest confidence, recommend the above dye as infallible, if done at their establishment; and ladies or gentlemen requiring it are requested to bring a full or servant with them, to see how it is used, which will enable them to do it afterwards without chance of failure. Several private apartments devoted entirely to the above purpose, and some of their establishment having used it, the effect produced can be at once seen. They think it necessary to add that, by attending strictly to the instructions given with each bottle of dye, numerous persons have succeeded equally well without coming to them.

Address Ross and Sons, 119 and 120, Bishopsgate-street, the celebrated Perruquiers, Perfumers, Haircutters, and Hairdriers. N.B. Parties attended at their own residences, whatever the distance.

STOOPING OF THE SHOULDERS and CONTRACTION

OF THE CHEST are entirely prevented, and gently and effectually removed, in Youth and Ladies and Gentlemen, by the occasional use of the Improved Plastic Chest Expander, which is light, simple, easily employed, and free of revivification, without any uncomfortable restraint, or impediment to exercise. Sent per post, by Mr. A. BRYSON, Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 40, Tavistock-street, Covent Garden, London, or full particulars receiving a postage stamp.

SELLING OFF CARPETS.

LUCK, KENT, and CUMMING, beg to inform the Nobility and Gentry, as well as their friends and the public, that they have removed their Business from Carpenter's Hall, London Wall, to their new and improved premises, 4, KILNCRATE STREET, WATERLOO PLACE, opposite Howell and James, and to 29, HATTON GARDEN, HOLBORN, where they trust that Patronage will be continued which they have enjoyed for upwards of a century. A considerable portion of their large stock of CARPETS, KIDDERMINSTER, and other Carpets, to be sold at a Great Reduction. In addition to Carpets, they have at their West End Establishment, a large Stock of Chintzes, Damasks, Tabourets, &c. &c., well worthy of attention.

ACCEPTABLE PRESENTS.—At a period when the social sympathies are most predominant, and the genial influence of "home" is felt in the highest degree—more especially by "My young master and mistress" spending their vacation at the "Old Hall," the most appropriate present becomes the first subject of consideration, a merely useful one can afford no evidence of taste, while a present possessing no claims to utility, shows a want of judgment. To combine these requisites, a more fitting souvenir cannot be suggested than ROWLAND'S Toilet Articles, the

"MACASSAR," "KALYDOR," and "ODONTO," each of infallible attributes. In creating and sustaining luxuriant silken tresses, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL is highly appreciated by Rank and Fashion, and patronised by all the Sovereigns of Europe. ROWLAND'S KALYDOR is a preparation of a powerful and efficacious in improving and beautifying the Skin and Complexion; and ROWLAND'S ODONTO, or PEARL DENTIFRICE, is invaluable for its preservative and beautifying effects on the Teeth and Gums, which infallibly tend to the augmentation of that imposing exterior, which Lord Chesterfield justly observes is "a card of recommendation."

Beware of SPURIOUS IMITATIONS! Each genuine article has the word "ROWLAND'S" preceding the name on the Wrapper. All others are FRAUDULENT IMITATIONS. The genuine are sold by the Proprietors at 20, Hatton-garden, London, and by Chemists and Perfumers.

PROTECTION TO THE FARMERS!

GOOD NEWS FOR THE AGRICULTURISTS.

In choosing a subject bettering the times, We think that "Protection" demands a few rhymes. This selection is made, as a suitable one, By the two great "Protectionists," MOSES and SON. Then listen, ye farmers! "Ye friends to 'Protection!' While briefly we throw out a hint for reflection, At a time like the present, you all will require "Protection" from winter—that turbulent rain, And for safety and shelter, you all ought to run. To the two great "Protectionists," MOSES and SON. These tailors have coats in the highest perfection, Whose purpose and special design is "Protection." Should winter prove rather too "free," in his "trade," They'll protect you with "protection," you'll find them at hand. They'll "protect" you from cold, and "protect" you from rain, And their high reputation will ever sustain. They'll "protect" you from snow, and "protect" you from hail, When you travel by coach—when you travel by rail. They'll "protect" you from night, and "protect" you by night, And "protect" you till winter has taken his flight. And thus with abundance of credit be done To the two great "Protectionists"—MOSES and SON.

LIST OF PRICES.

READY MADE.	£	s.	d.
Beaver Taglioni	1	0	6
Chesterfields or Cordingtons	0	7	6
D'Orsay, Athol's, Penbrooke, and every description of winter coats	1	0	0
Boy's winter coats in every style	from	0	8
Winter trousers, lined	0	4	6
Boys' winter trousers	0	1	0
Dress coats, edged	0	10	0
Frock ditto	1	0	0
Roll collar Vests	0	1	0
Double-breasted ditto	0	2	0
Boy's Hussar and Tunic Suits	0	18	0
Boy's winter Trousers	0	1	0
Boy's winter Vests	0	1	0

MADE TO MEASURE.

Winter Coats in every style and shape, handsomely trimmed	£	s.	d.
Milled Coats, Great Coats, velvet collar and cuffs	1	5	0
Tweed Wrappers	0	12	0
Ditto Trousers	0	8	0
Winter Trousers, in all the new patterns	0	12	0
Dress Trousers	0	10	0
Dress Coats	1	12	0
Ditto, best quality made	2	15	0
Frock Coats	1	13	0
Ditto, best quality made	0	8	0
Casual Vests	0	8	0
Satin, plain or fancy	0	12	0
Boy's Hussar and Tunic Suits	1	5	0
Boy's Great Coats	0	14	0

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

A new work, entitled "Habilitation Hall," with full directions for self-instruction, may be had on application, or forwarded post free.

Mourning to any amount can be had at five minutes' notice, at the following prices:

Men's Suits, dress coat, vest, and trousers from 1 10 0

Ditto, Jacket, vest, and trousers from 0 18 0

SUPPLEMENT TO THE LEAGUE.

No. 123.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1846.

[GRATIS.]

SIR ROBERT PEEL'S SPEECH ON THE COMMERCIAL POLICY OF THE COUNTRY.

Never was interest more intense than that which was manifested in the metropolis on Tuesday evening to learn the development of Sir R. Peel's promised proposals on the subject of the commercial policy of this country. The strangers' gallery was crowded at an early hour; multitudes who had been successful in procuring tickets were unable to obtain admittance; and, externally, the passages and the very streets were so crowded, that the police, who attended in considerable force, had no little difficulty in keeping a passage clear for the members. In the house itself there were not less than 400 members present at half-past four. The seats below the bar, usually reserved for strangers, were filled with peers, and other distinguished visitors; and most prominent of those, in the front seats, were seated His Royal Highness Prince Albert, His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and the Earl of Jersey. This, we believe, was the first visit made by the Prince to the House while sitting.

The Speaker took the chair at the usual hour, and various petitions were presented connected with the Corn Law and other subjects—one from Manchester, by Mr. Philips, which had received the signatures of 52,579 inhabitants of Manchester in two hours, praying that all restrictions on the sale of human food might be abolished. At 20 minutes to five o'clock Sir R. Peel moved that the order of the day be read for the House resolving itself into a committee of the whole House on the customs and corn importation acts; and having stated, in reply to a question from Mr. Miles, that he did not intend to ask for the opinion of the House that night upon any portion of his financial statement, and the speaker having left the chair, and Mr. Greene read a portion of her Majesty's Speech,

Sir ROBERT PEEL then rose and said: Sir, whatever opinion may be ultimately formed with regard to the merits of the proposal which I am about, on the part of her Majesty's Government, to submit this night to the consideration of the house, I am convinced that the extreme difficulty of the task which it devolves upon me to perform, and a consideration of the magnitude and extent of the interests involved in the questions with which I have to deal, will insure for me from the house that patient and intelligent attention without which it would be wholly out of my power, either with satisfaction to myself or utility to the public interests, to discharge my duty (hear, hear). I am about, in pursuance of the recommendations contained in her Majesty's speech, and which recommendations were advised by her responsible servants—I am about to review the duties which apply to many articles the produce and manufacture of other countries. I am about to proceed on the assumption adopted in the speech from the throne, that the repeal of prohibitory and the relaxation of protective duties is in itself a wise course to be pursued (loud cries of hear, hear, from the Opposition benches); and I am about to proceed upon the assumption that protective duties, abstractedly and in principle, are open to objection (hear, hear); that the policy of maintaining them may be defended, but that there must be shown to be special considerations either of policy or justice for their continuance. I am about to act upon the assumption that, during the last three years, there has been in this country an increased productiveness of revenue, notwithstanding that there has been a remission of heavy taxation (cheers); that there has been an increased demand for labour; that there has been increased commercial activity; and that there has been an increase of comfort, happiness, and contentment in this country (loud cheers, chiefly from the Opposition benches.) I do not say that these great blessings have necessarily been caused by any particular policy which you may have adopted, but this I say, that the enjoyment of these inestimable blessings has been concurrent with your legislation, with the plan and policy, I mean, of repealing prohibitory and reducing protective duties. I am not now, therefore, by praising that plan and policy, about to call upon the House of Commons to recede from any portion of a course which has been sanctioned by the House. It will be for the House to consider whether this course has been productive of public good; and, if so, it will be but consistent to persevere in it. Sir, I am at the same time, in advising a continued application of those principles, not about to discard those other recommendations contained in her Majesty's Speech, namely, that in the adoption of new principles we should be careful of the public credit, taking care not to endanger it, and not to cause any loss in the permanent revenue. Neither, Sir, have I lost sight of another recommendation, that in the application of sound principles, we should act with so much precaution and forbearance as that we should not prejudice any of the great interests of the country. This will be, I hope, scarcely rendered necessary, for the great interests will not be prejudiced by the proposal I am about to make. Above all, I trust that the recommendation of her Majesty will be attended to, and that this subject will receive the patient and dispassionate consideration of the house. I have already stated, in answer to the question put to me by an hon. gentleman, that I do not intend asking the House of Commons to pronounce any opinion to-night upon the entire or any part of the proposals I am about to submit to their consideration. It is on the contrary, the wish of her Majesty's Government, that the whole of those proposals may be dispassionately and deliberately considered and weighed. I am about to touch so many interests in those proposals, that some honourable gentlemen may be induced to dissent from them, and to consider me rash and improvident. If that should be the prevailing impression of those who are unwilling to relinquish the principle of protection, nothing can be more easy than upon the night when it will be my duty to ask the house to pronounce an opinion upon the question, for them to place upon record their protest against it. At the outset the proposal will be some such resolution as this. Not that protection to any branch of industry is advisable, but this comprehensive one—that protection to native industry is not in itself good (hear); it may be on the other hand that, considering all the great difficulties of this question—considering the variety of opinion upon it, and the nature of the contest which has been so long waged, and which I fear will long continue unless there be an early and satisfactory adjustment of it—it may be that those who dissent from parts of the scheme I am about to propose may be disposed to accept it as a settlement, and that the voice of the country may pronounce upon it as a whole, "This is not an unequitable or unwise adjustment, and, rather than continue a perpetual conflict, we will receive it." If that be the conclusion of the reasonable and intelligent of all classes of the community, I shall have confidence of ultimate success. If, on the contrary, I touch so many interests by the application of the great principle that protective duties are not in themselves abstractedly good, and ought to be relinquished, another fate will await my proposition, and the sooner it is disposed of the better for the public good. Sir, in the relaxation of protective duties, I am not about to select any one particular interest. I am not about to select the great interest connected with the agriculture of the country, and call upon them to relinquish their protection, whilst forbearing to call upon other interests to relinquish theirs (loud cheers). Mine is no separate, isolated proposal. Convinced that the proposal I am about to make is a just and wise one, I will ask all to make the sacrifice, if it be a sacrifice, of their protective privileges (loud cheers from both sides of the house, but chiefly from the Opposition seats). Sir, the house is aware that during the last three years what is called the tariff has been amended; and that in so doing, the whole scheme of customs' duties has been submitted to the review and consideration of the house. In 1842 it was my duty, as the organ of the Government, to propose great changes in the then existing system of customs' duties. The general principle of the plan on which I then acted, was to remove the duties upon articles of raw material constituting the elements of manufacturing industry. The principle of that plan also was, the subjecting generally the manufactured articles, the effect of the labour of other countries, to duties not exceeding 20 per cent. Not only in 1842, but at a subsequent period, the house adopted the principle upon which I had acted in 1842. Notwithstanding the apprehension of a failing revenue, we selected articles being raw materials for the remission of taxation. In 1844 we reduced altogether the duty upon wool. In 1845 we reduced altogether the duty upon cotton. There hardly remains a raw material imported from other countries the duty upon which has not been diminished or removed. The manufacturers of this country, therefore, have at present an advantage which they never before possessed. They have free access to the raw material which constitutes the fabric of their articles of manufacture, and I consider that I am entitled, therefore, to call upon the manufacturers to relinquish the advantages which they now derive from protection (loud cheers from both sides). The manufacturer has now advantages which he never before possessed. It might have been feared that a diminution of revenue would have ensued from the import of cotton wool free of the duty which existed in 1814. But the house was sensible that to the continuance of it there were objections, in consequence of the formidable competition which was arising in other places. The house disregarded the revenue derivable from it, and removed the 600,000*l.* or 700,000*l.* of duty which it annually paid. They wished to establish the stability of the manufacture of articles from sheep and cotton wool, and to place them upon a stable and sure foundation. They, therefore, remitted an amount of duty so easily levied and so little complained of that it scarcely excited the complaint of any great body of the people. Both with regard to the removal of duty from sheep's wool and cotton wool, this house subjected its members and the country to the imposition of an income-tax, out of consideration to the manufacturing interests, and thus it was that they removed the duty upon those articles. Sir, I mean in the first instance, in taking that review of duties still existing to which we are invited by her Majesty, to continue to act on this principle. I propose to take the articles of raw material first. I shall begin with them in order to still further justify myself in calling upon the manufacturers to relinquish the amount of protection which they still possess. Sir, I hardly know any article of raw material still liable to duty except tallow and timber (hear, hear). Sir, with respect to tallow, which is in the nature of a raw material from its being a staple largely used in manufactures of great importance, being used in the making of soap and candles, and in the dressing of leather, I propose to begin by reducing the duty which is still left upon it. Russia is the country from which chiefly the importation of tallow is made. Some also comes from the United States, and there is at present a duty upon it of 3*s.* 2*d.* per cwt. This subject was adverted to in the course of the last session, mainly with a view to our own interest, but partly also for the purpose of encouraging Russia to make some advance in the extension of commerce, of which I trust she has given some indications. I propose without any stipulation (hear, hear)—I propose that England should set the example of relaxation of those heavy duties (loud cheers). I propose it in the confidence that that example will ultimately be followed; and that our example, even if we do not purchase any immediate reciprocal benefit, will yet be productive of infinite good. By these reductions we shall improve our own manufactures; I therefore propose to reduce the duty on tallow from 3*s.* 2*d.* per cwt. to 1*s.* 6*d.* In taking those articles which are of the nature of raw materials first, I come to that of timber. With respect to timber I do not mean to exempt it. We have admitted timber from our colonial possessions at a nominal duty; but with respect to that from foreign countries it is subject to impost. Now timber is the only article on which I must ask time to consider the course I shall pursue. I shall be prepared to make a definite proposal with regard to every other article; but I am most anxious to make such alteration as shall give the benefit of the reduction to the consumer. My intention is to effect a gradual reduction of the duty on timber, the reduction being so proportioned, if possible, as to prevent any derangement of the trade, by parties withholding in order to reap the benefit of the change. As the importation from the Baltic partakes something of the nature of monopoly, I wish to make the reduction so that the consumer may have the benefit. Upon a very early day it is the intention of her Majesty's Government to make known their intentions with regard to the timber duties. The subject is a very complicated one. It is a very difficult one to gain reliable information upon, for it is extremely difficult to obtain information when you have to keep your intentions in seeking for it secret. I trust the house will be satisfied with my promise to make a gradual reduction in the duty, to be spread over a number of years, until it be entirely reduced. But it will be three or four days before the precise nature of those reductions can be laid before the house. Now, with these exceptions, I hardly know a raw material with respect to which, in this country, there is any duty. We have the advantage of a free command of foreign articles, so far as regards imposts upon raw materials. I call, therefore, upon the manufacturers of the three great articles which enter into the consumption of the great body of the people—I ask them to give that proof, which I am sure they will freely give, of the sincerity of their convictions with regard to the impolicy of protecting duties. (Loud cheers from both sides of the house.) The three great branches of manufacturing industry of which I speak are those of linen, of woollen, and of cotton (hear, hear, hear)—I ask them at once to set the example to others, by relinquishing cheerfully the protection afforded them. (Cheers.) An honourable friend of mine, the member for Dorsetshire—and I will call him, if he allow me, my honourable friend; for it shall not be my fault if these unfortunate political differences be allowed to interfere with private friendship and regard—expressed a hope, being jealous of an expression which occurred in her Majesty's speech, that the small interests of the country would not be overlooked. I promise him that those interests shall meet especial attention. I promise that on the revival of the tariff I mean to affect the great interests; and therefore I hope to meet the views of my honourable friend, and to gratify his expectations that the small interests shall be attended to. Now I shall call upon the manufacturers of cotton—I shall call upon the manufacturers of the great articles of cotton, linen, and woollen, to relinquish the protection which they now enjoy. Those articles that affect particularly the labouring classes I shall endeavour to treat with more forbearance. In the first instance, I will refer to the cotton manufacture. The great mass of the cotton manufacture, consisting of calicoes, prints, &c., is subject to a duty of ten per cent.; cotton goods made up, such as shirts and stockings, brought from abroad, are subject to a duty of twenty per cent., but generally, cotton manufactures are liable only to a duty of 10 per cent. I propose that all now imported at a duty of 10 per cent. should in future be brought in duty free, and that the duty of 20 per cent., which applies to certain articles manufactured abroad from cotton, and therefore in a certain advanced state, shall hereafter be liable to a duty of only 10 per cent. Articles of the ordinary cotton manufacture shall be imported free of all duty, while shirts, stockings, &c. shall pay 10 per cent., instead of 20 per cent., as at present (some confusion). The only favour I ask of the house is this—that I may be permitted to state the whole of my plan (hear, hear), without any inferences being drawn at once respecting a particular part of it (cheers). I may have to recommend precautions in the first part of my proposal which may give rise to erroneous conclusions as to the rest, and I therefore have to request that honourable members will for the present suspend their judgments (cheers). I do not ask you to suspend your judgments even to a future day, but merely until I have concluded my observations (hear, hear). I am the more anxious to call upon the manufacturers to set the example in relinquishing protective duties, because, according to a very high authority, it was not the agriculturist but the manufacturer who called upon the legislature, in the first instance, to adopt the protective system. The mercantile and manufacturing interests set the example in requiring protection, and it is but right, therefore, that they should set the example, as I doubt not they will do cheerfully, in now relinquishing protection. Nothing can be more marked than the observations made upon this part of the subject, by one who had no prejudices in favour of the agriculturists; I mean Adam Smith. Speaking historically he says—"Country gentlemen and farmers, to their great honour, are of all persons the last who are subject to the wretched spirit of monopoly" (cheers, and much laughter). We are adverting now to the origin of the system, and Adam Smith must be quoted as a most impartial authority, having no leaning or bias any way; he is speaking as a historian, and I shall beg leave to repeat what I was reading when I broke off, in consequence of interruption. He tells us that "country gentlemen and farmers, to their great honour, are of all persons the last who are subject to the wretched spirit of monopoly" (loud laughter). "Country gentlemen and farmers, dispersed in different parts of the country, cannot so easily combine as merchants and manufacturers, who, being collected into towns, and accustomed to that exclusive corporation spirit which prevails in them, naturally endeavour to obtain, against all their countrymen, the same exclusive privilege which they generally possess against the inhabitants of their respective towns. They accordingly seem to have been the original inventors of those restraints upon the importation of foreign goods, which secure to them the monopoly of the home-market. It was probably in imitation of them, and to put themselves upon a level with those who, they found, were disposed to oppress them, that the country gentlemen and farmers of Great Britain so far forgot the generosity which is natural to their station, as to demand the exclusive privilege of supplying their countrymen with corn and butcher's meat. They did not perhaps take time to consider how much less their interest could be affected by the freedom of trade than that of the people whose example they followed." That extract may excite laughter from some honourable gentlemen on the other side of the house, but my belief is that the statement made in it is perfectly correct. Protection was first pressed upon the legislature by the mercantile and manufacturing interests, and it was afterwards extended almost as a necessary consequence to the landed interest. I have, therefore, invited cotton, in the first instance, to relinquish protection. I propose to call on the manufacturers of cotton, wool, and flax, the three great articles concerned in clothing, to relinquish protection as applied to them, and as regards the coarser articles they produce: I believe they can do it without injury (cheers), although there will be some loss to the revenue. It is my opinion that the importation of some articles of the kind will stimulate their exertions, and with the skill, ingenuity, and enterprise that exists in this country, I do not doubt that we shall beat not only the French but the Saxon manufacturer (cheers). At present, in the case of woollen goods, when made up they are subject, under the tariff of 1842, to a duty of 20 per cent. In woollen goods, as in cotton, I propose to reduce that duty from 20 to 10 per cent. The house will observe that in the cotton and woollen trade we have given the manufacturer unrestricted power to import the raw material (hear, hear, hear). The same rule will apply to linens. Flax, on its importation, is free from any duty. As I said the other night, there is no impost whatever, and there has been none for many years, on foreign flax. Therefore, in the case of linens, as in woollens and cottons, it is proposed that the coarser articles of manufacture, in which the great mass of the people is interested, should come into this country duty free. Some linen articles, it is true, are very fine—they are not of general consumption, but of luxury; but with regard to these I do not propose that we should retain the present amount of duty. Among these, cambrics and some other fabrics may be included, and upon these the duties vary according to the article, but my proposition is (the right honourable baronet here dropped his voice, and we cannot be answerable for the precise words of the conclusion of the sentence), that the duty on made-up linen goods should be reduced one-half. So much with respect to these three great fabrics; and I now approach another manufacture, which does not fall exactly within the principle applied to cottons, woollens, and linens, but with respect to which it seems of great importance to make a great reduction in the present duty—I mean silks (cheers). It may be supposed that the existing duty on silks operates as a protection to the domestic manufacture. You have a duty which you call 30 per cent., but as regards many articles it is a great deal higher, and a false reliance is placed upon it as a protection to domestic manufacture. It is no such thing. There are many houses in Paris and on the coast who will guarantee the delivery of goods in London for half the amount of the duty (hear, hear). The duty, therefore, is a decided encouragement to smuggling, and it is a delusion on the part of the manufacturer and the labouring class employed in the silk trade to suppose that they are enjoying protection, while they are, in fact, robbed by the smuggler and by the dishonest consumer. I conceive, therefore, that some new arrangement of the silk duties, by a reduction of the amount levied upon foreign goods, would not interfere with the prospect of the domestic interest (hear, hear). Such a course would stimulate skill and industry among us, and at the same time diminish the profits of the smuggler, while it encouraged a lawful and innocent trade to the destruction of one that is unlawful and immoral (loud cheers). The general impression, as I have said, is that there is a general duty of 30 per cent. upon silk; but I hold in my hand an account of the duties paid upon silk at present; and although as to some the duty may not exceed 30 per cent., as to others it is less than 30 per cent.; and as to many it is much higher. Crape, for instance, pays a duty of not less than from 43 to 50 per cent., and velvet from 34 to 50 per cent.; fancy silk net, called tulle, is charged a duty of from 36 to 78 per cent., and manufactured silk bonnets not less than 145 per cent.; turbans and caps pay at least as much. Does any man believe, however, that any French turbans or caps really pay a duty of 145 per cent.? No such thing. The article, I believe, is in common use among us, but it is introduced by the smuggler (hear, hear). I propose, then, a new arrangement; but respecting this and other points I must not enter into much detail. Of course my proposals will be in the hands of members to-morrow-morning, and my suggestion is, that a new principle should be established as regards the silk duties, in which the general rule shall be, enumerating every article, that a duty shall be imposed of so much per pound. I would give an option to the Custom-house officer; but if taken ad valorem, the duty shall not exceed 15*l.* upon every 100*l.* value. The general rule would be the adoption of a duty of 15 per cent., instead of the varying and capricious duties now called 30 per cent., but less upon some articles, and vastly more upon others. We shall then have a qualified admission of the article, which will stimulate competition and do no injury to the home manufacturer. It seems to me much more likely that it will excite him to greater exertions than that it will at all reduce the amount of his business. I will now speak of paper, I mean paperhangings, upon which there is a duty, when brought into this country, of 1*s.* per square yard, and it is paid indiscriminately upon all kinds. I believe it possible to sell for a single farthing a square yard of some descriptions of paper; but upon the finest, that which has gold embroidery, as well as upon the coarsest, the duty is 1*s.* per square yard. As the excise duty is, I believe, only a farthing a yard, the duty of 1*s.* a yard seems exorbitant, and I propose to reduce that duty from 1*s.* to 2*d.* (hear, hear). I now approach those manufactures that are connected with metals (some laughter and confusion). It is impossible for me to guess what may or may not excite the risibility of some honourable members, but if I could avoid such points I would willingly do it, in order that I might be able to explain myself without interruption (loud cheers). I will enter into no more details than are absolutely necessary; and with respect to metals, I would observe that we have reduced the duty on foreign ores; if, therefore, there are any domestic manufacturers who ought to be able to compete with foreigners, it is the manufacturers of metals. Manufacturers of metals, generally speaking, are protected by a duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem. I propose that with respect to these, and other articles I do not specifically mention, the general rule for the future should be a duty not exceeding 10 per cent.; that shall be the maximum upon articles I do not enumerate. Of course it is impossible to apply that rule to such an article as paper hangings; and I mentioned it as an exception to the general rule of 10 per cent.; but wherever at present the duty upon any article is 20 per cent., my recommendation is, that it should be reduced in future to 10 per cent., and that is to be the maximum. Within the rule of 10 per cent. will fall brocade, earthenware, and some others, as well as all manufactures of hair. At present the duty is 20 per cent. upon foreign carriages, and I think I am only giving a proper advantage to the consumers in this country by making a reduction. I will venture to say that there is no article so extravagant in price as carriages in London. Compare the price of an Edinburgh carriage with one built in London, and the difference is most exorbitant (cheers). When we have timber, metal, leather, skill, and capital, there seems no reason why carriages built abroad should be so much cheaper, or why our own should be protected by a duty of 20 per cent. I propose, therefore, partly in order to promote competition in the manufacture of carriages in this country, and partly in order to encourage the introduction of foreign carriages, that the duty should be reduced to 10 per cent. There is another manufacture with regard to which I shall suggest the propriety of a reduction of duty: I allude to candles. We have lowered the duty on wax and spermaceti, and now I propose a reduction of the duty on candles to the extent of half per cent. I recommend, likewise, that the duty on soap shall be thus reduced: hard soap is now subject to a duty of 30 per cent.; but in future it ought, I think, to be lowered to 20 per cent.; the duty on soft soap ought to be reduced from 20*s.* to 14*s.*, and upon Naples soap from 5*s.* to 16*s.* [as the right hon. baronet dropped his voice we are not sure of the last figures].

These may be thought by some minute matters, but it is of great importance that I should give as full an explanation as I can, and I pass over other articles of minor moment. There are many upon which the duty is comparatively trifling, and those I omit. Notwithstanding the great simplification of the tariff in the year 1842, I propose to carry that simplification still farther. There were, I think, nearly 1100 articles in the tariff, and for the convenience of alphabetical arrangement to the custom-house officers, 500 articles on which the duty has been abolished are retained in it. I wish to carry that abolition farther, and to admit, duty free, many articles yet remaining in the tariff. There are some manufactures with which I must deal specially, and others regarding which I cannot now state precisely the amount of duty, but it may not be advisable to apply to them the general rule of 10 per cent. In respect to all articles connected with the manufacture of leather, we have made great reductions, and I now come to an important article of clothing—boots and shoes. You have remitted the duty on raw hides; they are now introduced duty free. You have remitted also the duty on almost every article connected with the tanning process, and I propose to abolish the duty on one article which partakes more of the character of a raw material than of a manufacture—dressed hides, with a view to lower the price of an article of clothing of great and increasing importance to the lower classes. For the sake of making boots and shoes cheaper, I propose to extinguish the present duty on dressed hides; and when that is done there will not be a single raw material which we cannot command for the purposes of manufacture without the payment of duty (cheers). Having proceeded so far I shall recommend to diminish the duty on foreign boots and shoes, in order to reduce what I consider the present rather unreasonable price of them in this country. They are most important to the comfort of the working classes; and my suggestion is, that we should lower the duty on what are called boot-fronts from 3*s.* 6*d.* to 1*s.* 9*d.* per dozen, and upon the larger boot-fronts from 5*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* 9*d.* per dozen. The duty on manufactured boots I would reduce from 1*l.* 8*s.* to 14*s.* per dozen, and on shoes from 14*s.* to 7*s.* per dozen. I propose also to lower the duty on hats; and to carry now into effect a reduction postponed in the year 1842—I am afraid not wisely—upon straw-plait; at present it is 7*s.* 6*d.* per lb., and I wish to reduce it to 5*s.* per lb.; the duty on straw hats I would make 5*s.* per dozen, instead of 8*s.* 6*d.* I have already urged a reduction of the duty upon silk manufacture, and I propose also to reduce the duty on what I consider rather a raw material than a manufactured article connected with our silk manufacture, I mean dyed thrown silk. I hope I am convincing the house that I am disposed to act fairly and impartially in the application of my principle, and I believe I have now exhausted every article that can be called an article of manufacture, as the word "manufacture" is now generally used. Upon all articles of clothing, use, and consumption, I have stated the general principle I would apply; and I come now to an item of great importance, which, though a manufacture in common parlance, does not strictly fall within that denomination, and with regard to which I apprehend a reduction ought to be made. I propose to reduce the duty on brandy and foreign spirits (cheers). At present, the duty on brandy is not less than 22*s.* 10*d.*, and, if I am rightly informed, the consumption of French brandy at this moment is not so great, or, at all events, not greater than it was in the latter end of the 17th century. This fact, I apprehend, is mainly to be attributed to the exorbitant amount of duty as compared with the value of the article itself. Now brandy, like silk, is an article in respect to which appearances are delusive: there is no article, unless it be silk, in which smuggling so much prevails as in brandy (cheers). The diminution of duty, therefore, is no necessary diminution of protection to the maker of domestic spirits. We are bound to prevent smuggling, and if we can, to convert an unlawful into a lawful traffic, and I propose that the present duty on brandy, Geneva, and foreign spirits generally, shall be reduced from 22*s.* 10*d.* to 15*s.* There remains one article to which I shall advert with respect to which an arrangement was made only as recently as last year, but the duty on which I also propose now to reduce. I allude to sugar (much cheering from the Opposition benches.) It is quite impossible with reference to this article, which must necessarily become the subject of prolonged discussions, that I should enter into details; and, avoiding details, I shall on the present occasion submit to the house the intentions of her Majesty's Government. I am afraid the proposal I have to make will not at all meet with the approbation of those who cheered the mention of sugar by me (hear, hear), but on the present occasion I shall not argue the matter, but state our proposal. Last year I estimated the probable amount of the increased consumption of sugar at not less than 50,000 tons, but that increased consumption did not exceed 38,000 tons. I have no doubt that that consumption will go on increasing hereafter, but it is not perhaps possible to calculate the ratio at which it will proceed, or to tell the amount of free labour sugar that will be brought into competition with British colonial sugar. I supposed that the increase in the quantity of free labour sugar would be 25,000 tons, but the amount actually brought into consumption has fallen far short of that calculation. I believe the defalcation may be accounted for by the total failure of the crop in Cuba, and by the augmented price of sugar on the Continent of Europe: the supplies we might have received were, therefore, diverted to other parts of the world. I think it can be shown that these two causes will account, in a great degree, for our diminished supply. I feel myself still bound to say, that British colonial sugar can bear additional competition with sugar the produce of free labour; and I may take this opportunity of stating, that I am not prepared to make any relaxation with regard to countries pro-dancing sugar by slave labour (hear, hear, hear). I must still contend for that; but as to sugar the produce of free labour, and while the competition shall be limited to sugar so produced, her Majesty's Government have not thought it right to exempt sugar from the general application of the principle (cheers). Assuming, therefore, that the competition is to be confined to sugar the produce of free labour, we propose to deduct 3s. 6d. from the amount of the present differential duty. In the case of Muscovado sugar, the amount of differential duty is 9s. 4d.; in the case of clayed sugar, it is 11s. 9d.; and in both we propose to reduce the amount of differential duty by 3s. 6d., making it 5s. 10d. on Muscovado sugar, and 8s. 3d. on clayed sugar. In concluding this review of the different articles, I might say nearly all articles on which import duties are levied, I come to those which are connected with agriculture. (Considerable anxiety was here evinced by all parts of the house, and a general murmur and whisper were heard.) There are many articles of this kind of first-rate importance, on which heavy duties are imposed, but on which those heavy duties do not operate as a protection, and I may take as an instance tobacco. In making the extensive changes which, on the part of her Majesty's government, I am now proposing, I hope that considerations of revenue will be allowed to have their due weight. I admit that the arguments may be most cogent as to particular items, but the house ought to bear in mind the importance of not breaking down a large source of public income. The demand this year on account of these reductions must be great, and considerations of public interest and of national defence will leave us no alternative but to make that demand. Revenue, therefore, must be duly regarded where interests of such great public magnitude are involved, and the house must not fail to remember that the reductions I am suggesting will necessarily occasion a considerable defalcation. On the other hand, it becomes our duty, not with any hostile intention, but with a view to a provident regard for our defences, to recommend a considerable increase of our naval and military establishments (hear). Those who may think that there are still duties extravagantly high, must exercise such a degree of forbearance as not to recommend simultaneous reductions (hear). I will first refer to those articles of agricultural produce, which are immediately connected with the food of the people. I will, in the first instance, take seeds—grass and other seeds; and I have a deep conviction that a reduction of duty upon them, so far from being a removal of protection to agriculture, will be conferring a benefit upon it. Let us look at the article of clover; it is surely impossible to maintain that the heavy duty for some years applied to clover operated as a protection to agriculture. Upon many parts of the country the duty on clover seed was, in fact, a heavy burden. In 1823, if I recollect rightly, you levied a duty upon clover seed of not less than 144,000*l.*; but how small a portion of the agricultural districts was benefited by it. Clover seed was necessary when farming was best conducted, for it was most importantly conducive to the improved system of husbandry. Some few counties of England were producers of clover seed; but speaking generally, the duty on clover seed was not a protection but a burden upon agriculture; and with respect to all seeds of the kind, to repeal the duty will not be to remove a protection. It is stated that the duty levied on clover last year produced 75,000*l.*, whereas in former years, before the reduction, it amounted to nearly 150,000*l.* For the sake chiefly of simplifying, the house will recollect that I have reduced foreign manufactures generally to a uniform duty of 10 per cent., and as relates to seeds, my proposition is that in no case the duty shall exceed 5s. per cwt. In some cases, leek and onion seed for instance, the present duty is not less than 20s. per cwt., but my suggestion is, that as to all the maximum duty should be 5s. per cwt. I have already adverted incidentally to that most valuable department of agriculture, the fattening of cattle. I believe it is impossible to over-estimate the importance of fattening cattle as instrumental in the improved system of agriculture. The increase of the fertility of the soil, by means of manure, is one of the most beautiful of the dispensations of Providence; and I believe there is no manure, let it come from where it will, that, with respect to its fertilising power, can enter into competition with that derived from the cattle fed on the soil itself. You cannot conduce more to the improvement of inferior soils than by encouraging the feeding and fattening of cattle, and promoting the application of their manure to increasing fertility. I propose therefore that an article of grain which I believe might be applied to the fattening of cattle shall hereafter be imported duty free (cheers). It is an article of immense importance—maize, or Indian corn (cheers). I propose that the duty upon it shall be hereafter and immediately nominal (hear, hear). I do not consider that by the removal of the duty on maize I am depriving agriculture of any protection. I understand that in the United States maize is used partly as human food; and that in this country its utility as human food is too much disregarded. In some parts of the Continent it is held to make excellent food, and it might be advantageously applied in the same way in Great Britain. To promote the free import of maize it seems to me, that so far from doing agriculture a disservice, it will be doing it a benefit, by promoting the nourishment and fattening of cattle. For nearly the same reasons, I suggest that buckwheat should be subjected to the same rule, namely, that the duty should be made merely nominal. I propose, likewise, that meal should be introduced upon the same terms as grain. If any honourable gentleman can ascertain the enormous sums now paid by our best farmers in the purchase of linseed cake and rape cake, I think they will agree with me, that to give increased facilities to the introduction of such articles will be doing no disservice to agriculture. The demand for this cake is so great, that the price is gradually rising, and the consumption on some farms is daily increasing; on some farms, linseed and rape cake chiefly provide the manure for the better cultivation of the soil. The following is a comparative statement of the price of linseed and rape cake at various recent periods:—

Price of Linseed Cakes per 1000, in the month of January, 1840....	49	0	0	to £10 0 0
— 1841....	10	0	0	to 10 0 0
— 1846....	12	0	0	to 12 5 0
Price of Rape Cake per ton.
January, 1843....	25	5	0
— 1844....	5	5	0	to £5 10 0
December, 1844....	4	5	0	to 4 10 0
January, 1846....	5	17	0	to 6 0 0

I hold in my hand a letter from a merchant, strongly recommending, as a source of great advantage to the agricultural interest, the import of another article, much employed in the feeding and fattening of cattle in the United States; it is there called rice-feed, and it is the refuse of rice which is ground up and given to beasts, which are said to thrive better upon it than on linseed cake. It seems that this material is at present excluded, on the ground that it comes under the description of meal, but I believe that the admission of it would enable us better to enter into competition with the foreign breeder, and would so far be an advantage to agriculture. I come now to the consideration of those articles of agricultural produce which are immediately connected with the food of man (renewed murmurs). On this great question, on which of course I anticipate much difference of opinion, I have to meet those on the one hand who contend for no delay and no qualification (cheers); and on the other, those who insist that there shall be no relaxation of the present amount of protection (cheers). My object will be, if possible, to make some adjustment of this question in which both sides may concur (hear, hear): I know that neither will approve of it (cheers and laughter). I know, I say, that neither will approve of it (renewed cheers). I know that I must meet the disapprobation, possibly the opposition, of those who usually sit on this side of the house (ministerial cheers). Probably I may have to encounter equal resistance from the honourable gentlemen opposite (cheers from the Opposition side). But on the part of her Majesty's Government I beg to say that our desire is, without favour or undue partiality, to suggest that which we believe to be just, and calculated to terminate that conflict, the continuance of which all must lament. I trust to be able to remove those causes of jealousy and dissension between different classes of her Majesty's subjects, so as not injuriously to affect any one class, and yet to promote the general interest of all (cheers). I consider it for the public advantage at least to lay the foundation of a final settlement (much cheering). I am not about to propose the immediate repeal of the duties imposed upon grain, and what I shall propose will be an earnest of the principle on which we shall act. I am induced to recommend the immediate reduction of duty on some articles of primary importance in contributing to the food of man. I will first state the articles with respect to which I propose that there shall be either reduction or repeal; as to all I shall recommend an immediate reduction, but I will first advert to those on which I propose an immediate and total repeal. Speaking of articles of consumption, I propose an extensive review of the duties on all articles included in the tariff which enter into the consumption of the people. As I stated, I propose to make an immediate reduction upon the whole, though not the repeal of the whole. On the part of her Majesty's Government I recommend that the duty should be immediately reduced to one-half: upon butter from 1*l.* to 10s., cheese from 10s. to 5s., hops from 4*l.* 10s., to 2*l.* 5s. The duty on cured fish I would reduce to 1s. per cwt. These are the articles of agricultural produce on which I propose the immediate repeal. I propose also the immediate repeal of the duty on all articles which constitute meat food. I propose that the repeal of the duty on bacon shall be absolute and immediate. On fresh beef, on salt beef, on salt pork, on fresh pork, on potatoes, and vegetables of all kinds, the duty shall be forthwith and immediately abolished (hear). Everything then which enters into the vegetable kingdom, and everything of animal food, shall be admitted at once duty free (cheers). I believe that the agriculturist need fear no foreign competition in consequence of this; for, in dealing with him as with the manufacturer, I conceive that I have given to the agriculturist increased facilities in meeting competition, by removing the duty from oil cake, rape cake, and linseed cake, with which he feeds his cattle. Then I propose, having reduced the duty on what may be considered the manufactured articles of food, at once to remove the duty on the importation of animals. I propose, with respect to all animals imported from foreign countries, as a general rule, that they should come in duty free. There is no necessity for retaining the duty on asses, still less on many other animals mentioned in the tariff (a laugh); but with respect to all animals, I propose, as a proof of our adherence to the principles which I have laid down, I propose that they, as well as meat, should be free from duty (hear, hear). It has been represented to me, that it is not fair to levy an equal amount of duty on cattle fattened abroad, and on lean animals imported from abroad; and it has been said that there would be an advantage to the agriculturist in getting access to the lean animal, whilst there would be none in admitting the fattened animal; at any rate my proposition will redress that inequality (hear, and a laugh); and I must say that I trust the increased means of fattening cattle which will be afforded, coupled with the great facility of getting lean cattle, and the ready means of converting them into valuable food for the people of this country, will be considered as some compensation for the removal of the duty from the fattened animal (hear). I hope, also, that those connected with agriculture will bear in mind, whilst I am proposing these reductions, that I have already proposed the removal of protection from some of the great articles of manufacture (hear, hear)—that I have not directed their attention to the removal of protection from the landed interest only; but that I have called, as I always do call, on the manufacturer to set the first example of the relinquishment of protection. They will bear in mind that the farm-servant can command a cheaper supply of clothing than he could before, and I trust, therefore, that they will not be indisposed to follow the example of those whom I have called on first to relinquish their claims to protection (hear). Sir, I now will state, with the permission of the house, the proposal which I intend to make on the subject of the Corn Laws (sensation). I have already said that I exempt some articles of grain from duty altogether. I have said that maize and buckwheat will be admitted duty free (hear). Now, on the one hand, though I do not propose the immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, I am yet in the hope of making a final adjustment of the question, whilst undue apprehension is prevented, and time is given for the adjustment of agriculture to the new state of circumstances (hear, hear). Though I propose a temporary continuance of protection (hear, hear), I do propose that the bill shall contain a distinct enactment that after the lapse of a certain time, foreign grain shall be imported into this country duty free (loud cheers). I am deeply convinced that any intermediate proposition would be of no avail (renewed cheers). It would have been out of my power, as I explained to the house on a former occasion, to have suggested any modification of the existing Corn Law with a guarantee to have continued that modification (hear, hear). That, I say, would have been out of my power. I feel that the choice is between the maintenance intact of the existing amount of protection in every branch, and the laying of the foundation for an ultimate settlement by means of a total repeal of the Corn Law (cheers). I propose therefore that there shall be a considerable reduction in the amount of protection on corn, and I propose that the continuance of the duty so reduced shall be limited to a period of three years (cheers). This act, if it shall meet the sanction of this house, will contain a provision that at that period of the year when I believe there will be the least inconvenience from the termination of protection, viz., on the 1st of February, 1849, oats, barley, and wheat, shall be subjected only to that nominal rate of duty which I propose to apply now at once to maize and buckwheat (hear, hear). The next point which we had to determine was as to what the intermediate state of the law should be during the continuance of protection. My opinion, I am bound to say, as to the policy of providing immediately for a great reduction of the duty on corn remains unchanged (hear, hear). I cannot admit that I took an erroneous estimate—I regret that it is so—I wish I had—but I cannot admit, I say, that I have over-stated the amount of pressure which before the arrival of next harvest may be felt in many parts of the country. I think, not only looking to the prospects of next spring, but looking to the consequence of a deficiency of food, that it is of the greatest importance to take precautions, as far as the Legislature can take precautions, against the evil day (hear, hear). It is possible that the results of that deficiency may be more extensive and permanent than we think of. I am sure I wish it were possible to take advantage of this calamity in one view; and to extract benefit from it, by introducing amongst the people of Ireland a desire for better food than potatoes afford (cheers), and thus to diminish the chance, to which they will possibly be liable, of a recurrence of this great visitation by which the food of millions of our fellow-subjects is rendered uncertain (hear, hear). We have yet to consider what provision is to be made for them—what substitute is to be provided for all the unsound potatoes which, had they been sound, would have formed the food of a majority of the people of Ireland. It is impossible to provide an immediate substitute which would prove satisfactory. You may think that the potato is a most insufficient article of subsistence; but you can't for two or three years to come, do what you will, dispense with the reliance on potatoes. In such a position, the most provident arrangement which can be come to must be suggested. I am not about to propose now what I proposed on the 1st Nov., the immediate suspension of the duty on wheat by an order in council; but I think it is of importance to make such reductions in the present amount of duties as shall realise a great part of the advantage which might have been derived from opening the ports. I wish to have but one law enduring for the limited period to which I have referred; but I wish in that law to take every necessary precaution against impending danger (hear, hear). I propose, therefore, that there shall be for the present, and immediately, a great reduction in the duty on wheat, and that that amount so reduced shall endure only for a limited period, there being a guarantee, by express enactment in the bill, that on the arrival of that period the then existing duty shall be converted into a mere nominal duty. What then shall be the nature of the law which is to endure for a limited period? My colleagues and myself have approached this question wholly unprejudiced, and with no other object in view than the general advancement and prosperity of the country. Our desire has been to propose a law, temporary in its relations, which appears to us, on the whole, best suited to meet the exigencies of the present case, and best calculated to provide for the wants of the country during the period for which it is intended. The rate of duty under the existing law, on other descriptions of grain, has been regulated by the rate of duty on wheat. We propose, therefore, that the rates of duty on barley, oats, peas, beans, and rye shall be governed as nearly as possible, during the continuance of this law, if it meet with the sanction of Parliament, by the principles which will apply to wheat; that is, that there shall be a reduction of a corresponding amount applied to all. But I propose that immediately from the passing of this act, all grain, the produce of British colonial possessions out of bond, shall be admitted at a nominal duty (hear, hear). I propose that in all cases those restrictions which apply to meal, the produce of grain, shall be removed. I presume that they were established for the protection of the milling interest of this country—I believe them, however, to be wholly unnecessary. They are not applied to flour, the produce of wheat; I see no reason why they should be applied to meal, the produce of barley, or any other grain. Now, on the one hand, I offer to those who insist on the immediate and unqualified removal of those laws, the unrestricted importation—at least, the importation at a nominal duty—of all kinds of grain, and all kinds of meal, the produce of British colonial possessions, out of bond. One great article, also the produce of the United States—the article of maize—to the free produce of which the United States attaches the utmost importance, we propose should be admitted duty free, and at once. I now come to the provisions with respect to other descriptions of grain, which we propose to adopt during the period whilst foreign grain is to be subjected to duty. We have attempted to meet some of the objections which have been made to varying the rate of duty; at the same time, to have fixed any duty which would be considered valuable in the shape of protection would not have answered the purpose which we desired to attain—of making an immediate reduction in the price of foreign grain, on account of the temporary exigencies of the country (hear, hear). We propose, therefore, that the enactment to endure for three years shall be to this effect, "That until the 1st day of February, 1849, the following duties shall be levied on wheat if imported from any foreign country. Whenever the average price of wheat made up and published in the manner required by law shall be for every quarter under 48s. the duty shall be.....	10s.

over 48s. and under 49s.....	9s.
49s.	8s.
50s.	7s.
51s.	6s.
52s.	5s.
53s.	4s.

and that whenever the price of grain made up and published in the manner required by law shall exceed 53s., there shall then be an invariable duty of 4s. per quarter." That is to say, that there shall be no temptation to hold grain when the price shall exceed 54s., for the purpose of securing the shilling of extra duty (hear, hear). The enactments which we shall propose with respect to all other descriptions of grain will precisely follow the scale which we have adopted with regard to wheat. It would, however, perhaps be more convenient for the house, considering the time I have already occupied, that I should rather refer them to the details which will be printed to-morrow morning, than go through the whole now as regards oats and barley (hear, hear). It may be sufficient for the present purpose to state that the same general rule will be adopted in all (hear, hear). There would now, therefore, be levied on wheat, instead of a duty of 16s., one of 4s.; and every other grain at the present prices taken out of bond for consumption in the home market, would be subject to a merely nominal duty (hear, hear). That is the arrangement for the adjustment of this great question which her Majesty's Government are induced to offer for the consideration of Parliament. We propose to accompany that arrangement with other provisions calculated—I will not say to give compensation—but calculated, in my firm belief, materially to advance the interests of that portion of the community which, after the lapse of three years, will be called on to relinquish their protection. I believe it is possible to suggest arrangements not affecting the interests of other portions of the community, yet materially benefiting theirs, by introducing reforms in the levying of duties, and in the application of the burdens which are to be raised. I thank them for having permitted me without interruption to state all those portions of my proposal which might appear to be bearing heavily on them. I am obliged to them for the forbearance with which they have permitted me to go through that part of my proposed measure (hear, hear). I will now state what are the measures with which we propose to accompany this great present reduction, and the ultimate extinction of protection—measures which, I believe, will prove greatly to the advantage of that interest in whose welfare this country is deeply interested (hear, hear). Let us review some of the burdens which do fall immediately on land; but burdens which are, in my opinion, some of them at least, capable of alleviation, not by their transfer to other parties, but by the introduction of reforms into the mode of their levy. Now, first, let me take the existing arrangement with respect to one great source of expenditure—to one great burden which is constantly and justly complained of by the agriculturists—I mean the amount of rate which is levied for highways (hear, hear). Is it not quite possible, without subjecting other parties to the expense of maintaining the highways, to introduce reforms into the mode of raising the highway rate which might be advantageous to the agriculturists? I believe it is possible (hear, hear). What is the law at present with respect to highways? There are at least 16,000 local authorities, each of which has charge of the highways. As railways advance, whilst turnpike roads are in many cases becoming of little importance, highways, which have hitherto been of little advantage to the public, are becoming of increased importance. But where a highway is a continuous channel of communication passing through different parishes, that same highway is under the control of every parish through which it passes, and as I have before said, the total number of parish authorities is not less than 16,000. The practice of keeping up the repair of the roads is to have a nominal appointment of a paid surveyor in each parish, who absolutely knows nothing whatever of the construction of roads (hear, hear); or even if they did—if they had double the ability which they do possess, the existence of different surveyors on one highway is necessarily a defective arrangement. That each portion of the highway should be subject to a parochial authority, distinct from the other portions in other parishes, and that the highway should be thus subjected to numerous local authorities, must evidently tend to increased outlay, to great abuse, and generally to a laxity of expenditure, and a bad system of repair, which it is desirable should be avoided in future (hear, hear). There is at present in existence an act of Parliament which permits the voluntary union of parishes into local districts, for the purpose of the most effectual superintendence and repair of the roads; but as the union of the parishes for that purpose is required under the act to be voluntary, there is hardly any instance in which that union has taken place, in which the voluntary power of forming such a district has been exercised. What I propose is this—and in proposing, I do not bring it forward as a relief to agriculture from any burden, but as a means of benefiting the agricultural interests, by greatly improving the communication by highways throughout the country (hear, hear). I propose, therefore, that what is now a power of voluntary union on the part of the parishes should be made compulsory (cheers). If we adopt the same extent of district for those local unions as that which is selected for the poor law unions, it will be 600 local authorities throughout the country; and I propose to compel the parishes in those districts to form such unions for the purpose of the superintendence and repair of the roads (hear, hear). I also propose that such union, when so formed, should have the power of appointing a surveyor of the roads for that particular district; the surveyor so appointed to be a properly qualified professional man, who is to have the entire charge of the roads in his district. Some cases of the voluntary union of parishes do exist at present, as I have before stated; and I wish to remind the house, before I proceed further, of the effects which have been produced by the adoption of these unions, and the substitution, for a parochial management, of a central management under the direction of a surveyor (hear, hear). I hold in my hand a return relating to a district in the north, in which parochial management has been superseded, and a district of seventy miles in extent formed for the purpose of carrying into effect a better mode than that which prevailed under parochial management, of repairing and superintending the roads under the direction of a county surveyor. The result of the improved system of central management is thus described:—[Here the right hon. baronet read a return from the parishes within the district of seventy miles, from which it appeared that under the old system the cost of repairing and surveying the roads was from 6d. to 9d. in the pound, whilst the money at the same time was thrown away; whereas, under the centralised system this expense was no more than from 1½d. to 3d. in the pound, and the work done in the best manner. In nine adjoining parishes which had not adopted the system of voluntary union, the expense of repairing, &c. &c., was from 4½d. to 5d. in the pound]. That is not a transfer of any burden, whilst it will go a great way in improving the channels of communication, and thus so far tend to the benefit of the agricultural interest, and relieve them to a certain extent of a burden which they bear. That is, therefore, one system by which I propose to relieve the agricultural interest, and it can be effected without transferring it to others, but by a better arrangement of our existing institutions. I will now direct the attention of the house to a law which has been greatly complained of by the agricultural interest—I mean the present law of settlement (hear, hear, from the agricultural representatives.) It happens, under the present law of settlement, that a large portion of the population of rural districts are induced, in times of great manufacturing prosperity, to move into the manufacturing districts, and it happens frequently that the power, the labour, and the best part of a man's life, who so removes, are consumed in that manufacturing district, and thus all the advantage of his strength, and good conduct, and industry are derived by the manufacturing district during the period of his residence (hear, hear). A revulsion then comes in trade; the manufacturing districts are not prosperous, and what course is taken with respect to the man who moved in more prosperous times from the rural to the manufacturing districts? The man with his wife and family is sent back to the rural districts (hear, hear); and the individual who spent the best part of his life as a manufacturing operative, and who perhaps was not very provident during the time of his best labour, is returned to the rural district from which he originally came—returned unfit for an agricultural occupation (hear, hear). Under these circumstances the man is sent against his will to a new home, at a period when all his communications with that district have been interrupted, and with no means of earning an honest livelihood, a proceeding which must shock the feelings of every man who witnesses it (hear, hear). In proposing an alteration of the system under which these circumstances take place, I am not merely doing an act of justice, but also preventing an act of injustice to the labouring man. The proposal is not, therefore, merely that an industrial residence of five years should give a settlement, but that the power of removability should be taken away in the case of that man (loud cheers). We propose that after an industrial residence of five years, after a man has laboured for a period of five years in a district, his settlement shall not be in the place where he had originally a settlement, but in the district to which his industry and labour had been given during those five years (cheers). The house may recollect what passed in 1842. In 1842 great distress prevailed in the manufacturing districts, and the practice adopted in consequence of this distress was, that the men who had originally a settlement in agricultural districts were returned to them, after having laboured in the manufacturing districts. Now I conceive that what we propose is a great moral improvement in the law of settlement (hear, hear, and cheers), and an improvement which will prove a just relief to the rural districts, but the great advantage of which will be the avoidance of an act of injustice to the labouring man (hear, hear, and cheers). I propose, on the part of the Government, that from the passing of the measure which we shall introduce with reference to this subject no person who has resided five years in a parish shall be removed from that parish, and no residence in a prison, or a barrack, or lunatic asylum, or an hospital in that parish, or no period during which the individual was receiving public relief, shall be reckoned in those five years, or, on the other hand, be an interruption (hear, hear). I propose that there shall not only be no power to remove that man, but that there shall be no power to remove his wife or his children, legitimate or illegitimate, under sixteen years of age—that those children shall be permitted to reside with the father and mother, for there is to be no power to remove them when the removal of the man himself is prevented (hear, hear). There is to be no separation of the children from the parent in this case (great cheering), or of the man so situated from his family (cheers). The man who labours for five years in a district of which he is not a native, is thus not to be sent to the place of his original settlement. Under the present system, immediately on the death of a labouring man in a manufacturing district, of which he happens not to be a native, his widow can be removed to the parish in which she had her settlement; but we propose that no widow can be removable, for 12 months after the death of her husband, from the parish in which he resided at the time of his death (hear, hear, and cheers). At present, when a man situated as the individual I have described begins to fail in a manufacturing district—perhaps from having undergone extreme labour—an apprehension begins to be entertained that he may become a permanent incumbrance on the parish, and means are accordingly taken for an early removal of that man to his original settlement; now, I propose that he shall not be removable after five years' labour on the grounds of sickness or accident; that no such ground as sickness or accident shall be alleged as the cause of the removal of such a man or his family from a manufacturing to an agricultural district (hear, hear). This alteration in the law of settlement which I propose will be found to be a great social advantage, whilst it will relieve the agricultural interest of a burden which at present it is subject to. In proposing this alteration, I am doing only what is just to the place of the man's original settlement, and preventing an injustice from being done to the man who for a long time employed his labour in a manufacturing district (hear, hear). The next measure I am prepared on the part of her Majesty's Government to advise is one that, without loss to any party in the community, will confer great advantage on others. There is a dread—a natural dread—of competition with our agriculture on the cessation of the present Corn Law, and I must add it is impossible to deny that agricultural science is as yet in its infancy in this country, and that opportunities are afforded for effecting immense improvements in that department, and thus affording the means of meeting competition (hear): there are opportunities of enabling the British farmer, by the skill, capital, and industry of this country, to meet any competition which might be entered into by other countries (great cheering). Now, we recommend that the State should encourage improvements in agricultural science, and we propose that for this purpose the State should give facilities for carrying on such improvements in agriculture (hear, hear). Look at the committee of last year, at which the Duke of Richmond presided—look at the evidence before that committee with respect to the improvement of estates; that evidence shows that great opportunities of improvement exist where the means were afforded, and that large and extensive districts of the country are in a state to afford a wide and profitable field for the application of those improvements. I believe that those facilities exist—I believe that draining would greatly increase the produce of this country (hear, hear). Difficulties are no doubt to be met, and those difficulties are alluded to in the report of the committee which I have just mentioned—but there have been also proposed various schemes for effecting the necessary improvements in agriculture, and amongst them are some which have been brought forward by my honourable friend the member for Berkshire. Amongst the principal difficulties to be encountered was the necessary intervention of the Court of Chancery in many cases, and the difficulty of raising sufficient sums of money, and obtaining satisfactory security for its repayment, as well as the interest, in case of failure. Now, we recommend that the public credit of the state should be lent for the purpose of encouraging improvements, but we intend that it shall be done in a manner which will not subject the public to any loss, whilst money can be thus afforded on certain terms which we will name for the purpose of affording every facility for agricultural improvement. I see a great deal of advantage likely to arise from that recommendation, and I will now lay before the house the manner in which we propose to effect it. At present we advance Exchequer bill loans on sufficient security; now I would advise the application of the public credit to the encouragement of agriculture in such a manner as perfectly to guard the public against any loss. We propose that the Exchequer bill commissioners should lend a sufficient sum of money to effect agricultural improvements, on due securities, and we will take advantage of another board already in existence—the board of enclosures—for the purpose of facilitating those improvements. We recommend that a landed proprietor, wishing to effect improvements, should make an application to the enclosure commissioners, to inquire into the nature and extent of the improvements proposed, and we recommend that the preliminary survey should be made at the expense of the proprietor so applying, in order to prevent all frivolous applications. After a full investigation on the part of the enclosure commissioners, a certificate is to be issued by those commissioners, warranting the Exchequer bill loan commissioners to advance a certain sum, such as may be required for the improvement so approved, providing by the terms of the advance an annual payment of a moderate rate of interest, and a repayment of the principal by annual instalments, the rent charge thus created to be taken as prior to all other charges, except any other party having a prior claim to the land should object to it. I believe, however, that there will be few cases in which an objection will be made by such a party to the effecting of the improvement on the terms which I have described, as those improvements would be the best guarantee for new charges on the estate (hear, hear). We propose that parties who have a prior claim on the land shall only be prior to the rent charge thus created, and that in case they shall object to the advance, it may not be done without the consent of the Court of Chancery. We believe that we shall thus be enabled to remove the objection which at present applies with respect to the difficulty that exists as regards improvements of entailed estates, and that we shall be enabled to obviate the great expense attending appeal to the Court of Chancery in such cases, thus removing the difficulties which now prevent advances on the part of private companies, and that thus great advantages will be conferred. I believe that a spirit of improvement will take place, and that the landlords, under scientific direction, will be enabled to improve their estates, and that the stimulation and emulation thus excited will lead to a general spirit of agricultural improvement (hear, hear). Well, that's another mode by which we propose to enable the landed interest to meet the competition to which they will be exposed at the termination of the present Corn Laws. With respect to direct local burdens her Majesty's Government have devoted serious consideration to that subject, and I must say that I cannot advise any material alteration of the present system of assessment. There is now raised an immense sum of money by this assessment, which is partly applied to the sustenance and relief of the poor, and partly for other objects. It is said, and said with apparent justice, that this charge bears on the agricultural interest, that it ought to be relaxed, and that there ought to be an alteration in the manner of levying it. Now, in point of fact, it is not a charge on the land; the opposition is not between the country and the manufacturing districts—not between land and houses—but between real and personal property (hear, hear); for whether real property is in houses or manufactures, where industry is employed it is subjected to the assessment for poor rates. If this were a general charge—if the Government undertook the general support of the poor, it might be advantageous to make personal property subject to the support of the poor. But this assessment to which I refer—this charge for the support of the poor—is a local charge, and not a general one (hear, hear). The land would have no advantage if the personal property of Manchester were all made to contribute to the poor rates. It would be no advantage to the land of the north of England, if the inhabitants of Halifax, Stockport, Macclesfield were rated in this manner, for this charge. You may say, subject personal as well as real property to the assessment. If you do this, you must subject it to the assessment in the rural as well as in the manufacturing districts. If you did so, how, I ask, would you levy so small a charge upon personal property as this would be in many cases? It might be possible to do so with great sums, and on urgent occasions; but when you come to levy sums for the relief of the poor on personal property in rural districts, you would find that the attempt would not be so successful (hear, hear). To raise minute sums by any inquisition on the part of local authorities would prove a great burden on land in the rural districts (hear). There are districts, partly agricultural and partly manufacturing, and there you may say this mode of assessment is unjust; but whether or no, I am not prepared to suggest such a remedy as this inquisition into personal property for the purpose of assessment. I do not think that it would be an advantage to the land that there should be an inquisition by local authorities, in order to levy this tax on personal property. If an inquiry were made into the profits of trade for the purpose of this assessment, an inquiry should take place into the profits of the farmer. You had an inquiry into personal property before, under another act, but you abandoned it because you found it impossible. If you established it in this case, I see no advantage that would arise to the agricultural interest; and I am sure that if the state took upon itself the maintenance of the poor it would be an arrangement open to the greatest objections; and as the charge is at present not a general but a local one, I do not believe that the landed interest would be benefited by this assessment of personal property for the poor rates. I have not, therefore, proposed any material alteration as to the principle on which the rates are at present levied. I always thought that the agricultural interest had a fair claim to direct relief from some local burdens, and looking at those which affect the land exclusively, we propose to take some of them off. I cannot mention this as a direct compensation, but I believe it will be found to lay the foundation of great social improvement if the public take upon them some of these charges. The hon. member for Somersetshire brought some of those burdens under the consideration of the house last year. I then said that while we retained protection I would not advise the agricultural interest to seek the relief then sought, as that relief would be comparatively small. But when we remove protection from the agricultural interest, I think it is in our power to relieve the land to a certain extent, and effect further social improvement. You have already taken upon yourselves half the expense of maintaining prisoners while in gaol before trial, and also half the expense of lunatic asylums. You already bear a portion of the charge of maintaining convicts while in prison, and of removing convicts under sentence of transportation. We propose to relieve the country from these expenses altogether, and to throw the charge entirely upon the consolidated fund. When I say the consolidated fund, I do not mean to say that these expenses shall be paid without inquiry; and therefore I propose, in order that there may be a constant and vigilant check upon the expenditure of the country, that the necessary amount shall be provided for by an annual vote. With respect to the expenses of prosecutions in England, one-half of that charge is already paid out of the public purse, the other half by the county in which the prosecution takes place. In Scotland, the charge is paid altogether by the country; in Ireland a portion of the charge still remains imposed upon the land. We propose that in the case of England and Ireland, that portion of the expenses of prosecutions which is now defrayed by the county out of the local rates shall be borne by the country at large. The relief will not be great, but it will at the same time afford you the means of establishing some control over prosecutions (hear, hear), and thus, in a social point of view, the country will be amply repaid for the addition made to the public burdens. In Scotland, a good system of checking prosecutions by means of a public prosecutor has for some time existed (hear). In Ireland you have a control of the same kind, by requiring that in all prosecutions there shall be the consent of a public officer before the prosecution can be instituted. With a view, therefore, partly to the relief which the land will receive, and partly to the means of supervision which will be thereby afforded, I propose that the whole charge of prosecutions shall be taken from the land and placed upon the consolidated fund. The expense which this will occasion will be 17,000*l.* for Ireland, but in England it will not be less than 100,000*l.* When I speak of Ireland, let it not be forgotten that if there be any part of the United Kingdom which will suffer from the withdrawal of protection to agriculture, that part of the United Kingdom will be a loser by the course which we have recommended. Its capital and its enterprise are almost exclusively directed to agricultural pursuits. If, therefore, there should appear at first any undue favour shown to Ireland, let it be borne in mind that Ireland has not the means which other parts of the United Kingdom possess of employing labour in manufactures. It must also be recollected at the same time that we propose no relief from burdens which is not accompanied with some great social benefit to the whole of the community. At present there is a large police force established in Ireland. The expense of maintaining that force falls partly on the county, and partly on the public at large. This seems to me, I confess, an anomalous system (hear, hear). I think that it would be a great advantage to place that force under the control of the executive government, and to make it as perfect a system as you can, excluding all power of local nomination and local interference. This course was strongly recommended by the commission over which Lord Devon presided, without any reference to the withdrawal of protection from agriculture; and, therefore, her Majesty's Government are disposed to recommend that the charge of maintaining the police force in Ireland shall be wholly borne by the public treasury. There is another charge borne by the land in this country, which, with a view to the social advantages which will result from the change, we propose to transfer to the consolidated fund. I allude to medical relief (hear, hear). There is no part of the administration of the Poor Laws which gives more dissatisfaction than the administration of medical relief (hear, hear). There has been often great unwillingness on the part of the guardians to provide proper means for visiting and relieving the sick poor; and I am sorry to say, there has been frequently just grounds of complaint with respect to medical attendance. The state of medical relief in Scotland also has frequently attracted the attention of the house during the last session of Parliament. For the sake, therefore, of gradually introducing an amended system of medical relief to the poor, we propose that the public shall pay half the charge of medical officers. I estimate that the amount of relief which the land will receive by this plan will, in England, amount to not less than 100,000*l.*, and will amount to about 15,000*l.* in Scotland. Ireland stands in a different position in this respect, and the circumstances in which it is placed will shortly occupy the attention of the other house of Parliament. There is a separate charge which falls on the land in Scotland, from which, I think, it is entitled to be relieved. The charge of the model prison, Pentonville, is borne by the country generally, and Scotland objects that the expense of maintaining the prison at Perth ought not to fall upon her exclusively. It is but a very small amount, but Scotland wishes to be relieved from it, more, perhaps, as a matter of feeling, than on account of the burden which it casts upon the people of that country, who see the prison at Pentonville and the establishment at Parkhurst, in the Isle of Wight, supported at the public expense. There is only one other item of expenditure which I propose to take off from the land, but on which I think I shall have the general acquiescence of the house. I believe that in many parish workhouses there is great ground of complaint on account of the inadequate provision made for education (hear, hear, hear). In many workhouses persons who are perfectly unfit to be trusted with the education of youth have been appointed schoolmasters. We propose not to interfere with the right of the guardians to appoint these persons, as we do not wish to raise any question about their religious tenets. The right of appointment, therefore, shall remain with the guardians; but the Government will be ready to bear the expense. We shall require the right of examination, of inspection, and of dismissal; but we are ready to provide a competent and decent salary for those who are to perform the task of instruction. We propose that a sum of 30,000*l.* a year shall be devoted to the purpose of providing competent salaries for schoolmasters and schoolmistresses for the children of the destitute poor, taking at the same time upon ourselves so much of control as shall not amount to interference with the right of election, but requiring that the person appointed shall be competent to discharge the duties of the situation. I propose also that the salaries of auditors of Poor Law unions shall be paid out of the public treasury, upon the same ground as those upon which the Poor Law commissioners are paid from the same source. If this general scheme shall meet with the approbation of the house, observe what it does for the great body of the people in this country. At a very early period all legislative restrictions on food will be entirely removed. Many of those restrictions will be removed immediately. With regard to clothing, the purchaser may at once go into the cheapest market. A great improvement will be introduced in respect to medical attendance. Before this measure be rejected, I do hope that both parties in this house, though their immediate views may not be consulted, will consider that, in respect to many articles of food, there will be an immediate removal of restrictions, and that with respect to all there will be a free importation at an early period. I trust, however, that the whole measure may be fairly and temperately considered, and that on each side you will reflect on the consequences of an immediate rejection of this scheme (hear, hear). I ask for no expression of opinion upon it this evening. I hope that after an interval of some days we shall approach the consideration of the final result in the same temper of mind in which, on both sides of the house, you have listened to my explanation of the views of the Government (hear, hear). Now, let me conclude with two observations, one connected with our foreign policy and the interests of our commercial intercourse with other countries, the other having reference to our own domestic prosperity. I fairly avow to you that in making this great reduction on the imports of articles which are the produce of other countries, I have no guarantee that other countries will follow our example (hear, hear). I give you the advantage of the admission that her Majesty's Government, worn out with long-continued efforts to make other countries give us a fair equivalent, have determined to pursue their own course, and that we, on the behalf of this country, have resolved to consult our own interest, and not to punish both other countries and ourselves by encouraging high duties, and with high duties a contraband trade (cheers). We have had no communication with any other Government on this subject. I cannot promise you that France will give us an equivalent for the reductions made on articles which are the produce of that country; nor that Russia will evince her gratitude for the policy of reducing the duty on tallow; you may therefore say to me, "You are giving away all these duties, and you get nothing in return." I may be told, and with truth, that many foreign countries which have benefited by the reductions which we have already made have not followed our example, but have actually applied to British goods higher rates of duty than were imposed upon them before (cries of hear, hear). I give you the whole benefit of that argument. I rely on that fact as a conclusive proof of the policy of the course which we have pursued. It is undoubtedly the fact that they have not followed our example. But look at the state of our export trade. You have defied the regulations of other countries, and your foreign trade has greatly increased. This is owing partly, perhaps, to the smuggler, whose daring and ingenuity have penetrated the triple cordon which was established to exclude your manufactures; and partly, perhaps, to the circumstance that the inhabitants of the countries to which I refer have not the advantages which enable you to enter into competition with them. But your exports, whatever the traffic of other countries may be, are a clear indication that the trade of this country with foreign countries is increasing. You have defied your competitors in the market, and notwithstanding hostile tariffs, the declared value of the exports of this country has increased to the extent of 10,000,000*l.* during the period since the reductions in our tariff have been made. I say, therefore, that you may depend upon it that the example which you have set will ultimately be followed. When your example could be quoted in favour of restrictions upon commerce, it was quoted and acted upon, and you may rely upon it that when your example can be quoted in favour of relaxation of restriction, it will not be without its effect. It may not act at first upon foreign governments or boards of trade, but ultimately the true interests of commerce will prevail; and in spite of the desire of foreign governments and boards of trade to raise revenue, the voice of reason will at last be heard. I see some symptoms already of an adherence to the principles by which we have been guided. Look at the report of the secretary of the treasury of the United States, Mr. Walker. That shows that your example has not been unavailing. The report made by him, containing many enlarged views on the subject of commerce, speaks thus on the question of foreign trade:—"By countervailing restrictions we injure our own fellow-citizens much more than the foreign nation at whom we purpose to aim their force, and in the conflict of opposing tariffs we sacrifice our own commerce, agriculture, and navigation. As well might we impose monarchical or aristocratic restrictions on our government or people, because that is the course of foreign legislation. Let our commerce be as free as our political institutions. Let us with revenue duties only open our ports to all the world, and nation after nation will soon follow our example." He says also, "If the question is asked, who shall begin the work of reciprocal reduction?—it is answered by the fact that England has already abated her duties upon most of our exports. She has repealed the duty upon most of our exports. She has repealed the duty upon cotton, and greatly reduced the tariff upon the breadstuffs, provisions, and other articles; and her present bad harvest, accompanied by a reduction of our tariff, would lead to the repeal of her Corn Laws, and the unrestricted admission at all times of our agricultural products." Here is a direct homage to the course which you have already pursued. Here is an admission that without any preliminary stipulation you reduced the duty on cotton, and the United States has now admitted that the time is come when she must follow your example. In other parts of Europe, where the form of Government is totally different from that of the United States, I could give you proof that your example is producing a considerable effect. I could quote the instance of a State, as different from the United States as can be, where your commercial principles are growing into favour. In Naples, liberal views on commercial subjects are beginning to prevail (hear, hear). I must say, in justice to the Sovereign who now rules over that country, and who takes a personal part in the administration of that branch of affairs, that I have seen documents on commercial subjects from his pen, in which the principles of commercial intercourse are enunciated with as much correctness as if he had been a professor of political economy. That Sovereign is constantly urging upon his ministers the relaxation of duties; and I am convinced that at an early period we may look for a reduction of the duties levied upon articles of our manufacture. I see reason to think that the same course will at no remote period be followed both in Sweden and Norway. Austria has shown some disposition at least not to follow the example set her by neighbouring countries; and Hanover, also, has taken her own course in commercial legislation. I do not despair, therefore, that the time will arrive when your example will act upon other countries. I trust that the improved intercourse which will ensue from it will constitute a new bond of peace. I do hope that the lovers and friends of peace between all nations will derive material strength from the example which I advise to be followed, by the removal of impediments to commercial intercourse. But, observe, that the continuance of peace will expose us to greater competition. The greater the certainty of the continuance of peace, the greater will be the efforts which you must make to maintain your commercial position. During the last war we commanded the means of supplying every nation, but peace has produced not only new consumers but also formidable manufacturing rivals. It is of great importance to us to maintain the position to which we have reached. Now, I do firmly think that the abundance and cheapness of provisions is one of the constituents by which the continuance of commercial pre-eminence may be maintained. You may say that the object of these alterations is to foster the love of gain, and to minister to the desire of accumulating money. I advise these measures on no such grounds. I believe that the accumulation of wealth, that is to say, the increase of capital, is a main element, is one of the means by which we can maintain the pre-eminence position which we have long held. But I have attempted to show that the abundance of provisions and the security—which is a main guarantee for the continuance of that abundance—not only contribute to the accumulation of wealth, but that they are directly conducive to the alleviation of public burdens by the increase of revenue—to the alleviation of local burdens by diminishing the pressure of local claims; but, above all, that they are conducive to the spread of morality, by diminishing those temptations to crime which arise from poverty and distress (hear). I ask you, therefore, to give your consent to these measures, not on any narrow view or principle connected with the accumulation of wealth, but I ask you to give your consent to them on far higher grounds—far higher principles. Encumbered as you are by heavy burdens, solicitous as you are to provide for the public credit, depend upon it the true source of increased revenue is increased comfort and increased taste for luxury. Thus, I say, are the interests of the revenue promoted by that unseen and voluntary taxation which arises from the enlarged consumption of articles of general use. I ask you to consent to the scheme you have just heard, on the proof which I have adduced, that abundance and cheapness lead to diminished crime and to increased morality (loud cheers). These are the usual, nay, the almost necessary effects of that cheapness and that abundance. I could bring before you many examples. "But why?" I hear it asked, "if there be no actual scarcity, and no danger of scarcity, why interfere?" (Tory cheers). Now what is scarcity? It is a relative term (hear, hear, from the Opposition). That which is not scarcity to us may be scarcity to others. But scarcity is a relative term in respect of times as well as persons. Remember this, that the lapse of three years of plenty brings us to an important era in a nation's history. The late abundance of provisions, and consequent comparative cheapness, have altered the character and the feelings of the people (hear, hear). That which was not scarcity in the hard winter of 1842 would be scarcity now (hear, hear); that which would not have been then a denial of comforts almost equal to the necessities of life would be severely felt now (hear, hear). There would be much more real suffering sustained in 1843, after the enjoyment of three years of comparative abundance, by the people now being put upon anything like a short allowance of food, than there would have been under similar circumstances in 1843. Now, I advise that we do not check the genial current of prosperity which has so long prevailed. We have had three abundant harvests. Now, do not mistake me. I am not insensible to the advantages of plenty arising from the abundance of home produce, which the bounty of Providence may favour us with. I do not say that any importation of corn from foreign countries can supply or compensate for the advantages we derive from abundant harvests of our own. But I ask you to consider whether or not such a consideration forms a reason why, if there be danger of a deficient supply at home, we should not remedy the evil as well as we can, by permitting importation from abroad (cheers)? I was told the other day that, in the instance of a battalion of the Guards, quartered here, a great increase in the number of applications for the furlough granted to private soldiers had taken place within the last three years. I inquired what was the reason. The house may think the anecdote trifling, but I confess it made a great impression upon my mind. I was told, I say, that the reason for the rapid increase in the number of applications for furlough—in fact, for twice the number of soldiers applying in 1845 for the privilege than had sought for it in previous years—and the number of applicants is still on the increase—I was told, I say, sir, that the reason was this—that the friends of these soldiers were at present in such comfortable circumstances, that the men were constantly receiving invitations to pass some time in the country with their relatives, and that it was in this manner that the increase was to be accounted for (hear, hear, and some laughter). Sir, honourable members may think the matter trifling, but it seems to me a striking instance of the moral advantages produced by the command of an abundant supply of food. We see abundance here facilitating the intercourse of kindly affection. We see it permitting those who are divided in periods of difficulty and distress—permitting the soldier to revisit his home, and then to return, I hope, imbued with feelings which would qualify him for the still better performance of his duty than those with which he had for a time left it (cheers and laughter). Now I was asked the other night why I am disposed to disturb the state of prosperity to which I allude (Tory cheering). I was told the other night that I had admitted that during a period of three years there had been comparative abundance and comparative prosperity—that that abundance and prosperity had co-existed with the Corn Law of 1842, and where then was the necessity for disturbing the arrangement then made (Tory cheering)? Sir, my answer is this—that up to the month of October last the indications of the prosperity in question did exist; but that during that month, and for the two or three which have elapsed since, there has been an apparent sympathy between the prosperity of the manufacturing districts and the price of wheat (hear, hear). One of the circulars issued from Manchester, containing an account of the state of trade in that town, and dated the 22d of the present January, contains the following passage:—"The anticipations which we ventured to make in our last annual circular, as to the prospects of the year we had just then entered upon, were fully realised for the first nine months, during which we enjoyed not only a continuance of the prosperity of 1844, but it had reached to a degree unexampled in our manufacturing history—extending to every branch, and acting powerfully on the social condition of our teeming population. The causes which combined to produce this state of things were, as in the former year, steadiness of prices, with a demand constantly keeping pace with the supply; low rates for the raw material, abundance of money at a moderate rate of interest, with a discriminating and careful management of our banking institutions; regular and full employment for all classes of our operatives, with cheap and abundant food, and the absence of any political event threatening either our domestic peace or foreign relations, to which may be added, the wise and comprehensive fiscal measures of the last session of Parliament. Unhappily, we have latterly experienced a reverse in several of these elements of prosperity, which, acting on each other, led to a state of embarrassment under which we laboured for the last three months of the year, and are still labouring, though in a mitigated form. Our home trade demand, up to the end of September, was on an unprecedentedly large scale, but from the causes above mentioned, an almost total suspension occurred for the two succeeding months, which has been followed since by a moderate business only." We are not, therefore, to conclude that up to the time at which I am speaking these indications of prosperity continue unabated. The events which have passed since the month of October, 1845, have certainly constituted one of the grounds on which I have come to the conclusion which I have arrived at (hear, hear). And now, Mr. Greene, these are the proposals which, upon the part of her Majesty's government, I offer for the adjustment—for the ultimate adjustment—of this great question. I cannot appeal to any ungenerous feelings of fear—to anything which can unduly sway your minds—as a reason for your listening with patience to my propositions. There may be agitation, but it is not agitation which has reached the great mass of the labouring community. There has been a total absence of all popular excitement. I admit, therefore, that it is possible, without danger to the public peace, to continue the existing law; I cannot therefore, appeal to your fears. But I tell you that there has occurred a great change in the opinion of a vast proportion of the community on the subject of the Corn Laws (loud Opposition cheering); that there exists between the master manufacturers and the operative classes a common conviction, which did not prevail in 1842, or in any previous year, that it is for the public advantage that these laws should be altered (loud cheers); but I believe that although there undoubtedly does prevail that union of sentiment on the subject, I cannot say that there is co-existent with it anything but general contentment, general loyalty, and a deep-seated confidence in the justice and wisdom of the decisions of this house. So far as I can judge, the example which you have set in taking on yourselves great pecuniary burdens, in order that you might relieve the labouring classes from the taxation to which they were subject, has produced the deepest impression and the most beneficial effect. I repeat that I believe there exists a perfect confidence in your judgment and your wisdom. But although this is a time of peace and plenty—although there prevails a perfect calm, excepting so far as agitation among the principal manufacturers may interrupt it—(hear, and a laugh)—although you are now not subject to any coercion, I entreat you to bear in mind that the aspect of affairs may be changed—that we may have to contend with worse harvests than that which we have lately gathered, and that it may be wise to avail ourselves of the present time for effecting an adjustment—an adjustment which, I believe, must ultimately take place, and which cannot be long protracted without engendering deep feelings of animosity between different classes of her Majesty's subjects (cheers). From the sincere belief which I entertain that that settlement must be brought about—from the sincere hope which I feel that, coupled with the precautionary measures to which I have referred, it will not inflict injury on the agricultural interest—from these convictions, and with these feelings, I should deeply lament, on public grounds exclusively, the failure of the measures which, on the part of her Majesty's government, I have on the present occasion recommended to your calm and dispassionate consideration; and recommended, mind, with no feeling, with no interest in the ultimate issue, other than that it may prove, in the words of the Royal Speech, conducive to the maintenance of friendly feeling between the different classes of the community, a security for the permanence of peace, and an assurance for the contentment and loyalty of all classes, of all ranks of her Majesty's subjects, by increasing the comforts and bettering the condition of the great body of the people. The right hon. baronet resumed his seat amid considerable Opposition cheering. His speech occupied three hours and twenty-five minutes in the delivery.

The resolutions brought in by the right honourable baronet were then read pro forma, as follows:—

"That in lieu of the duties now payable on the importation of corn, grain, meal, or flour, there shall be paid until the 1st day of February, 1849, the following duties, viz.:

If imported from any foreign country—		WHEAT.
Whenever the average price of wheat, made up and published in the manner required by law, shall be for every quarter		s. d.
Under 48s.	the duty shall be for every qr.	10	0
48s. — 49s.	9	0
49s. — 50s.	8	0
50s. — 51s.	7	0
51s. — 52s.	6	0
52s. — 53s.	5	0
53s. and upwards	4	0
BARLEY, BEAR OR BIGGS.
Whenever the average, &c.,		Under 26s. the duty shall be for every qr.
26s. — 27s.	5	0
27s. — 28s.	4	0
28s. — 29s.	3	0
29s. — 30s.	3	0
30s. — 31s.	2	0
31s. and upwards	2	0
OATS.
Whenever the average, &c.,		Under 18s. the duty shall be for every qr.
18s. — 19s.	4	0
19s. — 20s.	3	0
20s. — 21s.	2	0

21s. — 22s. 2 0
22s. and upwards 1 6
From and after the 1st of February, 1849, there shall be paid the following duties:—Wheat, barley, bear or biggs, &c., 1s.; wheat-meal, barley-meal, oatmeal, &c., for every cwt. 4½d."

After the reading of the resolutions, a discussion took place as to the most appropriate time for resuming the subject. Mr. Miles and Mr. S. O. Brien recommended delay; and notwithstanding Mr. Hume's remonstrances, it was ultimately fixed that the subject should not be resumed till Monday week, to allow due time for deliberation, and for ascertaining the opinion of all parties. The right honourable baronet stated that, so far as Government was concerned, he should then feel it to be his duty to proceed de die in diem. Several members then addressed the House, but, of course, their speeches are comparatively uninteresting in present circumstances. Mr. Liddell dissented toto coelo from the course which the right honourable baronet had thought fit to adopt. Captain Rous promised his cordial support to the measures which had that night been proposed. Mr. S. O'Brien was of opinion that before coming to a decision on so momentous a question, the country should be consulted. Colonel Sibthorpe read a letter, expressed in the most courteous language, which he had that morning received from the Council of the Anti-Corn-Law League, and intimated at the same time that the letter was private and confidential. The eccentric Colonel succeeded, as usual, in contributing to the amusement of the House. The other members who gave utterance to their sentiments, in the shape of questions and remarks, were—Lord March, Lord Ingestre, Mr. F. Scott, Lord G. Bentinck, Sir J. Tyrell, Mr. S. Herbert, Mr. P. Howard, Mr. Wodehouse, Mr. Wakley, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Aglionby, and others. In conclusion, Mr. Greene, the chairman of the committee, reported progress, and it was moved and agreed to that the House resolve again into the same committee on Monday, the 9th of February.

The other orders on the paper were then disposed of, and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock.

MONTEFIORE.—The following is a copy of a letter, addressed by Joseph Hume, M.P., to Provost Jamieson, of this place, in acknowledging the receipt of a memorial from Montefiore, for the repeal of the Corn Laws:

"Bryanston-square, January 3, 1846.
"MY DEAR SIR,—I am quite aware that Sir Robert Peel has been considered a slippery hand by his own supporters, because he has become an unwilling convert to the enlarged principles of Free Trade; and at the risk of offending his supporters, he has not only assumed those principles, but has carried them out to a greater extent than under all the existing influences I could have expected. As the Whigs refused until the eleventh hour to acknowledge those principles, as expounded in my report on Import Duties in 1840, you will excuse my placing some confidence in Sir Robert's doing as much as he can in the right direction. I am satisfied, when he frightened his colleagues, and made them all resign, that he then intended a large measure; but no person has hinted at its extent now; and we may be at a loss to guess even what he will propose on the 22nd. But of this I am satisfied, that he will not stultify himself with a milk and water measure. I recommend that 1000 of the entries in the British Tariff should be abolished out of 1150, and those articles admitted free. Sir Robert himself, in 1841, abused me in the House as an Utopian and visionary, to think of, or to recommend such a clean sweep of the tariff as I had done; but he was not one year in office before he had adopted every one of my principles, and, up to the end of the session, had actually struck out of our tariff 500 articles and entries. After that, all in my way, you must allow I have good grounds for hopes of something large. I send you his answer to your address; and every such paper will tend to strengthen his hand against the protectionists.

"JOSEPH HUME."

EFFECT OF THE CORN LAW REPEAL ON THE VALUE OF LAND.—With respect to the real value of land as a marketable commodity, indeed, a measure to determine the relative worth of all realised property, there can be no doubt that any legislative enactment which would remove the shackles from trade, and thus give an impetus to the reaction of wealth, must greatly benefit the landed proprietor. He would be a richer man, because he held what an increasing number of rich men would be anxious to purchase from him. In other words, he would find a better market for the commodity he had to sell, and would thus receive his full proportion of the developed resources of the country. How happens it that the possession of two or three thousand acres of land in England makes a man a potent squire, while in Russia or Germany a similar extent, though superior in its productive qualities, is altogether insufficient to meet the wants of their lowest standard of nobility? The answer is plain enough. England is a rich country,—made rich by her commerce, and the land and its owners participate to the full in the wealth which every wind of heaven is daily wafting to her shores. We have no fear, then, that a repeal of the Corn Laws will seriously affect the country gentlemen. Come what may, the great landowner may still be, as he is now, the centre of moral and political influence in his neighbourhood,—foremost among the aristocracy of the empire,—the friend, the example, the support of those who have harder fight to win their bread from earth's bosom than himself. Realising, to its full extent, the principle that "property has its duties as well as its rights," he will not shrink from giving his assent to a measure which the admitted exigency of the times demands, simply because that measure involves the bare possibility of pecuniary loss to himself. He will assist in developing that commercial greatness which has already benefited him so much, not doubting but that trade and agriculture, when left to themselves, will be found sharing in the same prosperity.—The Balance.

The Anti-Corn-Law League, that great, intelligent, and truly national confederacy—so much misunderstood by many, and therefore so much maligned—has at length triumphed. The discovery has at length been made in high quarters, that it is not merely a handful of "cotton lords," but the nation, which is up in arms against the food monopoly, and that it would be folly to resist any longer the demand for its abolition.—Macclesfield Chronicle.

AGRICULTURE.

FACTS AND FIGURES FOR FARMERS.

Farmers have long been told by the monopolist landowners that the object of the Corn Laws was to keep up the price of corn. The unlimited supply of grain with which this country was to be "inundated" from abroad, formed a standing topic with protectionist orators, from Lord Stanley downwards. But it seems now that this was all a mistake. Landlords think nothing of rents—not they. They have no intention of advancing the price of grain by means of the Corn Laws; they never had any such intent; they only meant to provide food on easy terms to the consumers, and to "protect the manufacturers of the country" against foreign competition. Thus, at the meeting of the "Central Agricultural Protection Society," at Willis's rooms, on Monday last, the Duke of Richmond said, "We never asked for protection to ourselves from any selfish motives;" and Lord Beaumont wished it to be "distinctly understood" that, "if the Corn Laws were intended, or if their operation had only been, to enhance the price of corn, and to diminish the supply of food, it was a most unhallowed cause in which they were engaged." It is true that these landed monopolists have only just discovered—or, at all events, disclosed—these disinterested intentions. Yet they may be real, for all that. Now, whether the cause in which Lord Beaumont and his co-monopolists are engaged be or be not an "unhallowed" one, we shall, for the present, leave the bread taxers to settle with the consumers, for whom so much tender, though latent, regard has been entertained. But, in the name of common sense, let us ask, why have the farmers been so earnestly called upon to stand by the Corn Laws, if those laws be not "intended to enhance the price of corn?" It may be unwise for farmers to love 60s. and upwards a quarter for their wheat; it may be that in relying upon high prices they are grasping at the shadow and losing the substance of profit; it may be—we believe it is—best for them to grow agricultural produce for a well-fed population; but farmers needed no "Central Protection Society" to tell them that. On the contrary, it is because farmers feared Free Trade in corn would "pull down" the price of corn, that they have been induced or seduced to support the monopolist landocracy.

Why was Sir Robert Peel so roundly abused by farmers in 1842, but because his Corn Law and Tariff of that year were supposed, rightly or wrongly, to have lowered the prices of grain and meat? In fact, if protection does not mean the enhancement of prices, then all the agitation, on paper, of the monopolist landowners, is much ado about nothing; or it has some other objects which cannot be conveniently avowed to the farmers.

Now, though the bread taxing landowners are trying to cover their own injustice by the plea that there are other classes equally unjust, and by pretending that they only desire to protect all domestic articles against foreign competition, the artifice is too shallow to deceive any one. The public know that the object of the Corn Law is to "enhance prices;" and the farmers know that it is only under the belief that such would be the "operation" of the law, that the yeomen of England have struggled to retain it.

It is certain that many farmers have lately become very indifferent, or adverse, to the continuance of the Corn Laws, because they have observed that when they do "enhance prices" the benefit goes to the landlord, and when they do not the loss falls on the tenant. This is contrived by calculating the rent according to the Act of Parliament price—that is, the price the Corn Laws affect to secure; and when prices are lower by making some eleemosynary and inadequate reduction of rent, to be put on again the moment prices reach the Corn Law level. The following instance of this is recorded in the Chelmsford Chronicle of last week, where it is said:

"We understand that at the rent audit of Lord Maynard, on Tuesday last, his lordship raised the rents of his tenantry 10 per cent., being the amount of a reduction made at a previous audit."

Here we have at once an illustration of the instantaneous appropriation to the landlord of the benefit of high prices, and of the "unselfish" character of the landowner's demand for protection. Let Farmers in every district contrast the sayings at protection meetings of the landowners they know, with their doings at home, and the patriotism of landlordism will become wonderfully like selfishness, and that of the meanest sort.

Whilst penning these lines, we have had brought before us a practical instance of the interest the "farmers' friends" have in high prices, and the way in which they have screwed up their rents by means of the competition, the unnatural competition, produced by the Corn Laws.

Doubtless our readers are aware that there is a gentleman of the name of Chetwynd, member for Newcastle-under-Lyne, who has figured at protection meetings in Staffordshire as a protectionist of the first water, and a flaming "farmer's friend." That gentleman is, we believe, the son of Sir George Chetwynd. On the estate of Sir George Chetwynd, there was, in the year 1805, a tenant farmer named Thomas Henney, holding a farm upon lease, at the yearly rent of 130*l*. The following is a verbatim copy of the receipt for his half-year's rent in that year:

"Received the 12th of January, 1805, of Mr. Thos. Henney, the sum of sixty-five pounds for half a year's rent due to Sir George Chetwynd, Baronet, at Old Michaelmas last.

Rent	£65	0	0
Deduct a year's Property tax	6	10	0
	£58	10	0

JOHN COLLINS."

In 1812, Thomas Henney's lease expired. Probably he had made some money, for prices had been high, far higher than either landlord or tenant anticipated at the commencement of the lease. Then came the competition screw, and Henney's rent was advanced from 130*l*. to 210*l*. per annum. And lest the landlord should not clutch all the advantage of rising prices, there was no renewal of the lease; but Henney went on as a yearly tenant. This is his receipt for rent in the following year:

"Received the 3d of July, 1813, of Mr. Thomas Henney, the sum of one hundred and five pounds, for half a year's rent due to Sir George Chetwynd, Baronet, at Lady Day last.

£105	0	0
10	10	0

Property tax.

£94	10	0
-----	----	---

Cash received. JOHN COLLINS."

As the landlord expected, prices did rise in 1813, and Thomas Henney experienced the advantage—to the landlord—of a yearly or "mutual confidence" holding; for by Michaelmas, 1813, we find him standing at the enhanced rate of 312*l*. a year.

Here is the evidence under the hand of the landlord's own agent:

"Received the 15th day of January, 1814, of Thomas Henney, the sum of one hundred and fifty-six pounds for half a year's rent, due to Sir George Chetwynd, Baronet, at Michaelmas last.

£156	0	0
10	10	0

One-half Property tax.

£145	10	0
------	----	---

JOHN COLLINS."

The reader will remark a slight but significant alteration in the terms of this last receipt, which marks the degradation of the tenant-farmer into a kind of political retainer of the landlord's, which was then just commencing. In the two former receipts the tenant was designated "Mr. Thomas Henney," now plain "Thomas Henney" was deemed the proper designation of the yearly tenant vassal. Shortly after this time the tenant died, and his son succeeded to his farm at the still further "enhanced" rent of 345*l*.

This is one of his receipts.

"Received this 7th day of December, 1825, from Mr. Thomas Henney, the sum of one hundred and seventy-two pounds ten shillings, being half a year's rent, due at Michaelmas last, to Sir George Chetwynd, Baronet.

£172	10	s.
------	----	----

"ROBERT HOARE, Jun."

This last advance was made upon the strength of the Corn Law of 1815, and the price of 80s. a quarter for wheat thereby promised.

The failure of such promise was fearfully felt by the tenant, who found the capital his father had accumulated under his lease rapidly undergoing absorption by the landlord, and with due humility he remonstrated with Sir George. Whereupon Sir

George said, "I must maintain my station in society: I have a large family, and must get the highest rents I can from my tenants." To this Henney replied, "Then, Sir George, to keep up your station, I am to be ruined." Whereupon Sir George rejoined, "If you don't like to continue your farm, your next neighbour will take it at the same rent." To this application of the screw the tenant could offer no resistance; and, having had his capital squeezed out of him by the landlord, gave up the farm to his next neighbour, and sought to obtain a livelihood as an eating-house keeper, in the new palace yard.

Let farmers read and mark this history, one far more true than any thing they will hear at "17, Bond Street," or at the "Protection Societies" of the provinces.

It forms, too, evidence of the "unselfish" character of the landowner's demand for artificially high prices. Is there a single landowner amongst those who assembled at the "Central Society's meeting" on Monday, whose acts would not furnish similar evidence?

Let those who know them at home answer.

A MONOPOLIST WITNESS.

A humorous and eccentric monopolist clergyman of Dorsetshire, Mr. Huxtable, thus bears testimony against monopoly. At the Sturminster Agricultural Association he said:

"I am more and more convinced, that of all mistakes that can be committed, that of growing hay is the greatest. (Loud laughter and applause.) Well, now hear me out. Pasture land is let in this country of a poor kind; I am not speaking of watering meadows, or of those rich meadows watered by Stour, and let at 2*l*. or 3*l*. an acre; but, speaking of the average of lands, I say that a greater robbery never was committed on a nation than that of keeping these lands in pasture. An acre will cut one and a half ton of hay; now what will three acres do? They will keep a cow summer and winter. I am prepared to say that two and a half acres keep a cow, but then the cows are kept in the straw yard for three months, and to produce the food for them during this time I allot the other half acre. Let it be broken up. First of all it is thoroughly drained, and then if you have Swedes, he must be a bungler who cannot grow 25 tons an acre; and what is the worth of Swedes an acre? Let that be reserved for the present, and be pleased now to allow me to suppose that they are worth 15s. a ton, exclusive of the dung. (MORE, MORE.) Now you have got 25 tons at 15s.; exclusive of this come the tops. If a cow gets hold of the tops the butter will taste, but the great quantity of phosphates they produce will tender milk abundant. You have got then the first year 25 tons of Swedes, the gross proceeds of which will be 18*l*. I presume that you eat off this; then you will produce out of that five or six tons of manure fully equal to manure that land. Then the next year you grow wheat. You will grow at least on that land nine sacks of wheat per acre; or you will grow 15 tons of green clover an acre, and in the next year nine quarters of oats. I pledge my word that you can grow these crops, because I have done it myself. Now look at the nation's benefit from this. You have grown nine sacks of wheat an acre, 25 tons of Swedes, and nine quarters of oats. And now I ask you, what has the cow been doing? She has made 200*lbs*. of butter, and 212*lbs*. of cheese; and the nation can feed from the arable land 240 more mouths than the cow can feed. I say it will not do to depend upon protection to keep foreign corn out. We ought to come before the country and say, 'We are doing all we can to feed you; but we cannot give you English corn at foreign prices, with English burthens.' (Loud cheers.) But are we doing that? Do we come with clean hands to ask for protection?"

And after giving a very graphic account of growing Swedes upon some very poor land, giving a return of 300 per cent, he said:

"You see I want you to be enthusiastic. If you will only be as enthusiastic as I am, you may laugh at these Free Traders."

Now, in sober seriousness, it may be said that there is in the land a latent power of increased production, far more than sufficient to enable the farmer to "laugh at Free Trade;" and the only "lion in the path" is the semi-feudal system on which landed property is managed.

THANKFULNESS FOR SMALL MERCIES.

What good easy people some of the agitating protectionists are! they seem to be extremely thankful for any exhibition of sympathy for their cause, though the manner of exhibiting it be ever so damaging to that cause. For instance, at a protection meeting at Malton, in Yorkshire:

"It was also resolved, that the unanimous thanks of the meeting be given to E. S. Cayley, Esq., M.P., for the two able letters he had lately addressed to Lord John Russell on the subject of the Corn Laws, and for the universal support he had given for the maintenance and protection of the interests of the agriculturists."

Well done, Maltonians! We wonder you did not by the same vote thank Mr. Cayley for his literary intemperance in falsifying Adam Smith. Again, at some other place a formal vote of thanks was passed to the Morning Post, for its strenuous advocacy of protection!!

Fancy that, Free Trade readers! Why, the League would not have had all its power of exposing the evils of the Corn Laws, but for the aid of the Morning Post in reducing protectionist theories to absurdity. If the League did employ any "secret service money," which it does not, the editor of the Post might have been fairly suspected of having largely participated.

REJECTING THE PLEDGE.

It is a sign of the times which farmers should note as significant, that protectionist members, in all parts of the country, make it a point of honour to refuse to "pledge" themselves to vote for the maintenance of the present Corn Laws. Mr. Sotheron, and his colleague in North Wilts, talk against all change in the law, yet they won't "pledge" themselves to oppose, that is to vote against such a change. Mr. Kemble, in East Surrey, won't "pledge," and monopolist members, who are adherents of the Government, in all directions echo the cuckoo cry, "we won't pledge." "Pledges are unconstitutional," which means, we suppose, that they are uncomfortable to pledge-breakers. Now, after the speeches these non-pledging members make, such refusals seem to us, as they do to the farmers, to be intimations of intention to shirk from implied pledges if the Minister wants a majority. Lord Worsley, at the Horncastle meeting, put this matter on the right ground:

"He (Lord Worsley) would repeat that he would give no pledges, although he contended that when a public man made a declaration he was bound to carry out his views as he described them, or if he saw grounds for altering them, then either to explain to his constituents his reasons, or resign his trust into their hands. Upon some subjects new circumstances might arise, and a doubt would exist as to the policy of refusing a change; but upon a matter like the Corn Laws there could be no doubt of the opinions entertained by the representative on the one hand, or the constituents on the other. His (Lord Worsley's) constituents could never be in ignorance of his opinions on these matters, nor could he be unmindful of theirs. If then he went into the House of Commons and voted for any alterations in the Corn Laws, even though he had given no positive pledge on the subject, he would not be acting the part of an honourable man. (Cheers.)"

FIGURES OF FANCY VERSUS FACTS.

Nothing can exceed the fervent vehemence with which the monopolists everywhere declare that there was no deficiency of crops last harvest, and that an average, and more than an average produce was obtained. Such are the figures of fancy wherewith the overgrown schoolboys of the squirearchy imagine they can gull the intelligent men of business of Great Britain. Hear however, what those who write for the information of real men say on the subject. The following is from the last Mark Lane Express:

"There has been a buoyancy about the trade in grain, indicative of a rise in prices; and, from present appearances, we certainly incline to the opinion that, in whichever way the Corn Law question may be settled, the settlement will be immediately followed by an active demand for bread stuffs. The late fall in prices of wheat was (as we have on former occasions remarked) caused wholly by political events, and not by any alteration in public opinion respecting the result of the harvest. The crop, though certainly not so bad as represented by those connected with the League for party purposes, must nevertheless be considered as decidedly below that of average years. That there really is a deficiency in the yield, is admitted on all hands; but so variously is it estimated, as to render it almost impossible to determine with any degree of accuracy to what extent. Coupled, however, with the falling off in the quantity of food, in consequence of the disease by which the produce of potatoes has been so greatly decreased, quite sufficient grounds are afforded to conclude that wheat cannot long remain at present rates."

REVIEW.

STUDIES OF ENGLISH LIFE—(Etudes de l'Angleterre.) By M. LEON FAUCHER. Paris: Guillemin; London: Dulau.

"To see ourselves as others see us" is not less advantageous to nations than individuals; the revelations of England contain full as much of novelty and of exciting interest for Englishmen as the revelations of Russia; for in this country, above all others, men are so absorbed in their individual pursuits, and so engrossed by their special occupations, that each knows almost as little of the social life in spheres or classes remote from his own as he does of Siberia or Kamschatka. During the last ten years, commissioners appointed to investigate the conditions of existence in the lower grades of the population, have brought to light grave evils and dangers which society had long neglected, but which had reached to a fearful intensity that menaced perilous consequences. But the information thus accumulated is entombed in Blue Books, and would have been almost unknown to the mass of readers had not D'Israeli collected some of the most striking characteristics, and interwoven them into the brilliant romance of Sybil. The sketches of M. Leon Faucher derive no aid from the graces of fiction; they are as minutely true to life as the pictures of Teniers; and, like them, not unfrequently exhibit revolting and painful portraiture. But as the physical anatomist must conquer the disgust of the dissecting room, so the moral anatomist, who searches into the causes of social disease, must not shrink from the investigation of its types, even under their worst aspect.

M. Leon Faucher is a decided Free Trader; he is in consequence an advocate for peace, and anxious to have the bonds of amity between England and France drawn closer together by mutual interest and mutual respect. Faithfulness of delineation has been his first object, and this he has generally attained. There are, however, peculiar phases of English polity and social life which have not a little perplexed him, as they have all other foreigners. The complicated details of our local administrations were not viewed with unprejudiced eyes by an observer trained to centralization; and the peculiarities of dissenting bodies appeared often trivial or repulsive to one who had come from a land where what is properly called sectarianism is utterly unknown. His investigation of our crowded cities and towns, London, Liverpool, Manchester, and Leeds, were pursued with the zeal of a philanthropist and the skill of a philosopher. His descriptions are as vivid as those of a novelist; and his reflections, even when a little erroneous, are characterised by good feeling and sound sense. We shall take a sketch of a part of London as little known to the inhabitants of the West End, and even of the City, as the interior of New Holland:

"In Whitechapel, were it not for the perpetual fog of this climate, one might imagine himself in some town of the south. The countenances you observe have no characteristics of the English type. The habits of life are those that you find in the street of Toledo at Naples, in the quarter of St. John at Marseilles, or in the Rue Mouffetard at Paris. Englishmen live secluded in their houses, which they deem the castles of private life; but the gypsy population of this district lives in the open street. Merry women sit at their thresholds, or work at their open windows, to have a better view of the crowd. Venders of eatables exhibit their cooking apparatus in the open air. The smell of vegetables and fish frying on the pan infects the lanes and alleys. Apple-women and old clothesmen stop the passengers. The cries of the various traffickers, the noise of conversation across the pavement or from window to window, the quarrels of children, the songs heard from the gin-palaces, make an aggregate of sounds, the southern gaiety of which bewilders the spectator to such a degree that he cannot believe himself within two steps of the Tower, and on the very verge of the City."

"To judge of this population when employed, it is necessary to visit 'Rag fair.' The custom existed of old, and the place was well known 150 years ago, for it is there that Daniel de Foe describes the arrest of Colonel Jack, one of his heroes, by the police. In fact, the scenes which pass there seem far removed from the civilisation of our age. The market is held in a space cribbed from heaps of rubbish, to which two narrow lanes give access. A covered shed occupies the centre, but the crowd besieging it is so great, that the greater number of bargains is effected in a flying camp. About 4 o'clock in the evening Rag-fair begins to be animated. Three or four thousand Jews cover the place, by turns buyers and sellers of the same objects. Without seeing them, it is impossible to form any notion of the serious air and pompous terms in which they puff their miserable merchandise. 'Here is an excellent coat, of superfine quality!' cries one, exhibiting a coat, worn at all its seams, and which has passed from master to servant, before falling into the hands of the old clothesman. 'A splendid bonnet, a beautiful gown,' says another, exhibiting a faded silk, which has already done service for three generations. Prices are obtained for these rags, everything finds a purchaser, and such merchandise is deemed worthy of being stored in the cellars of the neighbouring houses, which serve as magazines. Rag-fair has its alternatives of rise and fall, like those of the Stock Exchange. There as elsewhere, price depends on the proportion of supply to demand; the purveyors for the market arrive every moment, bending under their loads; the amount of disposable stock varies at every moment. Trickery is not much practised; the Jews who frequent the fair are too well acquainted with each other to attempt cheating."

The descriptions which M. Faucher has given of Liverpool and Manchester have been very copiously extracted into the English journals, and need not, therefore, be here repeated. We must, however, bestow some notice on his account of the agricultural classes of England, in which he has fallen into very serious mistakes. In opposition to Messrs. Baines and Hickson, M. Faucher earnestly contends that agricultural districts must be more moral than manufacturing districts. This is not a question to be decided by the mere statistics of criminal returns; there are two other elements to be taken into consideration—the amount of temptation, and the vigilance of police; and both these circumstances tend to swell the returns of criminals from towns and manufacturing districts. M. Faucher triumphantly states, that in the department of the Isere, there is only one arrest annually to every thirteen thousand of the population; but, before admitting this fact to be decisive, we should determine what are the temptations and opportunities in the locality. It would puzzle a confined thief to find any means of gratifying his propensities in the department. Petty thefts of fruit and vegetables, &c. are rarely prosecuted by agriculturists; they endure the loss rather than have the trouble or annoyance of law. A boxing match in the fields is rarely brought under magisterial cognizance; the drunken man in a hamlet has every chance of escaping the station-house; in fact, there are many rural depredations and acts of violence which are passed over by a kind of general consent; while acts of the same kind are never allowed to escape in a town population. Towns and manufacturing districts are subject to the perturbing influence of an immigrant population; the rejected of the country fly to the city to hide themselves in the crowd. An analysis of the criminal returns of Manchester would give abundant proof that the county of Lancashire has been made responsible for a vast amount of crime which is not properly its own.

Two chapters are devoted to the history of the Corn Laws and of the League formed for procuring their abolition. Having glanced at the history of the Corn Laws, he says:

"When we have studied with attention the arguments of the two parties in this debate, we remain convinced that if the landed proprietors wished seriously to devote time and capital to the amelioration of their estates, they would have no need of the precarious assistance of laws to preserve or augment their income. The nobleman best versed in agriculture, Lords Spencer, Ducie, Fitzwilliam, and Radnor, hold on this point the same language as Cobden, Ashworth, or Villiers. But the question presents a political element of which we must not lose sight, and which tends to complicate the solution. The landed proprietors wish to have high rents, but they are at least equally anxious to have their farmers so dependent on them as to find them willing instruments at the time of an election. Rich and skilful farmers would not suit them; for these, before investing large capitals in the cultivation of the soil, would demand leases as a security; but farmers who had thus placed themselves beyond the reach of any abuse of power would be found independent electors. . . . Farmers who consent to till the ground without a lease cannot expect to realise much profit; it is, therefore, necessary to offer them the illusions of a protective system. Thus the maintenance of the Corn Laws is not for the aristocracy so much a question of money as of political influence, and hence arises the difficulty of obtaining any concession."

We shall now extract the conclusion of this chapter, because it states the causes which render the doom of the Corn Laws inevitable; even if the harvest had proved favourable, and potatoes had escaped the murrain:

"The condemnation of the Corn Laws is written in every page of commercial legislation. The more they are discussed, the more apparent does the weakness of their supporters become. The mediating party which proposed a fixed duty as a compromise has disappeared; and the Government refuses to pledge itself to the maintenance of the last modification of protection which it accorded."

But since M. Faucher wrote, the advent of the repeal of the Corn Laws has been greatly accelerated by the conduct of the leading protectionists; their booby bluster has done more to disgust the thinking part of the nation with monopoly than could have been effected by the most eloquent denunciations of the Free Traders. No cause could stand the advocacy of the dukery; or, as it has been irreverently termed, "the donkery." M. Faucher could not have anticipated the lamentable farces enacted at agricultural meetings within the last few weeks. In his estimate of the strength of the English aristocracy, he has omitted to make a set-off for the negative elements of weakness which dukes and squires have taken such pains to develop. Dogberry was grieved that he could find no one "to write him down as an ass;" the Richmonds, and the Cleverlands, and the Norfolks have taken care that their asinine qualities should be faithfully chronicled. The country has not been slow in forming its judgment. The verdict pronounced out of doors must ere long be ratified by Parliament.

The great success of this work on the Continent is among the many gratifying proofs we daily receive of the progress of Free Trade opinion in Europe. It is everywhere felt that our struggle for commercial freedom in England involves the cause of progress in liberty and civilisation throughout the world.

BRADFORD.—As regards the borough election, all is safe. During the week, fifty names have been added to the requisition to Mr. Busfield and Colonel Thompson, making the number of good men and true attached to that document seven hundred and fifty! This is the guarantee of a signal triumph; but a triumph in which the vanquished will be equal gainers with the victors.—Bradford Observer.

REV. THOMAS SPENCER.—We notice that this gentleman has been lecturing in this city and in New England, on temperance and the Corn Laws. He is well and widely known in Great Britain as the active and devoted friend of all reform—Anti-Corn-Law, universal suffrage, reform of the Church, &c. How far he has ever identified himself there with the anti-slavery party, we cannot say, though we have always understood him to belong to it; but we cannot hear that he makes the slightest allusion to slavery in any of his addresses here, or manifests yet any wish to acquaint himself with the great anti-slavery movement in any of its forms. We trust that his hitherto honoured name will not come to be added to the list of those Englishmen whose anti-slavery zeal has been quenched by a voyage across the Atlantic—who have been flattered into silence by the conservative class among whom they chance at first to fall—or whose reformatory courage and faith have quailed in the deadlier struggle which marks our day and country, and our cause here most especially.—New York Anti-Slavery Standard.

Printed at the Whitefriars Printing-office, Bouvier-street, in the precincts of Whitefriars, in the City of London, by JOHN GADSBY, printer, of Number 7, Ridgmount-place, Hampstead-road, in the County of Middlesex, and also of Number 4, Farringdon-place, Chesham-hill-road, in the parish of St. Dunstons, in the County of Lancaster, and published at Number 67, Fleet-street, in the parish of St. Dunstons-in-the-West, in the City of London, by ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, of Number 67, Fleet-street aforesaid.—Saturday, January 31, 1846.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 124.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1846.

[3d.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

PETITION! PETITION! PETITION!

At a numerously attended meeting of the Council of the League, held on Thursday, the 29th ult., Mr. Wilson in the chair, the proposed measures of Sir Robert Peel were discussed at some length. Congratulations were exchanged at the progress which the great question has made in the minds of the most distinguished statesmen of all parties. With respect to the measure itself, several parts of it elicited expressions of satisfaction; but the feeling of regret at the re-enactment of the sliding scale was universal. The meeting was addressed, among others, by Messrs. R. H. Greg, Alderman Ker-shaw, J. B. Smith, A. Prentice, J. Heywood, H. Rawson, J. Whitaker, W. Bickham, T. Woolley, &c. All were of opinion that the League and its friends should stand firm to the principle of immediate and total repeal; and the following resolution, recommending universal petitioning, was unanimously passed:

"Resolved,—That the announcement of a new Corn Law renders it desirable that the friends of Free Trade throughout the kingdom should originate petitions for the total and immediate abolition of all laws imposing duties on foreign corn and provisions."

We have received numerous applications from different parts of the country requesting to know to what members petitions to Parliament should be forwarded for presentation. As it is impossible to reply specially to each particular case, we beg to announce that all petitions emanating from boroughs should be forwarded to the members thereof, with a note, requesting them to support the prayer of the petition. In all other cases, they may be sent per post, open at the ends, and marked "Petition," to any well-known Free Trade member of the House of Commons. The only address necessary in such cases will be the name of the member, House of Commons, London.

WHAT WILL THE LEAGUE DO IN PARLIAMENT?

As we believe our protectionist friends are rather curious on this interesting question, and are in some danger of answering it very mistakenly, it seems but fair to remove any doubts and errors that may prevail. What will the League do? We reply, the League—that is, those members of the League who are also members of the House of Commons—will do nothing that can, directly or indirectly, strengthen the hands of the monopolists—nothing that can impede or delay the passing of any legislative measure calculated to give greater freedom to commerce, and to increase the remunera-tative employment and exchangeable value of labour. The Leaguers will take excellent care, so far as they are concerned, that the country shall be put in possession, on the earliest possible day, of at least that very large amount of commercial freedom which is comprised within the scope of Sir Robert Peel's plan of commercial reform.

We beg the protectionists particularly to understand this. The error as to the views and intentions of the League, which, we know, exists to some extent in protectionist quarters, and which is, perhaps, more widely diffused than we are aware of, may as well be at once corrected. It may save these gentlemen a good deal of trouble, and some disappointment, if they clearly comprehend that, however strongly the Free Traders object to certain portions of the Ministerial scheme, the objection will not take any form that can be made available for the uses of landlordism. No opening will be given for the concurrence of monopolists and Free Traders in a joint anti-Ministerial vote. There will be no playing the enemy's game; no cross of parties; no unnatural or ill-assorted alliance of antagonist extremes. The League will offer no factious or fanatical opposition to Sir Robert Peel's measure—or to any other measure for liberating commerce from even a portion of its fetters, and bringing the trade in food nearer to the laws of nature and the principles of common sense.

At the proper time, Mr. Villiers will, we doubt not, press for the sense of the House on the question of the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Law,—and no effort will be spared to reinforce the old, familiar motion, not only with the old, familiar arguments, but with those special considerations suggested by the present state of the Free Trade question, and the obvious interests of the class now more particularly concerned in a total and immediate settlement. Everything will be done that can be done to convince Sir Robert Peel—or rather (for we are sure Sir Robt. Peel is sufficiently convinced already) to convince the landlords themselves—that the proffered concession to agricultural alarms, prejudices, or supposed convenience, is absolutely needless—and not merely needless, but injurious and deeply dangerous to all agricultural interests. Should these efforts be successful in carrying conviction to the landlord mind, so as to elicit declarations of landlord opinion that will make it easy to Sir Robert Peel to give full effect to his and our principles, we shall most heartily rejoice, as we are confident Sir Robert Peel will rejoice too. But, again we say, nothing will be done that can for a moment put in hazard the vast substantial benefits which the Ministerial proposal offers to the country. The motion for total and immediate repeal will be so shaped, as to place it utterly out of the power of any man to vote in the same division with its supporters who does not really desire total and immediate repeal. Sir Robert Peel's bill, or a better bill, with Sir Robert Peel's approval (of which we see no reason whatever for despairing), must and shall become law, with the least possible loss of time.

There will be no "compromise." The League cannot compromise the question, even if it would. The League has parted with its free agency in this matter—or rather, it never had any. "No compromise" is the very essence of the League's organisation, the fundamental principle of its constitution, the source and condition of its power. The question of compromise—whatever be the shape which it may practically assume—was finally disposed of, so far as the League is concerned, seven years and some months ago. The Parliamentary Leaguers will do with corn, in 1846, exactly that which they did with sugar, in 1841. They will move and divide the House, in assertion of their own sound and broad principles; and, should they fail of obtaining a majority, they will then give their united support, in all subsequent divisions, to any measure which proximately realises their principles. Sir Robert Peel's measure is not the League's measure. If the League could throw it out, and replace it with their own, they unquestionably would. But so much of Free Trade as there is in Sir Robert Peel's measure, the League will support, with heart and soul, against a monopolist opposition.

We trust, meanwhile, that our friends out of doors will firmly and vigorously maintain, without waver, ing or abatement, the great and plain principle for which we have all struggled through so many painful toilsome years, and our adherence to which, in all its integrity and simplicity, has placed our question in its present strong and hopeful position. Free Traders have nothing to do with agitating or petitioning for anything less than Free Trade—total, immediate, and unconditional. There must be no relaxation of effort and watchfulness—no distraction of aim—no division of strength. And there need be no fear of "embarrassing Sir Robert Peel" by any possible amount or number of "total and immediate" petitions or petitioners. Sir Robert Peel will not be embarrassed, but relieved of an embarrassment, by such a demonstration of earnest national opinion as shall enable him to give full and instant effect to his own convictions of justice and sound policy. The matter cannot be put too strongly. The more firmly and decidedly opinion expresses itself, both in and out of Parliament, in favour of the immediate and unqualified legislative adoption of Free Trade principles to their fullest extent, the greater will be the probability that the Ministerial measure may eventually pass in a shape thoroughly acceptable to the country—the stronger will the Premier feel himself against the landlord opposition—the more hopelessly chimerical will be the notion of any effective protectionist resistance, even in the protectionists' own House of Parliament—and the more palpably certain will it become, that an "appeal to the people," should their lordships be sufficiently chivalrous to bring it to this, would end in the instant, total, root-and-branch destruction of monopoly. We emphatically repeat our last week's counsel—PETITION, PETITION, PETITION! Petition, not in opposition to the Government, but in opposition to the vicious principle and power with which the Government is now engaged in mortal conflict. Petition, not that Sir Robert Peel's bill may not pass, but that it may pass in a shape more completely satisfactory to the country—more exactly consistent with Sir Robert Peel's own views and principles—and more conducive to the real and permanent welfare of that class which is the most deeply interested in the abandonment of its objectionable provisions.

A LORD CHIEF JUSTICE'S VIEW OF THE COUNTY QUALIFICATION MOVEMENT.

"To seek to acquire and secure a vote is not against the law—it is not against morality—it is not against sound public policy—it is neither a malum in se nor a malum prohibitum. On the contrary, it is held by many high authorities, that it is highly beneficial to the constitution that there should be an extension of the elective franchise; and certainly the avowed and real object of the reform act was to increase, as a thing expedient, the number of electors throughout the country."—LORD CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.

The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of ALEXANDER versus NEWMAN, which we briefly adverted to last week, and of which our readers will find a full report in another column, is a most important event in the history, not only of the League movement, but of Englishmen's constitutional liberties. It explicitly and once for all ratifies, in the amplest terms, the legality of all bona fide purchases of freehold property, whether made jointly or individually, although the express and avowed object of the purchase be the acquisition of the franchise incident to that description of property. Only let the pecuniary consideration be bona fide and real, and the law is satisfied. Nay, more—the law is pleased. The law not merely confirms the transaction as legal, but gives it a passing word of eulogy as laudable and meritorious, useful, moral, and constitutional. Law and constitution, morality and public policy,—all are here agreed—all ratify the acts, and applaud the purposes of the League. The “extension of the elective franchise,” in the mode adopted by the League, is both indisputably legal, and “a thing expedient,” “HIGHLY BENEFICIAL TO THE CONSTITUTION.”

We suppose we now really have heard the last of “the unconstitutional machinations of the League.” Sir Nicholas Tindal is, we have always understood, deemed by the profession to be every way as sound and “constitutional” a lawyer as Henry, Lord Brougham; and we dare say the learned (by courtesy) ex-Chancellor himself will not be over-anxious to recall public attention to his recent extrajudicial and very injudicious escapade. The remarkably ingenious distinction between “legal” and “constitutional,” will, we think we may venture to predict, not be again presented for public ridicule. Our friends in all parts of the country may now work away quite freely, and “Qualify qualify, qualify,” to their hearts’ content. Not a tongue will dare to wag against him, from ex-Chancellor Brougham’s down to that of the humblest protectionist attorney in the registration courts. The highest registration tribunal in the empire has formally—and more than formally—sanctioned and legitimated the League’s reading of the law and constitution.

As the protectionists talk, or did talk a little while ago—we dare say, however, they have forgotten it—of “fighting the League with its own weapons,” we may take leave to recommend them very carefully to study the whole of the Lord Chief Justice’s judgment in this case of ALEXANDER versus NEWMAN, that they may know precisely what the League’s weapons are, and receive a caution—which, it may be feared, they much need—against the use of another description of weapons, with which, we apprehend, some of them are rather more familiar. The same high authority, they will please to observe, which affirms the legality, constitutionality, expediency, policy, and morality of the League’s mode of extending the elective franchise, is equally clear and decided in condemning certain other modes of extending the elective franchise. As the judicial disputation on electoral law is not very tempting reading for our protectionist friends, and they may possibly be inclined to skim, we may do well to call their especial attention to a few of the more choice and significant dicta. There must be “no fraud or covin,” says the Lord Chief Justice. “The law hates covin.” The law sets its face very strongly against “fraudulent, and fictitious, and colourable conveyances—things that are nothing more than matters of form without substance—things in which the only real matters are the parchment and seal.” The law positively “abhors those conveyances professing one thing, but made with a secret intention and design to carry out another.” It is only a bona fide interest in the soil, with an actual pecuniary consideration, passing from vendee to vendor, to which the law and constitution annex the franchise. We trust that when (if ever) the monopolists really begin “fighting the League with its own weapons” they will particularly bear this in mind. Should they be so unfortunate as to forget it, they will find themselves most disagreeably reminded that “THE LAW HATES COVIN.”

We cannot leave this subject without expressing the lively and earnest satisfaction with which we shall ever review that portion of our labours which has had for its immediate object the extension of the suffrage among the trading and industrious classes. We have no desire to trespass, in these columns, on what, by the fundamental constitution of the League, its organ is bound to respect as neutral ground; but we are sure that we may, without jarring on the political feelings of a single Leaguer, advert with heartfelt pleasure to the circumstance, that the struggle for one popular right has incidentally strengthened the basis of all the rest—revived from practical desuetude the oldest, simplest, and most easily accessible of all the constitutional franchises of Englishmen—and laid the foundations, wide and deep, on which the people may hereafter erect the superstructure of just and good Government. The League will one day pass away, and be dissolved into its original elements; but this precious fruit of its existence and its labours will remain—a renovation of forgotten popular rights and powers—a new reading of old electoral laws—constitutional franchises made easy to the humblest capacity—enlarged, purified, and emancipated constituencies.

IRELAND AND THE CORN LAWS.

No part of the empire has suffered more than Ireland from the operation of the Corn Laws. They have enabled the landlords of that country to grind their tenants to the dust, and to reduce the food of the agricultural population to the lowest point at which existence can be maintained. But for these laws, Ireland could not so often have exhibited to the world the melancholy spectacle of a country exporting provisions, when its own population was perishing from famine. An artificial stimulus was given to production, but the benefit of it never came to the producers, for the wheat grown, the cattle fattened, and the pigs reared, were exported to be sold in the English markets to pay the rents of proprietors, of whom a large proportion were absentees. The peasant was allowed to rejoice, or to pine, on potatoes; the corn which he raised entered not into his home consumption. There was a forced export of that which was most wanted in the place where it grew, and there was a forced production which prevented any attempt at agricultural improvement. The advantages of a country, under any commercial system, must be measured by its imports and not by its exports; just as the wealth of a tradesman is determined, not by the amount of goods sold, but by the amount of money received. It is idle to tell us of the number of bushels of corn, or head of cattle, which were sent from Ireland to English markets; the real question is, what did the Irish producers get back in return? Let the answer be sought in the tenant’s farm and in the labourer’s shed. Let us look for it in the clothing, food, and dwellings, of the corn and cattle producers of the sister kingdom. This is the true test of the advantages that the Irish have derived from the Corn Laws; and what does it exhibit—rags, starvation, and misery.

The price of protected corn in the English market stimulated the production of corn on the Irish soil. What then? We want to know how it remunerated the producers? It raised rents, it facilitated mortgages, it enabled proprietors to employ agents instead of personally superintending their estates, it encouraged absenteeism, it offered a premium on bad management; but it ruined the farmer and the labourer. An artificial system affords opportunities for unfairness and oppression in contracts which could not be obtained under a natural system. The prædial disturbances in Ireland would long ago have righted themselves had not the Corn Laws denaturalised the markets, and prevented home consumption from becoming the measure of domestic prices.

There are some Irishmen who call themselves patriots, and yet advocate the maintenance of the Corn Laws: it is all but possible to credit their sincerity. They demand that exportation of provisions from Ireland should be artificially stimulated, at a time when they declare that Irishmen are starving for want of provisions. With the sad proof before them that potatoes are the most uncertain of crops on which a population can depend for food, they insist that corn should be sent out of the country, and that potatoes alone should be retained for home consumption. Ever prating about the evils of absenteeism, they require that the most stringent means should be adopted to ensure the payment of absentee rents; ever declaiming against the abuse of the landlord power, they resist the emancipation of industry from the trammels with which it is fettered by landlord-made law.

We only do justice to Mr. O’Connell when we gladly declare that he is not to be ranked in the class of these pseudonymous patriots. In the present crisis of the question, he has come over to plead the cause of the Irish producers, and to demand that the profits of their toil should no longer be intercepted by legislative artifice. There are people who reason as if industry were its own reward, and argue that labour should be sought simply for its own sake. We care not to refute such palpable nonsense. Industry must be rewarded from its results; labour must be paid from its productions. How are the Irish labourers rewarded and paid? This is the question which Mr. W. Smith O’Brien is bound to answer satisfactorily before he can reconcile his loud professions of patriotism with his silent support of the Corn Laws. It is in different to the issue to tell us how many quarters of corn are exported annually from Limerick, unless accompanied by an account of the proportion of purchase money of that corn which finds its way back to remunerate the producers. Do the Irish peasants profit by the Irish exports? Just about as much as the bees smothered in winter profit by the honey that has been stored in the hives—not so much as the slaves in Brazil profit by the diamonds which they raise from the mud of the streams. Never were the natives of the Moluccas so miserable as when the greatest quantities of spice were exported from those islands, for the profits went to the few proprietors of plantations, and their factors or middlemen, while the actual collectors of the spice received the most miserable pittance, scarcely adequate for the mere support of life. Such is now the condition of the Irish peasant, and such it is the anxiety of Mr. W. S. O’Brien that the condition of the Irish peasant should continue. We, on the contrary, are anxious that the Irish producer should benefit by his produce, that the Irish farmer should retain a fair share of his crop, and that the Irish labourer should be adequately remunerated for his toil. We know that this cannot be done when labour is artificially fostered, and import artificially prevented; between both lies a fraudulent balance, a part of which is shared as spoil by the protectionists, and for the sake of this part they are not unwilling that the rest should be abstracted from the farmers and the farm labourers of Ireland.

PROTECTION THE BANE OF MANUFACTURES.

We are not surprised that the members of the Trades’ Union in Old Bond-street should fraternise with the members of the Trades’ Unions in Spitalfields; both are combinations, formed to secure unjust profits at the expense of the rest of the community, and both have wrought immense damage to the classes which they affect to protect. The unionists of Spitalfields, by their combinations to fix a high tariff of wages, have driven a large portion of the silk trade from their locality to the northern districts, and have rendered the Spitalfields weavers one of the most distressed classes in the metropolis; the competition by which they are crushed is not with Lyons and Paris, but with Manchester and Macclesfield; their meeting on Wednesday night was directed against manufacturers at home, rather than producers abroad, and the speeches for the most part were levelled against capitalists.

The protectionists of Old Bond-street have entered into a combination to raise the price of food; the system of protection which they have established has proved as injurious to the farmers as the silk protection to the Spitalfields weavers; but they look to the rents which delusive pretences enable them to extort from agriculturists, as the leaders of trade-unions do to the subscriptions which they raise from their deluded dupes.

England now exports silk goods; but no export took place previous to the reduction of protection effected by Mr. Huskisson. There has been a large increase in the production of British silks, and more steady employment for the operatives engaged in the trade since their protection has been abated.

The worst distress in Spitalfields was in the year 1816, when protection was at its highest. There is distress indeed now in Spitalfields; but it is caused by the perseverance of the operatives in an artificial system, which places them at a sad disadvantage in competing with the productions of the North of England. It is one of the illustrations of Colonel Thompson's aphorism, that "all protection means robbing somebody else." The real complaint is not against the competition of foreigners, but of their own countrymen.

Have the Spitalfield weavers flourished under the system of protection? The records of distress in the metropolis abundantly prove that they have not. The very petition adopted by these dupes of the protectionists on Wednesday night declares that their wages are decreasing, and the rental of their miserable hovels increasing.

We have so often exposed the miserable absurdity of connecting cheap bread with low wages, that we fear to weary the patience of our readers by returning to the subject. But we should like to ask some of the Spitalfield orators whether the amount of silk goods consumed in years of abundance does not vastly exceed the amount consumed in years of scarcity? The reason is obvious; the more that families have to spend in the purchase of necessary food, the less they will have to spare in the purchase of necessary clothing. Neither cheap food nor dear food arms master-manufacturers with the powers of oppression, nor with any powers whatever; the relations between the employers and employed are determined by the proportions between demand and supply in the labour market. "When two masters are looking for one man wages will be high,—when two men are looking for one master wages will be low." The only way in which operatives can obtain an increase of wages is by the extension of trade and the consequent increase of a demand for labour. In protected trades there is generally found a hopeless and perverse system of endeavouring to maintain a high rate of wages by limiting the supply of labour and dictating to the manufacturers the conditions of employment.

If the proposed reductions of the tariff were likely to be injurious to the silk trade generally, we should find the manufacturers foremost in resisting the change; they have most capital vested in the trade, and they have, therefore, the deepest interest in its conservation. There is something suspicious in a demand for protection coming exclusively from those who have the least staked on the issue. But without dwelling on the circumstances of suspicion which attach to the meeting, we think that a very little reflection will convince the weavers themselves that the protection on silk has been the bane of their industrial pursuits. They have not prospered under the system; they have not kept up the rate of wages to which they laid claim; their trade is uncertain, fluctuating, and precarious, and they would not be better if a yard of foreign silk never came into the English market.

It is impossible to protect a trade. If foreign competition be prohibited, domestic competition is invited. If the manufacturers realise high profits, they will soon find themselves surrounded by rivals in a land where means of investment are so eagerly sought for redundant capital, as in England. If weavers obtain unnaturally high wages for a brief period, they run the risk of having them brought unnaturally low by the number of new hands enticed into the weaving trade. They cannot prevent this result by sticks, strikes, and combinations.

There is no law, and there could be no law, to confine the silk trade to any particular locality. If combinations intercept the fair gains of the capitalist on the banks of the Thames, there is nothing to prevent him forming an establishment on the banks of the Mersey or the Shannon. This is the precise error into which the Spitalfield protectionists have fallen; to prevent foreign competition, which they have no reason to dread, they are trying to encourage domestic competition which they are utterly unable to resist.

THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

The Council have, we believe, determined upon advertising upon a somewhat extensive scale the promised subscriptions to the League Fund, and to continue the same at intervals, in order to show the progress of the fund towards completion. To do this effectually, they seek the assistance of the local committees and treasurers, who have been requested to send a list of all the subscribers up to the present period, and to continue the same from time to time till all have appeared.

These lists, it may be well to state, are to contain only the gross amounts promised, and have no reference whatever to the instalments, which should be forwarded separately.

A few additions to the list of treasurers have been made since last we published it, which we subjoin:

Andover—James Baker, Esq., Prospect House.
 Ashton-under-Lyne—Thomas Mason, Esq.
 Aylesbury—J. P. R. Payne, Esq.
 Alnwick—Thos. Duncan, Esq.
 Ayr—J. Kinross, Esq.
 Annan—Alex. Dounie, Esq.
 Amersham—E. West, Esq.
 Beamister—Mr. Jos. Tite, Clenham Mill.
 Bath—Admiral Gordon, R.N., Nelson-place, Norfolk-cre-cent.
 Barnsley—J. S. Parkinson, Esq., Linen manufacturer.
 Belper—Mr. J. W. Hancock.
 Bromsgrove—W. A. Greening, Esq.
 Bridgewater—William Browne, Esq.
 Burton-on-Trent—J. N. Hanson, Esq.
 Bristol—George Thomas, Esq., Great George-street, street.
 Burnley—Geo. Holgate, Esq., jun.
 Bridport—J. P. Stephens, Esq.
 Barnard Castle—Mr. Wm. Raine, Horse Market.
 Brighton—Isaac Gray Bass, Esq.
 Bury—James Kay, Esq., woollen manufacturer.
 Boston—Mr. Robert Stevenson.
 Cleckheaton—Geo. Anderton, Esq.
 Cambridge—Chas. Newby, Esq., 55, Regent-street.
 Crediton, Devon—Edward Davy, Esq.
 Crayford, Kent—Henry Gould, Esq.
 Carlisle—J. Forster, Esq., Caldewgate.
 Colne—Mr. T. T. England.
 Chorley—Mr. James Wallwork.
 Carmarthen—Henry Norton, Esq.
 Chapel-en-le-Frith—J. Carrington, Esq.
 Congleton—J. Broadhurst, Esq.
 Carnarvon—William Turner, Esq., jun.
 Devonport—Samuel Oram, Esq., Market-street.
 Dundee—Edward Baxter, Esq.
 Doncaster—Mr. Robert Milner.
 Dunbar—James Wilson, Esq., Belhaven.
 Dartmouth—Noah Clift, Esq.
 Darlaston—Charles Green, Esq.
 Dunfermline—Mr. R. Robertson, Draper.
 Edinburgh—Messrs. Arch. Thomson and Co., 265, High-street.
 Exeter—Mr. Samuel Maunder.
 Eynsford, Kent—Mr. H. Rogers.
 Falkirk—John Smith, Esq., Writer.
 Forfar—Mr. Wm. Sturrock.
 Gateshead—Geo. Crawshaw, Esq.
 Garstang—Dr. Bell, Chapel-street.
 Glossop—John Kershaw, Esq.
 Gloucester—Samuel Bowly, Esq.
 Horsham—James Agate, Esq., North Parade.
 Halifax—Mr. Thomas Denton, Old Market.
 Hinkley—Mr. Thos. Payne.
 Holywell—Thos. Mather, Esq., Glyn Abbot.
 Hastings—Mr. Thos. Ross, Jun.
 Hazel Grove—Mr. T. Wharmby.
 Huddersfield—Foster Shaw, Esq.
 Hawick, N.B.—Mr. George Easton.
 Idle, near Bradford, Yorkshire—Mr. Wm. Russell.
 Inverness—Donald Frazer, Esq., jun.
 Jedburgh—Geo. Hilson, Esq., Manufacturer.
 Kendal—Geo. Charnley, Esq.
 Kelso—Mr. Alexander Dodds, Grocer.
 Knaresborough—Mr. Thos. Addyman, High-street.
 Keighley—J. Craven, Esq., worsted spinner.
 Kirkaldy—Mr. Robt. Bryson.
 Knutsford—Henry Long, Esq.
 London—A. W. Faulton, Esq., at the offices of the League 67, Fleet street.
 Luton—James Waller, Esq., merchant.
 Leek—Thos. Birch, Esq.
 Lancaster—George Jackson, Esq.
 Leicester—J. D. Harris, Esq.
 Leighton Buzzard—Thomas Price, Esq., Newtown.
 Leominster—Mr. J. V. Chilcott.
 Landport, &c.—Mr. Thos. Ross.
 Lichfield—Dr. Rowley, M.D.
 Liverpool—Jas. Mullineux, Esq., John Taylor Crook, Esq.
 Leeds—Samuel Birchall, Esq., woolstapler.
 Maesteg, near Bridgend, Glamorganshire—Mr. Jos. Crayne.
 Manchester—Mr. James Jones, at the offices of the League, 5, Newall's-buildings, Market-street.
 Maidenhead—Mr. Thomas Woodcock, draper.
 Maidstone—Richard Nemes, Esq., 109, Week street.
 Maldon—G. W. Digby, Esq.
 Middleton, near Manchester—Mr. Daniel Burton.
 Mottram—Mr. Saml. Oldham.
 Newcastle-upon-Tyne—George Crawshaw, Esq., and Mr. Daniel Liddell, Carlisle-street.
 Nantwich—Mr. Philip Barker.
 Newcastle-under-Lyne—Mr. Elias Shaw.
 New Mills—John Yates, Esq.
 Oldham—John Platt, Esq., Hartford Ironworks.
 Ossett, near Wakefield—Mr. Frank Fearnside.
 Potteries, The—Francis Wedgwood, Esq.
 Poole—G. R. Penney, Esq.
 Pontefract—Mr. W. Kidd, news agent.
 Pateley Bridge—Mr. R. Harker.
 Plymouth—Jno. Symons, Esq., Kinterburg-st.
 Reigate—Mr. Thomas Dann.
 Ramsgate—Mr. Henry Scott, 57, Queen-street.

Salisbury—Jno. Lambert, Esq.
 Sevenoaks, Kent—John Clark, Esq.
 St. Columb—Mr. W. Brown, 3, Fair-street.
 Scarborough—Isaac Stickney, Esq.
 Sheffield—William Hargreaves, Esq., Merchant.
 Skipton—J. B. Dewhurst, Esq.
 Southport—Richard Johnson, Esq.
 Stockport—Mr. J. Heginbotham, Millgate.
 Sirhowy, Monmouthshire—Rev. Richard Jones.
 South Shields—Mr. James Bell.
 Stourbridge—Mr. E. Baylie.
 Strood—Mr. John S. Cobb.
 Swaffham and West Norfolk—Arthur Morse, Esq., Swaffham.
 Swansea—Mr. Joseph Rutter.
 Stroud—Mr. T. Parsons.
 Stirling, Robert Smith, Esq.
 Sunderland—Mr. Edward C. Robson, Frederic-street, Bishopwearmouth.
 Shepton Mallett—W. Richardson, Esq., Woodbourne Cottage.
 Staleybridge—Henry Bayley, Esq.
 Sudbury—Colonel Addison.
 St. Austell—The Rev. Jas. Cope.
 Todmorden—W. Haworth, Esq., North View.
 Tewkesbury—Mr. Benjamin Harris.
 Thetford—Mr. Henry Brown.
 Warminster—Mr. H. Bastings.
 Wednesbury—Benjamin Round, Esq.
 Wareham—J. Pike, Esq., Merchant.
 Westbury—N. Overbury, Esq.
 Wigan—Thomas Taylor, Esq., Spinner, and Mr. Thomas Wall, Bookseller.
 Wirsworth—Mr. B. Street, White Lion Inn.
 Wakefield—Charles Morton, Esq., Whitwood Colliery.
 Whitechurch—Mr. Richard Thomas.
 Weymouth—Mr. Charles Pope.
 Westbromwich—J. Spittle, Esq.
 Wolverhampton—Henry Walker, Esq.
 York—Thomas Swales, Esq., Lawrence-street.
 Yarmouth—Mr. Jno. Fish, Denes.

[The following address has been sent to the Chairman of the League by the Economic Society of Paris, a body which includes many of the leading philosophers and philanthropists of France. We may well be proud of the sympathy and approbation of such a body, and we may also form well grounded hopes that its labours will precipitate the downfall of Continental monopolies.]

THE ECONOMICAL SOCIETY OF PARIS TO THE PRESIDENT AND ORATORS OF THE ENGLISH LEAGUE FOR THE GENERAL FREEDOM OF TRADE.

GENTLEMEN,—The Economic Society, which shares the truly social sentiments by which your League has shown itself to be animated, which has several times manifested a lively and legitimate interest in your labours, and which watches with eager and ardent attention all the phases of the great struggle in which you have engaged, deems it right to address to you directly, through the medium of its President and principal leaders, its thanks, its congratulations, and its well-grounded encouragements.

Our society, gentlemen, believes that it forms a just appreciation of the end proposed by the League,—the means it employs to obtain its objects,—and the results that may reasonably be expected from success when it regards that end, those means, and those results, as equally worthy of the warmest approbation.

There is not in your agitation, as you have often explained, the struggle of one envious and avaricious branch of industry against another branch of industry. You began by abandoning for yourselves all participation in the iniquitous system of that monopoly, the abolition of which you sought. You directed your attack against the protection accorded to the landed interest, because the chief strength lies there, it being the bond which unites and conserves all other monopolies; and because you hope, by destroying the key-stone of the system, that the rest of the edifice will crumble to ruin of its own accord. You desire perfect freedom of trade; you begin by offering it to all, and demanding it from none. You propose to set the example. You do so, doubtless, with the hope that you will be imitated, but without demanding or waiting for reciprocity. May God inspire and aid you in your enterprise; may His providence guide you to a prosperous termination! You must in a fast-approaching future obtain the gratitude both of your fellow-citizens and of the civilised world. You will have accomplished what nothing else has been able to effect, free commercial relations between all the nations of the earth; and the mutual interests thus created will annihilate the last vestiges of those international jealousies and animosities which religion and philosophy have hitherto failed to destroy.

The measures you have adopted for obtaining this object appear to us not less worthy of approbation than the object itself. You have adopted the course that should always be adopted in effecting great changes when it is desirable that they should be permanent. You have abstained from all violence of passion, and from all puerile impatience. You have won your way by fair discussion, and have advanced in proportion to the progress that your arguments have made in the public mind. In asking your Government to realise the great reform that you contemplate, you have not pressed it to grant its indispensable concurrence until you had secured for it the support of public opinion, which is always the stronger in proportion to the care bestowed upon instruction, and the discretion with which conviction is ripened. Such a course assuredly holds out an illustrious example, calculated to ensure a happy futurity, and to which it seems to us very difficult to refuse homage.

SIR R. PEELE'S COMMERCIAL SCHEME.—As was expected, there was an intense desire to know Sir R. Peel's new commercial scheme; the measure is not looked upon with so much favour now as it was during the first day.—Bolton Free Press.

Finally, gentlemen, we have a deep sense of the results which a course of conduct so firm and so prudent must render inevitable. We believe with you, that in proportion as the principles of freedom enter more deeply into the relations of foreign commerce, it will produce among nations a division of labour more and more intelligent, and more Normal—that is to say, more and more in accordance with the special conditions of each; that capital will be distributed by its natural laws; that production will be more fruitful because it will be better organised; that increased production will lead to increased consumption; that the distribution of the products of industry will be more equitable; and the peace of the world infinitely better secured.

We are anxious to communicate to you, gentlemen, the lively sympathy which the operations of the League have begun to produce in France, and our society cannot longer delay in transmitting to you, with the warmest expression of its sentiments towards you, its immovable adhesion to the economic doctrines which you continue to diffuse with a perseverance so rare, an activity so astonishing, and a generosity so well calculated to excite the gratitude of every other nation.

We entreat you, gentlemen, to accept the homage of our sentiments, and the assurance of our high and affectionate consideration.

Signed, on behalf of the Society,
CHARLES DUNOYER, Member of the Institute, and Acting President;
HORACE SAY,
JOSEPH GARNIER.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

Third Week, ending Saturday, February 7.

Repose has been the characteristic of the past week in Parliament. There was an adjournment of both Houses from Thursday week till Monday; and on Monday each House disposed of its business briefly. In the House of Lords Lord Montague asked the Government if they were willing to produce a copy of the report on the tariff of the United States, and on fiscal regulation generally, by Mr. Walker, the Secretary of the United States' Treasury. The Earl of Aberdeen said that the request was an unusual one, but that, as a copy of the document in question had been furnished to them, and as it was a very remarkable one, well deserving the attention of their lordships, it would be laid on the table of the House. [The attention of the readers of THE LEAGUE has been already called to this document.]

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Bright, without observation, moved for, and obtained, the re-appointment of the select committee on the game laws.

Sir Robert Peel, on Tuesday, stated the nature of the reduction which is proposed to be effected in the Timber Duties—a statement which he had postponed, when he made his speech on Tuesday week, expounding the general plans of the Government. The following is the Government proposition:

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—We propose, sir, to make, ultimately, a reduction in the differential duties upon foreign timber, so that the duty shall remain, after the reduction has been effected, at 15s. instead of the present amount. On hewn timber the duty is at present 25s. We propose to reduce it to 15s. But with the view of insuring to the consumer as much benefit as possible from the proposed reduction, we shall effect it in the manner I am about to explain. With regard to timber from the Baltic—in consequence of the very great demand for it, we do not propose that the reduction shall be immediate. We propose that it shall commence on the 5th of April, 1847, considering that period as one most suitable. We propose that on the 5th April, 1847, the duty shall be reduced to 6s. and on the 5th April, 1848, we propose to reduce it by another 5s. Sawm timber we propose to reduce by 6s. on the 5th of April, 1847, and by 6s. on the 5th of April, 1848. With respect to the small timber, such as laths, spars, and other sorts, we propose to make a proportionate reduction; but whether or not the reduction, having regard to the interest of the consumer, should be immediate, is a subject for consideration. Whether it should be effected without any more gradual reduction, we should wish to reserve for further opinions, as it may be a question whether the reduction might not be absolutely made on the 5th April, 1846.

On the same evening, Tuesday, the subjects of monopoly, Free Trade, tariffs, and other topics, were revived by Mr. WODEHOUSE, well known as a not inactive member on the protectionist side, but latterly made a little famous by announcing to the "House of Richmond," at 17, Bond Street, that he would meet and defeat Mr. Cobden, at Norwich, and then, on the appointed day, coming to the field, but declining the contest. Mr. Wodehouse has the air of a respectable country gentleman, and certainly, in manners, address, and style of speaking, is far superior to the mere Squire Western of the House. Yet one was puzzled to see the precise drift of his aimless motion of Tuesday night. It was a mere piece of very foolish absurdity. There is a gentleman of the name of Chapman, a member of the legal profession, a man of ability, who was one of the assistant commissioners appointed to enquire into the condition of the hand-loom weavers in 1838, and who, in 1843, was appointed by Lord Stanley Chief Judge of the Supreme Court at Wellington, New Zealand. In his reports on the condition of the hand-loom weavers, Mr. Chapman adduced some striking illustrations of the effects of restrictive laws on the condition of the humble and most depressed portions of the working classes. Mr. Wodehouse read extracts from Mr. Chapman's reports, and, seeing that about three years ago the assistant commissioner had been made a colonial judge, he gravely drew the conclusion "that the Government of this country had deliberately entered into a league with the League. (Laughter and cheers.) He repeated it advisedly, that the Government appeared to have formed a league with the League—(great laughter)—in a manner as if they were indifferent to the future prospects of the land."

This silly nonsense was the reason assigned by Mr. Wodehouse for the production of a copy of the warrant under which Mr. Chapman had been appointed to his office. But this was not enough. Mr. Wodehouse passed on from Free Trade, tariffs, and so forth, to as paltry a personal allusion to Dr. Bowring as can well be imagined. Here is a portion of a Parliamentary speech by an intelligent agricultural member! Alluding to Dr. Bowring, Mr. Wodehouse said:

"That hon. gentleman had played a distinguished part in Egypt; but he (Mr. Wodehouse) had received information upon that subject, as to the appearance of the honourable gentleman when there. The interpreter could hardly keep from laughing. He (Mr. Wodehouse) had the information from a source on which he could implicitly rely. It was from a friend—from a particular friend—a person on whom reliance could be placed. The friend was a lady (laughter)—a married lady (roars of laughter)—a lady whom he was in the habit of—(the conclusion of the sentence was drowned in the torrent of laughter which it brought down). She was not an actual eye-witness (great laughter), but there could be no doubt of the authenticity of the information; and she assured him (Mr. Wodehouse) that those who saw the learned gentleman now in every-day life beheld him shorn of his beams. (Laughter.) If honourable gentlemen had only seen him as she saw him (shouts of laughter), with a large straw hat, nearly as big as the clerk's table, a full flowing beard and moustaches (laughter), and, for the best was yet to come, with a pair of wide Circassian trousers"—(great laughter, which again prevented the conclusion of the sentence from being heard).

If this be the style in which protection is to be defended next week, we may say of the protectionists, as the bragging Frenchman, in Henry the Fifth, says of the English at Agincourt, before the battle had begun—"Foolish curs! that run winking into the mouth of a Russian bear, and have their heads crushed like rotten apples; you may as well say, that's a valiant flea that dare eat his breakfast on the lip of a lion."

Dr. Bowring was not in the least disturbed by the personal allusion of the protector of home-grown barley. He replied, not only good-humouredly, but sensibly, in the following way:

Dr. BOWRING might perhaps be allowed to say a few words, as the honourable member had done him the honour to make a direct personal allusion to him. In the first place he would inform the honourable member that the lady he had mentioned had practised greatly on his credulity; she had been very desirous to try the effect of an Oriental tale upon him, and, as ladies usually do, had perfectly succeeded. (Hear, hear.) The honourable member had swallowed the whole of her narrative without the slightest difficulty or hesitation. He (Dr. Bowring), when in Egypt, had been honoured with several interviews by the Pacha, and had had a long controversy with him on the subject of the Corn Laws, the Pacha arguing with rather more power and sagacity than even the honourable member. He fancied that he could provide food for his people by Corn Laws, but, as in this country, they had exposed his Government to great inconvenience. While at Cairo as commercial commissioner, he (Dr. Bowring) had received communications from various parties who wished him to use his influence with the Pacha, who had issued a decree against selling corn at more than a certain price. In the course of the friendly intercourse with which he had been honoured, he had represented to the Pacha the impolicy of this decree, and had told him that it was likely to produce extensive and enduring distress. His decree was against selling wheat and beans at above a fixed price in the bazaars, and against selling bread at above a certain price in the shops. The consequence was that the producers of wheat refused to bring it to market, and the bakers refused to make or sell bread. Thus the inhabitants of Cairo were exposed to the danger of famine; but he (Dr. Bowring) had had the good fortune to convince the Pacha that his system was injurious and untenable, and he therefore issued a counter-decree, declaring that the export and import of grain should be free. (Cheers.) The effects in Egypt had been what they would be in England, and he (Dr. Bowring) received thanks for the advice he had given. The honourable member had also referred to his (Dr. Bowring's) reports, and he had no doubt that if then his recommendations could have been adopted, and the Corn Laws repealed, as they were now sure to be, patronised as the cause was, the result would have been the opening of a new and wide field for British manufactures in the north of Europe. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) He had been commissioned to ascertain the disposition of northern states, but Government had then no power to diminish restriction on the free importation of corn. (Hear, hear, hear.) Had they been able to relax the system our commercial relations would have been at this moment on a much more satisfactory footing. He had heartily rejoiced a few nights ago to hear the right honourable baronet say that he was weary of making appeals to other nations, and that it now became Great Britain to lead the way and set the example, leaving others to follow it. When abroad, urging this principle, he had been met by the statement that Great Britain ought to heal her own diseases before she called upon others to heal theirs—she ought to reform her own tariff before she called upon other nations to reform their tariffs. This argument he had not then been able to answer; but by the measures adopted by the right honourable baronet an interest would be created throughout the world in favour of British manufactures, of which we should soon feel the benefit. (Cheers.) He begged to tender to the right hon. baronet his most grateful thanks; it was impossible to value the amount of advantage Great Britain would derive from the removal of prohibitions and the repeal of restrictions. She was now taking the position she ought to hold in the eyes of the world—that of a teacher; and she would soon find numerous and willing pupils. (Cheers.)

No farther discussion took place; and the House agreed to give Mr. Wodehouse the documents he asked for.

Some remarkable changes have taken place in the House of Commons, and the "Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds" has been in great request. Protectionist members converted to Sir Robert Peel's Free Trade views, and yet, feeling the restraint of their monopolist pledges, have been busy resigning their seats. Of course, the reader is aware that a member cannot directly resign the trust of a representative. If he wishes to retire, he must accept some place of honour under the crown; and, for this purpose, the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds is retained in the gift of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the purpose of facilitating the disburdenment of Parliamentary obligation.

Sir Thomas Fremantle, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, has resigned for Buckingham. Lord Arthur Lennox, brother of the Duke of Richmond, and a Lord of the Treasury, has resigned for Chichester. Lord Jocelyn, the eldest son of the Earl of Roden, and Secretary to the Board of Control, has resigned for Lynn. Mr. Gladstone, the Secretary for the Colonies, has not yet got a seat in lieu of Newark, and Lord John Manners offers his resignation, as does Mr. Mainwaring, for Denbigh. Lord Lincoln, the eldest son of the Duke of Newcastle, and Chief of the Woods and Forests, refuses to resign for Nottinghamshire. Lord Ashley has asked for a re-election, or a dismissal from his constituents in Dorsetshire; and the Hon. Francis Charteris, who moved the Address at the commencement of 1845, has made a similar appeal to his constituency of East Gloucestershire. All these are CONVERTS; it remains to be seen what progress has been made in the conversion of constituencies. The Hon. Mr. Dawney has retired from Rutland, and a protectionist takes his place.

THE PUBLIC PRESS AND THE MINISTERIAL MEASURES.

Had our limits permitted, we should have added considerably to the following series of extracts, taken indiscriminately from the liberal and leading portion of the public press, as we think it of supreme importance, in a crisis like this, to exhibit to our readers, at one view, the general tendency and tone of the various local representatives of the public mind; those, however, which we have given will suffice to manifest the sense of the nation on Sir R. Peel's measure.

(From the Leeds Mercury.)

The Free Trade plant, grafted on a foreign stock, has shot forth such a growth, that we may almost characterise it by the sublime description of the tree in Nebuchadnezzar's vision—"The tree grew, and was strong; and the height thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth; the leaves thereof were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all; the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it." So comprehensive and far-reaching, so beautiful and beneficent, so sheltering and fruitful, do we deem those principles of Free Trade which Sir Robert Peel has seized upon, and which, "with ambitious aim," to immortalise himself, he has here carried out to an unparalleled extent.

(From the Lancaster Guardian.)

"Protection" is becoming "small by degrees and beautifully less" in the hands of Sir Robert Peel. Arguing the necessity of amputating this diseased member of the body fiscal, he lacks nerve to remove it at once. To use Mr. Bright's apt and amusing illustration, he prefers cutting off the dog's tail by inches.

Let us not be misunderstood. We accept Sir Robert's measure as a magnificent instalment of the demands of the Free Traders. But while there is a chance of obtaining payment in full, we hold it an act of superlative folly to discard it. We hope, therefore, that the friends and supporters of the good cause, both in and out of Parliament, will redouble their efforts for immediate repeal. If the Premier should prove obdurate, they will still have the alternative which he now proffers, and may then embrace it with a clear conscience.

(From the Newcastle Advertiser.)

Shall this repeal of the Corn Law be gradual or immediate? This is a question which just now demands the most serious consideration. The Corn Law is given up even by the Premier. But what he is unable to defend as a permanent law, he yet proposes shall be continued for three years. It is not pretended that the country requires this delay. It is not supposed that immediate repeal is in all cases bad, for in other articles than corn protection is to be abolished without any preparatory measures. The Premier's object is, then, to conciliate the landed interest. This the delay has failed to do. The Duke of Richmond declares that immediate abolition would be less mischievous than the ministerial scheme. Yet if it was meant to please anybody, the Duke must have been the man. Again, the Free Traders agree in regarding the delay as the only thing which the country has to fear. Mr. Cobden puts the matter in a very clear light as regards the farmer, in the admirable letter we insert in another column; and the hon. gentleman's view has been taken by Earl Grey, Lord Kinnaird, and Lord Montagu, and by the friends of Free Trade generally. Neither the protectionists nor the League being satisfied with this part of the plan, it is just possible that the Premier may be induced to abandon it for a more final step. This no doubt depends upon the extent to which the people respond to the League's call for petitions.

(From the Bradford Observer.)

The above is an outline of Sir Robert Peel's great measure. We repeat, it is greater than could reasonably have been expected from him, though short of what has been demanded, and justly, by the League. It will in all probability be furiously opposed by the protectionists, and therefore we trust it will receive the cordial support of the Free Trader as a great instalment of their demands. The fact that it embraces total repeal is its best recommendation; and though we should far rather have had that repeal immediately than three years hence, yet the difference in point of time is more apparent than real: years in a nation's affairs are less than days in those of an individual. Far rather would we have a repeal of the Corn Laws at the end of three years even with no abatement of the present duty, than the imposition of a fixed duty of but half-a-crown at present, with the prospect of its being a fixture. And in mercy to the fallen protectionists, let us give them these odd pence for the three years. We shall soon be quit of them. As the Times remarks, "For this short remainder England will be fit for dukes to live in, and they will have time to arrange their affairs before they set out on their long and melancholy exile from the land of cursed abundance."

(From the Preston Guardian.)

To show the great difference between the proposed scale of duties and the one now in operation, we subjoin the following tabular comparison, as respects wheat:

Average Price.	Present Duty.	Proposed Duty.
48s.	20s.	10s.
49s.	20s.	9s.
50s.	20s.	8s.
51s.	19s.	7s.
52s.	18s.	6s.
53s.	18s.	5s.
54s.	18s.	4s.

The reader will at once perceive the great diminution of taxation upon the nation's food which the new measure will effect; and when he considers also that in three years from the present time, even this diminished taxation must disappear before the pledged and total repeal of the Corn Laws, we feel certain that he will sympathize with us in our congratulations upon the present approximation to, and prospective consummation of Free Trade principles.

It may here be asked whether Sir Robert's new scheme will anticipate the necessity for further agitation on the part of the League. We think not. That body has yet a duty to perform, to which it stands pledged before the world. It must yet see that perfectly Free Trade is attained for the people—if not before the expiration of the three years during which the new scale is to continue, at least immediately upon the expiration of that term. We know that the Income Tax was imposed for three years only, and yet we now find it renewed for another period, with the probability of a permanent imposition. The pledge of the Premier is but as a promissory note to the nation, which he may or may not take up when it falls due, and the nation must now see to it that the engagement is scrupulously and unreservedly honoured.

(From the Carlisle Journal.)

Sir Robert Peel has lost little time in announcing his measures to the country. He has commenced the work like a man in earnest, and we doubt not he will carry his labours to a successful close. The proposition he laid before Parliament on Tuesday night is of a "mingled yarn," varying in its colours, but good in its general effect. There is a mixture of boldness and timidity in it; a dash of the desperado, and a whine of the sneak, that are at least curious to behold. He deals boldly with principles; presents correct views, but fails to act up to what are evidently his own notions of right. He shows what should be done, but admits he has not the heart to do it.

While we say this, however, of the general bearing of his plan, we must admit that a bolder, or a more sweeping measure, one more clearly founded in justice, or better calculated to meet the wants of the times, has rarely been broached by any minister in this country. It is a declaration of rights, marred only by timidity and want of self-reliance.

The great object of the measure is a total and immediate repeal of the present Corn Law. But here the timidity of which we have spoken is most conspicuously displayed. For the present law a new sliding scale is to be substituted, to last for three years; and that again is to be superseded by a total repeal of all duty whatever!—except such nominal sum as may serve to record quantities at the Custom House. This is the blot on the measure. The repeal is to be total—it ought to have been immediate; for more injury will accrue to the farmer by the uncertainty which this three years' probation will produce, by the fears and alarms it will create, by the false rumours of an inundation of foreign corn and consequent ruin, to which the interested will give currency, than if repeal had come without notice at all. The worst would then have been known at once; and it would soon have been found, as in the case of cattle, that "the worst" was by no means so terrible a thing as the imagination had depicted it.

(From the Cheltenham Free Press.)

Well, we will not quarrel with him as to the mode in which he has introduced the measure. Suffice it for us to know that the Conservative Government of this country has proposed to Parliament and determined to carry out the abolition of the restrictive system and the adoption of Free Trade principles in its future commercial policy. "Although I propose a temporary continuance of protection," said Sir

Robert, "yet I do propose that the bill shall include a distinct enactment that after the lapse of a certain time, foreign grain shall be admitted duty free."

Oh! words of fear—

Displeasing to a landlord's ear!

And is this the end of all the Tory boasting at the advent of Sir Robert Peel to power when Lord John Russell proposed an eight shilling fixed duty and failed to carry it. The work was only delayed that it might be done the more effectually—that the public mind might be more fully matured upon the subject. For this abandonment of "protection," the landlord class, headed by the duke of Richmond, brand Peel as a "traitor" and talk of turning him out of power. Why, if they could succeed in such an attempt, it would be the worst day's work they ever accomplished. Do they imagine that if this mode of settling the question is refused, the people of England will be induced to rest satisfied with anything short of a total and immediate repeal? If they do, they must be infatuated indeed. It is all very well for the landowners to attribute the popular feeling against the Corn Laws to the "machinations" of the League, but they cannot get rid of the fact that a popular and enlightened feeling against the Corn Laws does exist throughout the masses of the country.

(From the Economist.)

The speech of Sir Robert Peel has not disappointed us. The Right Hon. Bart. has frankly avowed an entire change of opinion. He remains at the helm of the State, but refuses to navigate it by "observations taken in 1842." He defers to the new light which argument and, above all, experience have thrown around these subjects; and that is not the least gratifying part of the Minister's speech, in which he enters into a recital of his own observations of passing events, and the facts connected with our social, commercial, and economical condition, on which his new convictions have been formed. Whatever be the precise measure proposed by Sir Robert Peel on Tuesday next, we are now certain that it will at least contemplate the entire ultimate repeal of the protective laws. The old principle of protection is for ever abandoned; the new principle of free competition is embraced as the basis of all future legislation. It is, however, essential that the country should not underestimate the difficulties which will be encountered before the intentions of the Minister can be hoped to be realised. By the concluding paragraph of Lord John Russell's letter addressed to her Majesty, we are led to infer that his support will be given to such a measure as Sir Robert Peel intended originally to propose, though in one respect it differed from that which the noble lord would himself have proposed. In respect to the difference in question, whether the measure should be "immediate" or "gradual," we have already fully expressed our opinions. But suppose that it be so good a measure, that while the Free Trade party record their votes for an immediate repeal of the law, they will still support the plan of the government, then we take it for granted that it will pass the House of Commons by a considerable majority. But then comes its difficulty—a difficulty which, we regret to say, our observation during the last few days has rather tended to magnify than diminish. Our fears that such a measure as the House of Commons will pass, will not be accepted by the House of Lords, have rather increased than diminished. And, moreover, the grounds on which the determination of the Lords appear to be based, are such as are not likely to be removed should even a greater majority of the House of Commons support the measure than is at present expected. It is contended, that it would be a dangerous and unwise course for the House of Lords to place themselves in opposition to a large majority of the House of Commons. This is admitted—admitted frankly by many of the noble lords, who are nevertheless determined to oppose this measure. For, say they, this House of Commons does not represent the country; it was elected five years ago, on principles directly the opposite of those on which it now seeks to act. It might be impolitic—it might be unwise for us to oppose a large majority of the nation; but we deny that such a decision of the present Parliament can be taken as the true exponent of public opinion. Dissolve the Parliament; let the people declare their opinion; and if a new Parliament shall confirm the decision of the Government, it will only then be just to expect us to yield our own opinions and views, and adopt the decision of the House of Commons.

(From the Dublin Pilot.)

There is evidence of a change of feeling in England on these measures. The Chronicle regards them with less favour, and the cry is becoming louder for a total and immediate repeal. A very remarkable letter has been published by Mr. Cobden, in which he exhibits the mischievous tendency of the sliding principle still adhered to by the Premier. * * * * On the whole we think the Premier's position is becoming more critical. There does not appear as great a probability of a decided majority as there was, and if the majority be not decided there can be little doubt that the Lords will resist, and force on a dissolution of Parliament. Our letters assert that the expectation of a dissolution was stronger in London on Saturday than previously.

(From the Hull Advertiser.)

In the earnest hope that the landlords will see the importance of giving up the Corn Laws, now that their doom is irrevocable, and that the shred of remaining protection can be of no real benefit to them, we unhesitatingly approve of the Premier's grand and comprehensive scheme; and we trust that meetings will generally be held to support the policy of the Government. Sir Robert Peel has consigned to the tomb of "all the Capulets," to know no future resurrection, the time-honoured and respectable fallacy of reciprocity. In fact, during the last seven years, the League has had no more zealous disciple than the Right Hon. Baronet. Well; we predicted that it would be so. At the last public meeting in the Town Hall of Hull, we stated then our solitary, but not the less our firm, conviction that Sir Robert Peel would repeal the Corn Laws, and that there was not a more decided Free Trader in the House of Commons. It is no longer doubtful that we neither deceived ourselves nor the public. Free Trade, not only in corn, but in all the products of the earth, and of human industry, is now the policy of the Peel administration. It is for the country to ratify by its cordial approval, as we have no doubt it will do, the excellent scheme of Free Trade policy, so ably, so completely, and so distinctly propounded by the Right Hon. the First Lord of the Treasury.

(From the Maidstone Gazette.)

The question now comes, whether the scheme may not be amended, so as to suit the interests of both parties better than at present? The Free Traders complain that the question will still remain unsettled for three years; and a letter of most sound, and, as it seems to us, conclusive reasoning (which appears in another column,) has been addressed by Mr. Cobden to the tenant farmers of England; in which that gentleman contends that Free Trade at once would be better for the farmer himself, than Sir Robert's scheme of three years' longer vexatious and anxious procrastination.

We feel convinced that Mr. Cobden is right, and we do hope that our agriculturists will not allow their feelings of common sense to be blinded to the force of the reasons which Mr. Cobden adduces in support of that conclusion. For three years longer the farmer is to be kept in a state of paralysing apprehension. With total repeal at once, he would have a chance of making some improved arrangement, wherever such ought to be made, with his landlord. He will be still in doubt during these three years as to what he ought to do, or ought not to do. He will be able to lay down no plan, because he cannot possibly know what difficulty he may have to deal with in three years. Now, he knows what he has to contend with, and what calculations will enable him to meet it. He knows that, from this time, whatever change takes place must come on gradually, the foreign grower being altogether unprepared to take advantage of the chance.

(From the Glasgow Examiner.)

The blow is struck, and the death-knell of monopoly reverberates throughout the strongholds of the protectionists! The Premier has declared himself a Free Trader in principle, and he anticipates the certain and speedy triumph of that principle.

It is the easiest thing possible to find fault with a measure such as Sir Robert proposes—a measure which entirely revolutionises the whole political and commercial interests of the nation—but censurers should be aware that, compared with his knowledge of men and measures, theirs must, from their inferior facilities, be sufficiently scanty. We are far from supposing the ministerial scheme perfect. Formed chiefly by one who believes only in what he sees and individually experiences, the marvel is, not that it displays so much weakness, but so much strength. We deny not but the measure had been bolder had the Premier proposed immediate abolition, without aught of his paltry compensation; but the state of the country, and its present position relative to foreign powers, make caution more meritorious than daring. Those saying most regarding the paltriness of the compensation, seem not aware that the more paltry so much the better, if it prove a bait to greedy protectionists—a bait which, while they are swallowing, Sir Robert drags them to land, and leaves them to splutter on unprotected soil.

(From the Sussex Advertiser.)

It is undoubtedly a large scheme, but it just falls short of being a great one; and the more one contemplates its varied provisions, the more one reflects on the power of those convictions which have wrought so wonderful a change in the views of the Premier, the more one is constrained to admit, that the mischievous symptoms of expediency, which here and there mar the beauty and brightness of the conception, are just those which show Sir Robert to be essentially one of the "video, meliora proboque, deteriora sequor" school.

The blot on the scutcheon is the miserable attempt to preserve an emasculated and attenuated sliding scale, too contemptible to be accepted by the protectionists as a boon, but fully mischievous enough to be rejected by the Free Traders. It has not even the doubtful merit of permanency. In every probability, under the circumstances which do and which must prevail for many months to come, this scale, as a sliding scale, will not even come into operation—it will, on the contrary, simply involve a fixed duty of 4s. per quarter. Viewing the present position of surrounding countries there is no prospect, nay, hardly a possibility of any importation of foreign corn which could influence the English markets till after next October, and Peel's nursing, or as it might more truly be termed his starveling, would not come to life for months, even if it ever contrive to struggle into existence. For any good purpose it is powerless, but for bad it may prove all powerful.

(From the Norwich Mercury.)

In another part of our Journal, we have given both in summary and in detail, the entire plan; it is impossible not to admit that it is drawn with consummate skill, and with all that tact of which Sir Robert Peel is so perfect a master. But although we are ready to admit that upon the whole there is every appearance of a desire to do the agriculturist justice in the transfer of the local and other burthens we have noticed, and the reduction of the duties on various articles, we still look upon the continuance of the sliding scale, even for a short period, as the perpetuation of the delusion to which the farmers have so long been a prey. It is a system which rests upon what Lord John Russell has called "a vicious basis," and in retaining this evil principle of the Corn Laws, Sir Robert has retained a portion, whose inefficiency, and worse than inefficiency, has been exhibited throughout all the phases of the Corn Law. Now, looking at the new scale proposed by Sir R. Peel, will any one believe that it can be of use as a protection to the agriculturist. Nay, does not Sir Robert Peel himself indicate throughout his entire speech, that the tenant must look to increased production from highly improved cultivation of waste lands, and the labourer for increased employment rather than from any continuation of or even a probability of high prices. Why, then, except it were for an absurd wish to appear consistent, continue a system of delusion "more honoured in the breach than in the observance"—a delusion which must be injurious to the occupier, and is calculated to render the arrangements between landlord and tenant a matter of greater difficulty. Far better would it have been, in our humble opinion, to have proposed immediate repeal.

As a whole, however, the measure is one of an enlarged character; and although there be, in the compensating portions, evidence of a great love for small expedients, and a too nice balancing of advantages, it is still worthy the calm consideration of the nation, whose fiat will in the course of the next few days determine its doom. To all it is a matter of the deepest moment, and however differences may arise on some points, it is still a scheme which ought neither to be lightly, hastily, or inconsiderately opposed.

(From the Carnarvon and Denbigh Herald.)

We are not, however, without fears. Let us not be misunderstood. We have no fear for Lord John Russell. His superiority to mere party rivalry has been often and magnani-mously shown: nor should we fear much the dereliction to the enemies' camp of any of the Reform members, if it were not for the madness of presumed class and trade interests in some of their constituents. They must, we fear, make up their minds to stand not a little fire upon the occasion of their adhesion to the new tariff. The tariff touches upon too many interests to be received all at once, as it deserves. There are many men who cannot for the soul of them recognise a principle when made to apply to their own case. There are thousands of men who, in one and the same breath, recognise the right of a Free Trade in corn, and every branch of trade—except the very branch in which they themselves have been taught that there is some latent interest and benefit in protection. It is in vain to reason with such men, for nothing is so blind as the selfishness of ignorance. Time, in this case, is the only teacher; but the present crisis does not permit much time on the matter. Our Parliamentary members will soon be called upon to act; and we adjure them, one and all, to remember that their votes will be recorded on the page of history for ever, in eulogy or in reprobation.

(From the Monmouthshire Merlin.)

The commencement of the present Session has been looked for with deeper interest among the millions than that of any for several years past, in consequence of there being better ground for expecting substantial changes in the commercial legislature of the country. Nor has this expectation been disappointed in the main; for, whatever deficiency may appear in the ministerial measures as compared with the various and, in many cases, unfounded anticipations which have prevailed, there is obviously set forth a more glorious amount of sterling good, as well as of promise for the future, in the opening of the present campaign, than has been offered to the people of this kingdom for many years past. The Premier has boldly declared that all the grounds upon which protection to native industry had been advocated, are untenable; and in his comprehensive and gratifying exposition, has declared the final obliteration from the Statute Book, of the Corn Law, in three years.

(From the Oxford Chronicle.)

Our columns this week will excite no common interest in the minds of those of our readers who have not had access to the metropolitan journals. There can be no class which has not felt some degree of anxiety as to what would be the measure proposed by Sir Robert Peel to meet the present crisis: a crisis which he had felt to be of so alarming and pressing a nature as to have induced him to surrender the high credentials with which he had been entrusted, into the hands of the Queen in December last. We are persuaded that there are many who will say that in the plan which the Premier has laid before Parliament and the country, he has not gone far enough; while a numerous party will say that he has gone too far. Taking the measure as a whole, perhaps it will not be denied that it is bold and discriminating, and a step in advance towards the great object for which the country has been agitating for the last seven years.

(From the Dover Chronicle.)

We have thus stated the impression to our readers which Sir R. Peel's new plan has made on us; and, in doing so, have somewhat entrenched on the usual space to which we in general circumscribe ourselves for a leading article. This the importance of the subject excuses. Although we are inclined, at present, to think favourably of the proposals submitted to the House on Tuesday night, we would call upon the League not to relax in their exertions as it regards the registration. It is not likely that "protection" can possibly be re-enacted, if the present measure pass; but the attempt may be made in the Parliament which, in the course of two years, must succeed the present one. For such an attempt the League must be prepared. The progress of their registration must not be checked till the arrival of the time when the food of the community shall be as free and bountiful as Providence will vouchsafe.

(From the Whitehaven Herald.)

In the absence of information respecting the intentions of the great National Anti-Corn Law League we seriously, earnestly, and solemnly call upon the Free Traders of our country to keep upon their watch tower—not to trust a vanquished foe till he is beyond the power of doing harm. If agitation ceases the measure will as surely be buried in its passage through the house, or have a rider stuck upon it, which would have the same effect, as ever it was proposed. We would urge upon the Liberal readers of our columns to lose no time in petitioning Parliament for not only a total, but an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.

(From the Guernsey Comet.)

The anxiously looked-for announcement of the intention of Government, respecting the changes in the commercial policy of England, took place on Tuesday evening. The alterations proposed are great and important, and may be said to be the first great step towards the abandonment of protective duties. They have been received, generally speaking, with satisfaction.

(From the Norfolk News.)

Whatever may be thought of the Premier's new project; whatever of hope or of fear may be excited by its vast design and its almost innumerable details—one thing is certain, Sir R. Peel is still himself. He has fulfilled in this respect the expectations, however much he may come short of the wishes of the country. Consistent in inconsistency, steadfast in revolving, resolute in shirking principle, he adheres to the last to his wonted obliquities. Crab-like, he cannot go straight. He has an eel's alacrity in wriggling; or, to use a more noble simile, his progress is as rotatory as that of storms.

If Free Trade is so good a thing to the country; if it is to advance the progress of manufactures and the prosperity of agriculture; if it is to unite rival nations in the bond of brotherhood and peace; and all this Sir Robert Peel affirms, why should we for three long years be deprived of any part of such glorious results? If, as Sir Robert Peel declares, the present sliding scale be a failure, and a fixed duty be an intolerable nuisance, why are we for three years to be saddled with a wretched impost, which—as for the very purpose of uniting in itself the opposite mischiefs of a fixed duty, and of a sliding scale—is fixed at 10s. whenever the quarter of corn is worth less than 48s., and at 4s. whenever the quarter is worth more than 53s., and which slides all the way between? If the quantity of food is fearfully scanty, as Sir Robert Peel professes to believe, on what pretence are we called on to submit to any limit to an immediate supply?

(From the Wiltshire Independent.)

Well, the murder is out; Peel's new plan is before the public, and the farmers now know what they are to expect from their "friend." In three years the Corn Laws are to be entirely repealed; in the meantime the beloved sliding-scale is to be maintained, but the slide itself is to be cut so short that it will only serve to annoy the public who may happen to step upon it, while it will fail to afford those for whose use it was designed that advantage which they fancy is their right. Whether the Premier will be able to carry his proposition this session, is questionable; that he, or some one else, will carry it, ere the year expire, we have no doubt. So far as it goes we approve of the plan; it is a bold move, and whoever may be disappointed we are not of the number. We expected less, therefore we cannot but be pleased with what is offered, however short it may fall of what we demand. But will it satisfy either party? We think not. It gives the protectionist little more than a shadow, affording him scarcely any real advantage, while it annoys and harasses the Free Trader, who will still continue his agitation to get rid of the nuisance before its now appointed time shall arrive. Better far to have settled the business at once than to prolong an agitation which the protectionists themselves admit is worse to them than ought else that can happen.

(From the Liverpool Albion.)

The measures which Sir Robert Peel has proposed for the adoption of Parliament have taken the nation somewhat by surprise by their bold and comprehensive character, and certainly entitle him to the thanks of all who desire to see the commerce of the country free and unrestricted. This gratitude, however, which arises rather from the feeling that the measures are brought forward by one all of whose previous career has been in an opposite direction, and from whose prejudices and aristocratic predilections little was to be expected, must not blind us to the fact that, after all, practically, they are rather a recognition of the principles of Free Trade than a full and fair application of them. It is believed by all who have been actively engaged in the struggle that the minister has taken as bold a course as his view of the circumstances warranted, while, at the same time, the feeling is generally prevalent that he has sacrificed his own convictions of the desirableness of an immediate adoption of a thoroughly Free Trade policy, in the hope of thereby conciliating the protectionist party. Under these circumstances the leaders of the League and their adherents are placed in a position of considerable difficulty. They are fully sensible of the importance of something being done at once to relieve the pressing necessities of that large portion of the people whom the Premier has himself stated to be in imminent danger of starvation, but they are not prepared to abate their claim for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. For that they have pledged themselves to contend until every vestige of monopoly of the people's food is removed, and that pledge they will redeem. They do not wish to defeat Sir R. Peel's measures: they only require him to carry out his convictions without delay. In doing this they cannot fairly be charged with being men of extreme measures. They are only asking now for what they have been agitating for seven years back. If it were right two months ago to demand a total and immediate repeal, nothing has occurred within that period to make such a demand wrong at the present time. We know that it is urged by some that such a course of proceeding is impolitic, that it would embarrass the Minister, and endanger all that is good in the measure which he has proposed. This we do not believe. If it were so, we should be extremely reluctant to encourage any such step. We are convinced that an agitation for a total and immediate repeal now, so far from weakening, will strengthen the hands of the Minister. It will be to him an intimation that the country will give him a hearty and enthusiastic support in carrying out his own convictions in opposition to those whom he has vainly hoped to conciliate by retaining the "mockery of protection," as the Duke of Richmond has called it, and who will, we firmly believe, offer as strenuous an opposition to the present measure as they would do to a complete and final settlement of the question.

(From the Glasgow Argus.)

The measure of Sir Robert Peel is before the country. Long before this it has been studied, and studied again, by all the great interests of this great nation; and public opinion, at first agreeably startled by its vastness, has had time to form itself, and consider it in all its proportions. Though it is the most splendid movement in a right direction ever made by any man who has held the reins of power in this country; though if carried in its integrity, as the Minister has proposed it, results the most beneficial to our power and happiness as a nation must ensue; and though Sir R. Peel by his courage and his wisdom in bringing it forward has earned for himself a high place in the list of public benefactors, still it is impossible not to object to it as an instalment of a just debt, instead of a full satisfaction. It is but 17s. in the pound, when he could have paid us the full 20s. To abolish the Corn Laws at the end of three years, when they ought on every principle of right, as well as expediency, to be abolished now, is a shortcoming—which, though to be expected of a man in the position of Sir Robert Peel—is not to be approved of by those who have fought this battle, while he opposed it. Neither can the great Free Trade party accept, with thorough enthusiasm, a scheme which does so little for our neighbours of France. The French have abundance of wines, almost excluded from our markets by high duties, but which might be brought within the reach of our middle classes, to the great benefit of trade, and thereby of the poorer classes, if the duties had been reduced.

With every desire to aid and not thwart Sir R. Peel, the League can take no other course than the one it has taken. It cannot dissolve itself till the Corn Law is abolished; its machinery must be continued, and its energies must be brought into play as long as there is a sliding scale, or any other form of Corn Law to operate against. Is the perpetuation of such a conflict desirable? Strange as have been the events of the last few months, we are not without strong hope that an event still stranger is about to happen, and that Sir R. Peel will act upon the sensible views taken by Mr. Cobden. If he do, there is every probability that the protectionists themselves will ultimately consent to it with less obstruction and ill-feeling than they have already exhibited to his three years' scheme, so kindly meant, but so likely to be mischievous.

Extracts embodying precisely the same sentiments might have been multiplied indefinitely from the public press, and we regret that we have not space enough to insert a variety of excellent articles, conceived in the same spirit, from the following, and from many other papers which have passed through our hands:—The Manchester Guardian, The Manchester Times, The Manchester Examiner, Scotsman, Liverpool Mercury, Dundee Advertiser, Dumfries Standard, Bolton Free Press, Devonshire Chronicle, Bristol Mercury, Strathmore Journal, Northampton Mercury, Liverpool Times, Ipswich Express, Blackburn Mercury, Reformer's Gazette, Guernsey Star, Worcester Chronicle, Brighton Guardian, Tyne Mercury, Bristol Gazette, Dublin Evening Post, Kilkenny Journal, Cheltenham Examiner, Cambridge Advertiser, &c. &c. &c.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PETITION! PETITION! PETITION!

Belper, Feb. 3d, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—We are setting to work with petitions for immediate and total repeal.

We shall try to get a separate petition from the tenant farmers, and recommend this course to your consideration for general adoption.—I am, dear Sir, yours truly,

J. W. HANCOCK.

George Wilson, Esq., Anti-Corn-Law League, Manchester.

Yealand, 2 mo., 2, 46.

RESPECTED FRIEND,—Thy letter of the 29th inst., requesting petitions to be sent off to London, desiring immediate repeal of the Corn Laws (as per form given) was duly received.

Three petitions were forthwith put in motion in the several townships of Burton and Holme, Warton and Yealand, Preston, Patrick, and Stenton, in one of which there are already 300 signatures.

We shall forward them as soon as completed to Henry Warburton, M.P., and Thomas Green, M.P.

There are the names of many tenant farmers on the petition.—Am very respectfully,

R. WATMAN.

George Wilson, Anti-Corn-Law League, Manchester.

Thongsbridge House, near Holmfirth,

February 2d, 1846.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have received your letter, urging upon us to petition Parliament, without delay, for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws; and although we are rather busy making preparations for a contest, in the event of an opposition to Lord Morpeth, yet you may rest assured that not a single township in this polling district shall be without its petition.—I am, yours very truly,

GEO. ROBINSON.

George Wilson, Esq., Anti-Corn-Law League, Manchester.

Nottingham, 2nd February, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to your favour received yesterday, I beg to inform you that a requisition is going round to-day to beg the Mayor of this place to call a public meeting, with a view to promote the object named in your letter, viz.—to petition Parliament to immediately adopt measures abolishing all restrictions upon the importation of food of all kinds.

G. Wilson, Esq.

Yours respectfully,

JOHN PLACE.

Mallon, Feb. 2nd, 1846

DEAR FRIEND,—I have received the circular from the Council of the League, dated, January 29th, and in reply, am happy to say that, we have a petition in the course of signing, which shall be forwarded for presentation as early as possible.

Pray get Cobden's Letter to the Farmers circulated as extensively as possible. If you are intending to print it, please to let us have a thousand or two.—Truly,

G. Wilson, Esq.

JNO. HOPKINS.

High Wray, 2nd Month, 2nd, 1846.

RESPECTED FRIEND,—The committee of the North Lonsdale Free Trade Association have originated within the district three petitions;—for Nolestone and vicinity—Conistone and ditto—Hawthhead and ditto, which will be forwarded with all dispatch possible. We presume a similar course will be adopted with the House of Lords when the bill is introduced there. Any suggestions from the League will be acceptable.—I am, very respectfully,

Geo. Wilson, Esq.

WILLIAM WILSON.

Cheadle, Feb. 2, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—We have little chance of aiding the great cause of repeal by petition in our parish, being in the midst of the strongholds of the mis-called protectors of the native agricultural labourers, whose wages have been reduced since the passing of the Corn Law, in 1835, more than one-third; during which time, in some instances, the land has doubled its rent, and the whole has (with very few exceptions) considerably advanced throughout the parish; so that it is easy to calculate who has had the advantage of protection. If it were not for the trade employing a part of the families of the agricultural labourers of this parish, and thereby increasing their means of subsistence, the whole of such labourers having three children or upwards (with very few exceptions) would become inhabitants of the workhouse; and as the guardians do not take into the workhouse a part of a man's family without compelling himself and his wife to go also, our present capacious union workhouse would not hold one-fourth of the people that would be under the humiliating necessity of being reduced to paupers, and of submitting to the heart-rending feelings of leaving their own small but neat cottage and neighbourhood, with all its social enjoyments, in order to herd together in the workhouse, leaving their natural employment for that of the profitless one of breaking stones, and imbibing those principles of pauperism which would never hereafter forsake them, but at the same time of course enjoying the glorious protection which the landowners boast is the sole reason for their wishing a continuation of the Corn Laws. We will get petitions signed by such persons as believe a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws would be at the present time, and for ever hereafter, of the greatest possible benefit and advantage to the nation at large.

I am, Sir, your obedt. servant,
To George Wilson, Esq. JOSEPH HIGHAM.

Dimple Matlock, Feb. 2, 1846.

MY DEAR SIR,—Yours of the 29th inst. came duly to hand this morning, and I beg to assure you that immediate steps shall be taken to get a petition signed as numerous as possible in the course of this week.

I may just observe that a petition in favour of the present Corn Law, headed by the clergyman of Matlock, has been hawked about four days, and received the astonishing number, not of 8000, but of eight signatures. How we, the working-men, shall outstrip them in number, will be seen by the end of the week. I doubt not 1000 signatures in two days. Excuse my scribble, and believe yours faithfully,
To Geo. Wilson. WM. SMITH.

Wakefield, Feb. 1846.

DEAR SIR,—Previous to the receipt of your circular, urging upon us the necessity for petitioning for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, we had convened a meeting of the inhabitants of our borough, and agreed upon a petition something very similar to the one you suggested, and it is now being signed.

Dear Sir, yours truly, JOHN NETTLETON.
To Geo. Wilson.

Westbury, 31st Jan., 1846.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have just received your letter; but we had already taken almost precisely the steps you recommend. We have this day presented to our mayor a requisition very respectfully signed to call a meeting early next week to pass an opinion on the measures submitted to Parliament by her Majesty's Ministers; at that meeting we intend proposing resolutions for immediate repeal. As we shall have the support not only of the Free Traders here, but of the largest and most intelligent farmer in the parish, we have little doubt of carrying them. We have also a petition signed exclusively by the woollen manufacturers, praying not only for the repeal of the Corn Laws, but for the removal of protection on the articles of their manufacture. Most of the farmers see that the game is up, and are anxious for immediate repeal, unless the law can be kept as it now is.

I remain, very dear Sir, yours truly,
To Geo. Wilson. N. OVERBURY.

Annan, 2nd Feb., 1846.

MY DEAR SIR,—In reply to your favour of the 29th ult., accompanied by a plan of the petition, I beg to inform you that the necessary steps for procuring petitions from the magistrates, town council, and inhabitants at large of this town, to both Houses of Parliament, will be taken without delay; and also to inform you that you may rely on their further co-operation in forwarding the measures of Free Trade.

I am, my dear Sir, yours very truly,
To Geo. Wilson. JOHN SAWYER, Provost.

LABOURERS' WAGES IN SURREY.

London, 21st January, 1846.

SIR,—The other class of supporters claimed by the protectionists for the Corn Laws, are the agricultural labourers. Let us inquire in what respect their interests are identified with the maintenance of these laws?

In the part of Surrey bordering on Hampshire, the wages given by some proprietors and the wealthier class of farmers is 10s. to 11s. per week; but the average wages to labourers is 9s. per week.

It is a favourite assertion that wages rise and fall with the price of wheat.

A labourer informs me that "on one occasion when wheat fell to 10l. per load (or 40s. per quarter), he knew wages as low as 8s. per week; but that, for the last four years, he has seen no change made by the principal farmers." We all know how much, within the same period, the price of wheat has fluctuated. The uniform reply I have had from labourers in this quarter is, that when the price of corn falls considerably, farmers are apt to lower the wages from 1s. to 2s., according to the rate given, but that when the price of corn rises, it is long before wages tend upwards—and then only 1s. a week more is allowed to meet, as at present, a rise of 4d. per gallon on bread. The universal reply is, "We are always best off when corn is low. With bread at 10d. per gallon, more of our earnings is expended on bread than when 1s. per gallon; and the additional 1s. a week does not make up the difference. The statement made to me by two labourers, receiving 8s. per week from the parish, for working on the road, both with families depending upon them, was "some days we come to work with a bit of bread in our pocket—some days with none. In the winter season the farmers turn off a great many hands till the work in the hop-grounds (to which they devote much attention, often to the neglect of other crops) begins. If any of us want a piece of land, they won't give it us under 4l. or 5l. the acre, though few of them pay above 20s. for it." It is worthy of observation what variety of crops and abundant produce these small patches of land yield in the labourers' hands—affording evidence that by stirring the soil to a greater depth, and by more manure, the land will yield a larger return than it now does under the system at present pursued by the farmers of this country. It also leads us to infer that more labour could be employed upon the land with a profit to the farmer.

The labourers look with hopefulness to a change of system, by which an impetus shall be given to various branches of trade. They know full well when trade is brisk, young and unmarried men find employment elsewhere, and thus lessen the competition for agricultural labour.

The bishop of the diocese of Winchester was lately much commended, because he employed a number of hands in trenching some waste land; but, as he thereby reduced the rates, part of which fell to his share to pay, and got land hitherto valueless redeemed at a cost of 4l. 13s. 4d. per acre, we may question if he is entitled to high praise. It is alleged that the land ought to have been "taken in 100 years ago." May we not infer that some proprietors, seeing the leading-strings of protection slipping from under their arms, are using increased exertions to make their land yield a return, and thus reply to the declaration of many admirers of the Corn Laws, that poor land will go out of cultivation?

A great evil of the present Corn Laws, to which I have seen no allusion made, is, that they bring the interests of the labourers into direct collision with that of the farmers. They see the farmers struggling to maintain a law which raises the price of their bread, without increasing the demand for, and therefore, the value of, their labour. They know, as above stated, the ransom exacted for land, when they wish to take any themselves. Can the labourer but feel indignant, when these very farmers defend the Corn Laws as a "labourers' question?" Ask a labourer who holds the franchise, whether he would vote for a Free Trade candidate; his answer is, "We would; but we should be turned off from our work." Will such an interference with his rights as a British subject repair the breach already made? Let us, then, hope that Government may be led, or, if not, may be urged, by the voice of the country, to abolish "protection," that "bane of agriculture," and thus, in the simple but beautiful language of Dr. Chalmers, "sweeten the breath of society."—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

A PROPRIETOR OF LAND IN SCOTLAND, ON A VISIT IN SURREY.

AGRICULTURE IN NORFOLK.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

London, 5th February, 1846.

SIR,—Had Sir Robert Peel, either personally, or by deputy, visited Norfolk since the promulgation of his measure, he would have found that the most intelligent farmers there would much prefer an immediate repeal to the continuance of the graduated duty for three years longer.

One of these gentlemen, who occupies a farm of 1,000 acres, and manages another of equal size, informed us that he dreaded the effects upon the market of the Government measure as now proposed—that dealers, millers, and maltsters would avoid purchasing, except only for present necessities—looking for no such impetus to trade, as will cause a rapidly increasing demand—that thus the grain markets will be in a state of comparative stagnation, and that the farmer will be disheartened. On the other hand, this gentleman's opinion is, that if the ports are opened at once, no quantity of grain large enough seriously to affect our markets can, for many months to come, be imported—that dealers in grain, anticipating a greater activity in trade, will be ready to purchase—that then the prices will have a tendency to keep up, and that by the time any foreign grain can be brought into the country, the increased and increasing demand will absorb all that can be brought in, without causing a glut in the home market, and thus suddenly depress the prices; and that thus the real demand and supply will be the cause of the markets being affected, and prices either lowered or raised, instead of a sudden and injurious change by the transactions of speculators, who will wait till the expiry of the duty before they enter the market.

Our informant himself expends on labour on one farm of 1000 acres the sum of 28s. per acre, and his system of cultivation, and the appearance of his stock, shew that he hopes for a good return, not from prices maintained by Act of Parliament, but from farming. An observation made by this gentleman shews that he is above the ignorant prejudice often existing against machinery. Speaking of the mode of threshing their grain in East Lothian, where he had lately been, he remarked "that instead of thereby employing less manual labour, the farmer was enabled to employ, in other channels, a greater amount of labour, and was also ready with a sufficient quantity of grain whenever the market was favourable, instead of having hardly enough to supply his cattle with fodder and litter, as constantly happens by the present mode of threshing the corn." The example shewn to the tenantry by the Earl of Leicester's present bailiff, in a most improved system of cultivation, is such as to stimulate their industry; and as long as such manure heaps and tanks for collecting all the liquid manure, are to be seen on a farm, as may be seen on the home farm at Holkham, the agriculturist of this country need not fear competition with the starving Poles, or other producers of foreign grain.

—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
A PROPRIETOR OF LAND IN SCOTLAND ON A VISIT IN NORFOLK.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Darlington, Jan. 26th, 1846.

SIR,—At the commencement of your formation of the League pack, I entered, with my poor abilities and trifling subscription; and now we have, under your admirable instruction and guidance, hunted the vermin Monopoly through all his windings, stopped all his earthen, and driven him into a corner, till he is fairly at bay, I feel anxious to be "in at the death." For that purpose I beg to subscribe 10l. to the Quarter of a Million Fund, and forward you the first instalment of 20 per cent. Although a small tenant farmer, paying a high rent for my land, and to my labourers double the wages paid in Dorsetshire and Wiltshire, I believe I shall be as well able to pay that rent and those wages when the Corn Laws are repealed as I am now; for I feel convinced that, through their repeal our manufacturers will have a constant and steady good trade, and that consequently there will be such an incalculable increase in the consumption of farming produce as must keep it at a fair price. I cannot hide from myself, that upon the manufacturers and artisans of the country, farmers are principally dependent; they are the great, the ruling consumers of our products; without them, we—all her Majesty's subjects (and the number would be but small in comparison with the present population)—we should be as poverty-stricken and miserable as the inhabitants of Russia or Poland; as ignorant and uncultivated as the Ojibbewa Indians; as, independent of their being our best customers, of their finding employment for our surplus population, which we cannot possibly do without them, every inhabitant of our island would be compelled to rudely cultivate the soil for his subsistence—would be utterly unable to procure one single foreign production, for we should have nothing to give in exchange to foreigners, except that which foreigners have already more than enough of. If farmers and landlords would calmly and dispassionately reflect on these facts, they would soon properly estimate the paramount value and importance of trade to the well-being and prosperity of every individual and class in the empire, and give up at once the nonsensical clap-net of "independence of foreigners." Are we not now to all intents and purposes irremediably dependent upon foreigners for every luxury, nay, every comfort (above those of savage life) which we enjoy?

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
CHARLES GREEN.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

"I was naked, and ye clothed me."

Jan. 27, 1846.

SIR,—I am requested to say, that I have received the second and last parcel of smock-frocks from friends in town. Yes, Sir, I have received in all 36 good frocks for the use of the poor and more than half-naked peasantry. I have given thirty frocks to the needy already; and I am now prepared to clothe forty more labourers in a few days with good smock-frocks. A thousand thanks to those Free Traders who continue to respond so nobly and liberally to my appeals. I declare solemnly, earnestly, and emphatically, that were it not for the steps which I have taken from time to time to defend, feed, and clothe the insulted and cruelly oppressed peasantry in my own neighbourhood, some of them would have been consigned to the silent tomb before now. And I do not hesitate to assert that there are those in the country who would like to see the patient sons and daughters of toil thinned by the withering blast of death. It was stated by one of our county magistrates, while sitting on the bench, and in my hearing, this week, that there are a hundred men in the neighbourhood of Biester, Oxon, who would be glad of a day's work but cannot get one? My dear wife and myself are kept hard at work during twelve or fourteen hours every day, with the exception of Sunday, attending to our wretched and degraded neighbours. Of all the sufferers I meet with, single young men are the greatest sufferers; many of them cannot get a day's work, and they seem resolved to die rather than enter the union workhouse. Depend upon it, Mr. Editor, it is not an enviable task to stand between the living and well fed and the starving and half-fed, to stay the plague which "protectionists" feed and keep alive. Here are young men, 25 years of age, able and willing to work for 8d. a-day; but, alas! for them, no man will hire them! Sir, I fearlessly assert that this, our land of boasted prosperity and of Evangelical faith, is guilty of oppressive cruelty to such an extent as to arm against us the hand of God and the hand of man. And if those who care not to know the real state of the country will but persevere a little longer in their stern opposition to those men, and to their measures, who are endeavouring to bring about a better state of things, they must all look for a terrible retribution.—I am, Sir, yours very faithfully,

W. FERGUSON.
Minister of the Congregational Church, Biester, Oxon.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE VERSUS GOATACRE.

To the Editor of THE Times.

SIR,—I beg to send you the following facts relative to the wages earned by the operative classes of our town, which our landowners may compare, if they like, with the wages of the Goatacre and Dorsetshire labourers. If the statement does not remove the prejudices which they entertain towards the Lancashire cotton lords, it perhaps may shame them into an alleviation of the sufferings of their serfs:

	Wages per week.
	s. d.	s. d.
Little piecers, 13 years old	6	6 to 7
Big piecers	9	6—10
Young women, as winders, weavers, or tenters	9	6—12
Spinners (men)	25	0—35

Most of the cottages of mill hands are exceedingly well furnished, with mahogany four-post bedsteads, chests of drawers, and clocks, panelled oak-back couches, &c. Many of them have their rooms handsomely papered. At a recent public dinner here several of the operatives sat with pint decanters of wine before them, and drank to the various toasts with all the nonchalance of gentlemen. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
Ashton, Jan. 12. A COTTON LORD.

10, Woodbridge Street, Clerkenwell, Jan. 28, 1846.

MY DEAR SIR,—Seeing by the reports of the various protection meetings that that party are endeavouring to alarm the manufacturers of protected articles with the removal of their individual protection, I beg to state for myself, as an individual whose sole means of subsistence are derived from the manufacture of one of the protected articles chiefly alluded to, namely, watches, that I have long felt the utter absurdity of any reliance upon such a rotten staff; and as the best evidence I can offer of the sincerity of my views, I beg to hand you the inclosed 5l. in furtherance of the great object you have in view, the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, and with them of all protective duties.

I am, Sir, yours respectfully,
To GEORGE WILSON, Esq. JOHN JACKSON.

SCARBOROUGH, JAN. 31.—The particulars of the Free Trade measure were not generally known in this town until Thursday, when it was resolved, by some of the more active parties in the liberal interest, to have a meeting to consider what steps should be adopted in reference to it. A meeting of electors, including several members of the corporation, was accordingly held yesterday (Friday), at the Temperance Hotel, at which a petition to the House of Commons was agreed upon, and a committee appointed to put it in course of signature. The petition recognises the measure proposed by Sir Robert Peel as an important approximation to the carrying out of the great principle of commercial freedom, upon which the social and moral welfare of this nation, as well as the peace and happiness of the world, so essentially depend; but it expresses regret at that part of it which proposes to postpone the total repeal of the Corn Law for a period of three years, as incompatible with the principle on which the measure professes to be based, and as highly injurious to the interest of the tenant farmers. It, therefore, prays for the immediate as well as total repeal of the Corn Law. It is confidently expected that this petition will receive the signatures, not only of a majority of the electors of the borough, but of many of the neighbouring farmers, and a large number of the inhabitants. When signed, it is to be placed in the hands of Mr Cobden for presentation.

SHETLAND.—Letters dated Lerwick, January 21, announce that a petition to the House of Commons, praying for the immediate and total repeal of the Corn Law, was in active course of signature in Shetland; that the petition states, that those islands cannot produce corn sufficient for the adequate subsistence of more than half of the population—that the only means the inhabitants have of procuring a further supply is by exchanging for it the produce of their fisheries—that this produce is chiefly exported to foreign countries from whence the islanders could obtain cheap bread or corn in exchange for it, but that the Corn Law prevents that exchange, and compels them to purchase their bread from the home corn growers at a greatly enhanced price. And they further offer to produce proof, that in this manner the Corn Law has, for a period of thirty years, unjustly deprived the inhabitants of those islands of half their means of supporting existence. This petition, it was calculated, would be signed by nearly the whole of the electors, and by several thousands of the inhabitants.

PROGRESS OF THE POTATO DISEASE.—With the deepest sorrow we are compelled to state that the potato disease is spreading its ravages most fearfully, and that fever is making its dread appearance in every locality affected by the blight of the people's food.—Cork Examiner.

COBDEEN'S SPEECH.
THE SPEECHES OF R. COBDEEN, ESQ., M.P.,
 and T. M. GIBSON, ESQ., M.P., on Sir R. Peel's Budget, WILL BE PUBLISHED as early as possible after delivery. Price One Penny each: 6s. per 100.
 LEAGUE OFFICE, 67, Fleet-street, London; J. Gadsby, Newall's Buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.
 Where may be had,
THE GOATACRE MEETING.
 Just published, price One Penny, or 2s. per 100.
A VERBATIM REPORT OF THE MEETING OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS AT GOATACRE, printed in a tract form, 12 pages.
 Sold at the LEAGUE OFFICE, 67, Fleet-street, London; and by J. Gadsby,
 Newall's Buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

While we congratulate our readers on the progress of the subscriptions to the Quarter of a Million Fund, and on the effect that they have obviously produced without and within the walls of Parliament, we must impress upon them the necessity of not relaxing in their exertions, now that the crisis of our great struggle has arrived. The victory is not yet won; all the resources, and all the energies of the League, will be required, before complete success can be achieved. A dissolution of Parliament appears to be imminent; and the battle of Free Trade will have to be fought inch by inch on the hustings. We are anxious to urge on our friends the importance, not only of subscribing freely, but of subscribing early. The manifestation of strength will often decide the course of the wavering and the doubtful; but, above all, our subscriptions are the best proof that we are thoroughly in earnest, and that we shall not cease to labour until every link of the fetters imposed on British industry is struck off, and every restriction on the supply of food to the people completely annihilated.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Feb. 4, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

	£	s.	d.
*Reyner, A & F, Ashton under-lyne	200	0	0
*Booth, Thomas, Rochdale
*Hoyle, John do	200	0	0
*Hoyle, James do
*Hoyle, Thomas do
*Hoyle, Thomas and Sons, Manchester	200	0	0
Fletcher, Samuel, Sons and Co, do	100	0	0
*Whitehead, Thos, and Brothers, Holly Mount, Rawtenstall, near do	100	0	0
*Buckley, James Smith, Ashton-under-Lyne	100	0	0
*Stuart, Robert, Manchester	60	0	0
*Barnes, T and R, Manchester	60	0	0
*Helliwell, Wm, Frith Mill, near Todmorden	50	0	0
*Grundy, John, Belle Vue, near Bury, Lancashire	50	0	0
*Greig, Watson, and Greig, Manchester	30	0	0
Sumner, Francis, Glossop	20	0	0
*Martin, Peter, Bolton	20	0	0
*Renshaw, William, Salford	20	0	0
*Higginbotham, George, Ashton-under-Lyne	20	0	0
*Syddall, Benjamin, Manchester	20	0	0
*Stewart, Thomas, Stockport	10	0	0
Kay, John, Salford	10	0	0
*Hollins, Henry, Bolton	10	0	0
*Ormerod, O and W, Rochdale	10	0	0
*Acton, Mr, cotton-spinner, Wigan	10	0	0
*Moore, Robert R R, Manchester	10	0	0
*Crosland, Joseph, Bolton	10	0	0
*Farrar, James & Brothers, 8, New Brown-street, Manchester	10	0	0
*Kershaw, Samuel, Glossop	10	0	0
*Andrew, Jerry and Frank, Moseley, near Ashton-under-Lyne	10	0	0
*Branson, George, Ducie Bridge, Manchester	6	0	0
*Three Cotton Spinners (per B Syddall, Esq., Manchester)	5	0	0
*Molineaux, Mr, Dullam Works, Warrington	5	0	0
*Richmond, James, Manchester	5	0	0
*Haddfield, John, Glossop	5	0	0
*McCartney, William, Rumford st., Manchester	5	0	0
*Phillips, Thomas Wm Didsbury, near do	5	0	0
*Simpson, W M. Ducie place, do	5	0	0
*Wilson, Lawrence, Cornholme Mill, near Todmorden	5	0	0
*Chapman, J., solicitor, Fountain-st., Manchester	5	0	0
*Booth, James, 74, Grosvenor-street, C on M, do	5	0	0
*A Friend (per Thomas Johnson), do	4	0	0
*Whitaker, Edmund, Sandholm, Todmorden	2	0	0
*Drooge, William, 5, Blackfriars, Manchester	2	0	0
*Holland, James, 70, St Stephen's-street, Salford	2	0	0
*Charlton, James, Albert-street, Manchester	2	0	0
*Holmes, Josh, Market-street, do	2	0	0
*Lee, John, painter, Wigan	2	0	0
*Cookin, Joseph & James, 36, Market-street, Manchester	2	2	0
*Barlow, James, Blakeley-street, do	2	2	0
*Woodward, William, 3, Greenwood-st, do	2	2	0
*Horsfall, Js, 5, Renshaw-st, New Stretford-rd do	1	1	0
*Philip, R, 18, Cooper-street, do	1	1	0
*Irving, Wm, accountant, 168, Medlock-street, Hulme, do	1	1	0
*Roberts, Wm, 50, Stretford New road, Hulme, do	1	1	0

*Sinclair, Martin, 1, Worcester-street, Hulme, do	1	1	0
*Peate, Henry, 9, St. James's square do	1	1	0
*Goodwin, Geo, 16, Swan street, Manchester	1	1	0
*Warburton, Jno, and Sons, Withly Grove, do	1	1	0
*Southam, Jno, Leech-street, do	1	1	0
*Stanley, Thos, 11, Cross-street, do	1	1	0
*Adams, Jno, 265, Deansgate, do	1	1	0
*Broadfield John, Cateaton-street, do	1	1	0
*Goodwin, Josh, Heaton Norris, Stockport	1	1	0
*Hobson, Abel, Wharf-street, Portwood, do	1	1	0
*Hailwood, Josh, 52, Spear-street, Manchester	1	1	0
*Kershaw, Jas, 40, Stretford New-road, do	1	1	0
*Kershaw, Thos, Butler-lane, Oldham-road, Manchester	1	0	0
*A Friend, do	1	0	0
*Kershaw, John, junr, Sladen Mill, Littleborough, nr Rochdale	1	0	0
*A. M. F., Falkirk, N. B.	1	0	0
*Atkin, Henry, Sheffield	1	0	0
*Evans, Thomas, Stretford New-road, Hulme, Manchester	1	0	0
*Wedderburn, Jno, Belhaven, Dunbar, N. B.	1	0	0
*Lamb, Samuel, 12, Fennel-street, Manchester	1	0	0
*Holland, Jno, Sandy Well, Salford	1	0	0
*Edge, Mr, 60, Bridge-street, Manchester	1	0	0
*Bardsley, Jno, 43, Ridgway-street, do	1	0	0
*Lowry, Jacob, 3, Bond-street do	1	0	0
*Slater, Moses, Carbrook, near Staleybridge	1	0	0
*Day, Edward, 172, Deansgate, Manchester	1	0	0
*Booth, Edward, 79, Union-street, Ardwick, do	1	0	0
*Hill, Wm, Hollingworth, near Mottram	1	0	0
*Owen, Thomas, Mrs, Medlock-street, Manchester	1	0	0
*Ridmayne, Matthew, 113, Medlock-street, do	1	0	0
*Bardsley, Jno, 43, Ridgway-street, do	1	0	0
*Beadsley, W. and J., Pomona Gardens, Manchester	1	0	0
*Salt, Jno, 72, London-road do	1	0	0
*Taylor, Alexander, Hume-street, Arbroath	1	0	0
*Fairweather, Jno, King-st, Hulme, Manchester	1	0	0
*Orr, Matthew, Greenock N.B.	1	0	0
*Cranstone, G, Ware, Herts	1	0	0
*Marshall, J, 30, Broughton-pl, Edinburgh	1	0	0
*Saxon, Benjamin, 133, Chester-road, Hulme, Manchester	1	0	0
*Dearden, Abraham, 51, Wilcomb street, do do	1	0	0
*Duesbury, W, Stretford New road do do	1	0	0
*Drewry, Benjamin, Stamford Terrace do do	1	0	0
*Bradley, Joseph, Bamford-arms, Stockport	1	0	0
*Lampard, G, Longbridge Deverill, nr Warminster	1	0	0
*Sowter, George, Kedleston rd, Derby	1	0	0
*Cooper, Thomas, Brook-st, do	1	0	0
*Bakewell, Mrs, Medlock-st, Hulme, Manchester	0	10	0
*Gretton, J, 8, Rosamond-place, do	0	10	0
*Litherland, Wm, Dock-yard, Hulme, do	0	10	0
*Boardman, Jas, 56, Bloom-st, do	0	5	0
*Rothwell, Thomas, 96, Worcester-st, Hulme, do	0	5	0
*Haywood, Jno, 170, Deansgate, do	0	5	0
*Pascall, Wm, 164, do do	0	5	0
*Machin, Jno, 244, do do	0	5	0
*Poole, Edward, 67, Medlock-st, do	0	5	0
*Fielden, David, 84, Gt Jackson-st, Hulme, do	0	5	0
*Two Friends	0	4	0
*Douglas, Daniel, 91, Medlock-st, Manchester	0	3	0
*Sharples, Henry, 158, Medlock-st, Hulme, do	0	2	6
*Travis, Mrs, 44, Stretford New-road, Hulme, do	0	2	6
*Keal, John, 48, do do	0	2	6
*Barlow, Samuel, 21, do do	0	2	6
*Fletcher, Richd, 45, River-st, Hulme, Manchester	0	2	6
*Bromley, Wm, 46, Medlock-st, do	0	2	6
*Birkbeck, Jno, 160, Deansgate, do	0	2	6
*Lees, W, 8, Gt Jackson-st, do	0	2	0
*Williamson, Mrs, 52, Gt Jackson-st, do	0	2	6
*Hays, T, 17, Stanley-st, Hulme, do	0	2	6
*Small Subscriptions	0	7	0
*Long, Henry, Knutsford	12	0	0
*Swinburne, Joseph, do	1	0	0
*Alcock, Wm do	1	0	0
*A Friend do	0	12	0
*Gre n, H do	0	8	0
*Turner, J, Rev do	0	8	0
*Holland, Mrs A do	0	8	0
*A Friend do	0	5	0
*Gannon, Mrs S do	0	4	0
*Payne, John do	0	4	0
*A Friend do	0	4	0
*Clarke, Edw do	0	2	6
*Marron, Mr do	0	2	6
*Lawrence, Thomas do	0	2	6
*Small Sums	1	0	0
*Chaloner, Edw, Oak Hill, Old Swan	10	0	0
*Cochran, W, 2, South John-street	4	0	0
*Ashton, Neale, and Co, 91, St Ann-st	4	0	0
*Jones, W B, 47, Dale-street	2	0	0
*Stansfield, Sam, Field Head Lodge, Hawkshend	2	0	0
*Gibbons, John, 12, Beckwith-street	1	1	0
*Graham, R, 1, Gt Nelson-street, North	1	1	0
*Richards, Wm, 14, Bath-street	1	0	0
*Bennett, John, Lord-street	1	0	0
*Appleby, Joseph Windsor View Lodge-lane	1	0	0
*Hayward, T B, 50, Bold-street	1	0	0
*Shepherd, Wm, 13, Clayton-square	1	0	0
*Franklin, Wm, Upper Parliament-street	1	0	0
*McAlister, John, 19, Renshaw-street	1	0	0
*McMillen, Wm and Co, 2, Surrey-street	1	0	0
*Hodgins, R E, Ludlow, Salop	1	0	0
*Harding, Vernon, 16, Byron-street	1	0	0
Joiners in the employ of Messrs. Walker, Birkenhead, in addition to £11 9s previously subscribed	0	14	0
*Adams, Henry, Much Woolton	0	10	0
*Cosmopolite	0	10	0
*Haylock, H M, 15, Mons-street	0	5	3
*Cudde, Geo, 34, Paradise-street	0	5	0
*Lawson, Thomas, Puri-street	0	5	0
*Statham, Wm, 13, Chesterfield-street	0	5	0
*Greaves, Peter, 53, Ashton-street	0	4	0
*Protheroe, Edward Davis, M.P.	50	0	0
*Bottomley, Moses, Shelf, near	10	0	0
*Milnor, Wm	2	0	0
*Smith and Hargreaves	2	0	0
*Metcalfe, Wm Aked	2	0	0
*Trustees of Oddfellows Hall	2	0	0
*Ingham John, Waterhouse-street	1	0	0
*Wilson, John, Ovenden, near	1	0	0
*Simpson, John, Woodshops	1	0	0
*Wild, James, Winding-road	0	8	0
Sundry Subscriptions, per T. Bairstow, Bridge-street	1	1	6
Do Do J Walker, Bedford-street	1	2	6
Do Do R Whiteley, Crib-lane	1	0	6
Do Do WBakewell, at J Akroyd & Son	1	0	6
Do Do T Smith, Branswick-street	1	0	0

Bradford, Yorkshire.	*Cochrane, James	10	0	0
	*Bateman, James, Low Moor	4	0	0
	*Billingsley, Tankard, and Co	4	0	0
	*Thistlethwaite, J, Cheapside, woolstapler	1	1	0
	*Woodhead, W. H, Westgate	1	1	0
	*Wilson, Thos, Sun Bridge	1	1	0
	*Tankard, Benjamin, Bowling	1	0	0
	*Dale, John, bookseller	1	0	0
	*Watson, W, Kirkgate	1	0	0
	*Wright, John, Wibsey	1	0	0
	*Bottomley, Jonathan, Calledonian Mill	1	0	0
Barnsley District	*Norton, Geo, Clayton West, near Hud- dersfield	10	0	0
	*Norton, J, Clayton West, near	4	0	0
	*Hyde, Wm, Barnsley	2	0	0
	*Shaws, Messrs, Dodworth Green, near Barnsley	1	0	0
	*Sykes, Matthew, do	1	0	0
	*A Friend, per Mr. Harvey do	1	0	0
	Ellison, Thomas do	0	10	0
	*Box, Mr, Clayton West, nr Huddersfield	0	10	0
	*Smith, G H, Barnsley	0	10	0
Kille, near Bradford, Yorkshire.	*Ward, James, Green	1	1	0
	*Rider, Thomas	1	1	0
	*Craven, Wm, Buck Mill	1	1	0
	*Dibb, Christopher	1	1	0
	*Walker, Thomas, Albion Mill	1	1	0
	*Russell, Wm	1	0	0
	*Rushforth, John	0	12	0
	*Audsley, Francis	0	12	0
	*Rycroft, Benjamin	0	12	0
	*Stringer, J, Rev	0	12	0
	*Vint, G and Brothers	0	12	0
	*Oldfield, Geo	0	10	0
	*Rawson, John	0	10	0
	*Rushforth, James	0	10	0
	*Craven, Wm, Buck Mill	0	10	0
	Booth, Wm, Eller Carr	0	6	0
	Hutton, Edwin	0	5	0
	Exley, Benjamin	0	5	0
	Standlid, Geo	0	5	0
	Hargreaves, John	0	5	0
	Smith, Wm	0	5	0
	Wilson, James	0	5	0
	Wright, James, Park Hill	0	5	0
	Upton, C	0	5	0
	Pawson, H	0	5	0
	Knowles, John	0	5	0
	Sandbrooke, Geo	0	5	0
	Smith, Thomas	0	5	0
	Cowell, John	0	5	0
	Alred, Geo	0	5	0
	Sowden, Wm	0	5	0
	Booth, Wm	0	5	0
	Mitchell, John, Eccleshill	0	5	0
	Bland, Benjamin	0	5	0
	Nott, John	0	5	0
	Ward, John and James, Simpson Green	0	4	3
	Stone, John	0	4	0
	Rastrick, Joseph	0	4	0
	Lee, John	0	4	0
	Clark, Thomas	0	4	0
	Banister, Thomas	0	4	0
	Booth, James	0	4	0
	Kitson, John	0	4	0
	Jowett, Nathan	0	4	0
	Watson, John	0	4	0
	Ackroyd, Wm	0	4	0
	Walker, Wm	0	4	0
	Amicus	0	2	6
	Parkinson, R	0	2	6
	Green, R	0	2	6
North, Benjamin	0	2	6
Booth, David	0	2	6
Small Sums	1	14	0
Dewsbury	*Hale, Matthew	5	0	0
	*Tong, Thomas, Earlsheaton, near	4	0	0
	*Hall, Geo and Son	4	0	0
	*Todd, Thomas	2	0	0
	*Rhodes, Wm, Earlsheaton	2	0	0
	*France, John	2	0	0
	*Brensey, Geo	2	0	0
	*Brady, Wm	2	0	0
	*Walker, Joshua, Bank	2	0	0
	*Clay, Joseph and James	2	0	0
	*Blakey, Robt and Geo	2	0	0
	Whitworth, J and Sons, Earlsheaton, nr	2	0	0
	*Clay, James and Son	2	0	0
	*North, Wm, dyer	1	0	0
	*Crawshaw, Simon	1	0	0
	*Hemingway, James, Dawgreen, near	1	0	0
	*Oldroyd, M	1	0	0
	*York, Henry	1	0	0
	*Ward, R & Sons	1	0	0
	*Mines, Matthew, Battley Carr, near	1	0	0
	*Hirst, M, Meadow Cottage	1	0	0
	*Oates, Sam	1	0	0
	*Porritt, Oates, Battley Carr, near	1	0	0
	*Greenwood, John do	1	0	0
	*Fox, John, carpet manufacturer	1	0	0
	*Gloyne, Thomas H	1	0	0
	*Weeks, E H, Rev	1	0	0
	*Fearnley and Hinchliffe	1	0	0
	*Hemingway, Joseph, Earlsheaton, nr	1	0	0
	*Rhodes, Daniel do	1	0	0
	Spence, F	0	12	0
	Horsfield, John, Dawgreen, near	0	10	0
	*Willan, John	0	10	0
	*Thornton, David	0	10	0
	*Dyson, John, and Squire	0	10	0
	*Ridgway, M	0	10	0
	*Eastwood, Wm	0	10	0
	*Ward, Thomas, innkeeper	0	10	0
	*Senior, John do	0	10	0
	*Shepherd, Lewis A	0	10	0
*Johnson, Chas	0	10	0
*Rhodes, J and H, Earlsheaton, near	0	10	0
*Oates, John	0	10	0
*Bedford, John	0	10	0
*Robshaw, Joseph	0	5	0
*Oates, Brooke	0	5	0
*Blakeley, Thos, Battley Carr, near	0	4	0
Walker, R	0	4	0
*Fryer, A T	0	3	0
*Bedford, R	0	2	6
*A Friend	0	2	6
*Halliday, Geo	0	2	6
Hudders- field District	*Schwann, Fred	100	0	0
	*Mallinson, G and Son, Huddersfield	100	0	0
	*Leadbeater, Wm and Son	10	0	0
	*Shaw, Foster	10	0	0
	*Tetley, Brothers	5	0	0
	*Batley, Joseph, Armitage Fold, near	4	0	0
	*Day, John and Son, Daiton, near	4	0	0
	*Moore, Wm, juu	2	2	0
	Prith, Thomas, John-street	2	2	0
	*Armitage, S and J, Shelley	1	8	0
	*Holm, Wm, Rastrick	1	10	0
	*Wilson, Benjamin, Mirfield	1	10	0
	Broughton, John, Rastrick	1	10	0
	*Marshall, J and R, Rastrick, near	1	10	0
	*Ainley, John, sen, Galscar, near	1	10	0
	*Wood, Ephraim, Slaithwaite, near	0	10	0
	Brook, Jaber, Spring-street	0	10	0
	Gurside, J, Liffit	0	10	0
	Bower, J, Slaithwaite	0	10	0
	Hope, John, Bradford, Rastrick	0	8	0
*Armitage, Phineas	0	8	0
*Sheffield, Charles, do	0	8	0
A Poor Operative, Mold Green	0	2	6

Hall.	*Meggett, T. George-yard	1	0	0	*Hayward, Elisha, Melkesham	1	0	0	Battley.	*Sheard, Messrs Michael and Son	3	0	0
	*Meggett, John, Poplar-street, Drypool	1	0	0	*Steele, John, Bridgend Perth	1	0	0		*Jubb, John	3	0	0
	*Thorpe, R. grocer, Market-place	1	0	0	*Low, Andrew, Park place, Dundee	1	0	0		*Jubb, Joseph, jun	1	10	0
	*Brady, E. Caroline place	1	0	0	*Kearsey, George, Bongate green, Ripon	1	0	0		*Sheard, Benjamin	1	0	0
	*Thorpe, E. White Hart, Silver street	1	0	0	Gaden, R. S. corn-merchaut, Pool	1	0	0		*Newsome, R	1	0	0
	*Anderson, W N, Lister-street	1	0	0	*Perry, J. B. High-street, Hereford	1	0	0		*Shackleton, R	0	10	0
	*Todd, C S, Bowl-alley-lane	1	0	0	*Cobbett, James, Deptford-bridge	1	0	0		Lee, Isaac	0	10	0
	*Young, James, Waltham-street	1	0	0	*Clark, William, High-street, Doncaster	1	0	0		*Purdy, Joseph	0	10	0
	*Thompson, E. Whitefriar-gate	1	0	0	*Ball, James, The Britton, Devizes	1	0	0		Kay, Matthew	0	8	0
	*Noble, Wm. Market-place	1	0	0	*Booth and Taylor, Pilcher Gate, Nottingham	1	0	0		Akeroyd, John	0	5	0
	*Sotheran, W S, Junction street	1	0	0	*Brandon, Major, 6, Pittville Villas, Cheltenham	1	0	0		Akeroyd, Wm	0	5	0
	*Collinson, W 32, Prospect-street	1	0	0	*Hargreaves, John, Long Preston, near Skipton	1	0	0		Parker, Matthew	0	4	0
	*Musgrave, B, Princes-st, Mason-st	1	0	0	*Buchanan, J, C, Merchant, Greenock	1	0	0	South Shields.	*Jarow Chemical Company	10	0	0
Rotherham.	Bentley, Robert	20	0	0	*Dalgleish, George	1	0	0		*Bell, T, Don Alkali Works	3	0	0
	Jackson, John and Sons, Canklow, nr.	5	0	0	*Hercus, Jno, do	1	0	0		*Bell, J, Barrington-street	2	0	0
	Yates, James, Carr House, near Badger, Thomas	2	0	0	*Halliburton, Thomas, Tushilaw, by Selkirk	1	0	0		*Allon, Wm, Albion-terrace	1	0	0
	Lloyd, Thomas, Masbrough, near Grant and Lilley	1	0	0	*Watson, T, surgeon, 54, West Nile-st, Glasgow	1	0	0		*Mays, R J J, Market place	1	0	0
	Knowles and Brown	1	0	0	*Mullinson, A, Cirencester	1	0	0		*Coward, Wm, Dean-street	1	0	0
	Sandford, Charles R	1	0	0	*Taylor, John, Jasmine Cottage, Hollingwood	1	0	0		Briggs, H, King-street	1	0	0
	Oxley, W H and Co, Parkgate	1	0	0	Subscriptions at the Fox public-house, Russell-st, Bedford-sq. (per Thos Robinson, chairman)	1	3	0		James, Wm do	1	0	0
	Dyson, Henry, Finsley, near Taylor, Geo	1	0	0	*Aston, Thos, 12, Regent-place, Birmingham	1	1	0		*Kennedy, J F do	1	0	0
	Nightingale, Charles	1	0	0	*Richardson, W, bookseller, 100, Kirkgate, Leith	1	1	0		Hodge, J, Wapping-street	1	0	0
	Tasker, Thomas	1	0	0	*Darby, Abraham, Coalbrookdale	1	1	0		*Jackson, J, Ocean-street	1	0	0
	Hobson, Geo	1	0	0	*Callender, David, Lochend-road, Leith	1	1	0		Alexander, Wm do	1	0	0
	Pullin, Henry	1	0	0	*Johnson, B. Henry, Holdgate-crescent, York	1	1	0		*Oyston, Mr, Westoe	1	0	0
Sheffield.	A Friend, per R Bentley	1	0	0	*Montgomery, James, Brentford	1	1	0		Best, J, Thirft-street	1	0	0
	A Friend do	1	0	0	*Henderson, C J, 15, Windsor-st, Edinburgh	1	1	0		Hall, J L do	1	0	0
	Owen, Wm	1	0	0	*Barker, Edw, 23, Landgreave-st, Birmingham	1	1	0		*Imeary, R, Lake Alkali Works	1	0	0
	Flockton, Wm, Masbrough	0	5	0	*Middleton, S S, 7, Charles street, Sheffield	1	1	0		Hewison, H, Thirft-street	1	0	0
	*Table Blade Grinders Union	20	0	0	*Boulton, Joseph, Wellington-terrace, Clifton-park, Birkenhead	1	1	0		*Harper, Wm, Lawe-buildings	1	0	0
	*Saw Grinders Union	5	0	0	*Burgess, Jas & Son, 3, Hunter's-sq, Edinburgh	1	1	0		*Scott, J, Albion-terrace	1	0	0
	*Thompson, Wm, Upper Thorpe	4	0	0	Alexander, John, 96, Laureston-place, ditto	1	1	0		*Aisbitt, Matthew, Thirft-street	1	0	0
	*Hoyland, Wm, Church-street	2	0	0	*Beacon, G, 11, Mount-row, New Kent-road	1	1	0		Eden, T, Shadwell-street	1	0	0
	*Persons frequenting the Spread Eagle	1	5	0	*Cox, Geo James, Elizabeth-terrace, Islington	1	1	0		Hutchinson, Matthew, Long-row	0	10	0
	*Workmen at J Rodgers and Sons, Norfolk-street	10	11	0	*Laidlaw, Thos, 13, South-row, New-road	1	1	0		Robertson, Wm, King-street	0	10	0
	*Wardlaw, C and Son, Malinda-street	1	0	0	*Wallace, Andrew, 162, Devonshire-place, Edge-ware-road	1	1	0		Chapman, R, do	0	5	0
	*Roper, R, Broad-st, Park	1	0	0	Webb, George, 111, High-street, Whitechapel	1	1	0		Raw, Geo, East Holborn	0	5	0
	*Martin, Wm, 42, Eyre-street	1	0	0	*Walker, Mr, 10, Southampton-street, Strand	1	1	0		Holmes, Mr, Mill Dam Glass Works	0	5	0
*Hutchinson, Geo, 50, Milton-street	1	0	0	*Kingsbury, John, 9, New-street, Borough	1	1	0	Douglas, Geo, Shadwell-street	0	2	6
Farsley, near Leeds.	*Smith, Thomas, Westfield-terrace	1	0	0	*Ross, James, and Sons, Glasgow	1	1	0	"On bended knee I beseech you to pass"					0	10	0
	*Champion, A do	1	0	0	*Lewis, Henry, Ebley, near Stroud	1	0	0	A Working Man, King's Cross					0	10	0
	*Travis, Wm do	1	0	0	*Dobbing, Mrs E, 1 Malvern-terrace, Islington	1	0	0	Taylor, Thos, Archway Road, Upper Holloway					0	10	0
	*Workmen frequenting the Rock Tavern	1	0	0	*Dobbing, Mr, do	1	0	0	G W, Newcastle-on-Tyne					0	7	6
	*Briggs, H, Hanover-street	1	0	0	Edis, D G, 115, St John-street, Clerkenwell	1	0	0	Lewis, Richard, 28, New Milman-st, Foundling					0	5	0
	*Arnold, J, Wellington-place	1	0	0	Manchester	1	0	0	Haynes, Sam, 9, Hanover Row, Hanover Square					0	5	0
	*Wragge, John, Solly-street	1	0	0	*Burton, John, Basford, near Nottingham	1	0	0	Hatch, Richd, 16, New Union-st, Finsbury					0	5	0
	*Gledhill, James, do	1	0	0	*Southam, Hy, Lansdowne Crescent, Worcester	1	0	0	Lowe, William, 16, Bury-st, Bloomsbury					0	2	6
	*Homan, R, Edward-street	1	0	0	Causar, Wm, Tything, do	1	0	0	Osler, William do do					0	2	6
	Trickett, G, Loxley	0	8	0	*Clark, Thomas, 83, South Portland-st, Glasgow	1	0	0	Robinson, C, 4, Smart's Buildings, High Holborn					0	2	6
	Wilde, Thomas, Wisewood, near Wilde, A W, do	0	4	0	Lees, Robert, 65, South Bridge, Edinburgh	1	0	0	A Lady					0	2	6
	Parkin, Thomas do	0	4	0	*Kennedy, Robt, 59, Stockwell-st, Glasgow	1	0	0	"From a Poor Sussex Fishmonger"					0	2	6
	Wilde, Joshua, Loxley	0	4	0	*Fletcher, Thos, John-st, Sunderland	1	0	0
Denton, Edwin, Storr's Bridge	0	4	0	*Kinross, John, merchant, Ayr	1	0	0	ERRATA.
Ashby, W, Stacey Bank, Loxley, near Brown Henry do	0	4	0	Connolly, Edward, M D, Hanwell, Middlesex	1	0	0	In LEAGUE No. 121.—In the list of Subscriptions at the great meeting at Leeds, for Francis Noble, 50L, read, Francis Hoole.
Hall, John do	0	4	0	*White, Thomas, dyer, Tolbooth Wynd, Leith	1	0	0	In LEAGUE No. 122.—For G. Ainsworth, Holland-street, Rochdale, 20L, read George Ashworth. In LEAGUE, No. 123.—For Henry Wood, Gorce Tosteth Park, read Gorce Piazas, Liverpool.
Revit, Jonathan do	0	4	0	*Hamlin, Mr, George Square, Greenock	1	0	0	SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR THE WILTSHIRE LABOURERS.
Ashforth, Thos do	0	4	0	*Sutherland, James, 44, Constitution-st, Leith	1	0	0	"The Opinion of Labour"					1	1	0
Lee, Thomas do	0	4	0	*Biggart, Thos, Bridgend Mills, Dalry, Ayrshire	1	0	0
Marsh, Michael do	0	4	0	*More, John, Cross Shore-st, Greenock	1	0	0
Hensoll, J, Division-street	0	4	0	*Hinscliffe, James, Lightcliffe, near Halifax	1	0	0
Norton, Wm, Solly-street	0	4	0	Griffen, Harriett, 23, Lansdown Parade, Cheltenham	1	0	0
Free Trader	0	3	0	*F T, Kendall	1	0	0
Small Sums Subscribed	2	3	0	*Hills, Wm, Faversham, Kent	1	0	0
*Andrews, Geo, grocer	2	8	0	Hills, Vincent, Abbey-st, Faversham, do	1	0	0
Farsley, near Leeds.	*Hainsworth, John, clothier	2	8	0	*Ashley, Paul, Waterloo Tavern, Watson's Walk, Sheffield	1	0	0	LETTERS ON THE CORN LAWS, No. LVI.
	*Hainsworth, Dan do	2	0	0	*Heugh, Rev, Dr, Glasgow	1	0	0	TO RICHARD COBDEN ESQ., M.P.
	*Hainsworth, Peter do	2	0	0	*Merryweather, Chas, Calne, Wilts	1	0	0	SIR,—The end of your mission of agitation is in sight. When Sir Robert Peel named the 1st of February, 1849, he fixed a date which the Corn Law will not survive. The period of its existence may be diminished, cannot be extended. He may amend his own scheme, or others may amend it for him. The ensuing debates may issue in various changes of measures or of men. We may witness, in the interval, new Parliaments and new administrations. The political world is entering a temporary chaos, and who can foretell the exact point at which it will emerge? But when, for a doomed law, the day of execution has been thus named, the hypothesis of its prolongation becomes in the highest degree improbable. Not to die by that time will be to live for ever; and this, for the Corn Law, is an impossible alternative.
	*Varley, R, clothier, Staningley	2	0	0	*Jepson, Samuel and Martin, Swindles, Bankway Bank, Stockport	1	0	0	At latest, then, on the 1st Feb., 1849, your foot will be on the corpse of the monster which you have fought as manfully as St. George did the dragon. Perhaps much sooner. The keenness of your eye is not abated, nor the vigour of your arm; and if home thrusts, wisely directed and ceaselessly repeated, can more promptly rid us of the desolating nuisance, it will not live out its little span. You will stay the contortions of its dying agonies. We shall behold you foremost in the struggle of principle, which will precede that of political expediency; and you will prove to the Legislature, as you have proved to the farmer, that not only justice and humanity, but prudence and policy, call for the immediate, rather than the protracted, abolition of the Corn Laws. In the approaching and final conflict men's eyes are on you, in the assured reliance that you will neither compromise any sound principle nor forgo any public advantage.
	*Varley, Wm do	2	0	0	*Watson, Thos, 6, Fargate, Sheffield	1	0	0	You have brought us to the beginning of the end. The confessed impossibility of a protectionist Ministry; the adoption of total and immediate repeal by the Whig party; and the stammering petition for only three years' delay, by the (now) Conservative repealers; these facts are decisive of your success; nor can all the dust raised by ducal bluster obscure their significance. Your car of triumph may
	*Peckover, Dan, Woodhall	2	0	0	*Clark, Joseph, Jun, Southampton	1	0	0
	*Woolsorters at John Varley's Mill	1	11	6	*Neave, Samuel, Totton, near do	1	0	0
	*Taylor, Charles, Staningley	1	1	0	*J.W., York	1	0	0
	*Vickers, John do	1	1	0	*Bayne, Thos, 30, George-square, Glasgow	1	0	0
	*Hollings, Samuel, grocer	1	1	0	*Lowther, Phineas, 5, Saville-street, Hull	1	0	0
	*Varley, Samuel, Staningley	1	1	0	*Brodie, Alfred, Shore Dues Office, Kirkcaldy	1	0	0
	*Harrison, John do	1	0	0	*Field, Wm, Brighouse, near Huddersfield	1	0	0
	*Fifehead, Mr do	1	0	0	*Armstrong, Wm, Tea Dealer, Northampton	1	0	0
Farsley, near Leeds.	*Overlookers at John Varley's Mill, Staningley	1	0	0	Hertfordshire Farmers and others desirous of testifying their sympathy with the Anti-Corn-Law League at the present crisis:—
	*Woolen Spinners at ditto	1	0	0	Capel, W, Watford	5	0	0
	*Cockshott, John, butcher	1	0	0	*Lattimore, C H, Wheathampstead	1	1	0
	*Whitaker, Joseph	1	0	0	*Manser, Wm, Hertford	1	0	0
	*Fairbank, Joseph	1	0	0	*Lattimore, Wm, Wheathampstead	1	0	0
	*Fairbank, Joshua	1	0	0	*Bruton, Edw, sen do	1	0	0
	*Hainsworth, R, grocer	1	0	0	*Hewson, Francis do	1	0	0
	*Parkinson, R, clothier	1	0	0	*Gregory, John do	1	0	0
	*Wade, Benj, clothier, Beckbottom	1	0	0	Batten, A, Welwyn	1	0	0
	*Hainsworth, Chas	1	0	0	Cannon, J, do	1	0	0
	*Busfield, John, listing maker	1	0	0	*Dixon, J, Hertford-Heath	1	0	0
	*Hainsworth, A	1	0	0	*Phillips, Wm, grocer	1	0	0
	*Walton, Martin	1	0	0	*Hanson, T, mule spinner	1	0	0
*Smith, John, miller	1	0	0	*Wilby, J, bookkeeper	1	0	0
*Smith, David	1	0	0	*Scott, Sam, manufacturer	1	0	0
*Hainsworth, R, jun	1	0	0	*Ellis, James and Sons, Little Town End	1	0	0
*Hainsworth, Benjamin	1	0	0	Per CH Lattimore.
*Naylor, Jeremiah, butcher	1	0	0	*Hutchinson, John, Sunderland-street	6	0	0
*Duffield, Richard	1	0	0	*Rahu, A G, South-street	4	0	0
*Gaunt, Reuben, clothier	1	0	0	*Moore, A J, Bridge-street	4	0	0
*Gunn, Isaac do	1	0	0	*Vint, R, Herald Office	4	0	0
*Turner, John do	1	0	0	*Wilson, J, Frederick street	4	0	0
*Strickland, Joseph do	1	0	0	*Thompson, T, Villiers-street	4	0	0
*Waite, Benj, jun do	1	0	0	*Wilson, Henry, Tavistock-place	4	0	0
*Fairbank, Matthew do	1	0	0	*Robson, Thomas, Cumberland-terrace	3	0	0
Rowland, Charles	0	5	0	*Mounsey, E, West Hendon, near	2	0	0
Farsley, near Leeds.	*Pront, Thomas, East Hill, Wandsworth	10	0	0	*Donkin, J, Bridge Hotel	2	0	0
	*Darwin, E, 7, Park-st, Grosvenor-square	10	0	0	*Ogden, H, MD, Dumnyer-street	2	0	0
	*Leavers, William, 5, Park-st, Islington	10	0	0	*Robson, E C, Frederick-street	2	0	0
	*Lawrence, C, John, Rue de Madame Faubey, St. Germain, Paris	10	0	0	*Nesbit, G, Lawrence-street	1	0	0
	*Harker, J W, 21, Upper Bamsbury-st, do	5	0	0	*Bowmaker, E, Coronation-street	1	0	0
	*Adey, G, 10, Manchester terrace, Liverpool-road, Islington	5	0	0	*Thompson, W, Cousin-street	1	0	0
	*Twigg, Joseph, and Brothers, Newhill, Potteries	3	0	0	*A Free Trader	1	0	0
	*Workmen employed at Messrs Shearls, Spelding and Co, Hick-lane Mill, Batley	2	10	0	*Peacock, J, Merton-street	1	0	0
	*Saddington, Samuel, 129, St John's-st, Smithfield	2	2	0	*Tousdale, John, Tatham-street	1	0	0
	*Roberts, Walston, 2, Darwin-terrace, Derby	2	0	0	*Hills, J, High-street	1	0	0
	Gifford, Juliana, Myrtle-cottage, 12, Lausir, Jersey	2	0	0	*Young, J, do	1	0	0
	*Doubleday, William, Hamburgh	2	0	0	*Joplin, J, do	1	0	0
	*Balston, George, manufacturer, Poole	2	0	0	*Cranston, H	1	0	0

be prepared. The laurels will not have time to lose their freshness.

Readily will the confidence you have inspired respond to any call the occasion may require for public co-operation. Petitions for hastening, and bringing on at once, the termination of the evil, so long and loudly protested against, are daily receiving their multitudes of signatures. In the observance of your part of the work, we have guidance and motive to the fulfilment of our own. Seeing you so watchful, we cannot sleep; seeing you so active, we cannot be inert. By whatever co-operation is desired now, we earn our title hereafter to express the just appreciation of your services.

Those services have been rendered by the sacrifice of all that constitutes life to many; by the large invasion, and at times, the entire absorption of your hours of profitable occupation and domestic enjoyment; by exertions in which both the physical fatigue and the mental activity seem beyond the ordinary standard of human endurance; and by the yet higher qualities of extended sympathies, conciliating sympathy; of calmness indomitable by the roughest and rudest assaults; and of a beneficence of spirit ever in harmony with the beneficent principles you advocate. And there is attached to them a yet more important value. The moral of your success deserves the people's study. You have purchased no party aid by compromise. You have fawned for no titled patronage. You have stooped to no popular delusions. By no sinister arts have you sought to aggrandize a power that might be wielded for your own purposes. Faith in the might of knowledge and of truth has been your talisman, unpolluted by foreign admixtures. Hence the influence which you, heretofore an obscure tradesman of Manchester, superciliously assailed on your entrance into public life, given over for crushed and annihilated by the devotees of party connection—hence the influence which you have exercised towards achieving a revolution in the commercial policy of the country, a bloodless and blessed change, alike resplendent either in comparison or in contrast with all recorded revolutions.

Let the trading and middle classes of England revolve that lesson in their inmost souls. It is a revelation to them of their own capabilities. It bids them "venerate themselves" and deserve their own veneration. Servility, inertness, and sordidness; the juggle of care for a family into neglect of the community; the keeping a conscience for private use, and not for public duty; the waiting for Providence in the shape of aristocratic guidance or popular sanction; the faith in great men rather than great principles; and all the thousand sophistications by which people become their own degraders, and reconcile themselves to degradation and uselessness, are for ever shamed by your example in this agitation. All such may learn now how to do something, and to be something, worth being and doing in the world.

Enough may still remain of the strife with monopoly to bring these qualities into exercise. The means of maturing them, even in the quietest times, can never be wanting. Whatever sustains them is the "daily bread" of intellectual and moral life. In the final efforts to be now made, and for many a long year after, they will not fail to be invigorated by the study of this agitation; and eminently by your share of its conduct and its triumph. Posterity will have the means of blending the moral lesson with the material benefits. Your name is safe for history.

A NORWICH WEAVER BOY.

BICESTER.—FREE TRADE SYMPATHY WITH AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.—On Thursday evening, a public meeting was held in the Congregational Chapel, in this town, at which a large body of agricultural labourers and others attended. Many of the toiling sons of labour were relieved through the members of the Chapel and the liberality of Free traders, who had sent sums of money or snook frocks to be distributed amongst them. The Rev. W. Ferguson, the minister of the Chapel, who has taken so much interest in the sufferings of the poor in this locality, addressed the assembly on the benefits to be anticipated from a Free Trade, and was listened to with deep attention.—Oxford Chronicle.

DEPRESSION OF TENANT FARMERS.—At a meeting of the Magistrates, held in this town, on the 17th inst. Mr. Abraham Coates, the overseer of Chalgrove, solicited the Bench to issue warrants of distress against two farmers in his parish, for arrears of poor rates—the one amounting to 13*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*, the other to 6*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* Poverty was the excuse, which the overseer said he believed was the cause.—Warrants granted.

THE NEW ERA.

A WORD OF CAUTION TO FARMERS.

The decree has gone forth. The principle of protection is from henceforth repudiated by the British Government. The Minister has proposed a total, though not an immediate, repeal of the Corn Laws, an absolute but not unconditional Free Trade. Whether he has gained friends for his measure amongst the monopolists by the complications which so mar its completeness and detract from its usefulness, remains to be seen. With that more general view of Sir Robert Peel's plan we do not here propose to deal. Sufficient for our purpose is it to consider it with reference to our own class—the tenant farmers. Well, then, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom has proposed a measure, which, with more or less of drawback and compromise, will make trade free; will ultimately enable the industrious of these realms to carry their industry to the best market. Will the monopolists dare to stand between the British people and their food? Will the oligarchs venture, for their own sordid gain, or for the maintenance of their own sinister influence, to reject that measure?

Of themselves, they dare not; and their only hope of resistance lies in the chance of exciting the farmers by imaginary fears. We farmers know how little heart and reality there is in a protectionist meeting, where the real farmers look on, whilst lords, squires, law agents, and bailiffs bellow forth the silliest and most incoherent absurdities. Of these absurdities the Cabinet has disposed for ever. They will scarcely be again produced at the monopolist meetings which will be got up during the next fortnight. Now, let us offer a word of caution to the farmers. Let them abstain from attending such meetings altogether, or else let some one of their body, in the name of the tenant farmers of the Kingdom, declare, that they want to see an end of this strife, and that the only petitions they sanction will be for immediate as well as the total repeal of the Corn Laws. We, the tenant farmers, are, above all classes, interested in immediate repeal. Some of us may have hoped for, some of us may have feared, some of us may have doubted the policy of Free Trade in corn; but hopes, fears, and doubts, are now vain: the thing is inevitable. For good or for ill, protected agriculture—most of us feelingly know that, at all events, it is trammelled and unprofitable agriculture—is at end. A new era has commenced; and, like it or like it not, we, the farmers of Britain, have to show whether we are so inferior in intelligence, skill, and industry, that with the best market, the best labourers, and the most abundant supply of capital in the world, we cannot compete and compete successfully with the world's husbandmen. Free us from landlord-imposed burdens; let the "peculiar burdens" half defunct feudalism has left on us be removed, and we laugh to scorn the puling nonsense of lords and squires. And this brings us to the point of a practical consideration of Sir Robert Peel's plan as it affects agriculture. In the announcement of the principles which guide him there is little to be desired; he says—as we have ever said:

"I have already spoken of that most important department of agriculture, namely, the fattening of cattle. Now, I believe it is impossible to over-estimate the importance of promoting the fattening of cattle, as instrumental to an improved system of agriculture. The restoration of fertility to the soil by means of manure is one of the most beautiful of the dispensations of Providence; and I believe that there is no manure, bring it from where you will, which, in respect to its fertilising qualities, can enter into competition with that which has been directly derived in this way from the soil. I believe that you cannot conduce more to the improvement of inferior soils than by encouraging the feeding and fattening of cattle, and thus promoting the application of the manure to the increased fertility of the soil. I propose, therefore, that an article of grain, which I believe will be mainly applied to the fattening of cattle, shall hereafter be admitted duty free. It is an article, however, of immense importance—I mean the maize, or Indian corn. Now, I don't consider that by removing the duty upon maize I am depriving agriculture of any protection. Maize is generally used, I believe, in the United States; it is certainly there used partly as human food: and I believe that even its utility as human food is very much disregarded in this country. But I do believe that, by promoting the free import of maize, so far from doing any disservice to agriculture, it will promote the feeding of cattle, and that advantage to agriculture, rather than disadvantage, will be connected therewith. I propose also that an article called buckwheat should be subject to the same rule to which I propose to subject maize, namely, that maize and buckwheat, and the flour of maize and buckwheat, shall be admitted duty free. And I propose also that the meal shall be admitted on an equally favoured footing with the grain. And if any gentleman will ascertain the enormous sums which are now paid by many of the best farmers in the country for the purpose, or in the purchase of linseed-cake and rape-cake, I think they will agree with me that increased facilities for the import of articles that may be used for the fattening of cattle will be of no small service to the agricultural interest. The demand for this linseed-cake is so great, that it is rising in the market, and the consumption is immense. On some farms I believe that the chief object of consumption is to provide manure for the better cultivation of the soil. The price of linseed-cake per thousand in the year 1843 was from 9*l.* to 10*l.*; in 1844, it was 10*l.* to 10 guineas; and in 1846, the price has risen from 12*l.* to 12*l.* 5*s.* In the case of rape-cake, the price per ton in 1843 was 5*l.* 5*s.*; in 1844, it was 4*l.* 5*s.* to 4*l.* 10*s.*; in 1845, from 5*l.* 5*s.* to 5*l.* 10*s.*; and in January, 1846, the price had risen from 4*l.* 5*s.*, in 1844, to 5*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, or 6*l.*"

No farmer in this country, who deserves the name, will gainsay a word of that. And in a latter part of his speech, in reference to a part of the plan for advancing loans to landowners for draining their estates, he said:

"I do not limit the progress of that improvement to the outlay of the actual advance from the national resources. I look to the spirit which would be engendered throughout the agricultural community. I believe that the neighbours of him who improves his property would be stimulated by his example; that they would desire to improve their estates also; that they would commence works of a similar character; and that the consequence would be a general improvement of the land, and a great onward progress among the agriculturists."

Now, this is just what we say of the farmers. Where is the farmer who cannot "by spirit" and activity, when he stands on the firm ground of Free Trade, largely increase the produce of his farm?

In fact, the free access to the markets of the world for all his cattle food will, by itself, turn the balance of many a farmer's book from the wrong to the right side.

What we, as farmers, complain of in Sir R. Peel's measure is, the postponement of the hour of freedom. We are to be subject for three years to a sliding scale of duties on our wheats, our barleys, oats, and so forth, which may, and probably will, sometimes be in practice prohibitory, and must at all times disturb the natural state of the market, and prevent the farmer from making safe calculations and permanent arrangements. For instance, agreements for long leases must be put off till the years 1849 and 1850 shall have disclosed to us what is the natural price of grain in this market; and who can tell what may happen in the meantime? Who will give us a guarantee that we shall have no frantic Richmonds and foolish Mileses deluding sections of the farmers with expectations of the re-establishment of "protection?" Then all the wheat growers of this world will be making an exaggerated estimate of the capacity of our market after the transition period of three years, and they may, perhaps, then send in quantities so large as to produce a depression of prices, and go far to realise some of the evils the monopolists have foretold. But were the trade at once made free, there would be no mistake about it. The capacity of our grain market would be felt load by load, and quarter by quarter, so that instead of a temporary glut we should have a gradual and natural supply. This would be the condition of the market most favourable to us farmers. We farmers seldom get the profits of the ups, though we commonly have to bear the losses of the downs of our trade. A regular steady trade is the grand thing for the farmer.

Then, again, without undervaluing the immediately free importation of Indian corn, which we know to be an immense boon to tenant farmers, why are oats, rye, beans, and peas to be excluded—for, recollect, the new sliding scale will be practically exclusion—for three years? The same argument, used so forcibly by Sir Robert Peel with reference to maize, is strictly applicable to pulse, oats, and rye. Even upon the principles he has laid down as governing his reductions, namely, that where he admits the manufactured article duty free, he will also admit the raw material used by our home manufacturers of the same article. Now, he has admitted pork and bacon of all sorts free, whilst he only allows us pig breeders and pig feeders the single raw material maize. That admission is a benefit, and we are grateful for it; but every farmer knows that in rearing and fattening pigs, beans, and peas form the staple, and, from their peculiar qualities, the cheapest food. Let us farmers, then, loudly demand immediate, as well as total, repeal of all duties on all grain; and, if we can't get that, let us require, as an act of common fairness, on Sir Robert Peel's own showing, that oats, rye, beans, and peas shall be at once admitted duty free.

WEST RIDING ELECTION.

NOMINATION AND ELECTION OF LORD MORPETH.

On Wednesday Lord Morpeth was elected for the West Riding of Yorkshire. He walked the course. Mr. Ferrand, after all his incendiary harangues and blustering demonstrations, was not visible on the hustings. There was nothing to excite the feelings or to attract multitudes but the tranquil dignity of the triumph of a great national cause. And yet the crowd was immense. The number present was estimated at fully 30,000, and Wakefield was a scene of unparalleled gaiety and bustle as the multitudes poured from all quarters to the point where the hustings were erected. Cheap trains, coaches, waggons, carts—in short, every species of vehicle, and all means of locomotion, were in requisition. Many of the leading manufacturers in Leeds and other places had given their people a holiday; and seldom has Wakefield witnessed such a vast concourse of people. The animated scene was still further enlivened by the ringing of bells, and the marching of processions gay with colours and devices, and each preceded by its own band of music.

Shortly after 10 o'clock, Lord Morpeth appeared in a court dress. His Lordship was, of course, enthusiastically received. After the usual formalities, Mr. W. H. Fawkes, of Farnley Hall, proposed his lordship in an eloquent address of considerable length, which was loudly cheered. J. H. Marshall, Esq., seconded the nomination.

The Under-Sheriff then came forward and said—Has any other elector any other candidate to propose? if so, let him come forward, and he shall be heard. (Cheers and great laughter.)

No response having been made to this appeal,

LORD MORPETH stood forward and was received with loud and reiterated bursts of enthusiastic cheering. When silence was partially restored, he said: Gentlemen—electors of the West Riding, and let me add old friends (reiterated cheers)—it is not, it could not be, without varied and very deep emotion, that I find myself here again before you. (Cheers.) Yes, even here in Wakefield, before a constituency of the West Riding do I, the beaten and rejected candidate of 1841, now come forward in 1846, without having offered myself, without having canvassed, and, as it now seems, without being opposed. (Loud cheers.) Not that we have not had some rumours and some demonstrations of opposition. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) There has been plenty of blowing of trumpets; at least, there has been plenty of braying. (Loud laughter.) We first heard of the pretensions of Mr. Archer Gurney, from Rock Vale, in the county of Devon. (Laughter.) That sounds very picturesque; but I believe that this gentle stranger has returned to his sequestered home. (Laughter.) I am told that he appointed a meeting in Wakefield, and that he was met there by four protectionists and seven reporters. (Loud laughter.) All I hope is, that he did not convert the reporters, because I rate their intelligence sufficiently high to be persuaded that, whatever their employers may be, they at least are on the side of Free Trade. (Cheers.) Well, next to Mr. Archer Gurney, came (A Voice in the crowd: The Bingley Bull!)—(Loud laughter)—next to Mr. Gurney, I say, we had a gentleman who, as I am reminded, spoke in somewhat harsher accents. He was not so much a candidate himself as the godfather of candidates. (Laughter;) only, indeed, his godchildren did turn rather rusty. He first hit on two gentlemen, both bearing names—long highly respected in the West Riding. (Cheers.) But the first object of his affections chose to go and fight the battle of native industry in the particularly independent and self-directing borough of Ripon. (Laughter.) Now that seemed somewhat cruel in him to his godfather. (Laughter;) but I think that Mr. Ferrand himself it was who exercised the cruelty endured by the next candidate, because, if I am rightly informed, he has sent a certificate to state that he is not well enough to perform the duties of high sheriff. High and onerous, however, as these duties may be, I dare, from personal experience, to assert that those of a representative of the West Riding are still more trying to the health—(Hear, hear, and laughter.) The result however is, that this day, when the question has been put to you, no opponent has come forward to dispute your choice. (Hear.) And how is it that this has come to pass? Will you, for a moment, in my anxiety to account for the phenomenon—will you let me refer to the last occasion of my meeting you in this town, and then take some credit to myself for having exhibited something of the spirit of prophecy in the remarks which I then ventured to make? (Cheers.) I said on that occasion "that the opinions and the measures of which I am the advocate are now moving in their onward though unseen track, and hastening to their accomplishment;" and I added, "if there be one subject more than another in which a nation is most likely ultimately to see itself righted, it is on that which concerns its food." (Cheers.) And it is on the question of food—that question which has stirred the mind of England to its inmost depths—that I now come again to ask for, and as I believe to receive, the recovered suffrages of the West Riding. (Loud cheers.) But I further said, on the last occasion of our meeting, the "the triumph of our opponents is the most signal and decisive which has yet been attached to the car of Conservative reaction." May I not, then, now say with equal truth that my return this day—my unsolicited, uncanvassed, unopposed return, will lay the corner stone of a great electoral reaction, on which other constituencies first, and finally Parliament itself, with the sanction and sympathy of—the highest of all—the Sovereign herself (cheers)—will erect the finished temple of perfect Free Trade? (Loud cheers.) For I do feel, gentlemen, that often as we have met, and fully as we have sympathised already, there never has yet been an occasion on which our opinions and our hopes have been so much in unison as at present. (Cheers.) I do flatter myself that the great mass which I see around me consists of men boasting honest and simple hearts, wound up to one common aim; and I put it to you, what object can come so closely home to your interests, to your bosoms, to your every day life, as those laws which profess to regulate the admission of corn, and which do in fact regulate your daily meals—(hear)—which concern every class and condition among you—which concern every man whom I address; and not only that, but every one of your wives whom you have left beside the kitchen oven, and every one of your children, who, though they may not be able to ask for food, yet can very well cry for it? (Cheers.) I have already referred to the past; and while I certainly shall think it my duty to address myself mainly to the great question now at issue before the nation, I hope you will not think that I unduly dwell upon any topic merely relating to myself; for, gentlemen, when a candidate comes to present himself to the choice of a constituency, some degree of egotism is almost rendered necessary by the circumstances of his position. (Hear, hear.) In addition, then, to what I have already quoted from former sayings of mine, you may remember, when I was last before you, that I also stated that I did not think I could reconcile it to myself, for the present, to occupy any other seat, or represent any other men, than the seat and the men of the West Riding. (Loud cheers.) Now, it is true that a great number of the inhabitants of this Riding, in an address which they were good enough to present to me, absolved me from all that could be considered binding in that engagement, and although it is true that the time had come when I might have considered it my duty again to embark in the struggles of public life—yet, gentlemen, how I do rejoice now that I have not entered into any other service (cheers), that I have called no other men my masters (loud cheers), that I have reserved myself for this cause and for this hour (tremendous cheering), and that, should you shortly confirm my election, I shall go into the House of Commons as the member for the West Riding, to vote for—(An enthusiastic burst of cheering drowned Lord Morpeth's voice. When it subsided, he exclaimed)—I think you must be aware that the sentence was intended to have concluded with "the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws"—(Repeated cheering.) You will bear in mind that this was the main point on which I sustained defeat, and the Liberal party in the Riding sustained defeat with me, at the last general election. I was then opposed, and then beaten (cries of "shame") by the exertions of the great body of the landed interest (cries of "by bribery"), and by other friends of monopoly, because they said I had adopted a very violent and revolutionary course in recommending a fixed duty of 8s. per quarter. (Laughter.) I think they would be slightly obliged to me now if I could secure them the rejected 8s. duty. (Cheers.) But that scrip has gone down in the market, and no efforts can get it up again. (Laughter.) However, the revolutionary Whigs were got rid of; but, in the meanwhile, a youthful League had sprouted up. Oh, but they did not mind that—not they. On the contrary, they brought in an amended Corn Law of their own, which preserved most of the machinery of the old sliding scale, with some additional features, which they termed "rests." (Laughter.) "Rests!"—most delusive word! Whatever may be the beatitudes of the Corn Law now-a-days, rest is not an element in which it seems destined to breathe. (Cheers and laughter.) However, there were two or three good harvests in succession, and matters went on with comparative smoothness for a year or two. But then came the events of the last autumn, with which most of you must be sufficiently familiar. The average price of the quarter of wheat was thirteen or fourteen shillings higher than it was the year before. The price of the best wheat in the market was fully 20s. higher, and in addition to this the potato crop was afflicted with certainly a considerable and still unknown and mysterious degree of pestilence, in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Under these circumstances, all we know of the movements of Government was, that several Cabinet Councils had met, and broken up, and made no sign. Now, in this state of things the League came down to dine at Leeds, and I wrote them a letter there. (Hear, hear.) I am aware that I have some fastidious friends who told me, and still tell me, that it was all very well to express myself as warmly as I pleased in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws, but that I had no business to give my money to the League. (Laughter, in the midst of which a voice cried out, "It is that 54, note which has secured your election" renewed laughter.) His lordship continued: Well, if that was the case, at any rate I have bought it cheaply. (Cheers and laughter.) At all events I feel that any connection I have formed with the League will not be looked upon as a very grave offence in your eyes (no, no); and I need hardly trouble myself with any lengthened apology on that score. (Hear, hear.) But as on an occasion like this there is no objection on the part of any portion of my well-wishers which I should not wish to meet, I will say this, in the first place, the very little bit of money which has been mentioned was given to promote the local registration of the West Riding, and as a poll taken on the former list of electors turned me out, I can't be held much to blame if I co-operate with others to rectify what, in my opinion, was a mistaken judgment, and to enlighten future constituencies. (Cheers and laughter.) But further than that, with reference to the League generally, I could not look back to the events of the last few years, and at the same time dissemble from myself that, although many members of the League may have said things in which I could not agree, and although the League may have done things to which I could not subscribe, yet that the question of the repeal of the Corn Laws owes its present position mainly to the League (cheers), to its unmeasured exertions, and to the energy and ability of its leaders. (Loud cheers.) (A voice here exclaimed, "Three cheers for Cobden," which were given heartily.) His lordship resumed: And besides, I confess I do not like the notion of reaping the fruit of other men's labour, without assigning the reward which is due to the work. I think that it would be reversing, and not following the parable, if it was the labourer who came in at the eleventh hour who was to be the party making objections to the wages assigned to him who had worked from the first. And although I do not think large self-constituted bodies, whether you call them Leagues or associations, are desirable modes of, or machinery for, working out legislative measures and changes, yet there are objects of such importance as to necessitate even objectionable modes of overcoming the obstinacy of the resistance with which they are opposed. Knowing, then, how powerful and multiplied are the interests combined—I may say leagued—against a repeal of the Corn Laws—feeling this, and viewing the Corn Laws as we all do toppling to their fall, I could not—such were the sentiments in my bosom—I could not withhold that without which good wishes are but hypocrisy, and what Sir John Tyrrell (laughter) would call "humbug," my acknowledged and avowed support. (Cheers.) Next in order came all the Ministerial changes and the changing and crashing of Cabinets. That, gentlemen, has now become rather an old story, with which we have not much concern. You will remember that Sir Robert Peel, though at the head of large majorities in both Houses of Parliament, felt it his duty to resign the Government, and Lord John Russell was honoured by a commission to form an administration in its stead. Now, all with which I have to concern myself is this: I consented to accept office in a Government every member of which had unanimously agreed to the proposition for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. (Immense applause.) Well, that endeavour—that glory-giving endeavour was not even made. It was interrupted by causes wholly independent of that question. They do not concern us now, and I will not enter on their consideration, though I have a strong opinion about them; and I never will conceal my wish that my pure and high-minded friend, Lord John Russell—the statesman who had proposed the abolition of the Corporation and Test Act—the statesman who had introduced into Parliament the Reform Bill—should also have been the person to have proposed to the legislature of his country the final abolition of the Corn Laws. (Enthusiastic applause.) However, I certainly myself should feel, and I am sure that he would feel, any individual or any party disappointment as compensated, and more than compensated, if it should turn out that this great question itself—a question of Free Trade—had more chance of being brought to a satisfactory and triumphant issue with the Government in the hands of Sir Robert Peel rather than in his own. (Loud cheers.) And more, gentlemen, I think that the dispersion of the Whig leaders would have merited still greater reprehension. I think their hesitation would have degenerated into cowardice, and their caution into treason, if they had not felt that they had reason to believe that a Government of which Sir Robert Peel was at the head was prepared to do great things for Free Trade. (Loud cheers.) That expectation has been borne out. (Cheers.) I think none of us will deny that in the recent proposals submitted to Parliament Sir Robert Peel has done great things for Free Trade. (Cheers.) I reserve for myself the consideration of the precise details; but I may say that I cordially approve of the great feature of that measure. I rejoice in the instant admission, free of all duty, of colonial corn, of Indian corn, of meat salt and fresh, and live cattle. I am not sure, though I know that therein I differ from many of my friends, and from many ardent Free Traders in general—I am not sure, I say, that I shall feel myself called upon to dissent from the differences which he still wishes to retain between the admission of slave grown and free-grown sugar. (Cheers.) My doubt is, whether he can in practice realise that difference. But if he can, great as are the lengths I would always go in behalf of Free Trade, I must ever disconnect from all fellowship with that glorious cause the blood-red flag of the slave trade. But, with respect to his measures. I wish above all to avoid the three years' delay before we arrive at the totally free admission of corn. (Cheers.) I object to it as much with reference to agriculture as to any other interest. I am not sure whether it would not in the end tell more prejudicially on them than any other class of the community, and in any amendment or motion which may be brought forward I shall be ready to vote that that which he wishes to take place three years hence shall be immediate and at once. (Loud and protracted cheering.) Gentlemen, if you send me to Parliament, I shall then, as I have explained, be on the whole prepared to give my cordial assent to the measures just submitted to the legislature. (Applause.) And in this state of things, whilst this great proposal has been just launched into the House of Commons, whilst the whole mind of the country is intent on the reception it is there to meet with, it happens that, by the will of Providence, and by the sudden and unexpected death of Lord Wharncliffe, to whom and to whose race I have been ever opposed during my whole public career, but to whom no one of his most determined opponents could refuse the just praise of being an upright, high-minded, and most useful public servant—it happens that by the vacancy occasioned by his death, the consideration of the proposal of the Prime Minister is just at this important and critical moment submitted to this constituency, which is not only the largest in the kingdom, but which, in company perhaps with one other, has a greater interest in having it solved than any other in the realm. (Loud cheers.) Yes, gentlemen, the West Riding of Yorkshire, comprising Leeds with its woollens, and Bradford with its worsteds, and Huddersfield with its fancy goods, and Halifax with its piece goods, and Sheffield with its cutlery, and Rotherham with its iron, and Barnsley with its linens, besides the far and fair domain of agricultural enterprise—this riding has reason to say "aye" or "no," shall there be a total repeal of the Corn Laws; (loud and enthusiastic applause); for that, gentlemen, is the banner which we have planted in our van, and which we engage to support against all assailants. (Cheers.) I cannot be sorry, though Free Traders, as such, recognise no party, and though they are glad to enlist supporters from every party in the state, yet I cannot be sorry to see before me so prevailing a complexion of our own old colour. (Cheers.) I remember in one of our former contests having christened it the "sun's own colour." (Loud cheers.) To day we will call it "the colour of the golden wheat-sheaf," which the same sun is now ripening on a thousand shores, but which the legislation of man has hitherto kept from our ports and markets. (Vociferous applause.) They may talk of a black cloud in the west, but the harvest sun has a ray warm enough to scatter it. (Renewed and enthusiastic cheering.) I know that on the other side of the Atlantic they are uttering big words about Oregon, and we hear that the inhabitants of the western states of the American republic talk particularly loud on that subject, and that they are anxious to have a brush with us; whilst it seems that the inhabitants of the eastern states are more pacific in their disposition. Why is this, gentlemen? It is not in the natural order of things that men should grow more warlike as they live further west. No—it is because the inhabitants of the eastern states have a long sea-bound coast, large manufacturing towns, and ships, and harbours, and commerce. They do not like to risk those things, and therefore they say, naturally and very laudably, they are inclined for peace (hear, hear). But it is different with the western states. In the first place, they cannot be very easily got at; in the next place they produce nothing but agricultural produce, and they know that if besides living 5,000 or 6,000 miles away from us, the quarter of wheat which they might be inclined to send over shall have to pay a duty of 20s. when it arrives, they would not be able to get rid of a single bushel of it, and therefore they cling up their caps for war (Loud cheers). But give them the same motives for peace which the inhabitants of the eastern states have, and being sprung from the same stock as their brethren of Boston, and New York, and Philadelphia, being the sons of pious and broadbrims themselves, they will be actuated by the same motives as their more sedate and sober fellow-citizens, and instead of wishing themselves to go a thousand miles further, where they would meet more new tribes of Red Indians to contend against than draughts of water by the way; and when they arrived there to go to war with us for a number of uninhabited pine swamps, they might think it more desirable to bestow a little more skill on their own rich clay cottons, if you would only give them the means of taking your cottons, your woollens, your worsteds, your hardware in exchange for what they can send us, whether it be wheat or Indian corn—a food hitherto but little known amongst us, but which, from experience, I can safely recommend to you whenever you can get hold of it. You will find that some of their cakes, which they call Johnny cakes, go hard to rival some of our far-famed Yorkshire cakes. (Cheers.) What I have said of the present state of America applies still more strongly to those parts of the American republic which have more intercourse with us, and still more to the countries of Europe in proportion to their proximity; and I rejoice to think that in extending and encouraging universal commerce, we take the best means of extending and encouraging universal peace. (Loud cheers.) I was much struck a year or two ago on conversing with a neighbouring farmer of ours over in an adjacent county, as to the prospects of agriculture, when he said to me, "Ay, there never was a friend to the farmer like —" Now, like whom do you suppose? Like the Duke of Richmond, or the Duke of Buckingham, or Mr. Hudson, the railway king? No; but like Napoleon Bonaparte. "There never was," said he, "such a friend to the farmer as old Bonaparte." (A laugh.) I thought I had never heard put in such close but unconscious connection the genius of monopoly and the genius of war. (Cheers.) What was the state of the world then with wheat at 136s. a quarter, as it was in 1812, the quarter loaf 1s. 6½d.; war all over the world, and at home nothing but Orders in Council, as our Saddleworth friends will well remember? (Loud cheers.) Give me then, I say, the commerce—not the conquest of the world—overflowing garners, and not an empty laurel—open ports, and free produce, not a decrease of intercourse and the substitution of an embargo—a dependence—I will even use that obnoxious word—a dependence on foreign countries, instead of independence and an isolation from them. (Loud cheers.) Dependence on foreigners! Why that is the favourite bugbear with which the sleek soft-tongued monopolist tries to bamboozle his gaping crowd of rustic auditors. (Loud cheers.) Why, I ask him, how he would do himself without dependence on foreigners? I need not ask whether his wife and daughters do not rustle along in the silks of France, the velvets of Italy, and the lace of Florence? but I would ask himself whether he does not procure his tea from China, and his coffee from Brazil—whether he does not wear the fleeces of Saxony, ay, and perhaps smoke the cigars of Havannah? (Loud cheers.) And if he does that, ask him in your turn why you may not have wheat from the Elbe and bacon from the Ohio? (Loud cheers.) I believe that it is not in diminishing, but in increasing our dependence on foreigners, that we shall best follow out the laws of nature and the will of Providence, and thus enter into the strongest recognizances for the harmony, the peace, the civilisation, and the prosperity of the world. (Hear, hear.) For let me put it to you, what is the case with those manufacturers of which the mistaken friends of the landed interest sometimes present us with so unreasonable and unfounded a jealousy? (Loud cheers.) What are all the manufactures turned out, whether woollen, worsted, or silk, but so much work to sell? Where there is work, there must be hands, and where there are hands there must be mouths, and those mouths are filled with the beef and mutton and beer and bread which are raised from the soil by the landlords and farmers of England. But they say I want to transfer that supply from the native to the foreign grower; and I have just talked of wheat from the Elbe, and bacon from the Ohio; well, but the foreigner will not give his bread and bacon for nothing. He may have a very good opinion of the manufactures of Yorkshire and of England generally; he may have a better opinion of you than Mr. Busfield Ferrand has. (A laugh, and a voice, "He has as good an opinion of huz as we have o' him.") But still, though he may think them very fine fellows, he will not be likely to supply them gratis. He will ask a fair, and what he considers a remunerative price for his corn; because if he does not get that he will not send his corn, and there is an end to all the alarm about the transfer of supply. But I hope he will send a large quantity, and that he will receive a fair price for it, which he must receive either directly in your manufactures, or else in money, for which you will previously have exchanged your work. (Cheers.) Well, to turn out fresh work you must have fresh hands. Fresh hands again, bring fresh mouths, and the fresh corn which the foreigner sends over will be available for additional food, and I believe the additional hands will pretty nearly absorb the additional food; consequently, the demand on our native rural soil will be very nearly the same as at present, and any fall in price would, I flatter myself, be compensated by the demand for the different kinds of produce, and for the food which is produced on our native soil, and it would be compensated further by the withdrawal of the superfluous hands from the old rural districts into the new and improving fields of manufacturing industry. (Cheers and hear.) What I am tempted to look forward to as the result of an entire repeal of the Corn Laws would be much the same in effect as a perpetual succession of good harvests. There would be more to eat in the land, and when there is that, you may depend upon it there will be plenty of mouths to take it. (Loud and long-continued applause.) I cannot but suspect the motives, or, rather, I will say I cannot but object to the reasoning which shrinks from abundance. (Cheers.) The blessing of heaven cannot be the bane of man. (Cheers.) It is not so much to me the absolute diminution of the price of corn which I look to as the result of the operation in the law, but it is to the uninterrupted steadiness of trade—to increased supply following increased demand—more to do and more to eat. (Cheers.) Such are the unblest consequences of the Corn Laws. Why, supposing, as a mere matter of fancy, that some foreigners were to be so violently smitten with love for us, as to send over every year large cargoes of provisions gratis, as a mere token of their respectful regard and consideration for the British people, are we to say, "Oh, no, not by any means; we are much obliged, but really we have plenty, we would rather be excused?" Why, as I have tried to prove, this extravagant supposition, is not much more in favour of the British corn grower than the present state of things. Of course foreign corn growers will have money's worth. They must be paid in manufactures, and more manufactures will produce a demand for more home and foreign grown food. And now let me ask you, gentlemen, whether these are all crude and unsupported theories—will they stand the test of facts? Why, our more recent experience sufficiently shows, that in saying what I have said I am only speaking the words of truth and soberness. We have recently had periods of dear and cheap years. This point was very fully stated in the House of Commons by Sir Jas. Graham—it has been demonstrated also by Sir Robert Peel, and nowhere more fully or more ably than in our excellent weekly instructor the Leeds Mercury. (Loud cheers.) Well, if you remember, there were two periods of commerce; diminished home trade, diminished wages, diminished revenue, with an increased amount of poor rates, turbulence, and crime; while the cheap years have as uniformly and regularly exhibited an increase in wages and employment in every branch of industry: they have recruited the public revenue, and, comparatively speaking, set open the doors of the workhouse and prison. (Loud cheers.) In the summer of 1842, which closed the last period of dear years, who does not remember the state of affairs? Every manufacturing town invaded, every mill barricaded; while last summer, which for the present, but I hope not ultimately, has closed the period of cheap years, what spectacle did it exhibit? Why, every man, from the Premier to the navvy, turning up the sod for new railways, while the great difficulty was that of preserving people from throwing away their good money too fast. (Cheers.) Now, I wish to observe that we have been charged with reckless, almost with revolutionary conduct in suddenly proposing to subvert long-established protection, and to upset deeply-rooted habits of industry. Well, with respect to the suddenness of the proceeding, I think that the events of last autumn will sufficiently acquit us. I have told you of the rise in the averages of wheat, and in fact the prices of wheat have varied in the same market from 36s. to 72s. For a practical view of the results of such variations, let me refer to an agricultural paper, the Mark Lane Express. That journal stated last autumn that "the very inferior quality of a large proportion of the wheat of this year's growth has hitherto prevented the duty from receding more than a step or two; and from present appearances it is questionable whether the article will be for some time admissible below twelve shillings per quarter." And again, "Had the quality of the new produce been only tolerably good, the duty would undoubtedly ere now have fallen to ten shillings per quarter, or even lower, in the regular course of things, the finer sorts of red having been for some time selling at 70s. and upwards, while choice samples of white have realised as much as 80s. per quarter at several of the principal consuming markets. It may be conceived, therefore, how bad must be the quality of the common runs to have kept the general average below 60s. per quarter, such, however, having been the case, the last weekly return for the kingdom being only 59s. 2d. per quarter. (Hear, hear.) So you see the rates of duty founded on the averages are no indications of the real quality of wheat in the market. (Hear, hear.) Then we had the failure of the potato crop, respecting which I may as well read one of the resolutions of the Mansion-house Committee, which sat in Dublin to investigate this melancholy subject—"We are, unfortunately, able to proclaim to the inhabitants of the empire, and in the presence of an all-seeing Providence, that in Ireland famine of a most hideous description must be immediate and pressing, and that pestilence of the most frightful kind is certain and not remote, unless immediately prevented." (Hear, hear.) Now, however Protectionist societies may declaim and protest, I appeal to you whether a Prime Minister could lay his head on his pillow, had he not first taken every means in his power to augment the stock of the nation's food, without the risk of being awakened from his sleep by the sharp cry of a nation's famine. (Hear, hear.) With respect to the more prominent and general charge that there is anything revolutionary in our proceedings, I say, that whilst there are many things in the constitution of this country, in the modes of thought and habits of feeling interwoven with the framework of society, which I should wish to be enduring and eternal, (hear, hear,) yet there is one feature, one painful and pervading feature of our condition, which any one who, like myself, has visited the younger world across the waters—at the same time that he saw many things which he might not wish to copy, would earnestly desire to see removed—an abiding plague spot which he would be ready almost to give up the wealth of both nations to wipe away (hear, hear); what I allude to, is the striking and painful inequality between the two extremes of society—the extreme of wealth and the extreme of poverty. (Hear.) Do not mistake me, I am not declaiming against wealth; wealth we must have to feed our millions; neither am I trying to stir up your minds to repine against poverty. While such numbers continue to cover such space, poverty we must have. But I confess I should not much lament any change which would have a tendency to reduce the extreme inequality of the balance. For what is it I see among my countrymen—what is it I see among the inhabitants of the West Riding, who, in the wonderful multiplicity of their employment, are a very apt and complete representation of the community at large. (Hear, hear.) Why, I see industry without limit and without parallel—lining the valleys, swarming up the hills—plying on the rivers, choking even the railways—an extent and variety of active production calculated to warm, to clothe, to arm, to defend the whole world if they could but be our customers. But what is it that in this boiling, swarming, struggling mass of life and energy alone seems wanting? Why, more to eat (cheers)—a large loaf, a fuller meal. (Cheers again.) Why, I sometimes feel that the very strength of our case constitutes my weakness. I sometimes feel I could willingly shrink from putting it in its full outline before you. (Hear, hear.) I almost wish I had made a mistake in reckoning the extent of the injury which I conceive has been brought about by restrictive and exclusive laws. (Hear, hear.) But is it not so? Taking our whole population together, can it be said that we have all of us enough to live on? (Cries of "No.") And is there, then, not reason to believe that by the removal of restriction—by the admission of foreign corn—by the downfall of monopoly—we can get much more to live on. (Loud cries of "Yes," and cheers.) I know that it always bears the appearance of invidiousness to quote or rely on any religious grounds as the means of enforcing a political question, and I quite agree that it is most invidious and objectionable if we assume that we are more guided by conscientious and religious motives than our opponents. (Hear, hear.) But still I think the person who discards all the religious considerations which can be brought in favour of our view of this question of Free Trade, shows himself strangely wanting in his estimate of the real importance and urgency of the healing measure which we would propose. And though I will not dwell or insist on any such ground, I cannot, before closing these remarks, refrain from asking why, in the face of such evils as we have experienced, and in the face of such advantages as we may hope to realise—why may not human legislators sometimes endeavour to act in the spirit of that blessing which the national church repeats on every Christmas morning—"I will bless her victuals with increase, and will satisfy her poor with bread." (Hear, hear, and loud cheers.) And if I am asked whether the chosen people of old, in reference to whom these words are used, were confined to the limits of their own rocky and barren Judea, I would quote again in reference to the foreign supplies which might be poured in upon them—"The kings of Tarshish and the isles shall bring presents; the kings of Arabia and Saba shall bring gifts. There shall be heaps of corn on the earth, and high on the hills" (cheers). I may be told that those words refer to a still higher fulfilment. They may so; but I contend that the highest and most sacred ministry of faith and of prophecy may be faithfully copied and adopted in every act of disinterested benevolence, in every exercise of comprehensive charity, in the cup of cold water, and in the crust of dry bread to the meanest disciple (loud cheers). I will not venture to recommend the great cause we have in hand to any meaner consideration; I will not let my argument stoop from the height to which it may fairly be raised; but I commend this whole question—the question of free corn, of free food, and of Free Trade—I commend it to the reason, to the feeling, and to the consciences of mankind. (The noble lord sat down amidst the most overwhelming applause.)

Mr. R. WALKER (of Bradford) said, that as an elector of the West Riding, and as a person employing a vast number of operatives, he wished to put a question, which he regarded as one of the greatest importance to the noble lord. (Oh, oh, and cheers.) His lordship having participated in the views of those who had stated that they could not consent to a ten hours' factory bill whilst restrictions continued to be imposed on corn, he wished to ask the noble lord whether, now that those restrictions were likely to be removed, he would support that humane measure for limiting the hours of factory labour to ten in a day for all young persons between 13 and 21 years of age?

LORD MORPETH said: I think that, in accordance with words of my own which have been quoted, the repeal of the Corn Laws will give an opportunity for a fresh consideration, and I hope for satisfactory adjustment of the question of the hours of labour. I ardently wish that the question could be settled by agreement and adjustment, between the employers and the employed. (Cheers, and a voice "No one else has ought to do it.") If it cannot be so settled, I shall be willing to be a party to some legislative enactment. I consider that in the subject I may very likely go against the opinion of some of the masters—against some of the men; but I will leave myself at liberty with respect to both as I think the circumstances of the time and the real interests of both shall at the time require. (Loud cheers, and cries of "We'll trust you with it.")

Mr. WALKER having thanked the noble lord for the courtesy with which he had answered the question.

The UNDER-SHERIFF came forward and said—Has any other elector any other candidate to propose? If there be any such elector let him come forward and he shall be heard. (Cheers.)

No other candidate having been proposed, The UNDER-SHERIFF said: Those freeholders and other electors who are in favour of Lord Morpeth, hold up your hands.

In an instant a dense forest of hands was exultingly displayed.

The UNDER-SHERIFF continued: Those freeholders and other electors who are against the election of Lord Morpeth, let them hold up their hands.

We could only distinguish seven hands held up against the noble lord.

The UNDER-SHERIFF then said: The electors present being unanimously in favour of the election of Lord Morpeth, I do declare that George William Frederick Howard, commonly called Lord Viscount Morpeth is duly elected to serve in Parliament for the West Riding of Yorkshire. [Vociferous applause and waving of hats and handkerchiefs. The example was set by those in the immediate vicinity of the hustings, and was immediately taken up by the vast crowd extending the whole length of Wood Street. The enthusiasm and unanimity which prevailed rendered the scene strikingly imposing.]

LORD MORPETH, M.P., then presented himself and said, Gentlemen, I may now again say, constituents, ("hurrah!") not for the first time. This is, indeed, like the old times. (Cheers.) This recalls many stirring memories. We have, gentlemen, as I remember Sir Robert Peel to have said (and we are now able to quote Sir Robt. Peel) (cheers)—as that right honourable gentleman said, in talking of our last victories in India coming after reverses, "We have effaced the memory of our shame on the field of our previous disaster." (Loud cheers.) The West Riding, I am told, has its own again. (Cheers.) There is no title in the gift of the monarch, the minister, or the people, which I should be so proud of as "The West Riding's Own." (Loud and continued cheers.) And, gentlemen, it is no selfish or personal victory that we have won to-day. Broad as this Riding is, multiplied as its interests are, the effects of our struggle and of our triumph cannot be confined to any local boundary—it cannot be confined to any single county in its ultimate effects—I hope that it cannot be confined to any single nation, or any quarter even of the round globe we live on; but I hope that the shout of our triumph will go over the broad fields of England—that it will find an echo within the walls of the Imperial Legislature, and that it will be stamped, and ratified, and blessed to all future times, in the confirmed intercourse and the increased plenty of nations. (Loud and continued cheers.) You see, gentlemen, I do not lightly estimate the efforts you have made, the front you have shown, the good will with which you have silenced at once the hiss of monopoly, the firm tread with which you have planted the glorious banner of Free Trade; and I hope whenever we meet again, it will be to congratulate each other on our consummated triumph. (Loud cheers.) I have now, gentlemen, after the singular patience and indulgence with which you have heard me, no longer to trespass on your kind attention—that attention to which I never yet appealed in vain—that kindness which did not fail me in the moment of defeat, and which I rejoice to see to-day renewed and accumulated in the glorious shout of our finished victory. (Immense applause in the midst of which Lord Morpeth resumed his seat.)

Three cheers were then given for the League, for Lord Morpeth, and for the Queen.

Mr. CHARLES WOOD, M.P., moved a vote of thanks to the Under-sheriff, and after it had been carried by acclamation, the proceedings terminated, and the crowd slowly dispersed.

The friends of Lord Morpeth, to the number of nearly 500, afterwards sat down to an excellent lunch in the Corn Exchange Rooms. His lordship was himself present. The afternoon was spent very pleasantly.

LEICESTER.—The Committee of the local Anti-Corn-Law Society met on Monday, and, after mature deliberation, determined to petition for immediate repeal, and petitions are now in course of signature. The subscription to the Quarter of a Million Fund has been commenced by the two principal manufacturing firms, Messrs Biggs & Sons, and Messrs Harris & Sons, promising 500l. each.

GREAT MEETING AT LIVERPOOL, TO PETITION FOR THE IMMEDIATE AND TOTAL REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS.

(From the Liverpool Times.)

A public meeting of the friends of Free Trade was held last night in the Concert Hall, Lord Nelson Street, to support a petition to the House of Commons, now in course of signature throughout the county, praying that the repeal of the Corn Laws, proposed by Sir Robert Peel, should be total and immediate, instead of prospective, in its operation. An extremely limited notice of the intention to hold this meeting had been given; but, notwithstanding this circumstance, the room was well filled in about a quarter of an hour after the time fixed for the commencement of the proceedings—namely, half past seven o'clock. Amongst the gentlemen present we noticed the following:—William Brown, Esq., William Rathbone, Esq., Eyre Evans, Esq., James Mulleneux, Esq., Alexander Brown, Esq., Richard Sheil, Esq., Robert Mather, Esq., Charles Holland, Esq., Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., Thomas Blackburn, jun., Esq., Samuel Bulley, Esq., Isaac B. Cooke, Esq., James Harvey, Esq., Samuel Seward, Esq., Charles Robertson, Esq., John Taylor Crook, Esq., Joseph Dawson, Esq., C. E. Rawlins, jun., Esq., Samuel Thornley, Esq., James Cooper, Esq., John Mather, Esq., P. E. Weber, Esq., Samuel Stitt, Esq., John Finch, jun., Esq., Jas. Mellor, Esq., Daniel Mather, Esq., James Ryder, Esq., Samuel Tomkinson, Esq., J. W. Mulleneux, Esq., F. Boulton, Esq., &c.

Wm. Brown, Esq., whose entrance, with the leading gentlemen above named, was hailed with very warm applause, was called to the chair by acclamation.

The CHAIRMAN expressed his regret that the notice which had been given of the meeting had been so short, and that the Amphitheatre could not be obtained, so as to afford more ample accommodation. Having glanced at the important events of the past month, he proceeded to say that when the Free Traders of Liverpool last met, they were gratified by the letters of Lord John Russell and Lord Morpeth, giving in their adhesion to Free Trade; but they were now gratified by the fact of the Prime Minister of England having announced to the whole world that he also and his cabinet had adopted the same views. (Cheers.) For this Sir R. Peel was entitled to their thanks; but at the same time, they could not but express their regret that he had not gone a little further (Hear, hear, and cheers.) They had been the advocates of total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, and they must conscientiously and faithfully stick to their principles. No doubt the Prime Minister was in his heart as good a Free Trader as any person in that room; but he had in some measure been obliged to succumb to the Opposition. (Hear, hear.) He (the chairman) hoped, however, that when the measure about to be brought forward came before the House of Commons, very little difficulty would be experienced in amending that part of it which they considered defective. (Hear, hear.) The fact was, that the rabid protectionists were such perfect gluttons that they did not seem to know when they were beaten in argument. (Laughter and cheers.) They travelled in a circle, round and round and round, and the Free Traders must follow them till they made them fairly bolt. (Applause.) And when this came to pass, the protectionists would find, that, though they had lost some wind in the race, they had not been very materially damaged, and that the Free Traders had won the contest. The country had yet a very hard battle to fight; for, though the Commons might support the Premier, there was some doubt whether his measure would succeed in the Lords, and therefore it was necessary to take every opportunity of supporting him, and of demolishing the stereotype fallacies which the protectionists placed before the country from time to time. Were he not afraid of occupying too much of the time of the meeting, he would briefly run over some of those fallacies, and show upon what slight grounds they rested. (Cries of "go on.") Well, they spoke of a one-sided trade; they spoke of the great injury that the country would sustain by the loss of its gold; they spoke of our being overwhelmed with Polish corn; they said that we should derive no advantage from reciprocity treaties; that by admitting foreign corn we should make ourselves dependent on other nations; and they told us that we should be making very great sacrifices, and receive no corresponding benefits. Now, he thought he could prove that every one of those assertions was a perfectly groundless fallacy. With respect to the loss of our gold, he could easily despatch that. Whence did we draw our gold? Did we not get it from the mines of Peru and Chili? And did not the Peruvians and Chilians receive from us, in exchange for it, what in their estimation was more valuable than gold? We sent to them the products of our industry, what we considered less valuable than gold, and they gave us in exchange their gold, which they considered less valuable than our products. (Cheers.) Having got that gold, what were we to do with it? Were we to accumulate it in England? No; it was only valuable to us as a means of obtaining the comforts, conveniences, and necessities of life. No man wished to keep 100 guineas in his pocket, if he could get something more valuable for it, either in his own country, or from abroad. It was exchanged for an equivalent—gold for merchandise, or merchandise for gold; each party got something which he considered more valuable than that which he parted with, and that was the only kind of trade carried on in the world. (Cheers.) There was no one-sided trade. No one gave anything, not even gold, without receiving an equivalent. (Renewed cheering.) Mr. Alison had told them that if the ports were opened, we should be overwhelmed with corn from Russia, Poland, and America. The Chairman proceeded at some length to show that this assertion was also unfounded, and that the mistake arose from looking only at the cost price of corn in the interior of those countries, without taking into account the cost of transit over difficult roads to the ports, and then of conveying it hither. His fear was, not that we should have too much corn, but that we should have too little. Another of the fallacies put forth at the protection meetings, and by the writers on that side of the question, was, that England had already made very great sacrifices without having received any reciprocity or advantageous concessions from other countries—that, in fact, they had become more stringent as we had gone on relaxing our commercial policy. Now, what was the fact? Norway, in consequence of our measures, had given us a Free Trade tariff, and had enabled us to double our exports. Sweden had neither moved one way nor the other, and her exports had remained the same. The trade with Russia (on whose hemp and flax we had made some little reduction, although we had not given the concessions or relaxations which we ought to have given) had increased from 1,700,000*l.* in 1835 to 2,100,000*l.* in 1844; and if we were to admit her corn and tallow on easy terms, she was prepared to give us a relaxation of her tariff.

(Cheers.) The trade with Prussia told precisely the same story. Owing to the slight relaxations we had made in her favour, dating from the last ten years, our exports thither had trebled. (Hear, hear.) Then look at the German Confederation, where our Government had sent Mr. McGregor to confer with the Zollverein. Their answer, as laid before the House of Commons in 1839, was, "Don't talk to us of commercial treaties, so long as you remain what you are. Take off your corn and timber duties, and we are prepared to negotiate with you. Yet, notwithstanding this unsatisfactory state of our relations, our exports to Germany, had increased from 4,400,000*l.* in 1835 to 6,100,000*l.* in 1844. As to Lubeck, Hamburg, and Bremen, we had nothing to complain of—their duties fluctuated from one to 11½ per cent. Holland had a Free Trade tariff. Belgium had been slightly inoculated by France, and had laid extra duties on some of our goods; but we had nevertheless made considerable progress in our exports to that country. We had increased from 800,000*l.* in 1835 to 1,400,000*l.* in 1844. Then as to France: by having reduced the duty on her wines, we had more than doubled the consumption in England, and increased very much the revenue. In addition to that, our exports, which in 1835 were 1,500,000*l.* in the face of a restrictive tariff had reached 2,000,000*l.* in 1844. In the north of Europe the tariffs were more restrictive than in any other parts of the world. In 1835, our exports amounted to 10,000,000*l.*, and now they had increased to 14,300,000*l.* This demonstrated, without the possibility of contradiction, that every relaxation which we had made had given additional employment to the industry of the country, and added to the wealth, the comforts, and the luxuries of the people. (Hear, and cheers.) We were also told that we had no evidence of the advantages of Free Trade. In disproof of this assertion he would point to the Channel Islands, where land was higher than in England. The chairman next referred to Spain and Portugal. Spain, he said, was prepared to meet us with a Free Trade tariff if we would take her colonial sugar, her fruits and her wines. (Cheers.) He had always considered that Spain had been treated with injustice; and he trusted that although the Prime Minister had not said much relative to sugar in his budget, that he had something in view so as to make an advantageous arrangement with Spain. Portugal held the same language as Spain. She was prepared to admit the products of our industry, if we would admit her wines and fruits at something less than the present rates. Gibraltar was a barren rock. Our exports thither amounted in 1835 to 700,000*l.*; in 1844 they were 1,000,000*l.*; and yet that was a spot possessing no earthly advantage except Free Trade. Sardinia had as free a tariff as she could have. Genoa was a free port; in Tuscany the duties were very light. In the Papal States, the duties had been lowered very greatly, so as to admit the cottons and woollens of this country; and the King of the Two Sicilies had given a very liberal and encouraging tariff, so as to continue and extend our commerce with his dominions. Venice was a free port. Austria, to meet our reductions, had since 1838 gradually reduced her tariff; and she says that if we will go on and reduce our duties on the import of corn, she will make still further reductions. Greece, when raised into a kingdom, adopted in the first instance a very liberal tariff. It had since been raised somewhat; but owing to the cupidity of the officers, the tariff had been made rather higher than it ought to be for a revenue tariff. (Hear.) The duties probably amounted to about 20 per cent. Turkey was as free as could be desired. Egypt was the same. Persia was in a very peculiar situation. Its Government, as was well known, was despotic. Its custom-houses were let to farmers, to make as much as they could. Yet those farmers were sagacious enough to see that it was not wise to lay on heavy duties, and those imposed probably did not amount to more than five per cent. He wished that the same sagacity was exhibited here. In Arabia, the import duties were five per cent, including all charges. China had a very good tariff. There merchants paid five per cent, including transit duties. But, owing to our inability to take a sufficient quantity of tea from China, we had only been able, in the course of the last ten years, to increase our exports to that country from 1,300,000*l.* to 2,300,000*l.*, and this, notwithstanding it contained 800,000,000 of people, whose powers of consumption were illimitable, if they had only the means of payment. In Chili and Peru, the tariff fluctuated from 10 to 25 per cent; in Buenos Ayres and Monte Video, it was about the same, but the probability was that the duties there did not, in fact, bear on us at a higher rate than from 10 to 15 per cent. He had the pleasure of informing the meeting that a new tariff had just arrived from Mexico, and that a most liberal reduction had been made in it. As respected Brazil, however, he was sorry to say that we were placed in a very different position, owing to our exclusion of her sugars; our exports had been reduced from 3,000,000*l.* in 1835 to 2,400,000*l.* in 1844. To the United States, unfortunately, our exports had been reduced from 12,000,000*l.* in 1835 to 8,000,000*l.* in 1844. But if we relaxed our tariff, they would reduce theirs. Mr. Walker, the present Secretary of the Treasury, was disposed to act in a way highly advantageous to the trade of this country, and he (the chairman) hoped that the cessation of our Corn Laws would enable him to carry out the views expressed by him. (Loud cheers.) This would not only have the effect of increasing the commerce between the two countries, but he had no doubt that it would have the still further happy effect of preserving peace. The extent of the trade between England and the United States might be almost boundless, provided we remained in harmony and peace with one another, and both countries liberalised their tariffs. (Loud cheers.) He would now take a glance of the effects of what had been done to protect the colonies of British North America and the West Indies. In 1835, our exports amounted to 9,400,000*l.*; in 1844, they were 8,800,000*l.* Ceylon and the East Indies had made up for this decrease; our exports thither had increased from 4,200,000*l.* in 1835 to 7,500,000*l.* in 1844. He had now carried his audience round the globe, and he had no place to allude to but the little island of St. Thomas's, which was flourishing and prosperous because it was a Free Trade port. The chairman then proceeded to show, by reference to the measures adopted in Antioch in the time of the Emperor Julian, and in Bombay only recently, that the natural and free operations of trade were the best reliance for a country in a time of scarcity. He concluded by stating that the principal object for which the meeting had been convened was to submit to its consideration a petition to Parliament, approving, of course, of what Sir Robert Peel proposed to do, but expressing regret that he had not thoroughly adopted Free Trade principles. Mr. Rathbone would move the first resolution. (The Chairman concluded amidst general and warm applause.)

Wm. Rathbone, Esq., then proposed the first resolution, as follows:—"That we have seen with considerable satisfaction that Her Majesty's Ministers have proposed to introduce into the House of Commons a bill to reduce and repeal the duties on various articles imported into this country, by which greater liberty will be given to commerce and manufactures. At the same time we regret that the proposition with respect to the chief articles of human food is not such as at once to give that freedom to their importation which the necessities of the country require, and which is imperatively necessary in the present alarming condition of the people of Ireland, owing to the failure of the potato crop."

Mr. R. addressed the meeting in support of the resolution, which was seconded by James Mulleneux, Esq., and the motion being put was carried unanimously.

CHARLES HOLLAND, Esq., then proposed a second resolution, to the effect that "the meeting were strongly of opinion that now, more than ever, any duty on the importation of grain was undesirable, and alike unjust to farmers, labourers, and every other class of the people; and that they, therefore, were anxious to sign a county petition to the House of Commons that trade should be free." Mr. H. was succeeded by CHARLES ROBERTSON, Esq., who expressed his cordial approval of Sir Robert Peel's measure; but while he was willing to regard it as a very large instalment, he desired the meeting not to forget that it was neither total nor immediate.

C. E. RAWLINS, Esq., next read a copy of the county petition, which he strongly urged every Free Trader to sign; and after Mr. Lynch, an operative, had addressed the meeting, and a vote of thanks had been passed to the chairman, the assembly, which was very enthusiastic throughout the whole of the proceedings, separated at 10 o'clock.

ANTI-CORN-LAW MEETING AT EDINBURGH.—DEFEAT OF THE CHARTISTS.

On the evening of Thursday, the 29th ult., a meeting of the working classes of Edinburgh was held in the United Secession Church, Cowgate, to consider the propriety of petitioning Parliament for the immediate and total repeal of the Corn Laws. The meeting originated at an assemblage of delegates, representing forty of the principal workshops in the city. The church, which is one of the largest in Edinburgh, was crowded to excess.

Mr. Charles Ross, an operative, was called to the chair. He introduced the subject in a very excellent speech, expressing his conviction that Sir R. Peel's measure, however satisfactory as a great step in advance, was by no means calculated, as a whole, to meet the exigencies of the country. Mr. Sargent, journeyman hatter, proposed the first resolution in an admirable, able, and pointed speech. He began by denying that the repeal of the Corn Law was a party-question, and in the course of his speech he noticed some of the absurd statements made at the agricultural meetings in England. He referred first to Lord Ingestre's advice to the farmers of Lichfield "to keep their powder dry," next to the Duke of Norfolk's famous "curry powder" recipe—and last of all to the threat of the Duke of Richmond to leave the country if the Corn Laws were repealed. There was something truly amazing in the very supposition of this beautiful trio emigrating from the country, with the farmers of Lichfield arrayed in procession under the hereditary Grand Marshal of England, the Duke of Richmond's piper playing the "Rogue's March," with a banner bearing the well-known couplet—

"True patriots we; for be it understood
We leave our country for our country's good."

(Great laughter and applause.) But he would warn the aristocracy to beware. Let them remember that one of the first causes of the French Revolution was the scarcity and dearth of provisions.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Buchanan, when a serious interruption was attempted by some Chartists, one of whom denounced the League as a blasphemous combination to thwart the designs of Providence as manifested in that mysterious visitation—the potato-blight. Amidst hisses, groans, laughter, and confusion, the leaders of the Anti-Corn-Law League were declared by one of these intelligent Chartists to be "a set of deep, designing, money-mongering rogues." One of them maintained and reiterated with imperturbable gravity, that the League itself was a fendish caper,—a cunning device of the evil one, to multiply bread in the wilderness, and to work mischief.

The Chartist orators were ultimately pushed off the platform in the heat and climax of their eloquence, and the great mass of this large and intelligent assemblage, were unanimous and enthusiastic in support of the Free Trade resolutions. The meeting broke up about half-past eleven o'clock.

FREE TRADE TRIUMPHANT.—On Friday evening, Jan. 30th, a large and respectable meeting of the working classes of this town and vicinity took place in the Flowery-Field School Room, for the purpose of adopting a memorial to her most gracious Majesty, praying for a total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the present corn and provision laws. The first resolution, which contained the opinion of the meeting, "That all restrictions on the free importation of corn is unwise, unjust, and a grievance," was proposed by an Irishman, and seconded by an Englishman (which shows the unity that exists between all classes on the present subject), and was ably supported in a speech of great length by a Mr. Brewer, from Bolton, who declared himself a repealer since the days of Peterloo, and showed how the system of protection and the Corn Law acted on the farm labourer, and eulogised the conduct of Messrs. Cobden and Bright for their exertions, and sat down amidst loud applause. The resolution was put from the chair, and passed unanimously. The next resolution for the adoption of the memorial was moved and seconded, and passed unanimously. Several working men addressed the meeting, after which a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Thomas Ashton, manufacturer, for his kindness in lending the use of the school room, another to the chair, and the meeting quietly dispersed.

The Rev. W. Ferguson, dissenting minister of Bicester, Oxon, begs to inform his friends, through the medium of THE LEAGUE, that he has received the following sums and gifts, for the poor peasantry and starving mechanics in his neighbourhood:—From J. Bell, Esq., Wandsworth, 10*l.*; a Friend in Hackney, 10*s.*; J. Bunting, Esq., and others, 19 smock-frocks; W. 6*l.*; L. of Yarmouth, for J. Hubbock, of Okeley Bucks, 10*s.*; A. Muirhead, of Falkirk, 10*s.*

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

DECISION ON THE "SPLITTING ACT," WEST RIDING OF YORK.

ALEXANDER V. NEWMAN.—The case was heard last Michaelmas Term.

CASE.—At a court held to revise the list of voters for the parish of Lockwood, Joseph Bottomley, and thirty-four other persons, claimed to have their names inserted in the register of voters, as owners, each respectively of one undivided thirty-fifth part of freehold land and buildings at Lockwood. The facts of the case are as follows:—Joseph Bottomley being desirous of obtaining a qualification to vote in the election of members for the West Riding of the county of York, some time in the month of January, 1845, called upon an agent of a political association, in the town of Huddersfield, and requested him to obtain a vote for him. Joseph Bottomley wished to obtain a qualification as cheaply as he could, but did not care about the nature or situation of the property, provided it would confer the right of voting, and did not occasion an outlay of money beyond what would give a qualification, the same time securing the ordinary rate of interest. His motive in applying to the agent was not, however, for the investment of money in land or buildings, but only to acquire the right of voting. Some time in the month of January, Messrs C * * *, manufacturers in the neighbourhood of Huddersfield, authorised the said agent to sell for them certain lands and cottages for the sum of £1400., their only object being to increase the number of voters for the West Riding of York. They were not in want of money, and would not sell any portion of their real estate, but it was only for the reason before mentioned. The agent then Messrs C. employed in this transaction was not their general attorney, but was only the agent of the before mentioned Association; he had publicly caused advertisements to be placed in the newspapers inviting parties either to sell or purchase small freeholds for the purpose of qualifying themselves, and referring to himself as an agent, in consequence of such authority from Messrs. C.; and from instructions received from Joseph Bottomley and many other persons similarly disposed, he arranged the purchase and sale of the said lands and cottages to Joseph Bottomley and thirty-four other persons, as tenants in common, for the sum of £1400. The conveyance was accordingly prepared by the agent, and duly executed by Joseph Bottomley, on the 22nd day of January last, on which occasion he paid his portion of the purchase money, viz., 40l., to the agent, on behalf of Messrs. C., and 1l. towards the agent's bill of costs: on the same day a lease of the land and cottages was executed by Bottomley and thirty-four other tenants in common, to the vendors, Messrs. C., for the period of fifteen years, at an annual rent of 70l., which rent had since been duly paid. The land and cottages are within a very short distance of Messrs. C.'s mill, and were before, and at the time of the purchase, and are still in the occupation of persons employed at their own mill. The conveyance was bona fide, and the purchase money was the money of Joseph Bottomley, and the several other purchasers. There was no secret trust or reservation in favour of the sellers, nor any agreement as to the mode in which the elective franchise should be exercised by the 35 purchasers, or any of them; nor had any of them any communication with Messrs. C. They, and the 35 purchasers entertained the same public opinion: and though there was no immediate consent between them, the only objects of the transactions on both sides was to multiply voices in the election of members of Parliament, for the West Riding of York. Upon these facts, the claim of Joseph Bottomley, to have his name inserted in the list of voters, was opposed on the ground that the case came within the statute 7th and 8th Wm. III., chap. 25, commonly called the "Splitting Act" as being a conveyance made in order to multiply voices, or to split and divide, the interest in houses, or land, among several persons to enable them to vote at elections, and therefore were void, and of none effect. The revising barrister decided that the statute did not apply to this case, and that the claimants were entitled to have their names retained on the list.

This was a consolidated appeal, and nine other names were to abide the decision of the court in the foregoing case.

JUDGMENT.—CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—This appeal against the decision of the revising barrister for the West Riding of the county of York, raises the distinct question whether a conveyance to a body of purchasers as tenants in common is void under the 7th section of the statute 7th and 8th of Wm. III., chap. 25, such conveyance being made on the part of the vendor and the vendees, with the avowed and only object of multiplying voices at elections, and gain the franchise; it being at the same time a bona fide conveyance, made on a contract of sale, where the purchase money had been paid and possession of the land really taken, and kept under the conveyance, and where there was no search, trust, or reservation in favour of the seller, nor any stipulation as to the way in which the elective should be exercised? The question is undoubtedly one of considerable importance, not only as it involves the general principle of election law, but as it applies to a large number of the cases reserved for our determination. It has been argued before us, both on the present and other reserved cases that will depend upon a proper construction of the statute above referred to, taking into consideration at the same time the statutes subsequently passed and relating to the same subject matter, that if the conveyance in question was not a void conveyance then that the several persons claiming the right to vote under it were entitled to have their names retained on the list of voters for the West Riding of the county of York. Even if the statutes 7 and 8 Will. III. were the only statutes passed upon the subject, and if that passage were to be construed strictly by the very letter, we think its provisions cannot be held to extend to the case of any conveyance made on a really bona fide contract for the sale and purchase of land, but that the statute was intended to apply to fictitious conveyances that had nothing more than the form and appearance of a conveyance, the parchment and the seal only—the parties thereto having lawfully agreed and intended that no interest should actually pass thereby. The first observation that arises upon the statute of William III. as to the provision now under discussion is that the clause is declaratory simply of the common law. The first branch of that section creates a new law. It is thereby enacted, "That no person shall have a vote at elections by reason of any trust, estate, or mortgage, unless such trustee or mortgagee be in actual possession or in receipt of the rents and profits of the same estate; but that the mortgagee or cestuique trust in possession shall and may vote for the same estate;" but the second branch of the section, which is not now under discussion, is framed very differently, and by this latter branch, "all conveyances, in order to multiply voices and split and divide the interest in any houses and lands among several persons, to enable them to vote at elections of members to serve in Parliament are hereby declared to be void and of none effect." This important distinction proves incontestably that the latter fact was intended only to declare the law as it stood, giving to it the greater weight and sanction of a legislative declaration. The first question, therefore, is, what conveyances made in order to multiply voices at elections would be void at common law? The right of voting for knights of the shire, given by the common law, is acquired by the two statutes, the 8th & 10th of Henry VI., being given to such people dwelling and resident in each shire, whereof every man shall have freehold in the same county to the value of 40s. by the year, at least, clear of all charges, and there was no restriction or prohibition by the common law against any man's purchasing freeholds within the counties of a sufficient amount to qualify him to vote, nor on the other hand against any man's selling the same to one or any number of purchasers, although the object of the seller and purchaser might be that the purchaser would acquire a vote; and, consequently, that the number of votes should be thereby increased. By the common law, therefore, no conveyance really and honestly made for the purpose of carrying such contract into effect was void. But by the common law, from the earliest times, a conveyance, however perfect in point of form, notwithstanding that it had been originally intended by a secret act or understanding between the parties never to have any legal effect, as a conveyance, was always held to be void, whatever the secret object and purpose of the parties in making such conveyance might be. The old text writers have laid it down as an axiom, that "the law abhors covin, and any coviner's act shall be void;" and it is on that principle unquestionably that a conveyance, made in order, or for the purpose of giving a qualification to vote at elections, or for any other purpose, if made with the secret intention and design that it should fail to be evidence of any contract between the parties themselves, shall pass no interest and have no effect, would be fraudulent, and void at common law. Lord Somers, and it is impossible to name an authority of greater weight on a subject of the nature of the present, is express to this point in an observation made by him on the trial of the case of Onslow v. the Bailiff of Haslemere, for misconduct, as the returning officer, on which occasion it was proved that many of the voters claimed, under conveyances, of very many insignificant parts of burghage land that had been lately made, and fraudulently contrived to make votes against the election. He lays it down thus—"this case should be a caution to places having rights of election against making votes, by splitting burgess freeholds by such fraudulent conveyances, all such fraudulent conveyances as are not clearly made bona fide, a good consideration being in that case held to be void by the common law."—(See Lord Somers's Tracts.) He thus draws a very marked distinction between conveyances made to give qualifications where they are really honest, and where they are fraudulent and fictitious, making the latter only void at common law; and as this trial took place only about fifteen years before the passing of the statute of William the Third, the language of Lord Somers affords strong evidence of how the common law stood at the time of passing that act. Again, the very language of the statute of William seems to point to the necessary conclusion that real and bona fide conveyances were not intended to be abolished, although the motive and purpose of the parties might be that of multiplying voices at elections, but such conveyances only made for that purpose, were fraudulent and fictitious. The statute says, "All conveyances in order to multiply voices" are declared to be void: it names a "conveyance" only, and makes no reference whatever to any contract for sale on which a real conveyance was grounded, nor seeks to deal in any manner with the estate and interest on the land affected by the contract of sale, nor provides for the reverting of the land which passed into the possession of the purchaser under a consideration, nor for the repayment of the purchase money to the purchaser: all which provisions might well be expected if the conveyance on a real bona fide contract of sale is not a fictitious conveyance, only was intended to be avoided on account of the motive on which it was entered into. And this is the more striking, as in the very same section provision is made as to the estate of trustees and mortgagees, so that the mind of the legislature must have been awakened to the distinction between pretended conveyances which conveyed no estate, and one which was the completion of a real contract between the seller and purchaser. According to the distinction laid down by Lord Thurlow, that if the jus disponendum remains in any other person it is no longer in the person who conveys a right to transfer an estate that remains in another; and if the words of the statute do not in their strict and necessary construction compel us to hold a conveyance made for the completion of a bona fide contract of sale to be bad on the ground that the object of the parties was to multiply voices at an election, there is no general principle on which those words ought to be extended. The object of increasing the number of freeholders at a county election is not an object in itself against the law, or morality, or sound policy; there is nothing injurious to the community in one man saying to another, "Buy that land for the direct purpose of giving or acquiring a qualification. The object to be effected is neither malum in se, nor malum prohibitum; on the contrary, increasing the number of persons enjoying the elective franchise has been held by many to be beneficial to the constitution; and it certainly appears to have been the essential object of the legislature, in passing the late Act for the registration of the people of England and Wales. What ground can therefore exist for extending to real and honest proceedings the words of the statute, which may be fully satisfied by giving them the force of avoiding public conveyances only. It is further to be observed, that holding the statute of William to extend to a conveyance made, or real sale, would be productive of much inconvenience and injury to all claiming under the purchaser. The object and purpose which this is intended to effect, cannot be displayed on the face of the conveyance bill, is altogether concealed in the breasts of the parties themselves, so that by the larger construction of the statute contended for on the part of the appellant at any future time, and between other parties than those to the original conveyance, this illegal motive, if brought to light by accident or otherwise, might destroy the title to an estate in whose hands it might be, for a sum really paid, or where there were two purchasers; or it may be perhaps even the conveyance of part of the sellers land to one other person, if the object was that above mentioned, must be held to be void on such a construction of the Act as this. A landlord of an estate could not sell any part of it bona fide, and for a full consideration in money, to two different purchasers, or perhaps to one only, if the object of such sale was to give the purchaser a vote for the county, for the creation of two, or perhaps one only, is equally within the principle, though not in an equal degree of multiplication of views at one election, and splitting and dividing the interest in houses and lands amongst several persons. Taking, therefore, the literal construction of the words of the statute of William, to make only bona fide conveyances absolutely void, would very much fetter the full and free enjoyment of landed property, and create insecurity in the sale of estates. Upon these various grounds, and for these considerations, we think the sounder construction of the statute of William, taken by itself, is, that by conveyances made in order to multiply voices which are thereby declared to be void, are intended, such conveyances only as at the time of the passing of the act would have been held to be void by the common law; that is, conveyances intended by the parties not to transfer any real interest in the land, but made for the purpose of multiplying voices at elections, and for that purpose solely. And as to the observation made in the course of the argument, that if they would be void by the common law, there was no necessity for making them so by the statute, it may be a sufficient answer that it was thought desirable when such baneful practices as those described by Lord Thurlow, were in daily practice, to promulgate this doctrine of common law to sheriffs and other officers, upon whom the duty of conducting an election was cast, and to give to it the additional weight and solemnity of a legislative declaration. If, however, any doubt existed on the construction of the statute of Wm. III. when considered by itself, such doubt will be removed when the subsequent statutes made upon the same subject to effectuate more fully the same object are taken into consideration. The next statute to which reference is made is the 10th of Anne, c. 28, which is not so wide in its operation as the statute of William; for whilst the former statute by its general terms extends to all elections where the right of voting depended on the ownership of lands in counties or boroughs, the statute of Anne is confined exclusively to multiply votes in the election of knights of the shire. This statute is entitled an act for the more effectually preventing fraudulent conveyances, in order to multiply votes for electing knights of shires to serve in Parliament, the very title of the Act leading to the inference that it is directed not against all conveyances for all purposes, but against fraudulent conveyances only. The Act then begins by reciting the 7th section of the 7th & 8th William III., in which this question arises, and it then further recites, "That many fraudulent practices have been used of late to create and multiply votes." The recital, therefore, is more as a title, not pointing out the distinction in the creation of votes by fraudulent and fictitious means, and the making real votes, the latter of which could not be considered, in the language of the recital, to be injurious to those persons who had just rights to elect; and the 1st section goes on to enact that, "all estates and conveyances whatever made to any persons in any fraudulent or collusive manner or purpose to qualify him to give his or their votes at such elections of knights of the shire (subject, nevertheless, to conditions or agreements to defeat or determine such estate or to recover the same), shall be deemed and taken against those persons who executed the same as free and absolute, and be holden and enjoyed by all and every such persons to whom such conveyance shall be made, as aforesaid, freely and absolutely acquitted, exonerated, and discharged of and from all manner of trusts, conditions, clauses of re-entry, powers of revocation, provisos of redemption, &c., and all devises whatsoever shall be null and void; and the act then goes on to enact that the securities given for the performance of such trusts shall be void, and it imposes a penalty of 40l. on every person executing such conveyances or writings under him. And we consider this latter statute to be a legislative exposition of the clause of the statute of William therein set forth. The avoiding conveyances, made in order to multiply voices at elections, was meant by the other statute to be confined to such conveyances only as were fraudulent and fictitious—to conveyances which are such in form only, and never intended to pass, or except such as were accompanied by some secret trust for the benefit of the grantor; and not to extend to bona fide conveyances made in completion of an actual contract of sale and purchase of land; for the statute of Anne is expressly limited to fraudulent conveyances, and it cannot be understood that a statute passed to render the former statute of William more efficacious as to the county elections, should be less comprehensive in its provisions than the former statute, or that the former should comprise within its provisions bona fide conveyances, and the latter be restricted to fraudulent conveyances only. The statute of Anne meets the evil intended to be met, though by a very different provision to that contained in the statute of William; for, whilst the statute of William is contented, by simply declaring the fraudulent conveyance void, thus leaving the grantor and grantee as if the conveyance had never been made, the statute of Anne, on the contrary, provides that a fraudulent conveyance made to give a qualification, shall be deemed and taken against those persons who executed the same, as free and absolute, and be holden and enjoyed by all and every such person, or persons, to whom such conveyance shall be made, as aforesaid, freely and absolutely discharged from any manner of trusts or conditions, for the benefit of the grantor; at the same time, it precludes the grantee from putting it in force, by making him liable to a penalty of £40 to the common informer; the legislature, probably thinking the practice of granting fraudulent and collusive conveyances would be effectually checked by making them good against the grantor, and frustrating the object of the grantee. But this provision never could, in reason and sense, be meant to apply to a conveyance on a real sale of land where the seller already had received the purchase money, and consequently had always intended the grant to be good against himself. The statute of Anne appears conclusive as to the distinction between fraudulent and real conveyances to create votes. The next statute that touches the question is the 18th of Geo. II., chap. 18, sec. 5. The enactment contained therein makes a distinction so often adverted to. The statute enacts that no person shall vote in respect of any right of any freehold estate which was made or granted fraudulently for the purpose of qualifying him to give a vote. Therefore there is the statute of Anne prohibiting and voiding, not in every case where the estate is conveyed for the object of enabling him to vote, but in such case only where it is fraudulently made to him for the purpose; that is, where the grantee of an estate, although he appears on the face of the grant to take under it, does in reality as between the parties themselves take none, where it is accompanied by a secret trust for the benefit of the grantee. In the course of one of the arguments before us, some stress was laid by the counsel contending for their legality as by the statute 58 Geo. III., chap. 40; but that which was passed to explain and amend the statute of William III., and after reciting that doubts had been entertained whether devises by will, made in such cases and for such purposes as those mentioned in the former statute were within the true intent and meaning of that act, the statute then enacts that all devises by will made in such cases and for such purposes, as by the act of William are described, are and shall be taken to be conveyances within the true intent and meaning of the said act, as if the same had been therein specially mentioned." In the agreement it was thought somewhat singular that the 53rd of George III. should refer to the statute of William and not to the statute of Anne, unless the statute of William was in full operation, notwithstanding the statute of Anne; but to this it may be answered, that a reference may well have been made to the statute of William because the intention of the Legislature was that a devise to give a fraudulent qualification should be altogether void; whereas, if reference had been made to the statute of Anne, it would have been good against the devisor or the heirs of the deviser. The object of the statute was to write the word "devises" with the statute of William, and devises are to be dealt with in the same manner as the law is applied to conveyances. If the devise was fraudulent, and never intended to pass the land by means of the secret contract of the devisor, nor left so that the heirs of the devisee could not take or convey, the statute of George the Third would hold that devise in the same predicament as a conveyance; but if by will a father devised to his son an estate of 40s. a year, intending to qualify him to vote for the county, and the son entered and took possession of the land without any secret understanding or reservation on his part, that devise would be in the same predicament as a conveyance for that purpose, and would be good. Therefore, on the whole state of the case, considering the statute of William by itself, and with reference also to the latter acts, we think a conveyance made in completion of a bona fide contract of sale, where the money passes from the buyer to the seller, and the possession also from the seller to the buyer, and where there is no secret reservation or trust on the part of the seller, is not avoided by reason of the object or motive of the purchaser and seller being to multiply voices of an election, and as the revising barrister has by his finding brought the present case within that distinction, we think the decision by which he retains the names of the purchasers on the list of voters was right, and ought to be affirmed.

RILEY, APPELLANT, v. CROSSLEY, RESPONDENT.—CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—This case turns upon the same point in reference to that which we have just decided on the appeal from the West Riding of the county of York, in which Alexander was the appellant, and Newman the respondent. The facts differ in some particulars, but they do in substance bring this case within the same principle as that which we there laid down, namely, a conveyance made to carry into effect a bona fide contract of sale, when the purchase money is paid, and the possession taken without any secret reservation or trust whatsoever, by the purchaser or seller, is not such a conveyance as is intended to be made void by the statute of William the Third or the subsequent Acts, notwithstanding it has been made an order and for the purpose of multiplying voices at an election, or splitting and dividing the interest, but that the statute intended to avoid such conveyances only made for the purpose, as were in themselves fraudulent and collusive; so that as in this case the revising barrister has found no fraud in fact, but has held the conveyance to be in other respects good, and only void because made in order to multiply voices at elections, and has therefore struck out the names of the 25 claimants entered in the case from the list of voters. We think the decision wrong, and that the same must be reversed, and the claimants restored to the list.

Decision reversed.
CHIEF JUSTICE TINDAL.—As to the five remaining decisions of the revising barristers that stood over to await the determination of the case of Alexander v. Newman, in all of which, it was stated by the learned counsel engaged, that they were not distinguishable in any main point from that, it becomes unnecessary to say more than that we think the case of BESWICK, APPELLANT, v. ASHURCH, RESPONDENT.—We think the same was properly decided that the names of the respondents should have remained on the lists, and we affirm the decision accordingly.

In the case of
BESWICK, APPELLANT, v. AKED, RESPONDENT, we think the decision of the revising barrister, by which the names of the respondent and thirty-one others, claimants, have been retained on the list, is right, and the decision should be affirmed.

In the case of
THORNLEY, APPELLANT, v. ASPLAND, RESPONDENT, the decision of the revising barrister that the names of the nine claimants should be retained on the list of voters, was right, and affirm the same.

In the case of
NEWTON, APPELLANT, v. HARGREAVES, RESPONDENT.—We think the decision of the revising barrister, that the names mentioned in the case should be retained on the register is a right decision, and we affirm the same. This case is so far distinguishable from all the former ones, that this transaction is not a purchase or sale for the consideration of money, but this is a conveyance by a father to his two sons, in consideration of natural love, and effectual; inasmuch, however, as the law acknowledges the consideration of natural love, and affection, in the case of father and son, to be as good a consideration to raise a use, as a pecuniary consideration, between strangers, and as there is no fraud in fact found by the barrister, and we are not to infer it from any circumstances stated in the case; and the question reserved, being, whether conveyance is void by reason of the statute? we do, on this point, think the decision of the revising barrister should be affirmed.

But in the case of
RAWLINS, APPELLANT, v. BREMNER, RESPONDENT, in which, the revising barrister held the conveyance made under circumstances substantially the same as the last case, to be void by reason of the statute of Wm. III., we think the decision wrong, and reverse the same accordingly.

POWERFUL POLITICAL PREJUDICE AGAINST POTATO-PEELS.—A Conservative, of the very first water, in Ipswich, has given the strictest orders to his cook not to send the potatoes on to the table in future with the peels on; although he prefers them in that state as far his palate is concerned, yet the sight of potato-peels was so inseparably associated with the name of Sir Robert Peel, that he could not look upon them without thinking of the agriculturists who would all be ruined by the Free Trade principles advocated by the Premier.—Ipswich Express.

TO THE LANDLORDS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

GENTLEMEN,—Ought you to adopt immediate or delayed repeal of the Corn Laws?

In determining this question, you will be influenced by two considerations:—

What is your duty? and
What is your interest?

I will confine my remarks to your duty to yourselves, and those dependent upon you, and your joint interests.
It has been repeatedly stated by "farmers' friends" that the change produced by a repeal of the Corn Law will be so great, that no reduction of rent, not even its total abandonment, will enable the farmer to carry on his business with a fair profit. On the other hand, some who found their opinion upon actual prices in different parts of the world and actual expenses of farming in England, think that a reduction of 25 per cent. upon the rent of arable land, and a still smaller reduction upon that of meadow and pasture, will enable the farmer to carry on a more profitable business than he has done for the last 20 years.

Others, again, believe that if liberal leases are granted, or the landlord performs his part in removing all obstructions to good farming, the tenant may continue to pay his rent under a Free Trade with more ease than he has been able to do under the absurd restrictions and heavy drawbacks which have accompanied monopoly.

Which of these is the correct view, is a question of immense importance to your tenants and yourselves.

To those of you who believe that the whole rent must be abandoned, and that the farmer will still be unable to subsist, I can only recommend a careful analysis of the farmer's expenses to show how unfounded are your fears.

To those of you who think that some rent will still be fairly paid by the land—but whether one-half, three-fourths, or the whole of the present rent, you consider doubtful—I would urge, how important it is that this problem should as soon as possible be solved by experience.

You are the father of a family, having land which now affords a rental of 5000*l.* a year, which you will leave to your heir, with a provision for your widow and younger children secured upon it. Let me ask you, how can you make this arrangement without the probability of doing great injustice, when you do not know whether the rental of your estate is to be 5000*l.*, 3000*l.*, or 2000*l.* a year? You know the uncertainty of human life—will you, for the sake of a larger income for the next three years, risk the great probability of doing an injustice, which will be felt for generations, by making an unequal will?

How important is it that you should know with what expectations and for what station in life you should educate your children! It is not very material to your and their happiness whether you possess 2000*l.* or 5000*l.* a year, but it is of immense importance that they should not be unfitted for the enjoyment of the smaller income by being educated and prepared only for the larger one.

Then consider your tenants. How are their minds racked and harassed by suspense!—uncertain whether they shall be able to continue the occupation of that dwelling and of those fields to which they are attached by so many ties, or whether these inevitable changes must drive them utterly ruined from their home!

You know that these fears are groundless. Come forward, then, and at the risk of sacrificing some present income, learn as soon as possible what will be a fair rent by learning what will be the price of corn when you have thrown open the markets of the world—then make your arrangement with your tenant, and allay his exaggerated, but most distressing fears.

The consideration of the question, How will delay affect your own and your tenants' interests? will at once show your duty to the labourer; the state of transition will be one of deep distress to him, because it will be a state of suspended demand for labour.

Now, is not an immediate repeal your true interest? What will be the nature of the preparations for a change to take place in 1849? Your tenants will have the strongest inducements to obtain the largest possible produce from the land with the least outlay—to scourge the soil with exhausting crops, and to do as little as possible to enrich it, or keep it clean—and why? Because he knows that at the end of three years a fresh arrangement must be entered into with his landlord—that the fertility and cleanliness of the soil will be the measure of its value and of the rent he must give; and that although this exhaustion of the land will be a heavy loss to his landlord, it will be some small gain to him. I know the tenantry well. Some, with professional pride, will withstand these inducements, and rely, as they have hitherto relied, upon their landlord's fairness; but others, after a severe struggle with their feelings as farmers, will yield to a sense of duty to their families; and the preparation for competition with the world will be, roads gone to ruin—fences dilapidated and uncared for—drains obstructed and ineffective—and the soil choked with filth, and exhausted.

In cleaning land, a little timely care saves great subsequent expense; and your tenant's saving, by this process of deterioration, will not amount to the title of your loss.

Believe, then, one who is deeply interested in agriculture—one who has devoted 20 years of his life to its active pursuit, that your own interest, your duty to the tenants and labourers on your estates, and your affectionate care for those dearest to you, all plead with a powerful voice for an immediate repeal of the Corn Law.

I am, gentlemen, your obdt. servant,
Ruddington Grange, Nottinghamshire. C. PAGET.

To the Editor of the Western Times.
Barnstaple, Jan. 14, 1846.

SIR,—Knowing that your columns are always open for the benefit of mankind in general, I hope you will pardon me for informing you and the readers of your valuable and widely-circulating paper of the helpless condition of an agricultural labourer, his wife, and family (named Gregory), in the employment of —, of Sticklepath Farm, about a mile from this town.

His wages are 7*s.* per week, and every pay night he has to allow 1*s.* for rent; leaving 6*s.* for the maintenance and support of himself, wife, six children, and daily expecting the seventh. His two eldest are stone deaf, for which they receive two small loaves from the parish. Certainly this family must have

Half-cwt. of coals, of the value of	0	8
Candles and soap	0	6
Bedding and clothes	2	0
Total	3	3

Then there is only 2*s.* 9*d.* left for eight individuals to live on for seven days, or not one farthing a meal for each. I would ask you, Sir, were the Corn Laws to be repealed to-morrow (however had the protectionists say it would be), if this family could fare much worse? Were the Duke of Richmond or any of the party to see and hear their distress, it would make the tears fall from their cheeks, and I should hope to hear them alter their tone, and stand up for the repeal of the Corn Laws. I would advise individuals to petition! petition! or else their fellow-creatures will be found dying in heaps. Hoping that when Parliament meets, the members will turn their thoughts towards ameliorating the condition of the poorer classes of this kingdom; and relying on their humane dispositions, I am, yours respectfully,

THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND AN ENEMY TO THE CORN LAWS.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE WANTS OF THE PEOPLE.—The Poem with this title, read at the Free Trade meeting of the working-men of Liverpool, on the 23d of January, and inserted in our last, appeared originally in the first number of the Daily News; and is the production of Mr. C. Mackay, already well known to all lovers of poetry. The whole of the poems in the same Journal, under the title of "Voices from the Crowd," are, we understand, the production of the same author.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, February 7, 1846.

WEST RIDING ELECTION.

No moral victory achieved in our generation transcends, either in significance or importance, the unopposed return of Lord Morpeth for the West Riding of Yorkshire. It is a triumph in which the cause is worthy of the man, and the man worthy of the cause. Justice, tardy justice, has been rendered to a noble principle and a noble character. The largest and most varied constituency in the British Empire has retrieved with unanimity what was lost by a considerable majority. Free Trade has triumphed, and the glory of success is enhanced by the importance of the field on which the battle was won, and the virtues of the hero who is hailed as victor. In 1841 Lord Morpeth was defeated; he acknowledged himself vanquished in terms of sorrow for the present failure, but expressed confidence in his good cause, which drew tears from those who had been most active in his rejection. He withdrew from public life with that firm reliance on the ultimate triumph of sound principle which characterizes the Christian philosopher, and with that unchanged affection for his former constituency, which had been too pure and too ardent to be chilled by repulse. Five years are a long interval in the life of a public man; but his retirement for that space of time did not efface the memory of Lord Morpeth's virtues and talents in the heart and mind of the nation. As the evils of the protection to which he had been sacrificed became more and more apparent, the regrets of the Yorkshire electors for having caused so painful a parting, became deeper and keener—to him they came back with all the fervour of a return to first love; during the period of separation, their hearts, which had not gone with their votes—

Still to their Morpeth turned with ceaseless pain,
And dragged at each remove a lengthening chain.

He, who rose superior from defeat, has stood equally unmoved by the contingencies which have produced sudden victory. On both occasions he manifested a noble oblivion of self, and a firm assertion of principle. He has not shrunk from avowing the obligations of all Free Traders, himself included, to the exertions of the League, nor shall we shrink from acknowledging the importance of the adhesion to our cause of one who, as a statesman and philanthropist, has won not merely the approbation, but the affection of every enlightened friend of humanity at each side of the Atlantic.

The West Riding of Yorkshire is the constituency which most fully and fairly represents public opinion in England. It is the most numerous, the most varied, and one of the most wealthy. Historical associations have connected the representation of Yorkshire with the greatest political and moral revolutions of our age. Yorkshire returned Wilberforce to destroy slavery, and Brougham to win Reform. It now sends Morpeth as the herald and pledge of success in an equally glorious cause; and there is not among all our public men one whose advent on such an occasion would be more acceptable to the British Empire. In England admired, in Scotland respected, and in Ireland beloved, his re-appearance in public life satisfies a universal desire, and gratifies a national craving. It is rarely that the choice of an electoral body affords equal satisfaction to the reason and the feelings; but Lord Morpeth is one of the few statesmen whose career has obtained the suffrage of conscience and the tribute of affection.

NEW MUSIC.—New Editions of the FREE TRADE QUADRILLES and WALTZES, dedicated by permission to R. Golden, Esq., and Earl of Radnor, to be performed at all Free-Trade meetings and balls, now ready in the PIANIST'S, No. 46, price 1s. by post, eighteen stamps. Mr. Cobden's autograph permission has been received, and may be seen at the Pianista Office, 67, Old-street, one door from Cheapside; where may be had No. 39 Pianista, containing the whole opera of Sonnambula, for 2s. and No. 37, Pina Divo, 1s. 6d.

The Proprietors of the Pianista Office, Free-trade in Music. Every good Free-trader will therefore have a copy of these beautiful Quadrilles and Waltzes.—Chronicle.

Price Six Shillings.
COMPENSATION TO THE PEOPLE for Aristocratic Food Laws and Unfair Taxation; or the Influence of Aristocracies on the Conduct of National Affairs. By J. C. MACKENZIE, Esq.
London: Fisher, Son, and Co., and all Booksellers.

In One vol. 8vo, cloth, 14s. law calf, 17s. 6d.
A TREATISE UPON THE LAW, PRIVILEGES, PROCEEDINGS, AND USAGE OF PARLIAMENT. In Three Books.—1. Constitution, Powers, and Privileges of Parliament. 2. Practice and Proceedings of both Houses in the conduct of Public Business. 3. The manner of passing Private Bills. By THOMAS ERKINE MAY, Esq., Barrister-at-law, Assistant Librarian to the House of Commons.
London: C. Knight and Co., 22, Ludgate-street.

Next Week will be published, Demy 8vo.
THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRADE, or Outlines of a Theory of Profits and Prices; including an Examination of the Principles which determine the Relative Value of Corn, Labour, and Currency. By PATRICK JAMES STIRLING.
Oliver and Boyd, Edinburgh; Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.

CORNER'S NEW HISTORICAL WORKS, for School and Family Reading.
Each History, commencing with the earliest authentic records, is continued to the present time, faithfully portraying, also, the Manners, Customs, and States of Civilisation of the People.

	Bound with the Questions.	Without the Questions.
England and Wales; five fine plates, and map.	4s. -	3s. 6d.
Ireland; three fine plates, and map.	-	2s. 6d.
Scotland; three fine plates, and map.	-	2s. 6d.
France; three fine plates, and map.	-	2s. 6d.
Spain and Portugal; three plates, and map.	-	2s. 6d.
Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; with two fine plates and map.	-	2s. 6d.
Germany and the German Empire; 3 fine plates, and map.	-	2s. 6d.
Ta-ke-y and the Ottoman Empire; 3 fine plates, and map.	-	2s. 6d.
Poland and Russia; with three fine plates, and map.	-	2s. 6d.
Italy and Switzerland; three fine plates, and map.	-	2s. 6d.
Holland and Belgium; with two fine plates, and map.	-	2s. 6d.

The object of these works is to afford a complete and accurate account of the Religion, Customs, National Characteristics, State of Civilisation, and Domestic Habits of the people, in various periods of their history—to attract the attention of the rising generation to the study of language and the elements of detail; and thus render easy and pleasant the attainment of a knowledge of the leading events of history.
London: Dean and Co., Threepenny-lane, and, by order, of all Booksellers.

Price One Shilling; by post, One and Sixpence.
WHAT TO EAT, DRINK, AND AVOID. Addressed to the Nervous and Dyspeptic. By R. J. COLEMAN, M.D., Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, &c. Sherwood, 23, Paternoster-row, and all Booksellers, or direct from the Author, 21, Arundel-street, Strand.

Just published, price 1s., the Fourth Edition (translated from the Nineteenth French Edition),

CONSTIPATION DESTROYED; or Exposition of natural, simple, agreeable, and infallible means, not only of overcoming, but also of completely destroying habitual Constipation, without using either purgatives or any artificial means whatever (discovery recently made in France by M. J. W. Watson), and numerous certificates from eminent Physicians and other persons of distinction. Free by post, 1s. 6d.
Sold by James Youens and Co., Tea-dealers, 45, Ludgate-hill, London; and by all Booksellers in the United Kingdom.

READING AND BOOK SOCIETIES.—Now Ready—Delivered Gratis, A NEW PLAN for READING and BOOK SOCIETIES throughout the kingdom. This Plan provides an unlimited supply of Standard Works—all the New Books—and the right of Members to purchase any work desired at one half the published price, as soon as the first demand has subsided.

Delivered Gratis, and sent post-free to order, enclosing two stamps, addressed to Mr. BULL, Librarian, 11, Holles-street, Cavendish-square. Also the New Catalogue of Duplicates withdrawn from the Library for 1846.

National Tableau of Public Interest, which has been Eight Months in Preparation.

THE ROYAL FAMILY at Home, consisting of the Queen and Prince Albert, and their four lovely Children. The Grouping and Colouring by Madame Tussaud, the Models and Portraits by Mr. F. Tussaud, the Costumes by Mrs. F. Tussaud, is now added to the Collection.—BAZAAR, Baker-street, Portman-square.
—Admittance, 1s.; Napoleon Rooms, 6d. Open from 11 till 4; and from 7 till 10.

GYPSUM FOR MANURE.—PEGG, HARPER, and Co. (late Robert Pegg and Co.) possessing the advantage of large Water-power situated near the celebrated Cheltenham Gypsum quarries, can afford to sell this article on very low terms.—Dorset, Feb. 2, 1846.

LUXURY IN SHAVING.
JOHN GOSNELL and CO.'S AMBROSIAL SHAVING CREAM (Patronised by Prince Albert). This inestimable Cream possesses all the good qualities of the Finest Naples Soap, without the disagreeable smell inseparable from that article in a genuine state. It is of a white pearly silvery appearance, and produces a creamy lather, which will not dry on the face, and emits in use the delightful flavour of the almond.
In Pots, price 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., &c.
Perfumers to her Majesty, 12, Three King-court, Lombard-street, London. Manufacturers of Combs and Brushes of the best quality, and on the most approved principles.

BERDOE'S WATERPROOF OVER-COATS, and OUTSIDE GARMENTS of all kinds.—guarantee to exclude any rain whatever. Mr. Berdoe's extensive trial of these well-known garments, has enabled the public to form its own opinion respecting them; what that is, is best shown by their established and constantly extending sale, and the numerous competitors their success has produced, some of whom, among other similar attempts to mislead, actually attach to their garments W. B.'s name and label. General price from 4s. to 50s. An extensive variety kept to select from, or made to order at a day's notice. All shop and inferior goods strictly excluded. W. BERDOE, Tailor, Overcoat Maker, and Waterproof, 69, Cornhill (north side).

THE GOLDEN FLAX CRAVAT COLLAR.—"THE SINGLE BANDS" may be worn with the customary cravat—giving increased warmth and compactness, by substituting linen bands in place of the unsightly and troublesome tape strings, and avoiding the unseemly parting and irritation of the usual collar at the back of the neck, by one linen band passing through the other.
—"THE DOUBLE BANDS" need no additional cravat—in one article is combined both collar and cravat.
In both kinds "The Purest White" is obtained by the use, exclusively, of "THE GOLDEN FLAX" linen.
N.B.—Each cravat collar bears the name of "John Paterson, London, registered 25th August, 1845," and may be obtained at any of the principal hosiers and drapers in London and the country.

JONES'S £4. 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week, are selling at the Manufactory, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset-house. They combine the truth of a mathematical instrument with the elegance of an ornament of taste. One except of a Post-office order is above the price, a Watch will be sent free by post to any part of the Kingdom. Read Jones's "Sketch of Watch Work," sent free for 2d. stamp.

OUTFITS TO AUSTRALIA, INDIA, and the COLO-NIES. Parties leaving England will find it to their advantage to purchase their Outfits at E. J. MONNERY and CO.'S, 165, Fenchurch-street, City, where a large assortment of Shirts, Clothing, Hosiery, Gauze-Merino Under Shirts, &c., are kept on hand, and the trade, as well as for the voyage, is kept ready for immediate use, and at prices far more reasonable than usually charged for the same articles.
Bedding, Military Accoutrements, Cabin and Camp Furniture of every description. Lists, with Prices affixed, forwarded by post.

TO COTTON-SPINNERS.
A GENTLEMAN, who is conversant with the Cotton Yarn Trade of Glasgow, will be happy to enter into an Agreement with any respectable SPINNER, who is desirous of considering his Yarns to the Glasgow Market. He is intimately acquainted with the trade, and should be successful in obtaining one or more good commissions, he will do no business whatever on his own account, but will devote his time and attention wholly to his Consignee's interests.
Address L. R., care of Mr. A. Mills, 18, Ganderluggie street, Glasgow.

THE CARE OF THE HAIR may be unceasing, and its cultivation superintended by the most unquestioned skill and judgment, but without a good growth and condition of the material to work upon, every effort will be fruitless. The most thinly-scattered locks that defied every effort of art may be converted into luxuriant tresses by the application of OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA, which has thus become the indispensable appendage to every fashionable toilet. 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle. No other prices are genuine.—Oldridge's Balm, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand, London.

FREEHOLDERS' BUILDING SOCIETY
Manchester. Shares, £50. Subscription, 10s. per Month.

TRUSTEES.
John Brooks, Esq., President. Alderman Elkanah Armitage. Alderman William Harrison, Esq. W. Rawson, Esq.
Alderman Charles J. S. Walker. W. Evans, Esq.
BANKERS.—Messrs. Cunliffe, Brooks, and Co., Market-street.
SOLICITOR.—Mr. John Hewitt, 47, King-street.
SECRETARY.—Mr. William Jackson Keighly, 3, Princess-street, Manchester.
Shares may be taken up at the Secretary's Office, 9, Princess-street, Manchester, by payment of Two Months' Subscription; from whom copies of the Rules and Prospectus may also be obtained. Five Thousand Two Hundred Shares are now taken up.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.

DIRECTORS.
A. W. Poulton, Esq., Samuel Harrison, Esq., Dr. James Carlisle, John Gadsby, Esq., William Wilson, Esq., H. Mull, Esq., Uxbridge. R. G. Welford, Esq., Richard Burnett, Esq., Sidney Smith, Esq., J. Stanton, Esq.
TRUSTEES.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Highbury-terrace, Islington. George Thompson, Esq., 6, Waterloo place. Captain Cogan, Upper Mill, Mammersmill.

Messrs. Prescott, Grot, & Co.
SOLICITOR.
Josh. Ivinney, Esq., 26, Chancery-lane.
TRUSTEES.
Mr. Frederiek Farrand, Priory Villa, Poekham.
SECRETARY.
Mr. Alfred Lench Saul.

Prospectuses may be obtained, gratis, on application at the Society's Offices, East Temple Chambers, Whitechapel-street, Fleet-street. The Rules (6d. each) are now ready, and may be had as above.
Persons desirous to join the Society are requested to make application immediately.
The Society's Offices will be open for receiving subscriptions and the general transaction of business, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from 6 to 9 o'clock.

THE BRITISH BUILDING AND INVESTMENT COMPANY.

On Macarthur's Simplified and Improved Plan.

The triumphant success of the Plan on which this Company is formed having been demonstrated by the issue of 2500 Shares to 1500 Shareholders, the entrance fee has been raised: this, with the amount now required to be paid for the arrears of subscription, effectually prevents hundreds from becoming Shareholders who are not really desirous to do so.

THE SECOND BRITISH BUILDING AND INVESTMENT COMPANY.

has therefore been established on the same plan as the First, and to be governed by similar Rules. Entrance Fee, 2s. 6d. Subscriptions 10s. per Month. No Redemption Fee, &c. &c.

The Subscriptions to the Second Company will commence in March next. A Public Meeting, to explain its principles and objects, will be held on Tuesday, the 17th February, 1846, at the London Mechanics' Institution, Southampton-buildings, Chancery-lane. London, at Eight o'clock precisely, when the Rules, duly certified and enrolled, will be ready for delivery.

The Prospectuses may be obtained, gratis, at 3, Ivy-lane, St. Paul's, London, or of Mr. Witcomb, 121, Leadenhall-street; Starie, 166, High Holborn, Handley, 38, Chiswell-street; Finbury, Macarthur, 3, Taymouth-terrace, London Hospital, Jessurun, 17, Clifton-street; Finbury, Parkins, 11, Halfway-street, Oxford-street; Coffee Rooms, Exeter-street, Sloane-street, Coffee Rooms, Henry-street, Portland Town; or will be sent to any part of the Kingdom in answer to letters post-paid, containing one postage stamp. If the Rules are required, a postage stamp must be sent.

All Communications must be addressed to the SECOND British Building and Investment Company, 3, Ivy-lane, St. Paul's, London.

J. K. MACARTHUR, Manager.

COMPRESSED AIR ENGINE COMPANY.

Provisionally registered. No. 5, Pall Mall East, London.

Capital £400,000 in 40,000 Shares of £10 each. Deposit, £1. 1s. per Share.
TRUSTEES.
Kenyon S. Parker, Esq., Q.C., Lincoln's Inn. Frederick Square, Esq., 1, Pall Mall East.

Sir James Carmichael, Bart., Sussex-gardens, Hyde Park. Charles Farebrother, Esq., Alderman, Lancaster-place, and Moat House, Stockwell.

Lieut. Col. W. Fendall, Sevenhampton, Andoversford, Gloucestershire. Miles Miller, Esq., Phillimore-place, Kensington. Joseph Wilmshurst, Esq., St. Mildred's-court, City. Thomas Earnshaw, Esq., Tulse-hill.

With power to add to their number.
CONSULTING ENGINEER AND PATENTEE.
Arthur Farnsey, Esq.

ADDITION.
Henry Wilkins, Esq., Old Burlington-street. Alex. P. Ridgway, Esq., Leicester-square.

Messrs. Ransom and Co., 1, Pall Mall East.
SOLICITORS.
Messrs. Davies and Son, 21, Warwick-street, Regent-street.

SECRETARY.
D. E. Austin, Esq.

This Company has been formed for the purpose of obtaining from the Patentee the benefit of the patent right of his invention in Great Britain and its colonies, by means of licenses for its use.
By the present patent, condensed air is applied in the most simple manner, so as to obtain a uniformly regulated motive power, perfectly controllable, and capable of being instantly increased or decreased, and at pleasure, and is applicable in all cases where steam power is now employed.
The compressed air engine is very similar to the present locomotive, and may be constructed for about half the expense—does not require tubes, and can be applied to rails of any gauge as at present laid down.
Prospectuses and every information, with cards to view the working model, may be obtained from, and application for shares in the usual form made to the Secretary, at the Company's offices, 5, Pall Mall East, London; and of Messrs. Davies and Son, solicitors, 21, Warwick-street, Regent-street; and of the following Shareholders, London: Messrs. Sutton, Gribble, and Sutton, Royal Exchange; Messrs. Cardwell and Sons; Leeds, Messrs. Hebdon and Parkinson; Bristol, Messrs. Tate and Nash; Edinburgh, Messrs. Blackwood and Thompson; Aberdeen, Messrs. James, Blackwood, and Co.

BRUSHES—NEW INVENTIONS.

THE TRIPLE HAIR BRUSH. One stroke of this is equal to the effect of one penetrating, five small-tooth combs, and one even cut brush: to be had in four sizes, No. 7, 8s. 6d. No. 8, 7s. 6d. No. 9, 9s. 6d. No. 10, 11s. 6d.

THE DOUBLE ANTI-PRESSURE NAIL BRUSH, which does not divide the quick from the nail, no pressure being required, and thoroughly cleans and polishes the nails in a tenth part of the time of any other method. Price, in Bone, 1s. 2d. No. 2, 3s. 6d. No. 3, 3s. 6d. No. 4, 4s., and of all sizes and prices in Ivory.

THE NEW TOOTH-PICK BRUSH, which entirely enters between the interstices of the closest teeth; marks, full size brushes, No. 1, hard. No. 2, less hard. No. 3, middling. No. 4, soft. The Narrower Brush, No. 5, hard. No. 6, less hard. No. 7, middling. No. 8, soft. At each, or 10s. per dozen in Bone; and 2s. each, or 21s. per dozen in Ivory, the Hair warranted never to come out.

THE MEDIUM SHAVING BRUSH, between the usual Badger Hair and Bristol Brush, being a selection of the strongest Hair only from the Badger Skin, in a variety of sizes, both in Bone and Ivory.
The above articles are the Inventions of ROSS and SONS, 119 and 120, Bishopsgate-street, London, and being protected, any one imitating them will be proceeded against.

ELECTRO-PLATE SUPERSEDED BY RICHARD and JOHN SLACK'S PURE NICKEL SILVER.—This incomparable Metal possesses all the richness of Silver in appearance, with all its durability and hardness, and is warranted to stand the test of aquafortis.

	Fiddle.	Thread.	King's pattern.
Table Spoons and Forks, per dozen.	12s. 6d.	28s. 0d.	30s. 0d.
Tea Spoons, ditto.	10s. 0d.	21s. 0d.	25s. 0d.
Tea Spoons, ditto.	6s. 0d.	11s. 0d.	12s. 0d.

R. and J. S. beg to caution the public against several spurious imitations of their articles. The genuine are to be had only at their establishment, 338, Strand, where may be inspected the most extensive assortment of Pure Nickel Silver in London, at prices 30 per cent. under any other house: the money returned for every article not approved of. Their book, containing drawings and prices of every article, may be had gratis, or sent post free to any part. Richard and John Slack, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset House, established 1816.

NUMBER ONE, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD.

As real goodness is not helped by praise, nor injured by reproach, so the BLACK TRIP, at 4s. 4d. per lb., sold by DAKIN and COMPANY, owes its popularity solely to its intrinsic excellence.

Orders from the country forwarded Carriage Free.

SELLING OFF CARPETS.
LUCK, KENT, and CUMMING, beg to inform the Nobility and Gentry, as well as their friends and the public, that they have removed their Business from Carpenter's Hall, London Wall, to their long established Warehouse, 4, REGENT-STREET, WATERLOO PLACE, opposite Howell and James's, and to 98, HATTON GARDEN, HOLBORN, where they trust that Patronage will be continued which they have enjoyed for upwards of a century. A considerable portion of their large stock of CARPETS, KIDDERMINSTER, and other Carpets, to be sold at a Great Reduction. In addition to Carpets, they have at their West End Establishment, a large Stock of Chintzes, Damasks, Tabourets, &c., well worthy of attention. A splendid Carpet, of British manufacture, 20-3 by 18, with a centre and border, at less than cost price.

DEANE'S DOUBLY-REGISTERED STUOLOS COFFEE-POT.—The strictly scientific construction of this article involves two simple processes, which, by their rapid and certain action, secure a run of rich, boiling, aromatic, and brilliant coffee within five minutes. When the interior cylinder is first filled with boiling water, the latter is poured out into the cold, from the body, into which the extract instantly follows. When the cylinder is filled the second time, and is raised to the top of the pot, the tall column of small diameter is, by a well-known law of pneumatics, instantly emptied into the pot below, and the coffee is at once ready for use.
Doctors and Apothecaries, DEANE, opening to the Monument, 46, King William-street, London-bridge.

STOOPING OF THE SHOULDERS and CONTRACTION of the CHEST are entirely prevented, and gently and effectually removed in Youth and Ladies and Gentlemen, by the occasional use of the Improved Elastic Expander, which is light, simple easily employed, outwardly or inwardly, without any uncomfortable restraint, as in attempting to exercise. Sent per post, by Mr. A. BIRKIN, Sole Manufacturer and Proprietor, 40, Tavistock-street, Covent Garden, London, or full particulars on receiving a postage stamp.

THE PERFECT SUBSTITUTE FOR SILVER.

The high estimate formed by the public during the ten years RIPPON and BURTON'S chemically purified material has been before it, made into every useful and ornamental article usually made in silver, possessing, as it does, the characteristic purity and durability of silver, has called into existence the deleterious compounds of "Albata Plate," "Berlin Silver," and other so-called "cheap silvers," they are the best but bad imitations of the genuine articles manufactured with the view of satisfying the purchaser, by Rippon and Burton, and sold only by them.

	Fiddle.	Thread.	King's Pattern.
Table Spoons and Forks, full size, per dozen.	12s. 6d.	28s. 0d.	30s. 0d.
Tea Spoons, ditto.	10s. 0d.	21s. 0d.	25s. 0d.
Tea ditto and ditto.	6s. 0d.	11s. 0d.	12s. 0d.
Gravy ditto.	3s. 0d.	6s. 0d.	7s. 0d.

Detailed catalogues, with engravings, as well as of every ironmongery article, sent per post free.

RIPPON & BURTON'S Stock of General Furnishing Ironmongery is literally the largest in the world. They regret they cannot employ any language which will convey an adequate impression of its variety and extent; they therefore invite purchasers to call and inspect it.—Rippon and Burton, 39, Oxford-street (corner of Newman-street). Established in Wells-street, 1820.

FENDERS, STOVES, and FIRE-IRONS.—Bright steel fenders, to 4 feet, from 30s. each; rich bronzed scroll do., with steel bar, 10s. 6d.; iron fenders, 3 feet, 4s. 6d.; wrought iron kitchen fenders, 3 feet, 4s. 6d.; bright register stoves, with bronzed ornaments, and two sets of bars, from 1s. 6d.; bed-room register stoves, 2 feet, 10s.; fire-iron's chamber set, 3d. per set; handsome do., with cut heads, 6s. 6d. The money returned for every article not approved of. Detailed catalogues, with engravings, sent per post free.

Rippon and Burton's Stock of General Furnishing Ironmongery is literally the largest in the world. They regret they cannot employ any language which will convey an adequate impression of its variety and extent; they therefore invite purchasers to call and inspect it.—39, Oxford-street (corner of Newman-street). Established in Wells-street, 1820.

TONIC MILK OF ORANGE, a delicious Cordial, and Sweetener of the Breath. (Under the Patronage of the Court and Royal Family, and recommended by the most Eminent of the Faculty. It warms the Stomach, creates an appetite, Digests the Food, strengthens the Lungs, Clears and improves the Voice for Singing, enlivens the Spirits, dispels Nervous Debility, clears the Blood, and purifies and perfumes the Breath. As a lively but gentle stimulant wholly unmingled with spirituous ingredients, it will prove extremely grateful to that numerous class of persons, who, on principles of abstinence refrain from all intoxicating drinks. Prepared (as per Recipe purchased of the former Proprietor, Mrs. Guffy) by A. ROWLAND and SONS, 20, Hatton Garden, London. Half-pints, 2s. 9d.; pints, 4s. 6d.; quarts, 8s.

Sold by them and by all Chemists.

COMPETITIONS COMPLAINT.

Oh dear! oh dear! what shall I do?
I can't compete with MOSES!
Look at their House! how proud the view!
What beauty it discloses!
What crowds of customers go there,
Their favours to renew!
The place is, really, like a fair—
Oh dear! what shall I do?
I wonder not at such success,
For MOSES and his SON
Make all their clothing as they ought;
A d' mine are quite outdone,
My article, compared with these,
Are nothing much to view;
And vain my efforts are to please—
Oh dear! what shall I do?
MOSES and SON are far too strong
For feeble things like me;
They've been the victors all along,
And so they'll ever be.
In workmanship they stand alone,
And cloth and prices, too;
Yes, there's a match for me, I own—
Oh dear, what shall I do?

	BEAR BRAND.	MADE TO MEASURE.
Reaver Taglioni	1s. 0d.	1s. 0d.
Chesterfield or Cordingtons	0 7 6	0 7 6
D'Orsay's, Athol's, Fenneloke, and every description of winter coats	1 5 0	1 5 0
Boy's winter coats in every style	from 0 8 6	from 0 8 6
Winter trousers, lined	0 4 6	0 4 6
Woolen coats, edged	0 10 6	0 10 6
Dress coats, edged	1 0 0	1 0 0
Roll collar vests	0 1 9	0 1 9
Double breasted ditto	0 2 6	0 2 6
Boy's Hussar and Tunic Suits	0 18 6	0 18 6
Boy's winter trousers	0 3 0	0 3 0
Boy's winter vests	1 6 0	1 6 0

Winter Coats in every style and shape, handsomely trimmed
Milled Cloth Great Coats, velvet collar and cuffs
Tweed Wrappers
Ditto Trousers
Winter Trousers, in all the new patterns
Dressin Trousers
Boat, or Dress Trousers
Dress Coat
Ditto, best quality made
Frock Coats
Ditto, best quality made
Cashmere Vests
Satin, plain or fancy
Boy's Hussar and Tunic Suits
Boy's Great Coats

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.
A new work, entitled "Habillment Hall," with full directions for self-measurement, may be had on application, or forwarded post free. Mournings to any amount can be had at five minutes' notice, at the following prices:

	from 1s. 0d.	from 1 18 0
Men's Suits, dress coat, vest, and trousers	from 1s. 0d.	from 1 18 0
Ditto, jacket, vest, and trousers	from 1 18 0	from 1 18 0

Any article purchased or ordered, if not approved of, exchanged, or the money returned.

OSWNEY, E. MOSSES and SON, Tailors, Wholesale and Retail Woollendrapers, Outfitters, and General Warehousemen, 104, Minories, and 86, Aldgate, City, opposite the Church.

CAUTION. E. Mosses and Son are obliged to guard the public against imposition, having learned that the untrustworthy falsehood of being connected with them, or it's the same concern, has been resorted to in many instances, and for obvious reasons. They have no connexion whatsoever with any other establishment in or out of London, and those who do desire genuine "Cheap Clothing" should to prevent disappointment, call or send to 104, Minories, and 86, Aldgate, opposite the Church.

N.B. No business transacted at this Establishment from sunset on Friday to sunset on Saturday, when business is resumed till twelve o'clock.

Printed at the Whitefriars Printing-office, Bouverie-street, in the precinct of Whitefriars, in the City of London, by JOHN GUNN, printer, of the County of Middlesex, and also of Number 4, Fairfield-place, Chesham-hill-road, in the parish of Manchester, in the county of Lancashire, and published at Number 67, Fleet-street, in the parish of St. Dunstons-in-the-West, in the city of London, by ABRAHAM WATERMAN, Printer, of Number 67, Fleet-street, London.—Saturday, February 7, 1846.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 125.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1846.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,

JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

THE DEBATE.

We cannot say that the interest of the Parliamentary discussion of the past week has been commensurate with the transcendent importance of its subject-matter. On the whole, we are constrained to confess, the affair has gone off rather heavily. Nor could it well have been otherwise. The best intellect of the House is all on one side—on the other, there is little beyond a gentle (or angry) dullness, relieved only by occasional digressions into the realms of absurdity and paradox, or by outbreaks of personal and party spleen. The interest of novelty, and that of curiosity, are both wanting. All the arguments, or pretences of argument, are of the stalest—and the result of the whole business is already foreknown. The bill will pass; nothing remains to be ascertained, except by how large or how small a majority, and in what particular week of this or the ensuing month. There is really little or nothing to be said, at this time of day, except on the mere personal or party questions, whether this or that set of public men have the best "moral right" to do right, and whether Sir Robert Peel and his colleagues were sincere, or insincere, last year, or four, five, or seven years ago—questions which nobody is just now particularly anxious to hear answered. The whole care of the protectionist defendants is narrowed into "abuse of the plaintiff's attorney." And the world is so much in the habit of hearing plaintiff's attorney abused, and so little inclined to join in the abuse, considering that plaintiff's attorney is in the very act of rendering the world an invaluable service, that the abuse might just as well be spared, and the defendant's counsel would lose nothing by reserving their vituperative resources for a fitter occasion. On the whole, we scarcely recollect a Parliamentary debate, on any subject of first-class moment, that presents, comparatively speaking, so few salient points of public interest.

The personal and party recriminations which have filled hitherto so large a space in this discussion, have certainly not been devoid of cleverness. They have only the fault of being utterly beside and beneath the occasion. Lord Worsley, it cannot be denied, was great, in a small way, and pressed the old familiar Hansard argument with a good deal of dexterity and point. But then, it so happens, that the Hansard argument is not, just at present, of the smallest interest to any human creature out of the House of Commons. The Hansard argument would be all very well in its proper place and time. If the questions were, whether the Ministers hold exactly the same opinions now that they did some years ago, and whether they can fairly lay claim to the character of consistent politicians, the Hansard reports would be really invaluable. But, as it happens, this is not the question. Ministers "frankly avow" that they have "changed their opinions"—that their present opinions are most decidedly inconsistent with the old Hansard opinions—and that their own Corn Law has failed—"signally failed," as was manfully said by one of them, and elaborately shown by another. They tell us they are inconsistent—and there is an end of the matter. They do not pretend to hold the Hansard opinions—they maintain that the Hansard opinions are all false together; and with this one broad and plain avowal, they "dispose of" the whole of that logic and rhetoric which have been so superfluously lavished on this particularly uninteresting and insignificant topic.

The only question is, Are Sir Robert Peel and his colleagues right now?—not, Were they right, four, five, or seven years ago? The question now is, How are the people to be fed? How is Irish famine to be averted, or mitigated? How are commerce and manufactures to be saved from the revulsion which experience has shown to be invariably consequent on scarcity and dearth of food? How are agricultural interests and relations to be placed on a sound and stable footing? How are the scenes of 1842—the miseries and horrors of Stockport and Paisley—to be prevented from recurring, when the causes that produced them have already commenced their operations? How is the great wages-fund to be kept up? How are distress, pauperism, crime, and mortality to be kept down? How are we to maintain that diminution of 18 per cent. on the criminal commitments which, as our Home Secretary tells us, has resulted from low prices of food and high wages? How shall we take security against the return of those days, when combinations, strikes, political discontent, turbulence, and midnight burnings, alarmed and terrified the responsible guardians of the public peace, and when regiments were hurried off to Manchester, by railway, to suppress anticipated commotion in the manufacturing districts? The question is, How shall "the greatest error ever committed by legislation" be repaired—HOW SHALL THE COUNTRY BE GOVERNED? To inquire, with one of our protectionist orators, "Upon what principles parties in this country are to be kept together," is a piece of trifling for which the public are not at present in the mood.

We must do Ministers the justice to say, that they bear themselves well and worthily in this matter. They rise to the height of their great argument. They give the go-by to all secondary and non-essential matters, and keep their own and the public attention steadily fixed on the one great question of questions, of which they have undertaken the solution. Nothing can be better, in tone and spirit, than the speeches of Mr. Sidney Herbert and Sir J. Graham. The speakers, it is plain, are in earnest—thoroughly and intensely in earnest. They know they are right. They speak like men irresistibly forced upon an unwelcome and highly inconvenient conclusion, which they cannot and dare not blink—urged by a necessity which they must and will obey. They speak with a strength, a clearness, a cogency, a self-consistency, which we have not observed in ministerial oratory for this many a day. Their language is, in effect, "Think of us as you please, say of us what you please—but pass our bill, for the empire needs it; never mind whether we were right or wrong, some years ago—we are right now, and you know it—PASS THE BILL."

To the political opponents of the ministry, we must likewise render the justice of saying, that they have been true to the exigencies of this great occasion, and to the public interests entrusted to their charge. By a generous oblivion of party, and a wise avoidance of all irritating party topics, they have given moral weight and force to their enunciation of those broad principles of public policy and justice with which they are identified. All vulgar political considerations are merged and lost in an all-absorbing anxiety for the success of a great public measure; great, both in its immediate results of practical amelioration, and in its prospective assertion and realisation of sound principles. The speech in which Lord John Russell, while emphatically warning the Government of the evils and dangers inherent in their three years' sliding scale, avowed his determination to throw no obstruction in the way of a measure presenting so many and so large substantial advantages to the country, adds much to the claims which the Free Trade representation of the City of London had already established for himself, on public honour and confidence. And the powerful and earnest manner in which, on Thursday night, Lord Morpeth addressed himself to those higher social aspects of the question, which he so felicitously and impressively exhibited in the light thrown on them by his recent observations of other social institutions and modes of life than our own; the warning to Protectionist lords and landlords, that no aristocracy is safe which "props itself on special interests" at variance with those of the great mass of the community, and that, if aristocratic institutions are to keep their ground, they must be "administered and worked out in rather more of a democratic spirit than heretofore"—in the spirit of sympathy with the people, and respect for the people;—this is a fitting recommencement of the Parliamentary life of the man whom the foremost of English constituencies have judged worthy of their confidence. The Free Traders of the West Riding are rewarded.

One other feature of the week's debate calls for notice. We allude to the strong and steady undercurrent of Free Trade doctrine which runs through the whole of the protectionist argument and oratory. Either by direct assertion, or by incidental and unconscious admission, nearly every speaker on the monopolist side has affirmed some one or more of the leading and fundamental maxims of the Free Traders. The mover of the amendment ascribed the extraordinary prosperity of the last three years to "a succession of good harvests"—which is precisely what we have always said;—and his seconder, with a happy obliviousness of the great first dogma of landlordism, boasted, that "the provisions of the people have been cheap and regular, in proportion to the protection afforded to the growth of corn;" that is to say, cheapness of bread is a national good, worthy of being expressly and carefully legislated for—cheap bread does not mean low wages—it is all nonsense about the "Polish serfs," and "Pomeranian peasants." Another speaker, on the same side, "believed, from the bottom of his soul, that the agricultural art was at present only in its infancy"—which is also exactly what we have always said. The "agricultural art is at present only in its infancy;" and in its infancy it will infallibly remain so long as agriculturists are treated like infants—swaddled all round with protection, and not suffered to run alone. Mr. Stafford O'Brien clinches our argument for us with an illustration, to which we can only do justice by quoting the honourable member's words:

"He wished to apply the system of the new philosophy to the tenant farmers. A tenant farmer came to his landlord, and said, 'Sir, I hope you will allow me an abatement of my rent. I may not understand draining quite as well as my neighbour. I may not have all the new patent implements; but my family has long held under your family—I have wor-your colours, and I should be very sorry to go anywhere else.' The landlord might reply—'My good fellow, I am sorry for you; you invested your capital, and so did I, on the faith of former legislation; but we are told now that we must buy at the cheapest and sell at the dearest market, and there is a gentleman from a manufacturing district with abundance of money, who is ready to spend it upon my land. I must look to the interest of my family; and as to your talk about feudal times, and wearing my colours, that is all exploded, and under the new system there is no true blue now.' So that unless the landlord acted with better faith and kinder feeling than the legislature, the tenant farmer must go, a new and rich tenant must be put in possession, and the land might, by improvements in agriculture, be made to bear five quarters per acre instead of three."

So, according to this zealous and eloquent protectionist champion, the "new philosophy" is, after all, a perfectly true philosophy. Landlords will get higher rents under the Free Trade régime than under protection—more capital will be invested in the cultivation of the soil—and more produce will be extracted from the soil. Free Trade crops will bear to protection crops the proportion of five to three. There will be two-fifths more of corn grown under Free Trade, than is grown under protection by Act of Parliament.

We have nothing more to say. What more could we say? This is our case. Mr. Stafford O'Brien perfectly understands the whole question—and he puts it so well, that all the world can understand it, too. The landlord's Corn Law is a law against the growth of corn—against the fertility of the soil—against agricultural improvement—against the application of capital, skill, science, and labour to agriculture. It is a law for growing three quarters of wheat where there might be five. It is well for the interests of truth, when so much force and justness of thought are combined with so happy a vivacity of expression as nature has allotted to Mr. Stafford O'Brien.

PROTECTION TO MANUFACTURES

There has been no response to the appeal made by the protectors of agriculture to the operative classes, save from their natural allies, the fanatics of Trades' Unions. Indeed, the absurdity of protecting manufactures which defy competition in foreign markets, is so potent and so palpable, that we are surprised how ever county members could expect to excite sympathy on the subject. There is, however, another fallacy, which has been recently put forward in Spitalfields—the great importance of the home trade to the manufacturers of that district, and the comparative unimportance of the export trade. As there is a considerable export of silks from this country, we can see no reason why the manufacturers of Spitalfields should not have as large a share in it as the manufacturers of Lancashire; if they have not, it must be their own fault. If they are unable to compete with Manchester, the sooner they change their system the better. But, taking their special view, we are ready to show that the home market will afford them greater remuneration under a system of Free Trade than under a system of protection. They must either compete with the fair trader, or the smuggler. In the world of fashion, articles excluded by a system of protection acquire an artificial value from their being difficult of attainment. French silks, independent of all comparison of pattern, and material, are more sought after than English silks, because they show, or are deemed to show, a higher rank in the wearer. Without at all detracting from the merits of the Spitalfields manufacturers, we state a fact which they themselves will readily acknowledge, that until within the last few years these patterns, both in design and execution, were decidedly inferior to those of Paris and Lyons. They have recently made great improvements in both respects, and have reaped some rewards from their ingenuity; but still these fabrics have not won the sanction of fashion. The protectionists advise them to ask for more stringent laws against smuggling, but they forget that even without smuggling large quantities of French silks must continue to be brought over by the multitudinous British families that visit the Continent. We can state with certainty that in every large silk-warehouse of Paris it has been found necessary to employ English clerks in order to satisfy the curiosity of English visitors forming in all cases a large proportion, and in many the majority, of their customers. Now, under Free Trade, French silks would lose their factitious and fashionable value; English producers would compete with French producers on equal terms. Had English silks been unprotected, a public opinion would never have been formed against them; but the fact of their being protected is the main source of the general belief that French silks are cheaper and better.

Protected trades are always those of least progress and greatest complaint. We believe that the weaver of Spitalfields can compete with the weaver of Lyons; if he cannot, neither can he compete with the weaver of Manchester, who does not hesitate to meet French producers in foreign markets. If he cannot, it is a proof that the system of Spitalfields is bad, and that we are asked to continue one evil for the sake of perpetuating another.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846.

Fourth Week, ending Saturday, February 14.

The Parliamentary week opened with an anticipated yet significant event. On Monday, after the Speaker had taken the chair, Lord MORPETH was introduced, and at the table of the house took the usual oaths as representative for the West Riding of Yorkshire. His appearance was marked by cheering, which was again renewed, when, during the time for the presentation of petitions (of which there was a large number, though not at all so great as have been exhibited on other stirring occasions) the noble lord rose to present several from the West Riding. Mr. Ferrand thought proper to manifest himself after his usual fashion. He rose to ask a question—"Were the signatures to these petitions the free and unbiassed acts of the parties themselves? because he had been informed that—" Here the SPEAKER interposed. The honourable member might ask a question relative to the petition, but could not, according to the rules of the house, make a speech. The discomfited Ferrand sat down; and Lord Morpeth quickly answered, by saying, that "to the best of his belief and the entireness of his conviction," the signatures were really the free and unbiassed acts of the parties themselves.

The petitions, as we have said, though considerable in number, presented no such formidable array as might have been witnessed on some former occasions of interest. Still, there were some remarkable ones, as those presented by Mr. Mark Philips from Manchester, and by other members from other places. Those in favour of Free Trade, and of total and immediate repeal, preponderated very considerably, both in number and in character, over those which the protectionists had to present.

The house was crowded: but before the debate commenced, Sir Robert Peel made a somewhat important statement. He had, on a former evening, in reply to Lord John Russell, informed the house and the country that the Government intended that the remission of the duties on the articles contemplated, including those on corn, should take place from the day that the resolution, affirming the reduction, had been confirmed by the reception of the report on it. This is a preliminary stage in the proceedings. When duties are to be altered, either imposed, increased, or reduced, the first step is the proposition of a resolution, or a series of resolutions, in a committee of the whole house. If this passes, the resolution, on a subsequent day, is "reported" to the SPEAKER, by the chairman of committees; and then leave is given to bring in a bill, which must go through all its subsequent stages. Of course, when duties are remitted from the day that a "resolution" is affirmed, the Government take precaution that the importers shall give security for the payment of the higher duties, in case the bill should not ultimately become law. Sir Robert Peel now informed the house that the Government would adhere to the practice in previous cases, of not remitting the duties on corn until the Act had received the royal assent; but to obviate, as much as possible, the inconvenience which the delay would cause, they would proceed with the Corn Bill to the exclusion, in the meantime, of other public business.

The "order of the day" was then moved, that the house should resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, on the commercial propositions of the Government. The SPEAKER put the question, "That I do now leave the chair," upon which up rose,

Mr. Philip William Skinner Miles, one of the members for Bristol, and younger brother of Mr. William Miles, the well-known member for Somersetshire. Mr.

Philip Miles moved, as an amendment, that the house should go into committee on the Government proposition "that day six months." This, of course, is a direct negative. The speech in which Mr. P. Miles supported his amendment was delivered with calmness, and a somewhat easy fluency; his manner gave an air of respectability to his arguments. But the arguments themselves were of the stock kind, and not unfrequently self-contradictory. He saw no sufficient ground, either in the price of wheat or in the failure of the potato crop, for the sweeping propositions of the Government. The law of 1842 had worked well; under it Sir Robert Peel hoped to maintain a price about 58s. the quarter; the actual price at the time he proposed to open the ports was only 56s. 2d. Increase of exports was no test of commercial prosperity, for India, China, and other markets were glutted with our goods. Engaged alike in commerce and agriculture, he was no enemy of any interest; but he dreaded the unnatural expansion of our manufacturing system, and in the adoption of Free Trade saw ruin to all, beginning with the humbler classes, whose wages it would reduce, until it reached the higher, whose incomes it would diminish. Then Free Trade would destroy our shipping, and sweep away navigation laws and reciprocity treaties. Our colonies would cease to be of value to us, for they, too, must have equal liberty to trade freely with the foreigner; and thus anticipating universal disaster from the adoption of the Government scheme, he prognosticated that its adoption would neither allay the appetite for change, nor repress agitation. He asked if the Anti-Corn-Law League would now be induced to "retire into private life?"—a question which provoked much laughter. If it did, said Mr. P. Miles, other associations would arise, to agitate for other objects. He concluded by proposing his amendment, which was seconded by Sir William Heathcote, one of the representatives for North Hants, who expressed his confidence in the Government, while opposing their propositions as ruinous. He was for Free Trade in grain with the colonies, but not with foreign countries.

The Hon. Mr. Lascelles, brother of the Earl of Harewood, and member for Wakefield, rose, immediately behind the Treasury bench, and advocated the commercial policy of the Government. Though Mr. Lascelles is a Conservative, he is not a turn-coat. Before the general election of 1841, he supported the commercial changes of the then Whig Government, and has, therefore, consistently supported the policy of the present Government, from the tariff of 1842, down to the present greater scheme. But a reference which he made, praising Sir Robert Peel as a greater financial Minister than any of his Whig predecessors, called up Lord J. Russell at a later period of the evening, in vindication of the consistency of his party, and their steady adherence to principle, whether in or out of office.

Lord Norreys, son of the Earl of Abingdon, and one of the representatives for Oxfordshire, next expressed his dismay at the sweeping propositions of the Government; which, however, were defended by

Mr. A. B. Cochrane, one of the members for Bridport, who ridiculed the idea that members were never to change their opinions, and quoted the witty saying of a remarkable individual, who had remarked that the advocate of an unalterable law must be an unalterable fool! Mr. Deedes, a new "agricultural mind" representative from Kent, took, of course, the protective side; and was followed by Sir John Walsh, who represents Radnorshire. This gentleman endeavoured to raise the question to the dignity of debate. He quoted statistics, expounded the theory of rent, and tried to break a lance with the political economists. The rental of Great Britain, according to the income-tax returns of 1842, was 45,750,000*l.*, to which add 15,000,000*l.* for Ireland, and we had an annual rental of 60,000,000*l.*, or double the annual amount of the interest of the national debt. The landed proprietors were at least 200,000 in number; and he warned them against touching their rental by changes which would throw the loss on its actual recipients, the tradesmen, and other people in the country upon whom the landlords expend their incomes. Again, he told the political economists that they were ignorant of the theory of rent, and unaware of the fact that a fall in price would touch, not rental, but the profits of the tenant farmer, who thereby would be ruined, and his ruin would descend on the labourers whom he employed.

Mr. A. J. Beresford Hope, member for Maidstone, and youngest son of the late author of "Anastasis," made a speech characterised by rambling humour, some little buffoonery, and touches of natural common sense, the staple of which, however, was an attack on Sir R. Peel for having abandoned his party, and the principles on which that party placed him in power.

Lord Sandon came next, and the noble member for Liverpool exhibited himself to the house like an ass between two bundles of hay. He spoke strongly against the measure, and as strongly expressed himself determined to support it. After pointing out what he thought would be the misery which Free Trade might produce, he gave the go-by to his fears, by expressing himself, not merely going to vote for Free Trade, but his belief that under Free Trade England would be as great as ever!

No member had yet spoken from the Opposition side of the house, but now

Lord John Russell rose, and told Lord Sandon that he was going to give his vote on the same side with him, but he trusted with more of heart and hope! The noble lord's speech deserves perusal.

Sir Robert Harry Inglis followed Lord John Russell, with some stock arguments for protection; and the night was wound up by a very remarkable speech from Mr. Sidney Herbert, half brother of the Earl of Pembroke, and one of the representatives for South Wilts.

Mr. Sidney Herbert, as is well known, is Secretary at War, and a member of the Cabinet. He it was, who in the early part of last session told the agriculturists not to come "whining" to the House of Commons for relief. On the present occasion he gave the history of his conversion to Free Trade views, and certainly spoke with much ability in support of the measures of the Government of which he is a member. The law of 1842, he frankly avowed, had failed; and the state of the agricultural population showed that protection had done nothing for them. The remarkable assemblage of labourers, at Goatacre, in Wilts, who, at night, had met to proclaim, in painfully-affecting statements, their social wrongs and sufferings, had made a deep impression on him. Knowing the country as he did, he felt that no change could make their position worse than it was. Then he warned the landed interest that tenant farmers and agricultural labourers were all coming round, with the rest of the community, to the conviction that the Corn Law was simply a landlords' question; and concluded his speech by an earnest appeal to the country gentlemen to avail themselves of the present opportunity to REPAIR the "great error" which had been committed in 1815, when the first of the series of modern Corn Laws had been imposed.

When he had concluded, the debate was adjourned; and on Tuesday was resumed by

Mr. Augustus Stafford O'Brien, one of the representatives for North Northamptonshire, and well known as one of the most active members of the Central Protection Society. He addressed himself mainly to the speech delivered on the previous evening by Mr. Sidney Herbert; and taunted him with want of originality in offering to the country gentlemen the opportunity of "repairing" the "great error of 1815." Mr. Stafford O'Brien felt much obliged to Mr. Sidney Herbert for the offer, but the country gentlemen had been repeatedly offered similar opportunities by Mr. VILLIERS, and had been backed by the Government in their refusal to accept them. The speech of Mr. Stafford O'Brien was delivered with fluency, and had several ad captandum points which were vociferously cheered by the agricultural members around him. The staple of his speech, so far as argument is concerned, was simply this:—The poor man's labour is his property; the Legislature is mainly occupied with the protection of property; but if we permit the rich man to go abroad for his silks, his paper-hangings, and his carriages, there will be no work for the artisan, and consequently the labouring man, deprived of his property, will covet that of the rich, and in wrath and hatred overthrow the established relations of society. This was really the gist of a somewhat showy speech.

When Mr. Stafford O'Brien had concluded, Mr. Sharman Crawford rose, and in language as plain as his mild and amiable nature would permit, told Mr. O'Brien, that however amusing as a fancy, there was not a particle of fact in the "dissolving view" he had exhibited. Mr. Sharman Crawford is an Irish landlord of considerable property and experience; and his opinions on the question of the Corn Laws are deserving of great respect. He showed that their repeal would be of the greatest possible advantage to Ireland—an opinion which was corroborated by Lord Clements, who represents Leitrim, and young Mr. Gregory, who is one of the members for Dublin.

With the exception of two speeches,—one at the opening, and the other at the close,—the whole of the debate of Tuesday night was exceedingly flat. The opponents of the Government were Mr. Lefroy, member for Longford, the Marquis of Granby, the eldest son of the Duke of Rutland, Lord Brooke, who was recently elected for Warwickshire, and Lord Clive, the eldest son of Earl Powis, and who represents North Salop.

There was, however, one noticeable speech, which, in fairness, cannot be passed over. It was delivered in a low slow tone, and escaped attention; but it contained some plausible objections to Free Trade, and then the gentleman who made them declared his intention of voting for the Government measures. This member was

Mr. H. Baillie, who said that the reason why foreign nations fenced themselves round with customs houses and prohibitory duties, was the fact of their being aware that our superiority in manufactures, by means of our iron, coal, machinery, and facilities of transit, would enable us to overwhelm their domestic industry. Again, the reason why we protected our domestic agriculture from foreign competition, was the fact that our climate was inferior to that of other countries for the production of grain, which could only be produced here at a risk from which warmer countries were free, and which, therefore, gave foreigners an advantage over us to the extent of at least twenty per cent. If it was said that our soil was better adapted for pasture, he admitted it; but then this raised the question of dependence on foreign supply. He illustrated what he considered would be the results of Free Trade, by a reference to the cotton manufacture. When we went first to India, we found a vast population engaged in the domestic manufacture of those fabrics, which have been since wholly superseded by our machinery and skill. Yet, dreading the results of Free Trade, he thought he had no alternative left but to vote for the Government propositions.

Lord Worsley, the eldest son of the Earl of Yarborough, and one of the representatives for Lincolnshire, quoted some of the former speeches of Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham, in praise of protection—especially a famous one by the Home Secretary, in which he deprecated the "change from 'the breezy call of incense-breathing morn' to a painful and grievous obedience to the sad sound of the factory bell; with a number of fine epithets about the "thatched cottage," "blooming garden," "rural walks," "village green," "foul garret," "dark cellar," and other things too numerous to mention, including a threat that if England were made the "workshop of the world," it would be the last country he would wish to live in. This reminiscence created much laughter, and brought up Sir James Graham.

Lord Clive finished the discussion on Tuesday night; and the debate was then adjourned to Thursday.

On Wednesday there was a short day sitting of about two hours; and even in that interval the "agricultural interests" in the house could not resist the temptation of getting up a miniature Corn Law debate. Lord G. Bentinck, (second son of the Duke of Portland) who has earned more laurels on the turf than in the House of Commons, moved for a return of the number of importers of foreign grain, and the quantity in bond, with a view of showing that any reduction of duty would be a benefit, not to the consumer, but merely to the importer. Mr. Escott sarcastically advised Lord George to add to his motion a return of the number of people who were to EAT the grain! This provoked his gallant lordship to tell Mr. Escott that he wondered how he could, consistently, with his personal honour, retain his seat for Winchester, seeing he was elected on protection principles, and was now an advocate for Free Trade. Mr. Escott, however, took the matter very coolly, hoping Lord George felt more comfortable after his discharge! and informing him that he was wholly ignorant of all the circumstances connected with his election.

Before the adjourned debate was resumed, a characteristic scene occurred. One of the laborious compilations of Mr. Macgregor, of the Board of Trade, on the Commercial Regulations of America, has just been issued; and Mr. Stafford O'Brien, holding up the huge Blue Book, said it was full of disgraceful blunders, adding an instance of what he considered to be one. This attempt to damage the reputation of Mr. Macgregor turned out an utter failure. Though Mr. Stafford O'Brien had not given any notice of his question, and therefore expected that his charge would have an uncontradicted run for twenty-four hours, it luckily happened that Mr. Macgregor was within hail; and through Mr. Thomas Duncombe, the house was informed that the supposed astounding mistake was caused by a simple typographical blunder!

Mr. Colquhoun resumed the adjourned debate, and made a long speech; and a curious speech it was. The opinions of Mr. Colquhoun hang on the very confines of the principle he opposes; almost he is persuaded to be a Free Trader; he would take a fixed duty, if he could get it; and during his speech, his arguments were like nine-pins, which a man sets up that he may have the pleasure of knocking them down himself. Besides, Mr. Colquhoun, though a fluent, is really a very shallow speaker; after listening to his fluent mass of verbiage for an hour, you could put all that he has said into a speech of ten minutes duration.

Mr. Wynn followed. This gentleman has been in Parliament for a length of time—nearly equal to that of venerable Mr. Byng, that is, for about half a century. He has long been noted as a liberal Conservative, and has had considerable official experience during his public life. His opinions therefore are always treated with respect. Owing to infirmity in his limbs, he addresses the house sitting; but his head is still clear. He made an excellent speech in favour of the Government measure, showing that all our past commercial legislation was a compound of ignorance, folly, and intermeddling, and that the sooner we could arrive at a sound system the better for the country.

Later in the evening, Mr. Wynn's son-in-law, Mr. Milnes Gaskell, who flung up his lordship of the Treasury in horror at the propositions of the Government, made an attack on Sir Robert Peel, for having betrayed his principles, and broken up a "splendid party." His assault on the Prime Minister was vociferously cheered by the "agricultural members;" though Mr. Roebuck, in reply, put the question on its right footing, by asking what they meant when they talked of a great party being broken up? Was it anything that would prove injurious to the people?

The other speakers on Thursday evening do not require special notice, unless we remark that Mr. Wykeham Martin, member for Newport, Isle of Wight, produced a series of calm statements, to prove to the agriculturists how groundless were their fears of some terrific flood of foreign grain. But the two main orators of the night were Mr. Thomas Baring and Lord Morpeth.

Mr. Thomas Baring, who contested London on the principle of "Free Trade in the abstract," against "Free Trade in practice," was true to his former reputation. Trying to steer his way between rock and whirlpool, he at last came to the conclusion that the time was now come—only now come!—for a COMPROMISE. He implored the house to adopt a middle course, and accept a FIXED DUTY. Well was he answered by Lord MORPETH, whose rising excited the general attention of a full house. The noble lord reminded Mr. T. Baring that a "compromise" had once been offered, but the time was now gone by. The whole of Lord Morpeth's bold, frank, manly speech, deserves the most serious attention. The conclusion was one of the most emphatic warnings ever delivered to the aristocracy by one of its most honourable and conspicuous members. His travels in the United States have enlarged the sphere of his observation, and Lord Morpeth, therefore, spoke with authority, when he told them that no aristocracy which claimed excessive and peculiar privileges ever escaped a downfall. The question of the Corn Laws, if not settled with their aid, would be settled in spite of them. Let them, then, he said, throw in their influence with a thinking middle class, a toiling population, and a busy press, and in the onward march of civilisation be the leaders, and not the laggards of the people. This conclusion was like a trumpet sound.

The debate was adjourned to Friday.

THE CORN LAW DEBATE.

Continued from Page 336 of our Supplement.

had by no means prepared the house or the public for the course which he now takes, and he referred particularly to a speech made by my right honourable friend in 1839. Allow me to read a short extract from that very speech. My right hon. friend, then a leader in Opposition, and a candidate for power, said, "I consider this statement, that the condition of the labourer has been rendered worse by the operation of the Corn Law, a most important one; and I have no hesitation in saying that, unless the existence of the Corn Law can be shown to be consistent, not only with the prosperity of agriculture and the maintenance of the landlord's interest, but also with the maintenance of the general interests of the country, and especially with the improvement of the condition of the labouring class, the Corn Law is practically at an end." That was the declaration of my right honourable friend, as early as the year 1839 (hear, hear). It may seem presumptuous in me to refer, in addressing the house, to what has fallen from myself in a former debate, but after what my noble friend has stated, perhaps in fairness the house will not refuse me permission to do so (hear, hear). On the occasion when the hon. member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers) moved for going into committee on the Corn Laws, in June last, I said, "It is decidedly my opinion that the prosperity of agriculture must always depend on the prosperity of the other branches of the native industry of this country, and that the public prosperity is on the whole best promoted by giving a fair and uninterrupted current to the natural flow of national industry. I will go farther and say, that it is my opinion that, by safe, gradual, and cautious measures, it is expedient to bring our laws, with reference to the trade in corn, into a nearer relation with the sound principles which regulate our commercial policy with respect to every other branch of industry. I will go still further, and say I am not satisfied with the plan, and can be no party to it, of setting up a separate interest for the landlord and the farmer of this country; I believe that their prosperity will, in the main, be found to depend on the wealth, the comfort, and the ease of the great body of the people of this country." Those were the principles which I avowed upon that occasion (hear, hear). The house, I think, will also remember the memorable motion of the noble lord opposite, on the condition of the working classes. I then stated to the house many facts which had come before me, which were, in my opinion, quite conclusive to prove that the comfort and well being of the working-classes in this country were mainly dependent upon abundance and cheapness, and that misery and distress were mainly occasioned by scarcity or by high prices (hear, hear). I frankly avow, that if the course of events had not been interrupted by circumstances which it was impossible to foresee, I should very gladly have adhered to the policy of gradually and progressively diminishing the protection to agriculture, but steadily keeping in view that desirable period when the protection might altogether be removed. But this brings me to the point of the utmost importance to the consideration of this case, namely, the unforeseen circumstances which did occur after the termination of the last session. First, with respect to the harvest of this country. It was a harvest, as was truly stated by my right hon. friend the Secretary at War, of a peculiar character. In point of quantity it was not a deficient harvest: in point of quality, I believe, in the experience of the oldest farmers, there never was so great a variety; and the effect of that has been to point out and to establish the great imperfection of the averages under the existing law. I will not press this further. It was distinctly stated last night by my right hon. friend, that in no former years, I believe, has there been such a variety of quality in the corn brought to market, the price varying from 40s. for the worst, I believe, up to 70s., or 75s. for the best. An alteration was made in the law in 1842, in regard to the averages, which had a very decisive effect in one respect; it altogether prevented fraud. By extending the period, and multiplying the towns, in respect to the taking of the averages, fraud was prevented; but as relates to the interest of the consumer, this had a very reverse effect; for fraud, whenever it had been exerted, was always in favour of the consumer, and for the purpose of opening the ports; and in my real opinion, the general defect of the measure of 1842, though it was not so intended, was that it rendered protection more stringent (hear, hear). This was demonstrated, I must say, by the operation of the scale regulating the duties in the course of last autumn. Prices were rising; the price of the quarter loaf in this metropolis was 9d., and approaching to the war price. When the quarter loaf had so risen, the duty indicated by the sliding scale was 14s. or 15s. per quarter (hear, hear). In point of fact the sliding scale would neither slide nor move (cheers). And that was its condemnation (renewed cheers). I do not wish to go into an historical statement respecting the Corn Laws, or I might mention that from 1773 to 1792 the importation of corn was in point of fact free in this country; and it was a remarkable coincidence, which Adam Smith points out when, without marking the cause, he mentions as a time when there was a great start in our manufacturing and commercial prosperity—exactly that period, from 1773 to 1792, when the importation of corn was free (hear, hear). I will also observe that really change on this matter was not a change of any fundamental principle. The corn law had been changed and altered five or six times, and yet its avowed object had never been answered (hear, hear). I will now return to the point from which I digressed. I was speaking of the imperfect operation of the sliding scale, and I may add, that together with that, there did arise that which human foresight could not anticipate, the general failure of the potato crop throughout the United Kingdom. This failure was by no means limited to Ireland. The destruction of the potato crop began in the south of England, and I believe that it was more fatal in the southern part of England than in any part of Ireland. In many parts of the southern counties of England the working population, though not altogether subsisting on potatoes, yet are in a great measure dependent on that article for their daily food. With respect to Scotland we have the most accurate information; and from the parochial returns, we know positively, that in the south of Scotland one-third of the potato crop was destroyed as early as the month of November last. I will not go through all the precise details as to the extent of the failure of crop in Ireland. Suffice it to say, that in November Government received the report of Messrs. Lindley and Playfair, by which it appeared that one half of the whole crop, though not greater than an average, had been destroyed; that one-eighth of that crop must be preserved for seed; and that, consequently, not more than three-eighths of the whole crop remained at that time for the consumption of the year in Ireland. I had been at that time resident in the North of England, and had almost daily communications, in writing, with my right hon. friend at the head of the Government; and it did appear to me that this matter of coming scarcity, if not of famine, to be apprehended in Ireland, did have an immediate and indissoluble connexion with this question of the Corn Laws. The noble lord the member for Liverpool said last night that he could not see that connexion; and the hon. member for Northamptonshire, following the same track, has also said that he did not see the intimate connexion between the two questions. Will the house, then, allow me to state what was the effect produced upon my mind by this inevitably coming scarcity in Ireland (hear)? I foresaw, and I am afraid rightly, that it would be indispensably necessary to give to the suffering community in Ireland aid from the public purse of this country to meet this great calamity. Already some advance of the public money has been asked for, and I am afraid that further advances may still be necessary. Then this great question presents itself—Can in fairness any Minister of the Crown propose to the people of Great Britain to take out of the taxes of Great Britain public money to aid in the sustenance of their fellow countrymen in Ireland, while artificially, by laws so designed, the price of the food of the people of Great Britain is enhanced (hear, hear)? Other persons may be bold enough to make such a proposition; but I confess that no power on earth should have induced me to be responsible for such a proposal (hear, hear). I told my right hon. friend that if such a course should be necessary, I strongly advised the suspension of the existing law (“hear, hear,” from the Protectionist benches), and that suspension I find is now generally approved of on this side of the house (hear, hear). The humane, the generous feelings of the landlords of England could not tolerate for a moment that distress, such as that likely to visit Ireland, should not be met (hear, hear). But to give this aid to the Irish people, and at the same time to enhance the price of the food of the great community who contribute towards the taxes of England, and who by their hard industry are only able to pay those taxes, living in some instances on potatoes—is a proposition which I never could have maintained as a Minister (hear, hear). But it has been intimated that, under these circumstances, hon. members generally on this side of the house would be glad to open the ports. Then arises the question—if you once suspend the present law, what is the proposition which, at the termination of that suspension, is to be made? I have told you that I am satisfied, that even when scarcity has arisen, when the price of the quarter loaf was high, and when high prices ought to have been counteracted by the self-operation of the scale, that scale does not operate. I have told you that I thought the present an unsatisfactory law, and according to my opinion, I could not, after its suspension, have supported its re-imposition. I have always stated that my objections to a fixed duty as a fiscal duty are insuperable; because I think that whenever the duty should be high, it would be impossible to exact it; and whenever the duty should be low, it failed for the purposes of protection, and the agricultural interest would then incur all the obloquy of maintaining protection without deriving any advantages from it. We might have proposed some small remnant of the sliding scale, and such a reduction of protection, which it would have been unworthy of the agricultural interest to accept, and still more unworthy of the Government to offer. Under these circumstances the abolition of the Corn Laws was inevitable on its suspension. It was, as it appeared to me, absolutely necessary to suspend the operation of the law; and I foresaw the necessity, if you suspended the law, of its abolition; and I again repeat that, in my humble view, our duty was, charged as we were with the responsibility of office, to meet this immediate necessity and suspend the law. Nothing could have more gratified me than to see the general arrangements of this question respecting the Corn Law conducted by the noble lord opposite (hear, hear). The question has been asked, “Have you any reason since 1842 for changing your opinion?” I say that since 1842 those who were charged with the administration of affairs, and who have watched the various circumstances which have occurred have had experience, not to be mistaken, leading to conclusive consequences. We had, first of all, the painful and lamentable experience of 1842 itself, a year of the greatest distress, and, since it had passed, I may say, of the utmost danger (loud cries of hear, hear, hear). What were the circumstances of 1842? Allow me just to glance at them. We had in this metropolis, at midnight, Chartist meetings, assembled in Lincoln’s inn-fields. Almost for nearly three weeks there were assembled in all the environs of this metropolis immense masses of people, greatly discontented, and acting in a spirit dangerous to the public peace. What was the condition of Lancashire, the seat of our great staple manufacture, depending for its prosperity on an uninterrupted tranquillity and labour? Such was the madness of the people on that occasion, that a great combination existed to stop machinery, and to put an end to the source of the labour, on which they depended for subsistence (hear, hear). What was the duty of the Government under these circumstances? It was my painful duty to consult with the Horse Guards as to the precautions that were necessary for the maintenance of the public peace; a large force was marched to Manchester, and the troops were actually called on to enforce public tranquillity. I can safely say that for three months the anxiety which I and my colleagues experienced with reference to the public peace was greater than we ever felt before with reference to public concerns (hear, hear). Those were the days of high prices and scarcity (hear, hear). I am certain from what I have since observed, that that turbulent disposition, that dangerous disposition, mainly arose from the want of adequate sustenance, combined with low wages (cries of hear, hear). What has been my experience for the last two years? I don’t take credit to her Majesty’s Government for the altered circumstances. Our measures may or may not have conduced to that great end; but by the bounty of Providence we have had abundant harvests; with abundant harvests we have had cheapness and full employment; and what has occurred? I can safely say that for the last 12 months I have not had a single interview with one of the commissioners of police with respect to the maintenance of the peace of this metropolis; I do not believe that for the last 12 months I have had one interview with the Horse Guards with respect to the movement of troops for the maintenance of the peace of the country (hear). Perfect tranquillity, comparative happiness prevailed; and that is a contrast between scarcity with discontent, and plenty with social comfort, more striking than any I ever before witnessed (loud cheers). I will not trouble you with many statistics. The document I am about to read is short, but still, as an analysis with reference to crime, it is pregnant with instruction. I have taken the six counties which may be said to be the seat of our manufacturing industry; I have taken the county of York, the county of Lancaster, the county of Warwick, the counties of Gloucester, Cheshire, and Staffordshire, and have compared the commitments for trial in these counties in 1840, 1841, and 1842, when the prices of wheat were 66s. 4d., 64s. 6d., 57s. 3d., with those which took place in 1843, 1844, and 1845, when the price of wheat was about 50s. Now, observe, in Yorkshire the commitments were, in 1840, 1687; 1841, 1895; 1842, 2,598. The scarcity then ceased, abundance with low prices begins; and we have committed for trial in 1843, 2304; 1844, 1691; 1845, 1417; showing a decrease of commitments in the last as compared with the previous period of these years of 14.9 per cent. In Lancashire the commitments in those years were respectively 3506, 3987, 4497, 3577, 2893, 2852, exhibiting a diminution of 21.4 per cent. In Warwickshire the commitments were 1001, 1046, 1003, 1045, 894, 769, a decrease of 11.2 per cent. In Gloucestershire, including Bristol, the numbers were 1045, 1236, 1252, 1186, 1071, 929, showing a decrease of 9.8 per cent. In Cheshire the commitments were 1042, 943, 1086, 1018, 777, 688, a decrease of 19.1 per cent. In Staffordshire the numbers were 923, 1059, 1485, 1175, 885, 717, a decrease of 19.9 per cent.; exhibiting an aggregate decrease of 17 per cent. (loud cheers). Upon the whole of these six counties, comparing the years 1842 and 1845, there is a diminution on the aggregate of 18 per cent. I am convinced with the right honourable baronet, the head of the Government, that it is a fallacy to contend that wages fall with falling prices, and rise with rising prices (hear, hear, and loud cheers). It was my noble friend the member for Liverpool, I think, who last night contended that it was true in the agricultural districts that wages did rise with rising prices; but he admitted that the proportion was not always equal. Now I beg you to observe, that to the labouring man the equal proportion between the price of food and the rise of wages is a matter of life and death. But it was necessary to observe that the proportion should be concurrent as well as equal. If the rise in wages should lag behind the rise of prices life itself might be in danger. But I have the experience of Sir John Walsham, who long had the charge of the districts of Norfolk and Suffolk, himself an extensive landed proprietor in the county of Hereford, and who, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, assisted the Poor Law Commissioners, and he tells me that he has never known that wages have risen between 8s. to 10s. and 11s. in certain counties, and from 9s. to 18s. in other counties; the utmost rise being 25 per cent.; while he has seen at the same time the price of corn rise from 45s. to 90s. It is unnecessary to say, in reference to this point, that the rise of wages in those districts is not at all commensurate with the rise in the article of first necessity (hear, hear). But, as truly stated by my right hon. friend the Secretary at War, whatever may be the case in the agricultural districts, the converse of the assertion is true with respect to the manufacturing districts. Invariably in the manufacturing districts you will find low prices accompanied by high wages, and high prices by low wages. I mentioned some circumstances which occurred in the month of November with reference to Ireland; but I have not the whole of the case with respect to that time. From a report which I have received from Mr. Sanders with respect to the West Riding of Yorkshire, I find that at that time there was not merely a rise in prices, but a strong apprehension of still higher prices in several parts of the West Riding, particularly in Bradford, and that several works were put on short time. In several of the cotton districts, also, I learn the mills were about to be put on short time. When, therefore, we looked to the circumstances of the whole country in the months of November and December, we had no option left, as the general guardians of the condition of the great body of the community, but to pursue the course which we have pursued. We have been told of the danger of being dependent on foreign States for the supply of food; but when we consider that the population of Great Britain in 1815 was 18,000, and that at the present moment it is 23,000,000, it seems to me that the time has arrived when it may well become a question, not whether Great Britain can alone supply the amount of food necessary for the population, but whether it will not be difficult at a moderate price to secure food for the whole of that population, even with the aid of foreign countries (hear, hear). For myself, I have no apprehension of any great fall of prices from the abolition of the Corn Laws. I think that both the hopes and fears of many people on the subject are greatly exaggerated. I do not believe that the abolition of protection, as matters now stand, will materially lower the price of corn; but I consider that to the great body of consumers it will be a security of inestimable value against high prices when the harvest happens to be deficient in this country (hear, hear). That is my view with regard to supply. With regard to the commercial principle there can be no doubt whatever. The hon. member for Northamptonshire described a state of things where a certain individual has the walls of his house covered with French paper hangings, furnished with articles of German hardware, and who rides in a Brussels carriage, while workmen are crowding the market with nobody to hire them. How does the hon. gentleman think those carriages are to be obtained? Whatever may be the form of the transaction by which they are obtained, that transaction of necessity resolved itself into a bargain. Directly or indirectly there must be an exchange of commodities, and you must in the long run export some of your own home productions to pay for what you have got from abroad. I am quite satisfied, if you extend the sphere of your commerce, and do not attempt by fits and starts to force its expansion, that the property of all classes will steadily advance with the increase of your exports. The hon. member for Northampton, (Mr. S. O’Brien) referred to the case of a farmer, whom he described in the most pathetic terms, for the purpose of illustrating the consequences which the hon. gentleman presumes will flow from the measures of her Majesty’s Ministers. But another picture was given last night by the noble lord the member for Liverpool (Lord Sandon). The hon. gentleman represented the farmer as petitioning his landlord in vain for a reduction of rent. The noble lord considered the condition of the farmer as peculiarly helpless and exposed. He said this unhappy man had constantly held out to him the expectation of prices which he had never realised—prices which were made the basis of calculation, when he agreed to pay a fixed rent; then he comes to the landlord with “bated breath” and most humble demeanour, seeking an abatement of rent. The landlord grants somewhat less than the farmer requires; an abatement of 10 per cent. is found quite inadequate; and at last the farmer is forced to take refuge from all his difficulties in some lower occupation. Such are the results, as described most accurately by the noble lord himself, of this system of protection and of disappointment (cheers). The abundant crop, the diminished protection, and the fixed rent, have been a failure (no, no, and hear, hear). From the very spot where the hon. gentleman stood when he addressed the house I heard such a representation given of the condition of the farmer; and I am quite satisfied that the great bulk of that class are more likely to be injured by the continuance of the existing law than by its repeal. I have no apprehensions whatever that the abolition of that law will render this country dependent upon any foreign country. But, as a landlord—and on this point I agree with the noble lord the member for Lincolnshire—I am certain that the settlement of this question is with reference to the interests of landlords of paramount importance (cheers). How can we have a settlement? with the feeling of the great bulk of the community on the subject as at present, there is but one settlement. There are various classes whose interests are involved in this question, and their views have undergone a change on the principle of protection. I will not dwell upon the meeting in Wiltshire. It may have been suggested, but still that meeting is a remarkable fact. I pass, however, from that, and appeal to every gentleman in this house who has had opportunities of observation, whether he can contradict me when I assert that till lately the opinion prevalent among operatives was, that low prices would invariably lead to low wages. I say they have changed their opinions (cheers). The experience of the last three years has not been thrown away upon them; and if that be so—if the masters and the men are quite of one mind on this point, they will settle—and I may tell the hon. member for Knaresborough so—they will easily and amicably settle those questions which are likely to arise between parties placed in such a relation to each other. I can very well understand how those working men should overtax their industry, and even call on their wives and daughters to work, that they may obtain subsistence. Necessity might drive them to such resources. But if they can understand that by a change of your law they may be able, without working so long themselves, without requiring their wives or daughters to work as they do now, to live in greater comfort than they have ever known, I have not the smallest doubt that arrangements will be made between masters and men as to the period of labour, and so every ground or pretext for legislative interference will be taken away (cheers). It will, I should say, be one of the most pleasant and happy days that ever occurred in England, when, on account of an alteration in your law rendering a shorter time necessary to procure wages adequate to purchase the comforts of life—it will, I repeat, be one of the happiest days of England when, on account of such an alteration, the masters and the men shall, without legislative interference, come to an agreement on that subject (cheers).

I am glad to see that the noble lord the member for the West Riding of Yorkshire (Lord Morpeth)—with whom I have often differed, but whose absence from this house I never ceased to regret—expressed on the hustings sentiments closely akin to those I have endeavoured to convey (cheers). As to the agricultural interest—the interest with which I am myself connected—I would say, let us have certainty with reference to the value of our land. That certainty you will have, as far as it can possibly be given, from a change in the law. But, in addition to certainty, you will have peaceful enjoyment. You will have that peaceful enjoyment without exciting the jealousy of your poorer neighbour. And I do not think that landlords will have to make any very great sacrifices; but, entertaining the opinions which I do, founded on the experience I now possess, I say, were the sacrifice ten times greater, I for one, sooner than that it should be said of myself, or any of the class to which I belong, that our object was to secure for ourselves an increase of rent, and not to promote the welfare and happiness of the great body of the community—sooner than leave any room for such a suspicion, I should say, speaking for myself, that I would descend to a lower estate, and abrogate my inheritance (cheers). It is said a great party has been dissolved. It is said old political ties have been severed. It has been said that social relations have been disturbed. It is anticipated, and it is probable, that an Administration may be dissolved (cheers). And, though I should regret the former part of those consequences, on my conscience I believe this proposition will save a great and powerful nation from anarchy, misery, and ruin. (The right hon. gentleman resumed his seat amidst great cheering.)

Lord CLIVE briefly expressed his intention of voting for the amendment of Mr. Miles, and of opposing the commercial project of Government.

On the motion of Mr. COLQUHOUN the debate, after a short discussion, was adjourned till Thursday next.

The house then adjourned.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.—THURSDAY.

The adjourned debate on the question "that the house do resolve into committee on the Customs and Corn Importation Acts" was commenced by

Mr. COLQUHOUN, who entered into an explanation of his vote in 1838, in support of Mr. Villiers' motion for a committee to inquire into the propriety of repealing the Corn Laws. Sir Robert Peel had entirely mistaken both his past and his present opinions. He had never entertained the opinions so consistently entertained by Mr. Villiers; and he had never passed from them to the doctrines of high protection. He had always considered the question of the Corn Laws a most anxious and perplexing question; and in 1841, not being in Parliament, and having much leisure time, he had studied it with all the diligence and impartiality he could command (hear, hear). He had come to the conclusion that protection was necessary for the interests of agriculture; and having come to that conclusion, he had declared himself an advocate for a fixed duty on corn. After the occurrences of the last few months, it seemed probable that his notion of a fixed duty, had it been adopted, would have now been deemed preferable to that of a sliding scale. After applying himself to refute Sir R. Peel's arguments respecting prices and wages, he proceeded to comment on the speech delivered by Sir J. Graham on Tuesday evening. Sir James Graham had then disposed very summarily of all his former arguments on this subject; and had said that as he confessed that he had changed his opinions, there was an end of his former reasonings (hear hear). No, there was not an end of them; for a statesman who spoke like Sir J. Graham, with eloquence and genius, ought to recollect that his words were winged shafts which stuck deeply in men's hearts. They had made many converts, and had influenced and were influencing thousands of his fellow-countrymen; and he (Mr. Colquhoun) was of opinion that Sir James's explicit recantation of his immortal words would not convince the country that he could raise wages or exalt the financial condition of the labouring population by his present measures. He was afraid that those measures would bring on the country evils of a kind to which its attention ought to be, yet had not been called. What would be their effects on the colonial interests? The protection on timber and sugar would soon survive the protection of corn; and then the manufacturers of England would find themselves no longer in possession of the advantages which they now possessed in the colonial market. Under such circumstances, what would be the condition of the country if, in addition to a failing harvest, it should have to struggle, as in 1840, against a falling revenue? But what reason was there to induce the house to give its assent to a commercial code which even Mr. Villiers could not recommend to his constituents as a perfect code, as it still enforced protection on silk, on sugar, on timber, on copper, and various other articles? If, then, protection were left on some fabrics, why was all protection to be taken from that manufacture—for corn had been justly called by Lord F. Egerton a manufacture—which was of all others the most precarious in its course, and the most uncertain in its returns? He regretted that ever since he had taken his seat on the Ministerial bench agricultural protection had never received from Sir R. Peel anything like a sincere defence. Last year Mr. Villiers had called Sir Robert's speech on the Corn Laws a dexterous evasion of the whole question, and had warned the country gentlemen that they would soon be called upon to surrender the protection they enjoyed. He was sorry to observe that on all the great institutions of the country Sir R. Peel followed a similar course of dexterous evasion. He had no antipathy to him, and a very sincere regard for many of his colleagues; but his opposition to Sir R. Peel's Administration would in future be openly avowed and steadily adhered to; for as long as Sir Robert declined discussion on all the great questions which agitated the minds of Englishmen, so long he should not promise him any adhesion, nor repose in him any confidence.

Mr. C. WYNN was sorry that he differed in opinion on this question from his constituents, but was consoled by the reflection that he differed from them on honest and conscientious grounds. There was no portion of our law which reflected so little honour on the wisdom of our ancestors as their commercial regulations. Our statute book was filled with instance after instance of their impolitic interference with matters of trade. So long as there was protection extended to other articles, it would have been unfair to take it altogether from agriculture. But the removal of protection was now no longer brought forward as an isolated measure bearing on one interest alone, but as part of an extensive project which applied to every interest and to every trade in the empire. It had been said, however, that a duty of 10 per cent. was well preserved on several manufactured articles. Undoubtedly it was so; but that duty was not so much a duty of protection as a duty of revenue. It was impossible to carry out the system of Free Trade fully; for the claims of the revenue unfortunately interfered. He trusted that on a future occasion this measure would be carried out to a still greater extent. He should have been better pleased had it been so carried out now; but he was afraid that such a proposition could not have been made to Parliament with any chance of success at the present moment. He had no apprehension that if we repealed our Corn Laws we should fall in obtaining a supply of corn from foreign nations. So long as they could raise a superabundance of corn, they would be as anxious to sell as we should be to buy it.

Mr. HEATHCOTE did not come forward on this occasion to attack the consistency of others, but to maintain his own. He had resisted a measure similar in principle to the present when proposed by his own political friends; and he felt bound to offer the same resistance now, when a measure ten thousand times more mischievous in degree was proposed by his political opponents. He explained at some length the reasons why he considered this measure a rash, ill-timed, and hazardous experiment, and observed that it was not recommended to his mind by being accompanied with changes of opinion hitherto unparalleled in the annals of political tergiversation. They had turned out a Government for proposing a fixed duty of 8s. a quarter on corn; and they were now themselves proposing a fixed duty of 4s. a quarter, to expire at the end of three years. The compensation which they proposed for the injury which they were thus going to inflict on the agricultural interest was utterly inadequate and disproportionate. Monarchical Europe and Republican America had both their Corn Laws. Why was England to deprive itself of a similar code? Holland had once made the experiment of abrogating such laws; but the experiment had altogether failed, and Holland, like ourselves, had now the benefit of a sliding scale. No case of public necessity had been pleaded as a justification of the proposed change. Public opinion was not in favour of it even in the large towns, if any conjecture could be formed from the last elections for Wigan, Birmingham, and Sunderland. Foreign countries had not called upon us to make it, for as we were putting off our armour they were covering themselves with the full panoply of restriction. As to the allegation of famine in Ireland, he believed it to be little better than a mere pretext. Famine might exist in Ireland in the speeches of Cabinet Ministers, and in the paragraphs of newspapers; but he believed abundance was to be found in its markets. If he was mistaken on that point, he was willing to meet the emergency by an ample grant from the public treasury; but he was not prepared on account of local distress and temporary mischief to alter entirely the permanent laws of a mighty empire.

Mr. C. W. MARTIN felt compelled, after the observations of the preceding speaker on the political tergiversation which had been displayed on this question, to explain the reasons which had induced him to abandon the opinions which he had formerly entertained of the Corn Laws, and to support the propositions of Sir Robert Peel in favour of Free Trade. He then entered into a review of the circumstances which had occurred in the last autumn, and contended that there was no ground for supposing that the agricultural interest would suffer injury from the reduced price of corn in consequence of the changes now proposed. The prices of corn in the Channel Islands were not unworthy of the attention of the house. The trade in corn was perfectly free, and yet corn bore a high, and what was more material, a steady price. Little apprehension was to be entertained for many years to come from those corn-growing countries which it was said would inundate England with grain. He looked forward with confidence to the measures now proposed, and was certain that they would place the agriculture and commerce of the country on a sound and healthy footing.

Mr. T. BARING expressed his deep regret that he was compelled to give his vote on this question in opposition to a Government which he had hitherto supported, and in whose patriotism he still trusted. The experience of the last three years was not a sufficient justification for adopting, without hesitation or reserve, a great experiment, which would shake the security of all interested in the prosperity of agriculture, and which would open a future to the whole country of which no man could foresee the result. After alluding to the allegation of Ministers, that famine was impending over Ireland, and after contending that casual distress ought not to induce us to change a permanent law, he proceeded to express the surprise which he felt at hearing Sir James Graham assert the other night that he would not be the Minister to propose, and that this would not be the Parliament to consent to, the imposition of a tax for the purpose of supplying the starving people of Ireland with food so long as the price of corn in Great Britain was enhanced by artificial regulations. Talk of want in Ireland! He believed that the greatest want under which the country laboured at present was the want of ministers, and the most appalling scarcity was that of statesmen, who would consent to sit together in the same Cabinet. Neither in the effects of our previous relaxation of protective duties nor in the present circumstances of the country, could he see any justification for the sweeping change now proposed. There were three parties on the subject of the Corn Laws at this moment—the agriculturists, who required the protection of a sliding scale; the Anti-Corn-Law League, which repudiated all protection; and those who advocated a fixed duty. The present settlement would not satisfy any of the three. If ever there was a time when a compromise could be made by conciliation and concession, this was it, and he recommended the three parties, laying aside passion and prejudice, to submit their claims to friendly arbitration.

Lord MORPETH, having been loudly called upon, rose to address the house. He said: If the question had been a less important one, and the moment less critical, I might perhaps have hesitated, at so short a period after I had resumed my seat within this house, to present myself again to its notice, especially when I rise for the purpose of taking that view of the question, which, in my humble judgment, at least, has received almost all the illustration of which it is capable, from everything that the most consummate ability, the most industrious research, and the most protracted discussion could bring to bear upon it (hear, hear), not to mention the still more useful assistance it has lately received from official countenance, and from many illustrious adhesions (cheers). The honourable member who has just sat down was, we know, the friend of Free Trade in the abstract, but after his speech of to night, it would be difficult to discover that he is a friend to it either in abstract or detail (cheers and laughter). He professes himself, indeed, to be favourably disposed to some gradual and cautious relaxation of restrictive duties, but he has not told us how far he would go, or where he would stop; and I imagine that, with reference to the great interest which has been specially brought forward in the course of this debate, the large agricultural interest of this country, if there be any one course more than another to which we should object, it is to make it the subject of constant, gradual experiments, being for ever tampered with, and never let alone. The hon. member (Mr. Baring) has told us that the great want in the preceding autumn—upon the circumstances connected with which most of the ministerial proposition is sustained and has been founded—was the want of a ministry. Now, I certainly think that want is most sensibly felt by that great and important party in the state and in the country of which the hon. gentleman himself is an ornament (laughter). We hear of their being backed by the voice of the country (hear, hear)—we hear of their contesting successfully every vacant seat (hear); but still it seems to be as lamentable as it is unaccountable, that they are without leaders and without a head (cheers and laughter). If this be not the case—when they have displayed the full force of their numbers, when they have made the echo of their own opinions heard throughout the country—why do we not see a successful and suitable Government formed upon the principle of undiminished protection to agriculture (cheers from the Opposition benches)? Indeed the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Baring) has told us that the present time would be eminently suitable for a compromise (hear). I don't know whether he comes here entrusted with any message—I don't know whether he comes here the bearer of any overture to propose a ministry founded on the principle of compromise. If his compromise, indeed, was founded upon the commercial circular he read himself, I think he would find that he would depart very little from the actual line of conduct of the right hon. gentleman Sir Robert Peel (hear, hear). But I apprehend that it is now universally felt, both in the country and in this house, that the time for compromise is gone by (hear, hear). A compromise, indeed, was once offered (loud cries of hear, and cheers from the Opposition benches,) by the party, and by the leaders of the party with whom I have the pride and satisfaction of acting (cheers). And the hon. member cannot forget that the party which is now so glad to hail him and to cheer him as an honourable auxiliary—summarily and immediately rejected all notions of that kind (hear, hear, from the Opposition benches). I feel, sir, that the best excuse I can have for offering myself to the attention of the house, on this long discussed and widely-stretched question—which, as I have already said, has received almost all the illustration of which it is capable—will be, first, that I shall compress what I have to offer into a very moderate compass; and next, that I mean to confine myself to what may seem to me most special and particular, so far as my own opportunities and position enable me to form an opinion with respect to it (hear). Since I had the honour of having a seat in this house, I have myself happened to be a traveller upon the North American Continent. I have, for an uninterrupted period of two years lived in the heart of a purely agricultural district, and I have lost and gained the representation of the West Riding of Yorkshire (cheers). The last circumstance is naturally the freshest and uppermost in my own mind; and it is one of wisdom in itself. I feel it may intelligently and sufficiently answer for itself (cheers), because, brought about as it has been, it tells its own moral, and conveys its own meaning (loud cheers). And if my predecessor in the seat which I have now recovered justly adduced, in the opening debate of this Parliament, his return as a most significant reply to the inquiry which had been submitted to the country with respect to the budget of the year 1841, I feel that I may still more expressly appeal to my own recovery of that seat as the most significant and signal verdict that could be given upon the measure which now, under happier auspices, has been submitted to the country in the year 1846 (hear, hear). But there is only one circumstance that seems to me to require remark from me with reference to the bearing of the late election in Yorkshire on the question before the house. We know that the project of the right hon. baronet includes a variety of articles, corn, and provisions. His scheme has justly earned the title of comprehensive (hear, hear), and it meddles almost as much with manufactures as it does with agriculture (no, and cries of hear, hear). With many leading branches of manufactures it meddles with them just as much as it could, because the withdrawal of protection with respect to them, unlike that of corn, is immediate (hear, hear, and laughter). I was proceeding to say that the constituency, by whose choice and approval I have been honoured, represent, as is familiar to every one, a great variety both of manufacturing and agricultural interests. It comprises the largest woollen, the largest worsted, the largest steel manufactures in the empire (hear, hear). It comprises, I believe, the largest linen manufacture in England, and it comprises besides very large iron, and considerable cotton manufactures. Now, as I have just said, the withdrawal of protection from most of those articles is immediate and complete, and with respect to some of them it is by no means clear that the protection which is withdrawn would only act nominally. I might mention for instance, the cutlery of Sheffield, the knives and scissors and razors, for the manufacturing of which that town has acquired such just celebrity. Those articles will be immediately imitated on the Continent of Europe; the Sheffield mark will be forged upon them, and then they will be introduced into this country as genuine Sheffield manufacture (hear). So with respect to the article of woollen manufactures that are called low cloths. I am told that this manufacture, which prevails extensively in certain districts in the west, may be obtained from Belgium, and we shall probably sustain a formidable competition from the low cloths of Belgium. Every one of those interests will be directly affected by the withdrawal of protection, yet not one of the persons connected with them during the whole of the fortnight which was specially exacted for the consideration of the measure by the friends of protection, expressed a wish that it should be continued, even during the excitement of some rather vehement appeals that were made to them in the principal cities, and in the very heart of the manufacturing districts; and again, when many of those manufacturers were assembled in great numbers last week before the hustings of Wakefield, from no one of them was a single murmur or whisper of murmur or disapprobation heard, nor a single hint or wish to continue protection. Competition may come, they said, but we are prepared to meet it—all we ask is a fair field and no favour (cheers). And let me ask, why may not that interest which so often plumes itself upon being the most important, the noblest, the most English in the country—why, I say, should not that interest take a leaf out of the book of those begrudged manufacturers (hear, hear)? Now, with respect to what is meant by the agricultural mind and the impressions derived from it, we have not heard for the first time to-night in this debate that it is evident that the landlord persuades himself in this question that he is not induced to take the course which he does from any regard to his own interests, but to that of others; it must be confessed that with this comfortable opinion he could not regard it as injurious to his interests. The landlord assumed that he did not take the course which he did with respect to the Corn Laws from any regard to his own advantage, but with a view to the interest of his tenants—and above all, to the agricultural labourers—and to the wounds which he thought would be inflicted on them by repeal. Now, valuable as I admit the services of the agricultural labourer to be, and acknowledging, as I do, that it is the duty of individuals to honour, and of the state to cherish them; yet in a country where trade and commerce contribute such important elements, it is not proper to say that in any one interest, exclusively or principally, resides the source of individual wealth, or of national strength. I think that it is only natural justice to all not to select one class to honour, or, as its friends are not ashamed to term it, protect (hear, hear). I really question whether protection is not misallied, and among those exposed to this mistaken system no class is so much injured as the agricultural tenants and labourers. The hon. member for Northamptonshire presented to the house the other night the picture of a scene between a landlord and farmer, where the latter had been turned out of his holding because he could not give the same rent for the farm as an enterprising member of the Anti-Corn-Law League (no, no, from Mr. Stafford O'Brien). I thought that the honourable member represented the competitor as a person of more capital, more enterprise, and more intelligence.

MR. STAFFORD O'BRIEN: Hear, hear; but it does not necessarily follow that he was a Leaguer.

LORD MORPETH.—There was previously an allusion to the hon. member for Stockport in connection with agriculture, and from the statement of the hon. member for Northamptonshire I thought that he intended the competitor to be a member of the League. But this is an occurrence which might happen every day, if you had a landlord who would not give a lease, and who did not scruple to deal summarily with his tenants, and when, as the hon. member said, he could get a tenant who would make each acre bear six quarters where hitherto it had only borne three (hear, hear). But putting out of consideration the effect on the agricultural labourer, the truth is not less justly recognised that the interests of all classes must really be identical. It is merely begging the question for any one to say that this is for my interest, and therefore it is for yours. The welfare of agriculture must depend on the well-being of the whole community, and above all, on the efficient demand of the working classes. Now, has not this demand been more efficient when corn is cheap than when it is dear (hear, hear)? The hon. member for Huntingdon said that cheapness of bread did no good, if it was not accompanied with a larger demand for labour; but has not this been universally the case in practice (no, no, and hear)? As far as practical experience goes, I say that with a cheapness of bread there is an increased demand for labour (cheers and cries of "No"). The hon. member opposite said that they might talk of the three years' experience of the right hon. baronet at the head of the government on this point, but the fact was, that the prosperity and activity of three years was not to be imputed to the working of the tariff, but to various causes, and above all, to the activity of the railway system. But I ask whether this activity of the railway system occurred while bread was cheap, or while it was dear (cheers)? The hon. member for Rutlandshire, upon this point, said that in 1839, when there was great prosperity in manufactures, bread was dear, and he quoted some observations of the late lamented member for Kendal on the subject. But I beg the hon. member to recollect, that this was only the commencement of that cycle of bad seasons and dear years which proved so injurious, not only to the manufacturers, but to the whole country. Now, I find in a statistical report on the woollen trade of Yorkshire, in 1839, a statement which bears directly on this point:—"On a careful comparison of these, it appears that the amount of employment is less by at least two-fifths now than on the average of 1833 to 1835; and comparing 1839 to 1841 with that period, full one-third less. Combining the two elements of a depreciated rate of wages and a diminished amount of employment, as just stated, it would appear that estimating the former at 20 per cent., and the latter at 33 per cent., the real deduction of the wages of the operatives of this district is about nine-twentieths, or nearly one half,—a fact which, coupled with the enormous rise in the price of flour and butcher's meat, painfully and forcibly indicates the severe privations which the operative classes are now enduring." Why this is as plain as can be, and shows the effect of the demand on the kitchen-house of the working classes, namely, the agricultural markets. But I will put the case in another light:—Suppose a miller, regardless of the produce of cattle, of wool, or of hides, or of any protection for them, insists that all corn should be brought to his mill, although he might not be able to grind, and he might therefore say to them, as you do now, that the effective demand of the working classes shall be increased. But what advantage was this to the agricultural labourer—how do you intend to bolster up him and the farmer—and what share do you give them of the spoliu opima of legislative protection (hear)? The noble lord the member for Liverpool stated, in the course of the debate, that the rate of wages varied with the price of provisions. Now it was clearly proved by the right honourable Secretary for the Home Department that it never varied in the same ratio, that is, that wages never rose in the same proportion as the price of provisions (hear, hear). He had a proof of that in his own neighbourhood, for in that district wages never varied at all. In Northamptonshire, he was happy to say, they were as high as 12s. a week. If the agriculturists fixed the wages at 12s., and there was no variance in the price of corn, it would be very well, but this would not stand for an instant the test of fact. Some time ago a stone of flour was 1s. 9d.; it was now 2s. 6d. Under those circumstances, a labouring man's command over the other comforts and necessities of life must be materially diminished. Now, taking 12s. a week as the rate of wages, it would give 31l. a year. Suppose a case of a family, six persons in it, that they consumed ten stone of flour a week, the rise in the price from 1s. 9d. to 2s. 6d., would make a difference of 6l. 10s. in the year (hear, hear). I put this to rich men—to men (to use an expression used the other night) of two meals—they would not think it a trifling thing to have to give two-fifths of their income, in addition to the income tax; and must not a man who gets his bread by the sweat of his brow feel most keenly this great additional charge thrown upon him for the daily food of himself and family (hear, hear, and cheers)? I have before me a paper which has been drawn up giving some statistics respecting an agricultural town near which I reside, showing the proportionate expenditure on the several articles of food in three families in respective classes of society, namely—the tradesman, the professional man, and the working man's family. I will not trouble the house with going into details respecting butcher's meat, or butter, or cheese, or milk, or other articles, which, however, I could give, but shall confine myself to flour. Each of the families which I take consists of six persons. I will take the tradesman's family first. I find that the tradesman's yearly bill for flour amounts to 12l. 18s. 10d., being 15 per cent. of the whole of his expenditure for food. The annual charge of the professional man for flour for his family is 8l. 18s. 2d., being rather more than 10 per cent. of his whole expenditure for food, while the working man pays 13l. 4s. for flour for his family, and not 15 per cent. as the tradesman, or 10 per cent. as the professional man, but 48 per cent. on his expenditure for food (loud cries of hear, hear). Now is it not apparent that such a state of things must sorely detract from the few comforts of the labourer, and prevent him obtaining many articles, such as clothes, and that it must infinitely more press upon him than upon those more easily circumstanced in society (hear, hear)? I find that a professional man, living economically, expends about one-third of the total amount of his income. I find also, that the expenditure for food by a careful tradesman is short one-half his income, while the food of the working agricultural labourer is about three-fourths of his income (loud cries of hear, hear). What he actually spends in food out of his whole earnings is 73 per cent., while the other 27 per cent. is left for rent, clothing, shoes, and education for his children; therefore, is it not clear that this rise in the price of a stone of flour from 1s. 9d. to 2s. 6d. must deprive the working man of most of the little comforts of life, means of clothing, and of educating his children (cheers)? I have sometimes thought that the whole logic of the question is so complete in its force, and the syllogism of it so simple, that I have been surprised how any one could dispute it; for instance, that there is not more than a sufficient quantity of food produced in this country for the supply of the people. I believe there is hardly a man who will deny this—that there is daily added to the population an increase of 1000 or 365,000 in the course of the year. Then I make bold to assert that you do not year by year, having this annual addition of 365,000 to the population, grow a proportionate increased quantity of what. Therefore, does it not result that it is most imperative upon us to get a supply of food from abroad, and should we not do this at the cheapest possible rate (hear)? I challenge any one to point out a fallacy in this syllogism. I do not say that the agriculturists have less humanity than any other class, but, for our part, I think it a matter of humanity as well as of duty, to get rid of that system which prevents a due supply of food for an increasing population, and which, in spite of long cherished feeling, I feel I could not cling to without something like infatuation and cruelty (cheers, and cries of hear, hear). I do not impute blame to her Majesty's ministers that they did not act till they were appalled by the events of last autumn. An hon. member opposite asked, "What had the failure of the potatoe crop in Ireland to do with the repeal of the Corn Laws, as England had never shown any want of sympathy towards Ireland, nor hesitated to afford ample relief in times of necessity?" But I ask is it fair to tax the community of England because there is a wish to fly to the relief of the distress prevailing in Ireland? There is an old maxim, "Be just before you are generous." I say, give generously to the people of Ireland, but at the same time be just to the collective community of England (hear, hear). The hon. member for Huntingdon said that you should not apply a permanent remedy for a temporary evil, but does the hon. member forget that this state of things might arise every year (hear, hear)? and with the risk of being exposed to such a state of things, are we to be mocked with a sliding-scale, which will not slide, and which will not stand the test of trial (hear, hear)? I think it is one of the best proofs of the truth of the doctrine of Free Trade, that it does not interfere with the laws of nature, and that its success is not dependent upon seasons. I recollect reading some lines addressed to an emperor, which I consider applicable to this point, and I shall endeavour to quote the Latin more correctly than did the honourable member for Newcastle this evening.

"Tibi mittit ab antris

Æolus armatus hymes; tibi militat æther

Et conjurati veniunt ac classica venti."

Yes, sir, I think it rather a confirmation of the truth of that principle, that the stars do not fight against it, but that their combinations would seem to be in its favour (cheers and laughter). But with respect to this argument, I believe it is established by those who give their special attention to the variations of the weather, that the same circumstances of cold or hot, wet or dry, weather are not found generally to prevail over or to affect the produce of a large surface, so that bread, in seasons when prices are high in London, may be cheaper in Paris or Vienna; but, on the contrary, I believe it will be found that a wet or dry season in this country, is compensated for by a season of an opposite character in other parts of the world, for instance, upon the Continent of North America. Every one will recollect, for example, that the season of 1842 was remarkable in England for a warm and even temperature. Now, during that year, I happened to travel on the Continent of North America; and we had weather of the most variable character. Much as I had heard of the extreme heat of an American summer, I scarcely experienced "a hot day," and every one told me that it was the coldest season almost ever experienced in the United States; the very reverse of this occurred last year. Last summer, it will be remembered, was peculiarly wet and unseasonable in England, whilst, on the Continent of America it was, I understand, peculiarly hot—so much so, that I remember reading, in one paper, of a man who died, in one of the larger cities, from the effects of the excessive heat. Now, what is the inference to be derived from this? That not merely the periods of sunset and of sunrise are different in different parts of our globe, but that there is the same system and compensation as to the season, as there is in the return of darkness and of light; so that when our part of the world is afflicted with untimely rains or colds, and the attendant bad harvests, we may take comfort in the reflection, if we repeal the Corn Laws and open our ports to foreign produce, that the rays which have been denied to us have ripened distant harvests, and that just at the moment of need, the superfluity of their growth will be wafted over the ocean to atone for our deficiency (cheers). With reference to the Continent of America, on which I just now found myself, I do not wish to allude so much to any statistical deductions which my residence there may have induced and enabled me to make, because these have been subjects of frequent discussion, and can be calculated as closely and appreciated as clearly at a distance as on the actual spot; though I have felt sometimes that the real site, the actual presence of our own faithful eyes, bring the truth better home to one, than the most laborious collection of documents (hear). He had felt this most emphatically when placed in full view of those mighty prairies of the west, which, almost totally without an inhabitant, seemed in their luxuriant fertility imploringly to invite the agriculturist—when in view of those vast forests above the prairies, which promised (and all experience had verified the promise) that as soon as the axe of the woodman had once rung among them, as soon as the log-cutter had put up his cabin, and the smoke from its chimney curled up into the air, fertile crops would take the place of tall trees (hear, hear, and cheers). He felt this in sight of the immense and wonderful valley of the Mississippi—that valley which the accomplished De Bequeville has described as the most magnificent abode ever formed by nature for man; I have felt this, on the St. Lawrence, that mightier volume of fertilising waters than the whole world else presents. In all these grand scenes, I have felt that while the distance between them and us must necessarily prevent those extraordinary imports which the panic in the breasts of our protectionists anticipates, yet that still, as a very long time must elapse before that same valley of the Mississippi can number the 200,000,000 of inhabitants, of which it is said to be capable, as a very long time must elapse ere those woods can be cleared for the cultivation of what they are susceptible, or for a very long time the traffic to be looked forward to on the lines of communication there, as the prescribed Canadian Railway, and others, must be good for more passengers. I have felt it, I say, most extraordinary and deplorable, that we have not availed ourselves of all these advantages for the transmission of food to our own little island, which seems adapted to supply, even to overflowing, every article of necessity, of utility, except that certainly not unimportant one of food. We have heard repeatedly, of late, representations made respecting the social and political condition of the people to whom I am now referring. I am ready to admit that much of what I witnessed whilst I was amongst them, and more of what has reached my knowledge since I quitted their shores, have not tended to give me the most favourable impression of their pacific or their moral tendencies; and the particular specimens of their good faith which have been seen to arise out of a pure democracy, are such, that I did not on my return home, feel any increased repugnance (loud laughter). I meant to say that I did not feel, on my return to England, any diminished attachment either to the aristocratic or monarchic elements of our constitution (loud cheers). But, notwithstanding, I have felt whilst I was in that country, a most powerful conviction that we are not in a position to confront the general ease and abundance that prevail generally throughout the United States. The honourable member for Northampton has referred to the two meals a day of the wealthier classes as a test of ease, and we are all familiar with the case of the Irish emigrant, who refused to write home to his relatives in Cork that he had three meals a day, because he was sure that nobody would believe what he said (hear). But what I assert is, that we are not in a condition to confront the growing convictions of our own people (hear). We cannot confront the sympathies, the feelings, the determinations of the age in which we live, if we do not work out the aristocratic institutions by which we are surrounded, and which have gradually sprung up around us, in a more democratic spirit than we have shown a disposition to do. I contend that there is no aristocracy resting on exclusive principles, which our own does not (hear)—that could be maintained or tolerated for an instant. Such an aristocracy, placed in a community such as ours fortunately is, could not escape a certain and a speedy downfall (hear). And not even an aristocracy so old and so dignified as that of Great Britain could sustain itself when concession comes to be prohibitory. That would be an effort which the oldest title-deeds would fail to make. I do not by this mean to say, that the advocates for protection seek purely and solely to promote their own personal interests individually. Still they are the interests and the associations, not of individuals, but of a class, which they have been in the habit of keeping planted in their minds and view. There is in them the strength and sympathy of feeling which belongs to what is termed esprit de corps; there is even a refined degree of selfishness, which almost mistakes itself for self-martyrdom. Under these circumstances, monopoly itself, as it nears its downfall, though it does not seem entitled to any sympathy for self-sacrifice, will be invested with something of the graces of self-martyrdom. We are even prone to feel sympathy with the convict, when he is pursued, and when he stands at bay (hear, hear). But I cannot permit the general interests of the community, or the whole of the State, to indulge in practice at least, in sympathies of so morbid a description. It is the part of a true politician, of a sound philosopher, to put the universal above the particular, to rise above the interests of a class, and not weigh them against those of a people, and therefore I would conjure those who belong to the real aristocracy of the country—who are so by hereditary association or by landed property, to rise above the consideration of their own especial interest, and to open their eyes to the consideration of this great question (hear, hear). I grudge to their side, I grudge to them the adhesion of those who bear such names as the Marquis of Granby and Lord Clive (laughter), for I feel that our aristocracy has marched with the general progress, and identified itself with the struggles of the country. Well, then, let them not refuse to bear their part in an adjustment which, if not adjusted with them, must be adjusted in spite of them (loud cheers). They bear a part, I allow a distinguished and a prominent part, in our social system, but that system comprises, besides themselves, the irrepressible energies of trade and industry, the order and determination of our middle classes, the hard working perseverance of the immense masses of our working classes, the most powerful agencies of a talented and enlightened press, and all the great stir and progress of a generally advancing age. Let them, then, throw all their energies into the cause; let them make it as much their pride, as it is their station, to be the leaders, and not the laggards, in the onward march of the British people. (The noble lord resumed his seat amid loud and protracted cheering.)

Mr. GASKELL observed, that in spite of the speeches of Sir J. Graham and Mr. S. Herbert, he had yet to learn what new circumstances had arisen to induce this Parliament, elected on protection pledges, to consent, not to a suspension of the Corn Laws, but to a total departure from their general principles. During the last four years he had opposed every motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws under the guidance of those in whom he had hitherto placed confidence. He had always been a friend to a moderate protection to agriculture, and in those opinions he had been confirmed by the authority of Mr. Canning, Mr. Huskisson, Lord Grey, and Sir R. Peel. The force of that authority could not be swept away by a single sentence even of so able a statesman as Sir R. Peel; and the more he reflected on this subject, the more he was convinced that gentlemen on his side of the house should not propose, and that this Parliament should not sanction, the repeal of the Corn Laws. In the course of his public life Sir R. Peel had made great sacrifices to his sense of public duty, but the first sacrifice which he had made was not so great as his present. By the first he had lost the representation of the University of Oxford; by the present he had destroyed a noble party which was once his pride. He then expressed the regret with which he had contrasted the votes with the speeches of Lord Sandon and Mr. Baillie. Though he differed from Sir Robert Peel with pain, he differed from him without hesitation; and he should, therefore, with a clear conscience give his vote in favour of the amendment of Mr. Miles.

Mr. ROEBUCK observed, that when passion had passed away on this question, posterity would wonder how it had contrived to raise such a storm of agitation. He differed from most of the speakers who had preceded him; for he had nothing to retract—nothing to defend—but everything to assail. He was surprised that the High Tories on the other side of the house should have given encouragement to the notion that a member ought to resign his seat whenever his opinions were in opposition to those of his constituents; for that doctrine, which degraded the representative into a mere delegate, was contrary to all their former dogmas on the subject. He also wondered what they would say to those representatives who had resigned their seats, not on the demand of their constituents, but because they were the nominees of certain influential proprietors of close boroughs. He lectured Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell on their recent change of opinion on the Corn Laws, and observed, that he who gave them credit for sincerity must do so at the expense of their understandings. The real meaning of "protection" was that the food of the people should be produced at a higher price at home by certain individuals for their own benefit than that at which it could be procured abroad if the trade were free. It was said that such a system was necessary to promote the agricultural class, which consisted of labourers, farmers, and landlords, all with different, if not conflicting, interests. He showed that it was more injurious than beneficial to them all. After a long argument on this subject, he concluded by expressing a hope that the measure of the Government would pass, and by recommending the house to accompany it with some measure for the general education of the people. This measure, if carried, would give a stimulus to the population; and as the population increased, its condition, unless it were educated, would deteriorate rapidly.

The adjournment of the debate was then moved by Sir H. Douglas.

Mr. HODGSON HINDE in speaking to that question observed that as he had always been an advocate of protection to native industry, he could not give his vote against the proposition of a Government which he had hitherto supported without briefly explaining his reasons for it. The impatience of the house rendered his explanation very inaudible, but he concluded it by declaring his opinion, that after the present session Sir R. Peel must be prepared to give up the Government to those who had been the early supporters of this liberal policy.

Some formal business was then disposed of, and shortly afterwards the House adjourned.

FREE TRADE MEETING AT Tooting.—On Wednesday evening a Free Trade meeting was held at the spacious room attached to the Rising Sun, Tooting. There were about 600 persons present, many of whom were well-dressed ladies, and who seemed to take great interest in the proceedings. Mr. Barter having been called to the chair, opened the meeting with some appropriate observations, and then called on Mr. Richard Aitken, who moved, after a suitable speech, a resolution approving of the ministerial measure so far as it went, but condemning that an interval of three years was allowed, previous to the total abolition of the Corn Laws. The resolution having been seconded by Mr. Rolt, the chairman called on Mr. A. L. Saul, of the League, who explained the general features of the Peel measure, and congratulated the meeting on the advance of the Free Trade question, and in an argumentative address, proved that the proposed interval of three years would be injurious to the farmer. He was followed by Dr. Eppe, who gave a short but humorous speech, which much amused and interested the audience. Thanks to the speakers were moved by Mr. Aitken and seconded by Mr. Harding. Thanks were also voted to the chairman, and the meeting then broke up.

A young woman brought before the Boston (American) police alleged, in defence of her respectability, that she was acquainted with "all the lawyers in New York." She was instantly committed for six months.

WESTMINSTER.

On Thursday night a numerous meeting of the Committee of the Westminster Reform Society was held at Stannard's Hotel, Charles-street, Covent-garden (at which the previous evening it was resolved to support the election of General Sir De Lacy Evans, as the representative of the city of Westminster) for the purpose of taking prompt and immediate measures to carry out that object. There were present some of the most active and tried reformers of Westminster, among whom were Mr. Prout, Mr. Trott, Mr. Coppock, Mr. Pouncey, Mr. Charlwood, Mr. Childs, Mr. Lewis, junior, Mr. Hocken, &c. The gallant general also entered the room previous to the commencement of the business.

Mr. PROUT having been called to the chair, directed the attention of the meeting to the circumstance of the High-Bailiff having appointed Tuesday next as the day of nomination, and the following day (Wednesday) for the election. He impressed upon them the necessity of the utmost energy being exercised by the Reformers of Westminster upon the present occasion, to ensure the return of General Evans, and stated that the Central Committee-room would be opened on Friday at the Ship Hotel, Charing Cross. He then announced, that the following noblemen and gentlemen had consented to act with the committee chosen to promote the election of General Evans, viz.—the Hon. E. P. Bouverie, M. P., Chairman of the Central Committee; the Hon. G. S. Byng, M. P.; the Hon. W. Cowper, M. P.; the Earl of Shelburne, M. P.; Lord Duncannon, M. P.; the Hon. W. R. Colborne, M. P.; Sir J. Easthope, Bart., M. P.; the Hon. H. Elphinstone, M. P.; the Hon. G. Fitzwilliam, M. P.; Mr. C. P. Villiers, M. P.; and Mr. T. Duncombe, M. P. They had also been promised the support of the Marquis of Tavistock, M. P.; Lord R. Grosvenor, M. P.; Lord Marcus Hill, M. P.; the Hon. E. J. Stanley, M. P.; the Hon. F. Maule, M. P.; and Mr. E. Ellis, M. P. It was most cheering to their cause to receive the support of noblemen and gentlemen, members of Parliament, and of such high respectability and influence in society.

It was unanimously resolved that the names of those offering themselves should be added to the committee.

Several gentlemen from the various parishes stated that active exertions were being made to promote the election of the gallant General.

It was subsequently arranged that a meeting of the electors should take place on Friday evening at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand; another on Saturday night at Willis's Rooms, Brewer-street, St. James's; and on Monday a third and last meeting at Pimlico, for General Evans to meet the constituency.

Thanks were then voted to the chairman, and the meeting separated.

BRISTOL.

On Monday evening a tea meeting was held at the large public rooms, Broadmead, in aid of the Quarter of-a-Million League Fund. The attendance was numerous and highly influential, several of the leading merchants of the city being present. The chair was taken by George Thomas, Esq., merchant, and a liberal supporter of the League. When tea was concluded,

The CHAIRMAN said that a petition had been sent from this city, signed by 18,000 persons, for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. It was sent to Mr. Berkeley, one of the members for Bristol, with a request that he would present it to the house and support its prayer. A similar request was also made to Mr. P. Miles, the other member. Letters had been received from each of those gentlemen, the former agreeing in the sentiments of the petitioners, the latter saying that he could not give his vote in favour of total and immediate repeal.

The Rev. GEORGE ARMSTRONG (Unitarian minister) followed the chairman. He congratulated Colonel Thompson and the Free Trade advocates upon what he might call the successful termination of labours extending over a period of twenty years. It was gratifying now to find men of all parties agreeing that Free Trade is the only measure which can work advantageously for this great empire (cheers).

Colonel THOMPSON then rose, and was received with loud cheering. He said that they met under very altered circumstances from what they were in twelve months ago. He could truly say that their enemies were made to be at peace with them; let them, then, lay aside all unfriendly recollections and hostile feeling, let them make the utmost of the bounty which Heaven hath bestowed upon them, and take all reasonable care that none of the advantages slip away from their own carelessness, that they would do their endeavours to carry forward the fruits of their great success wherever the condition of mankind should open the occasion. He rejoiced that the trust of executing this great object had fallen where it had. He should be glad if they would throw aside all remnants of party feeling, throw aside all recollection of what had passed, and, as honest men, know and feel nothing except that they were seeking the improvement of the condition of the country (cheers). Col. Thompson concluded by extolling the conduct of the Premier in respect of the Oregon question, stating that his promptitude had had the effect of subduing the warlike spirit which had begun to manifest itself in the United States, and prognosticating that his (the Premier's) measures would have the effect of averting the war altogether (hear, hear).

R. R. R. MOORE, Esq., was next introduced, and was received with loud cheers. Having addressed the meeting at some length, with his usual eloquence, he concluded by announcing the subscriptions, observing that at present only 20 per cent. would be called for.—George Thomas, Esq., 250*l.*; Joseph Eden, Esq., 250*l.*; Edward Thomas, Esq., 250*l.*; William Tothill, Esq., 200*l.*; Edward Keate, Esq., 100*l.*; Naish and Co., 100*l.*; James Charlton, Esq., 100*l.*; Thomas Sanders, Esq., 100*l.*; William Wills, Esq., 100*l.*; H. O. Wills, Esq., 100*l.*; S. S. Fry and Son, 100*l.* There were several 50*l.* and 25*l.*, and smaller sums, and we believe the collections amounted to about 3000*l.*

After the collection the meeting broke up.

THE QUEEN.—FREE TRADE.—We hear, from a source which leaves no doubt of the truth of the statement, that the most illustrious personage in the kingdom takes a lively interest in the repeal of the Corn Laws, and has, on more than one occasion, warmly advocated the measure, against the opinions of certain noble lords, who are as strongly opposed to it.—Daily News.

Sir John Sinclair said of sleeping—that it can only be performed in two manners—with or without a nightcap.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

Brighton, Feb. 10, 1846, 10 o'clock.

SIR,—Mr. Falvey and myself have just returned from Chichester, after having achieved one of the greatest victories ever known in that city. We arrived at Chichester about 4 o'clock last evening, and after dinner, proceeded to the rooms that had been taken for the purpose of Mr. F.'s lecturing. After a most eloquent address to the electors, who had assembled in great numbers, so much so, that there was a complete crowd outside the doors, Mr. Maldon proposed thanks to Mr. F., and dovetailed with it, "That he was a fit and proper person to represent the electors of the city of Chichester in Parliament," which was received with deafening applause. After the meeting, we adjourned to the Dolphin, and prepared the address to the electors (a copy of which I enclose, which please to take great care of, as it is the only one left). We sat up till past one, getting it out, and making arrangements for posting and distributing it. This morning the town was in the greatest state of excitement in consequence of the opposition. At half-past nine o'clock we proceeded to the Town Hall, which we found had been previously "packed" by the monopolists with labourers at ten o'clock. The mayor took his seat; and after the precept was read, Lord H. Lennox was proposed and seconded, after which Mr. Fullagar proposed Mr. Falvey in a very eloquent speech, and was seconded by Mr. Maldon. Then Lord Lennox rose to address the electors, but he was very poorly received, and was in a very nervous state, for his knees knocked together as if he had fallen. He merely said, that he should feel it great honour to be returned as M.P. for their city, and stated that he thought that we ought not to be dependent upon foreigners for our daily bread, and ended his address in about five minutes. He was interrupted many times during its delivery with hisses and groans, so much so, that at last he said, he hoped they would give him a hearing, and allow him to proceed without interruption. Upon Mr. F.'s rising, there was a simultaneous burst of applause, which lasted for a considerable time; and, after an address from Mr. F., of about one hour and a quarter's duration, the Mayor called for a show of hands for Lord H. Lennox, which was complied with. "On the contrary, and in favour of Mr. Falvey," was put, when the large body of heads in front of the Mayor, seemed on an instant to be changed into hands! The Mayor then said, that it was his bounden duty to say, that the show of hands was in favour of Mr. Falvey!! (Loud and prolonged cheering.) Lord H. Lennox immediately demanded a poll; the usual notices were then given, that the poll would commence at eight o'clock next morning, and a vote of thanks to the Mayor about to be passed, when Mr. Falvey came forward and said, that as his noble opponent had had the start of him in the canvass, it was not his intention this time to go to the poll; but at the next election a Free Trader would be ready to fight the seat with the noble lord, who was then returned duly elected. The meeting broke up with three cheers for Free Trade, and three groans for protection. Then we had to go home, and we were accompanied by a mob who continued shouting, "Falvey for ever!" "Free Trade!" and "Down with protection!" The place was in the greatest excitement when we left, as such a thing as the candidate of the duke's having to demand a poll has never before taken place. They sadly want some one to come and look after the registration here, which ought to be done.

Yours, &c.

P.S. I should state that the whole of the men paid by the monopolists, as if completely paralysed with Mr. F.'s eloquent address, held up their hands for him; and a great number followed us home. There was a large staff of London reporters down for the Times, Herald, Chronicle, Daily News, Advertiser, &c.; and it is the opinion that this is the greatest blow the Duke of Richmond has ever yet had.

To the Editor of THE LEAGUE.

SIR,—As a working man, I beg to offer you the following remarks for your consideration. This time last year the potatoes were 4*d.* per pound, just now they are 1*d.*; almost all small families use three pounds per day, that makes an extra outlay of 9*d.* a-week. The bread was 6*d.* a loaf last summer, now it is 8*d.*; if we consume three loaves a-week we pay an extra 6*d.*, and that added to the 9*d.* makes 1*s.* 3*d.* Now, if our wages last summer were barely sufficient to find us in food, shoes, and cloth, this year we must go without something to the amount of 1*s.* 3*d.* a-week; and what will that something be? not food, I am sure. No! the tailor and shoemaker may starve, but food we must have. Our old clothes and shoes must last us some time longer, and in the meantime the master tailors and shoemakers, finding their trade falling off and workmen pressing them for work, reduce wages. There is only one party who prospers, and that is the landlord; he will this year pocket the tailor and shoemaker's 1*s.* 3*d.* On the other hand, if we only earned enough last year to find us food, we will be obliged this year to give up the use of tea and sugar to the amount of 1*s.* 3*d.*, these being articles we can easier spare than bread, and by these means we lessen the revenue of the country by at least 6*d.* a week.

38, Coleman-street,
Woolwich

JOHN WHITE,
Journeyman Carpenter.

The following letter has been forwarded to the Rev. Mr. Ferguson, of Bicester, by a few friends of humanity in the city:

22, Swan-street, Minorities, London, Jan. 10, 1846.

DEAR SIR,—Your very affecting appeal on behalf of the agricultural labourers of Bicester and its neighbourhood, as contained in THE LEAGUE of Dec. 27, has been responded to by a few warm-hearted Free Traders of the Ward of Portsoken, in this city. The contributions placed in my hands for this purpose will enable me to send you between 30 and 40 good smock-frocks, a portion of which were forwarded yesterday by waggon, and the remainder shall follow so soon as the quantity can be made up at the warehouse. I feel honoured in being made the medium of communication with you, Sir, whose untiring exertions and personal sacrifices in the cause of humanity shed so bright a lustre on human nature, and beautify and adorn the Christian character which you so well sustain.

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

JOHN BUNTING.

ALL ONE.—For the time-honoured admonition of the pantaloons, "Don't be a fool!" the clowns in the pantomimes at most of the theatres are now, we understand, substituting "Don't be a duke."—Punch.

CORDEN'S SPEECH.
THE SPEECHES OF R. COBDEN, ESQ., M.P.,
 and T. M. GIBSON, ESQ., M.P., on Sir R. Peel's Budget, WILL BE PUBLISHED as early as possible after delivery. Price One Penny each. L. & CO., 67, Fleet-street, London; J. Gadsby, Newall's Buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.

Where may be had,
THE GOSFORD MEETING.
 Just published, price One Penny, or 2s. per 100.
A VERBATIM REPORT OF THE MEETING OF THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS AT GOSFORD, printed in a tract form, 12 pages.
 Sold at the LEAGUE Office, 67, Fleet-street, London; and by J. Gadsby,
 Newall's Buildings, and 3, Old Millgate, Manchester.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

While we congratulate our readers on the progress of the subscriptions to the Quarter of a Million Fund, and on the effect that they have obviously produced without and within the walls of Parliament, we must impress upon them the necessity of not relaxing in their exertions, now that the crisis of our great struggle has arrived. The victory is not yet won; all the resources, and all the energies of the League, will be required, before complete success can be achieved. A dissolution of Parliament appears to be imminent; and the battle of Free Trade will have to be fought inch by inch on the hustings. We are anxious to urge on our friends the importance, not only of subscribing freely, but of subscribing early. The manifestation of strength will often decide the course of the wavering and the doubtful; but, above all, our subscriptions are the best proof that we are thoroughly in earnest, and that we shall not cease to labour until every link of the fetters imposed on British industry is struck off, and every restriction on the supply of food to the people completely annihilated.

Subscriptions received during the week ending Wednesday, Feb. 11, 1846.

N.B.—As the Subscription List is made up from Wednesday to Wednesday, contributions received on Thursdays and Fridays are not published in the LEAGUE of the Saturday immediately succeeding, but are included in the list of the week following.

As the regulations of the Post Office require that the Christian Name of the party to whom Post Office Orders are sent should be given in full, subscribers are respectfully requested to procure their Orders in future for GEORGE WILSON, League Offices, Manchester, or ABRAHAM WALTER PAULTON, 67, Fleet-street, London.

	£	s.	d.
*McCormel and Co, Manchester ..	100	0	0
*Murray, A and G, do ..	100	0	0
*Ross, Wm, 18, Mosely-st, do ..	100	0	0
*Mayson, John, and Co, Strutt-st, do ..	50	0	0
*Heald, Nicholas, do ..	40	0	0
*Wilson, John, do ..	30	0	0
*Eden and Thwaites, Bolton ..	30	0	0
*Wilkinson, Fredk and Geo, Stockport ..	20	0	0
*Barratt, J, Sons and Darbyshire, Newton and Manchester ..	20	0	0
*A Friend, per Jno Gadsby ..	20	0	0
*Grady, Edmund, Park Hills, Bury ..	20	0	0
*Brigden, Mathew, South-st, Manchester ..	10	0	0
*Lat, W T and E, Hatfield Lodge, Glossop, Derbyshire ..	10	0	0
*Shaw, Peter, and Son, Mossley, nr ..	10	0	0
*Eley, Joseph, Boden Down, Macclesham ..	5	0	0
*Shackleton, Ebenezer, Moon Mills, Ballitore, Ireland ..	5	0	0
*Eales, Thos, Stamford, 3, Hare Court, Temple, London ..	5	0	0
*Kendal, Thomas, 30, Nelson-st, Manchester ..	5	0	0
*Workpeople of Henry Woods, Wigan ..	4	4	2
*Ryder, John, Bradford, near Manchester ..	1	0	0
*Cabinet-makers in the employ of Mr. Doveston, Manchester ..	2	2	0
*Roberts, John, 85, Market street, do ..	2	2	0
*Dale, John, Dockway-square, North Shields ..	2	2	0
*Hall Free Trade Club, per Edward Brady ..	2	0	0
*Luton, Francis, Orell, near Wigan ..	2	0	0
*Hubert, Joseph, Hyde, near Manchester ..	2	0	0
*Watson, J, 40, Moreton-st, Strangeways, do ..	2	0	0
*Eames, Thomas, Whitman, Sunderland ..	2	0	0
*Hilton, Charles, Gilder Brook, Eccles, near ..	2	0	0
*Warburton, Josiah, Preston street, Radnor-street, Hulme, Manchester ..	1	12	6
*Booth, John, 58, Great Jackson-st, Manchester ..	1	1	0
*Hewitt, John, Ardwick-green, do ..	1	1	0
*Dobbs, J and S, 14, Whitley-grove, do ..	1	1	0
*Taylor, J R, 228, Deansgate, do ..	1	1	0
*Thornley, T, Crown Inn, Fountain-st, do ..	1	1	0
*Leach, James, Scholes, near Wigan ..	1	1	0
*Faulkner, Nicholas, 3, Durham-street, Hulme, Manchester ..	1	0	0
*Griffin, Rev. James, Richmond-terrace, Strerford, do ..	1	0	0
*Richard, John, 6, Booth-street West, Hulme, do ..	1	0	0
*Leech, Richard, 84, Rutland-street, do, do ..	1	0	0
*Thyer, Josh, 7, Loyd-street, Green Hays, do ..	1	0	0
*Whitaker and Higginbottom, 52, Wilnot street, Hulme, do ..	1	0	0
*Luton, Thos, Hauley, Staffordshire ..	1	0	0
*Walker, Geo, Belle Vue, near Bury, Lancashire ..	1	0	0
*Lomax, Abraham, Folds road, Little Bilton ..	1	0	0
*Lambert, C, Warwick-street, Birmingham ..	1	0	0
*Leach, Robt, Douglas, Carl, Wigan ..	1	0	0
*Hall, Robert, Tideswell, Derbyshire ..	1	0	0
*Hobbs, Edward, Golden Lion Inn, Tedmorton ..	1	0	0
*Chadwick, Uriah, Dukinfield, near Manchester ..	1	0	0

*Wilson, Alex, Mrs, 4, Great Ducie-st, Strangeways, do ..	1	0	0
*Lewis, Henry, Blue Bell, Chester-road, do ..	1	0	0
*Whittaker, Rev, T F, St Wilfred's Church, do ..	1	0	0
*Radcliffe, Jno, 71, Queen-street, Hulme, do ..	1	0	0
*Mitchell, Richd, 39, York-street, do, do ..	1	0	0
*Ritchie, John, Cleveland-buildings, Market-st, do ..	1	0	0
Derbyshire, Wm, 30, Cobden-street, Manchester ..	0	10	6
Jones, Joseph, at Smith and Jukes, grocer, Bradford, Yorkshire ..	0	10	0
Prideaux, George, Woodbury, Devon ..	0	8	0
Williams, Henry, 56, Great Jackson-street, Manchester ..	0	5	0
Lancaster, Edward, New-street, do ..	0	5	0
Stamp, Rev. John, 78, Wilnot-street, do ..	0	5	0
Meyer, George, Bedford-street, do ..	0	5	0
Small subscription ..	0	5	0
Large, William, Market-place, Prescott ..	0	4	0
Small sums in Hulme ..	0	3	0
Oxford, William, Fazakerley-street, do ..	0	2	6
Lloyd, Charles, do, do ..	0	2	6
Forber, William, Atherton-street, do ..	0	2	6
Scholes, James, 60, Great Jackson-street, do ..	0	2	6
Richards, W G, 62, Medlock street, do ..	0	2	6
Small sums ..	0	1	6
Montrose. Paton, John and George ..	40	0	0
*Roster, Archibald ..	10	0	0
*Miller, C H ..	5	0	0
*Workmen of J and G Paton ..	4	12	0
*Muelart, John, N B ..	3	0	0
*Weatherley, Capt J D, New Bridge-st ..	3	3	0
*Burnett, Thos, Summerhill-terrace ..	2	0	0
*Fensdale, Wm, Quay Side ..	1	1	0
*White, Thomas, Deun-street ..	1	1	0
*Greenhow, T M, Eldon-square ..	1	0	0
*Weatherett, James, 5, Carlisle-square ..	1	0	0
*Wilson, Robert, Swinburn-place ..	1	0	0
*Gowan, Joseph, Blaydon Burn ..	1	0	0
*Yea, R H, Hanover-square ..	1	0	0
*Proctor, Wm, Grays-street ..	1	0	0
*Dewar, Thomas, Picton-place ..	1	0	0
*Watson, Joshua, son, 109, Side ..	1	0	0
Gateshead. Angus, Wm, Windmill Hill ..	1	0	0
*Hewitt, James, 45, High-street ..	1	0	0
*Humble, Wm, Church-street ..	1	0	0
*Hind, Thomas, Heworth, near ..	1	0	0
*Foster, Joseph ..	1	0	0
*Bolton, Andrew ..	1	0	0
*Foster, Miss Jane, Green Bat Cottage ..	1	0	0
*Duncan, Thomas ..	1	0	0
*Hushey, Robert ..	1	0	0
*Graham, Joseph ..	1	0	0
Anonymous ..	0	10	0
Alnwick. Davidson, Wm ..	0	8	0
Fate, George ..	0	5	0
Johnson, Thomas ..	0	5	0
Milne, Wm ..	0	5	0
Burnell, Mrs, Bailiff Gate ..	0	5	0
Finlay, Robert ..	0	5	0
Landells, James ..	0	5	0
Smart, Wm ..	0	5	0
Holywell. Kenrick, Sam S, Greenfield Lodge ..	5	0	0
*Buckley, John F, Walwen ..	2	0	0
*Wolstenholme, H J ..	1	0	0
*Smedley, Thomas ..	1	0	0
*Williamson, Wm, jun ..	1	0	0
*Fairbairn, P, Woodley House ..	60	0	0
*Birchall, Messrs Edwin & Sons, Park-lane ..	60	0	0
*Aldam, W, jun, Esq, MP, 3, Plowden's-buildings, Temple, London ..	20	0	0
*Walker, Benjamin, Water Hall ..	20	0	0
*Ripley and Ogle, Lady-lane ..	20	0	0
*Haigh, John, Cookridge-street ..	20	0	0
*Sykes, John, Woodhouse-lane ..	20	0	0
*Jowett, Robt and Sons, Albion-street ..	20	0	0
*Witham, Messrs Sand J, Kirkstall road ..	10	0	0
*Walker, Thomas, Springfield Mount ..	10	0	0
*Broadhead, John, Bridgend ..	10	0	0
*Elwynd, B, Roker-lane, Pudsey, near ..	5	0	0
*Haigh, Thomas, Newlay, near ..	5	0	0
*Wilkinson, John, Wellington-street ..	5	0	0
*Watson, Chas, Queen-street ..	5	0	0
*Lambert, Josh, Cookridge-street ..	5	0	0
*Simpson, Wm, 11, Park-row ..	5	0	0
*Shackleton, Jonathan, Mill Green ..	4	0	0
*Tatham, G N, Water Hall ..	4	0	0
*Kennedy, Francis, 3, Park-row ..	4	0	0
*Ford, R L, Albion-street ..	4	0	0
*Stead, Sam, Holbeck, near ..	3	0	0
*Smith, Beacock, & Tannett, Victoria-road ..	2	2	0
*Wood, R and Son, Larchfield, near ..	2	2	0
*Warburton, Sam, Hunslet Carr, near ..	2	2	0
*Atkinson, Edward, Trafalgar-street ..	2	0	0
*Ingham, Wm, Wortley, near ..	2	0	0
*Cliff, John, Bramley, near ..	2	0	0
*Ramsden, John, East-street ..	2	0	0
*Friends at Fountain Inn, Armley-road, per Fred Batty, Wellington-bridge ..	2	0	0
*Stenson, Thomas, Richmond-street ..	1	1	0
*Waring, James, Briggate ..	1	1	0
*Maude, John, Greek-street ..	1	1	0
*Newton, Geo, Hanover-street ..	1	1	0
*Morgan, E, Wheeler-street ..	1	1	0
*Morgan, Thomas, Rock-street ..	1	1	0
*Yewdall, John, Briggate ..	1	1	0
*Burroughs, John, do ..	1	1	0
*Rowling, Sam, Headingley, near ..	1	1	0
*Clark, Robert, Hunslet do ..	1	1	0
*Bilbrough, James, Gildersome, near ..	1	1	0
*A Friend, per J Holroyd, Carlton Hill ..	1	1	0
*Illingworth, Wm, Crownpoint ..	1	1	0
*Hughes, John, St John's-street ..	1	1	0
*Vickerman, James, Burley-street ..	1	1	0
*Kilvington, R, Skinner-lane ..	1	1	0
*Robinson, Wm, Isle of Cider ..	1	1	0
*Bingley, G M, Alfred-place ..	1	1	0
*Bislington, R, Briggate ..	1	1	0
*Broadbent, J, Prospect-place, Holbeck ..	1	1	0
*Eggleston, W, Alfred-place ..	1	1	0
*Townley, R, Springfield-place ..	1	1	0
*Pollock, R, Bishopgate-street ..	1	1	0
*Knox, Geo, Elmhawd Grove ..	1	1	0
*Wainman, John, Garden-street ..	1	1	0
*West, John, care of John Wilson and Co, Hunslet ..	1	1	0
*Holroyd, Wm, Park-lane ..	1	1	0
*Lawton, T, and Son, Wortley, near ..	1	0	0
*Turkington, H C, Chapel Allerton, near ..	1	0	0
*Asquith, Thomas, 17, Mill Hill ..	1	0	0
*Jagger, Wm, Upper Wortley, near ..	1	0	0
*Bell, Charles, Pottennewton, near ..	1	0	0
*Smith, James, and Son, Wortley, do ..	1	0	0
*Brandsby, Benjamin, Bramley, near ..	1	0	0
*Barker, Joseph, Bell-lane, do ..	1	0	0
*Ball, Mark, High-street ..	1	0	0
*Shackleton, Roger, Wortley, near ..	0	12	0
*Mann, John, Gifford-street ..	0	10	0
*Dewhurst, John and Son ..	30	0	0
*Tempest, Sir C R, Burt, Broughton-hall ..	20	0	0
*Wilson, Mathew, jun ..	10	0	0
*Settle, John ..	10	0	0
*Johnston, B ..	10	0	0
*Shackleton, T, Aulton Garages, near ..	1	0	0

	*Beveridge, Erskine, manufacturer	10	0	0
	*Inglis, James, do	2	0	0
	*Robertson, Robert, draper	2	0	0
	*Reid and Davie, do	2	0	0
	*Duncanson, J & Co, do	1	1	0
	*McLaren, W & J, do	1	1	0
	*Lawrie, David, soapboiler	1	1	0
	*McDonald, Andrew, teacher	1	1	0
	*Young, Jas, Rev	1	0	0
	*Clarke, Wm, bookseller	1	0	0
	*Birrell, Geo, manufacturer	1	0	0
	*Morris, James, Gardner's-land	1	0	0
	*Inglis, H, grocer	1	0	0
	*Aitken, James, manufacturer	1	0	0
	*Reid, A and H, do	1	0	0
Dunferm.	*Inglis, Geo	1	0	0
line.	*McMichael, Rev N,	1	0	0
	Boevie, Wm	0	10	0
	McLaren, Peter, shoemaker	0	10	0
	Robertson, Geo, grocer	0	10	0
	Brydon, J and J, clothiers	0	10	0
	Syme and Preston, drapers	0	10	0
	Miller, John, bookseller	0	10	0
	Thomson, Rev Geo,	0	10	0
	Walker, Ralph, bleacher	0	6	0
	Shoolbred, James, manufacturer	0	5	0
	Ireland, Thomas, ironmonger	0	5	0
	Browning, J S, teacher	0	5	0
	Elder, David, grocer	0	5	0
	Henderson, R, clothier	0	2	6
	Lumsden, John, grocer	0	2	6
	*Isherwood, John	1	1	0
	*Brooks, John	1	0	0
	Spedding, Edw	0	10	0
	Hindle, John	0	7	6
	Fell, James	0	7	6
	Fell, John	0	6	3
	Fell, Wm	0	6	3
	Hardman, John	0	6	0
	Marsh, Peter	0	5	0
	Callan, Joseph	0	5	0
	Selby, M	0	5	0
	Booth, James	0	5	0
	Wardle, Benjamin	0	5	0
	Wardle, Robert	0	5	0
	Hayes, James	0	5	0
	Hindle, Thomas	0	6	0
	Longshaw, James	0	5	0
	Corless, Joseph	0	5	0
	Higson, Thomas	0	5	0
	Bluesdale, Thomas	0	5	0
	Green, James	0	5	0
	Turner, James	0	5	0
	Whittle, James	0	4	0
	Moore, John	0	4	0
	Marsh, James	0	2	6
	Marsh, Richard	0	2	6
	Ince, James	0	2	6
	Jervis, Wm	0	2	6
	Corless, John	0	2	6
	Littrick, James	0	2	6
	Yates, John	0	2	6
	Futough, Adam	0	2	6
	Durham, Richard	0	2	6
	Grime, James	0	2	6
	Griffin, Henry	0	2	6
	Small Sums	0	11	0
	*Metcalfe, John and Geo	10	0	0
	*Harker, Robert	4	0	0
	*Taylor, Joseph	1	0	0
	*Wrigglesworth, Mrs	1	0	0
	*Newbould, Matthew	1	0	0
	*G H M	1	0	0
	*Grange and Bell, Dacre Banks, near	1	0	0
	*Webster, Henry	1	0	0
	*Newbould, Wm	1	0	0
	*Warburton and Sugden	1	0	0
	A Friend to Free Trade	0	10	0
	Grange, Ward	0	5	0
	Doughill, Wm	0	5	0
	Steel, Geo	0	5	0
	Gill, Joseph	0	5	0
	Ashworth, John	0	5	0
	Lowcock, John	0	5	0
	Small Sums	0	5	0
	Isaac Sinclair	0	2	6
	Ward, Moss	0	2	6
	Marshall, Wm	0	2	6
	Rogers, John	0	2	6
	Wood, Christopher	0	2	6
	Hallawell, James	0	2	6
	*Gully, John, Ackworth Park	20	0	0
	*Gaskell, Daniel, Lupsett Hall	20	0	0
	*Clayton, Thomas	5	0	0
	*Scott, Robert, Wood-st	5	0	0
	*Todd, Christopher, Hoyle Mill	1	0	0
	*Kershaw, James, Westgate	1	0	0
	*Swallow, Joshua, Garden-street	1	0	0
	*Oyston, John, Kirkgate	1	0	0
	*Watson, John, Northgate	1	0	0
	Stead, Mr, jun	0	3	0
	Sundry Small Sums	0	3	0
	*Tucker, Geo, 7, York-street	2	0	0
	*Fearn, John, 3, Leicester-street	2	0	0
	*Workmen at Hawks worth, Eyre and Co., per Vincent Eyre, 30, Rock-st	1	12	0
	*Read, Isaac, Lambert-street	1	0	0
	*Eadon, Moses, Norfolk-lane	1	0	0
Sheffield.	*Thornhill, S and Son, St Thomas's-st.	1	0	0
	*Shirt, Elias, Coalpit-street	1	0	0
	*Sanderson, John, Charles-street	1	0	0
	*Cam, John, Eyre-lane	1	0	0
	*Osborne, T P G, Port Mahon	1	0	0
	*Parkin, John, 8, Wicker	1	0	0
	*Nicholson, John, Charles-street	0	8	0
	*Clay, John, 147, Castle-st, Edgley, near	1	1	0
	*Hyde, Abel	1	1	0
	*Hyde, John	1	1	0
	*W S, M P S	1	1	0
	*Heginbotham, James, Millgate	1	0	0
Stockport.	*Riddell, James, Heaton-lane	1	0	0
	*Wells, John, do	1	0	0
	*Roylance, Wm do	1	0	0
	*Mayden, R do	1	0	0
	*Bowden, J, N B Lane	1	0	0
	*Atkinson, Geo, Petersgate	1	0	0
	*Wheeler, Thomas, Bridge-street	1	0	0
	*Hunnah, John, St Alban's	2	0	0
	*Thompson, R, Eanam	1	0	0
Blackburn.	*Blacklock, James, Cable-street	1	0	0
	*Rutherford, John, John-street	1	0	0
	*Briggs, James, Plough Inn	1	0	0
	*Roberts, James, Britannia Inn	1	0	0
	*Watson, J A, Old Chapel-street.	0	0	0
	*Musgrave, S and S, Town End	2	0	0
	*Hinings, Wm	1	0	0
	*Carr, Henry, Jun, Little Moor	1	0	0
Padsey.	*Walker, James, Low Town	1	0	0
	*Halliday, John do	1	0	0
	*Halliday, Wm do	1	0	0
	*Oddy, John do	1	0	0
	*Webster, Geo do	1	0	0
	*Halliday, James do	1	0	0
	*Fearnley, Joshua, Kent	1	0	0
	*Swale, John, Heslington	4	0	0
	*Allis, Thomas, Oswaldwicke	2	0	0
	*Wilberforce, Henry, Walmgate	2	0	0
York.	*Birks, John, St Helen's-square	1	0	0
	*Agar, Thomas, Walmgate	1	0	0
	*Swale, Joseph do	1	0	0
	*Swale, Thomas do	1	0	0

Glasgow.	*Thomson, Dr Thos, 100, St Vincent-st	2	0	0
	*Young, Andw and Sons, Brunswick-st	1	1	0
	*Jamieson, Joseph	1	1	0
	*McNab, Messrs	1	1	0
Falkirk.	*Turner, Geo, stationer, Ingram-street..	1	1	0
	*McIntyre, Donald	1	0	0
	*Lemon, John, 18, Saltmarket-street	1	0	0
	*Anderson, James, 16, Montrose-street..	1	0	0
South Shields.	*Cameron, James, 24, West Nile-street	1	0	0
	*Rankin, Robert, 93, Glasgow-street..	1	0	0
	*French, Robert, 86, Trongate	1	0	0
	*Miller, Robert, Govan	1	0	0
Bolton.	*Young, John, teacher, Wathamston	1	1	0
	*Cochrane, H W, ironmonger	1	0	0
	*Jeffrey, Chas, bookseller	1	0	0
	*McColl, Hugh, King-street	1	0	0
Collected by F C Harrison.	*Thompson, Alex, Hiron-street	1	0	0
	*Mitchelson, Archibald, King-street	1	0	0
	*Robertson, Wm do	0	10	0
	*Campbell, Robert, Market-place	0	2	6
Dalkeith	*Threllfall, R, Bridgmore-place, Bolton	1	0	0
	*Spencer, James, Cross-street, Great do	1	0	0
	*Knott, Geo, Manor street, Little do	1	0	0
	*Harrison, F C, Cement Works, Abersychan, near Pontypool	2	10	0
Birmingham.	*Parker, Joseph, brewer, Pontnewydd	2	0	0
	*Hair, John, miller do	1	0	0
	*Hughes, Henry, stationer, Pontypool..	1	0	0
	*Spittle, Thomas, Union Inn, Abersychan, near Pontypool	1	0	0
Edinburgh.	*Yates, J A, 33, Bryanstone-square	20	0	0
	*Morse, Arthur, Swaffham, Norfolk	20	0	0
	Crosfield, Brothers, and Co, St Helens, Lancashire	10	0	0
	Weedon, John, Reading	10	0	0
Greenock.	*Robinson, H G, Half Moon-st, Piccadilly	5	5	0
	*Webb, Wm, Hereford	5	5	0
	Hewitt, Colonel, Boulogne	5	0	0
	*Bouverie, Admiral, The Hon T B, Cliffe Hall, Devises	5	0	0
Glasgow.	*Burt, James, 65, York-st, Westminster	5	0	0
	*Coupland and Gilbert, 1 George Yard, Bow Lane	4	0	0
	*Colquhoun, Wm, Clatlick, near Crief, Perthshire	3	3	0
	*Westleys and Clark, Doctors Commons	3	3	0
Per Thomas Morgan, Leeds	*The Workmen of Messrs Burt and Potts, York-st, Westminster	2	2	0
	*Roberts, David, R A, 7, Fitzroy-st, Fitzroy-sqr	2	2	0
	*Beauchamp, Richd, Hereford-st, Mayfair	2	0	0
	*Wormald, Mr, Solicitor, Macclesfield	2	0	0
Birmingham.	*Pidduck, John, Burslem, Potteries, Staffordshire	2	0	0
	*Kennedy, W S, do do	2	0	0
	*Hall, Thos Henry, 48, Finsbury-square	2	0	0
	*Finlay, James, Newcastle-on-Tyne	2	0	0
Edinburgh.	*Parker, Wm, and J G, 76, Eyre st, Sheffield	2	0	0
	*Biffen, John, Chichester	2	0	0
	*Jarvis, J, Sportsman Inn, Bridghouse, Sheffield	1	5	0
	*Tweeddale, M, Wellington-street, South Shields	1	1	0
Glasgow.	Clarke, J, Anstwich, near Clapham, via Lancaster	1	1	0
	*Ayling, Wm, Midhurst	1	1	0
	*Hamilton, Thomas, Gloucester	1	1	0
	*Robinson, John, Wellington-place, Northampton	1	1	0
Greenock.	*Wordsell, T C, English-street, Hull	1	1	0
	*Cochrane, A B, Blowers green, near Dudley	1	1	0
	*Parsons, Robert, York-street, Westminster	1	1	0
	*Hill, Thomas, 12, Princes-street, near Jubilee-street, Stepney	1	1	0
Glasgow.	*Biaggini, C H, Hoxton-square	1	1	0
	Ratray, Alexander, 18, Bedford-place, Commercial-road East	1	1	0
	*Smith, David, and Friend, 3, Wood-street, City	1	1	0
	*Lines, Augustus, 3, Iron-gate wharf, Paddington	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Easto, Robert, Upper Tulse Hill, Surrey	1	0	0
	*Lowe, J, 68, Fleet-street	1	0	0
	*Trappe, J, 31, Budge-row, City	1	0	0
	Denman, G, L, 4, Curzon-street, Mayfair	1	0	0
Greenock.	Bicknell, David, 100, Ebury-street, Pimlico	1	0	0
	*Price, John, Belle Sauvage, Ludgate-hill	1	0	0
	*Ibbotson, T, 21, Camomile-street, City	1	0	0
	*Gurney, James, Brill House, Thame, Oxon	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Waters, T, Worcester	1	0	0
	*Charlton, Michael, Union-terrace, York	1	0	0
	*Winspear, W, St, Helen's-square, do	1	0	0
	*Young, H, Winchester-street, Salisbury	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Burford, G, 1, Printing-ground, Stratford, Essex	1	0	0
	*Burford, E, jun, 5, do do	1	0	0
	*Whitburn, T, Ripley, Surrey	1	0	0
	*Shunks, James, St, Helen's, Lancashire	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Crosfield, Simon, 10, Dean's-street, Fairfield, Liverpool	1	0	0
	Diggary, Mr, Waterloo-road, Cobridge, Staffordshire Potteries	1	0	0
	*Walker, James, 3, Morton-street, Leith	1	0	0
	*Phillimore, Samuel, Ebley, near Stroud	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Miles, Richard, do do	1	0	0
	*Boulter, Benjamin, Surgeon, Ordnance-place, Drypool, Hull	1	0	0
	*Shipway, Edward, Stanley Mills, Stroud, Gloucester	1	0	0
	Hamlin, John, Draper, &c., Taunton	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Walker, P, Devises	1	0	0
	*Newton, Edward, Church Gate, Leicester	1	0	0
	*Laycock, Joshua, Harewood, near Leeds	1	0	0
	*Jupe, C, Mere, Wilts	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Parkin, Wm, Barnard Castle	1	0	0
	Morton, Robert, Dunoon	1	0	0
	*Hardrop, Robt, Windy Edge, Beith, Ayrshire	1	0	0
	*Wright, A, North-street, St Andrews, Fife	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Andrew, John, North Curry, Taunton, Somerset	1	0	0
	*Atkinson, Joseph, Yeadon, near Leeds	1	0	0
	*Selley, Ephraim, Minto, by Hawick	1	0	0
	*Woffenden, J R, Selverwell-street, Bolton	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Hamilton, John, Fairholn, Larkhall, N B	1	0	0
	*Liggs, Wm, Sen, 2, York-buildings, Gloucester	1	0	0
	*Zeal, Thos, Church-street, Westbury, Wilts	1	0	0
	*Scott, Moses, Kay-street, Little Bolton	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Stopes, Christopher, East-street, Colchester	1	0	0
	Garland, Thos, do do	1	0	0
	*Holmes, Jno, 29, Manchester street, Liverpool	1	0	0
	*Cochrane, John, Melksham	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Thompson, W, Hull	1	0	0
	*Colquhoun, J, 37, East Holborn, South Shields..	1	0	0
	*Liddell, Edw, Union Bank, Sheffield	1	0	0
	*Saunders, A C, Market, Lavington, near Wilts..	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Tucker, W, MD, do do	1	0	0
	*Smith, Wm, do do	1	0	0
	*Ross, John, Stanwix, Carlisle	1	0	0
	*Cooke, Wm, Heckmondwike, near Leeds	1	0	0
Greenock.	*Clarke, Mrs Elizabeth, Lynton	1	0	0
	*Horton, W, Eccles Hill, near Bradford, Yorkshire	0	16	0
	*Hutton, John, do do	0	16	0
	*Fenton, William, do do	0	16	0
Greenock.	*Thornton, Samuel, do do	0	16	0

in procession to the Town-hall in the usual electioneering style, with a brass band at their head that made horrible discordance, the usual forms having been complied with,

Mr. RAFFER, the mayor, stood forward, and said that the meeting had heard from the crier the object for which they were then assembled together, and he was quite sure that they would proceed to the business before them in the spirit that they had displayed on former occasions, and that they would give to every person, whatever his political opinions might be, a fair, candid, and impartial hearing (cheers).

Mr. HENRY, an extensive brewer in Chichester, then rose, and said that the connection between the citizens and their late representative had suddenly been dissolved, and he was sure they all regretted extremely that such was the case, but it now remained to be seen whether they could not find a worthy successor. The connection between them and Lord Arthur Lennox had subsisted for 15 years, and he believed that it had ever given satisfaction to them all—that each year had strengthened their mutual regard, and even political opponents had heard of Lord A.'s retirement with regret. He was sure that the citizens would now proceed to find his successor with perfect good will. There had existed between them and the house of which Lord Arthur was a branch, a connection that had lasted many years, and where could they look for a representative of their city with a greater chance of success than in some other branch of that family? In introducing to them Lord Henry Lennox as a young candidate for the honour of representing them in Parliament, he considered that great trust was to be placed in his lordship (cheers and groans). There was about him certainly an uncertainty which in the case of their noble friend, the late member, did not subsist; but he felt well assured that if the constituency elected Lord Henry Lennox, their trust in him would not be belied. The connection which had existed between their city and his grace of Richmond, was not that which bound a stern landlord to a servile tenantry; but it was that which influenced the heart and the affections, which sprang from the love which the exalted integrity of the Lennox family must create (cheers and groans.) He introduced the noble lord as the upholder of true Conservative principles, as a warm supporter of the ancient institutions of the country, both civil and ecclesiastical, as determined to promote whatever may conduce to the welfare of the country, and to oppose such measures as he may consider dangerous to its prosperity. But the noble lord would himself have an opportunity of addressing them and explaining his views; and he now therefore begged to nominate Lord Henry Lennox as a fit and proper person to represent the city of Chichester in Parliament. (Cheers and groans, mingled with cries of "Free Trade for ever.")

Dr. M'CAROGHER said that he had much pleasure in seconding the nomination of Lord Henry Lennox. Though only about to commence his political career, he felt sure that his lordship would imitate the conduct of his illustrious predecessors by the zeal and ability he would display not only in advancing the interests of his own constituency, but also that of the country at large.

Mr. FULLAGAR, a Unitarian minister, then stood forward and addressed the meeting. He said that it was the custom sometimes in the hereditary house of the Legislature, in which the noble duke, the father of the noble lord then present, sat, to enter a protest against the proceedings of the house, when these were disapproved of by any peer; and he suspected that unless his grace very speedily became a convert to those opinions which were now very generally expressed by Parliament, his only resource would be to enter his protest against the proceedings of the house in which he sat. He thought the noble duke would find himself in a minority if he still clung to his opinions, and that those who thought with him would have the poor satisfaction of entering their protest against the proceedings of their fellow peers. Now a protest did not stop the progress of a measure, for it was only an advantage as a satisfaction to the party making it, and as a record to posterity in all time coming of the views which he had taken. He (Mr. Fullagar) was there to protest against the proceedings of the day, as managed by the friends of the noble lord and himself, and against those proceedings which had preceded that meeting (loud cheers). He held in his hand two papers, the one purporting to be from Lord Arthur Lennox, and the other from the noble lord who was then soliciting their suffrages. He must confess that he strongly suspected if they were to search the whole annals of election proceedings, they would not find two more curious productions than he then held in his hands (cheers). He could not tell if they emanated from the same pen, but he had a strong presumption and suspicion that they did (laughter). There was a very general similarity in their character. Their score and meaning was perfectly inane and unsatisfactory, for they declared hardly anything (cheers). He did not pretend to say that these addresses had any direct or indirect connection with the noble lord's father, because that would be a very unconstitutional interference with the liberty of elections (laughter). But if they did not proceed from the same pen, then he hoped that Mr. Frec-land would prove to the satisfaction of the meeting that his suspicion was groundless (cheers). All he could say was, that if those addresses did not proceed from the same pen, then there was a very strong family likeness between them; more, indeed, than could be anticipated between the style of an uncle and his nephew. Lord Arthur said, in his address, that the feelings under which he then laboured were such as he could not possibly express. And why? Because he felt himself placed in a more difficult and painful situation than he was sure the constituency would wish to see him involved in. He believed that many of Lord Arthur's political opponents were as sorry that Lord Arthur had resigned as any of his friends could be; but his lordship's resignation did seem so very curious, that the question very naturally suggested itself—What, in the name of common sense, was the nature of the dilemma into which he had got? He was unacquainted with the courtesies of life which regulated the intercourse of men associating in the ranks of the noble lord, but he should have thought that had he himself represented a city in Parliament for 15 years, and at length had felt himself uncomfortable in that connection, he should have come down to the citizens, and explained to them frankly the causes of his discomfort (cheers). Lord Arthur had merely talked to them of his painful feelings, without deigning to give them the least insight into the reasons for which he was about to withdraw (cheers). It appeared to him most extraordinary and most unsatisfactory that some information had not been offered to them on the subject. Probably the noble lord would see the propriety of giving some explanation with respect to the conduct of his noble relative (laughter). But when Lord Arthur Lennox had withdrawn from the representation, the constituency had not once been called together to consult to whom they should entrust the affairs of the city, and yet in so momentous a business one would suppose that some step of that kind would at least be taken. The noble lord, their late representative, had withdrawn, and then another noble lord came and told them that he was ready to supply the vacant place. Lord H. Lennox told the electors that he was quite aware that he had "but slight pretensions to so great a distinction as that at which he aspired" (hear,) and he therefore expressed a hope that he should not be considered presumptuous in doing so. Now, he did not pretend to be the scholar the noble lord might be. His lordship might have studied many languages, and the English language among them, but he did not see how his lordship was to be acquitted of presumption in coming forward to solicit so important a trust, while he admits at the same time that his qualifications for assuming it are so slight (cheers). He suspected that the noble lord was not acting on individual feeling and principle, but that he was a mere automaton, whose motions were regulated by the pulling of some secret wires (loud cheers and laughter). These were the horns of the dilemma on which he should fix his lordship, because, as the matter stood, he thought the constitution had been wounded in one of its most vital parts (cheers). The noble lord told them in his address that he was anxious to preserve those institutions under which the country had attained its present prosperity. Now, what were these institutions? There were two of the greatest importance to the interests of the country and its liberties; one of these was the trial by jury, and the other, the liberty and duty of returning as member to Parliament the fittest person they could find after due consideration, and of returning him on free, unbiassed, independent principles (cheers). Now, instead of his lordship's saying what his capabilities were, he merely told them that individually he had but slight claims on their support. Mr. Henry had introduced his lordship as entitled to become their representative because of the long connections that had subsisted between the city of Chichester and the Goodwood family. But, if Mr. Henry wanted a coachman, would he choose him on such grounds (laughter)? If he did, and the coachman pulled one rein when he should have pulled the other, very few people would be found who, however much they pitied, did not blame Mr. Henry for the accident (laughter). Such was the case of the noble lord. He did not mean, when he said so, however, to say anything hard of the noble lord personally. He had intended to come there that day, not from any feeling of personal liability to his lordship; for if he had it in his power, he would be ready to serve him, but to protest against proceedings which were reducing a most important duty to something worse than child's play. Since, however, he had seen the noble lord, circumstances had arisen which had given him an opportunity of introducing to the citizens a gentleman of the Anti-Corn-Law League; and he embraced the opportunity presented for two or three reasons. In the first place, he thought that free and unrestricted trade in everything was not only most important for the country, but proper and fitting, according to the Creator's arrangement of the New World. He would, therefore, put it on his opponents to show if there were any circumstances in the state of the country—anything rotten in the state of Denmark—to require such an interposition in the dispensations of the Deity as protection interposed. His second reason was, that he was a minister of the gospel. When he considered that Free Trade was what the Deity intended; when he considered that that illustrious person (the reader must remember that it is a Unitarian minister who thus speaks of our Lord), whose minister he was, had directed his disciples to do all in their power to ameliorate the condition of the poorer classes, he certainly was astonished that the established clergy had not come forward on this subject (cheers). Having, however, been at the Corn Exchange the other day, he was still more astonished to find that some of them could come forward on the opposite side of the question. In an old book, which he had in his possession, the author, in describing the conduct of the Christian hierarchies, said, that the instruction given them was, "feed my sheep," whereas their conduct had been as if it was "fleece my lambs." As the Duke of Richmond had expressed his desire that the question of protection should be discussed at the hustings, he would not be surprised if his Grace should make him a handsome present for allowing his son to have an opportunity of discussing the subject there to-day (laughter). He would wish to please his Grace if possible, and as this was not the first or only time in which such discussion had taken place, and if the question was not soon settled, would not be the last, as other obstacles might be thrown into the stream of truth; yet they were only like the pebbles which children cast into the brook, which were powerless to stay the flow of its waters. The rev. gentleman then proceeded to state his objections to Lord H. Lennox, as a member of the aristocracy, entering the lower House of Parliament. He then continued by saying that it was asserted that Sussex had been distinguished for sending incapables to the House of Commons, that the brains of the people required as much working to make them profitable as the clods of the soil itself. After enlogising Captain Pechell, whom he excepted from this category, and condemning in strong language the principles of the new Poor Law, the rev. gentleman concluded by quoting the following lines, altered from those on Burke, with reference to the trial of Warren Hastings:—

"Off it has been remarked that Sussex ground,
"Produced no senators of thought profound,
"That taint at Sussex shall no more be hurled—
"Cobden, her son, appears to teach the world." (Cheers.)

Having proposed Mr. T. Falvey, as a fit and proper person to represent Chichester in Parliament,

Mr. MALDON seconded the nomination. He said that he was one of those who regretted exceedingly that Lord A. Lennox, their late representative, had not rested satisfied with the office which he had obtained a little before he last came down there to stand upon the hustings, but that since then he had been ambitious of another office, viz., that of the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds. He regretted that Lord Arthur had vacated his seat for Chichester. Not that he could agree with the noble lord then present that Lord Arthur's retirement was unexpected by him. When he read the able speech of Sir R. Peel, developing the plan of his great commercial revolution, he did expect that Lord Arthur would either quit the ministry, depart from Sir R. Peel, or vacate his seat in Parliament. His lordship had chosen to do the latter, and he thought that his lordship had shown himself very wise in his generation (loud cheers and laughter). By so doing he had pleased his noble brother; he had accommodated his noble nephew; he had shown his gratitude to his patron, his friend, and benefactor—Sir R. Peel; and also some consideration for his noble self and the wife of his bosom (loud cheers and laughter). 1200*l.* a-year was no joke it appeared. Lord Arthur had chosen to keep his office, with its emoluments, and he had thought proper to give up the representation of their city, which would not after all be worth to him more than about a year's purchase—or the value of a warming-pan (cheers and laughter). It was merely a question of time with his lordship, after all, for he might be sure that as Lord George Lennox was compelled to vacate the west division of Sussex for the accommodation of Lord March, so surely would Lord Arthur be compelled at the close of the present session to vacate his seat for the noble candidate who was then before them (cheers). He had always received a great deal of civility from Lord Arthur Lennox, and he rejoiced therefore that he intended to retain his office, as it would make him independent of his brother the Duke of Richmond (hear, and cheers). His Grace had been a very fortunate man in providing for his children (cheers). It was said in a very old book, that "he who would not provide for his own had denied the faith, and was worse than an infidel" (laughter). He (Mr. Maldon) believed that the sort of infidelity thus spoken of did not belong to the Duke of Richmond (continued laughter). All this was quite true, but was it not a serious thing that a peer of the realm should thus interfere in the election of members serving the lower house of Parliament. Was it not a serious thing that he should thus violate the express terms of an Act of Parliament on that subject (cheers). But if they, the inhabitants of Chichester, being so ill-treated, returned his Grace's nominee to Parliament, they would become abettors of his crime. The duke had expressed his anxiety that the Parliament should be dissolved, and the doctrines of Free Trade discussed at the hustings. His Grace had taken care that Parliament should be dissolved as far as Chichester was concerned; and to accommodate his grace, he, Mr. Maldon, was there to hear it discussed, and he had very great pleasure therefore in seconding the nomination of Mr. Falvey, of Manchester, because he knew him to be a man of talent and information, of high moral and intellectual worth, and well able to discuss with the noble lord the great question which was then absorbing the public attention (cheers).

Lord H. LENNOX, then, on presenting himself, was received with cheers from his own party, and groans from his opponents, in the midst of which a voice was heard, "Let the lady speak." His lordship said that he presented himself before them as a candidate for the honour of representing the city of Chichester in Parliament. He assured them that he felt deeply the extent of the honour which he solicited at their hands, and he must take that opportunity of expressing the gratitude which he felt in the course of his canvass during the last four days. There was one point which had been alluded to that day, and with which he had been repeatedly questioned in the course of his canvass. He begged distinctly to state that Lord Arthur Lennox had resigned his seat of his own accord. The Duke of Richmond did not dictate that step; but he resigned of his own accord. (Cheers and groans, mingled with cries of "Turned out.") He of course felt some delicacy in approaching a subject which had been discussed by the greatest men in the kingdom—that subject which engrossed not only the attention of England, but that of the whole civilised world. Nevertheless, he was unhesitatingly in favour of protection, not only to agriculture, but to British industry in every branch. He hoped that he should never live to see England dependent on the foreigner for her daily bread. The cry of the League was cheap bread, while their avowed object was low wages; but what good would cheap bread do if the rate of wages fell in proportion? (Hisses.) He considered that the result of the proposed Ministerial measure would be to employ the foreigner, and to allow the condition of the native mechanic and labourer to become much worse than it then was. He did not see why the landed interest, who had peculiar burdens pressing on them, should have protection to their industry taken away, while the manufacturers, who had no such burdens, were still to retain a half of theirs. The best proof that protection should be preserved was to be found in the fact that it was, as a principle, approved of by the whole world, and that every country abroad was now adopting the system under which England had attained its present flourishing position among the nations (cheers and groans). They had heard his opponents without interruption, and perhaps now, therefore, they would allow him to explain his views. There was no use, he thought, for any change in the existing corn and provision laws, as England was at present in a very flourishing condition. He agreed with the present Secretary for the Home Department when he said, some years ago, that it was at any time most dangerous to interfere with the laws that regulated the price of food, and of all periods for doing so, the worst was, when a report of scarcity in the returns of the seasons had inflamed the ignorant passions of the people (loud cheers). The reverend gentleman opposite had stated that he expected a brilliant speech from him, and he saw that the Anti-Corn Law League newspaper (the Times) of yesterday had said that as this was "his first appearance on any stage, it was anticipated some other members of his family would be present on the occasion as prompters." It was his first appearance on any stage, and if he failed in realising their hopes they must excuse him, because it was his first fault (cheers). He trusted that, should they elect him to Parliament, they would find him not only ready to vote for all measures which might tend to the benefit of the country at large; but, also, more especially, for those that would be of benefit to the local interests of the city (cheers and hisses). And he would consider that he had been elected as member for the city, not on account of any merits in himself, but to advocate that principle of protection to native industry which the farmers required. Now, the city of Chichester was dependent on the farmers of the neighbourhood, and if they were ruined, what would become of the city? The organ of the Anti-Corn-Law League, the Times, on Wednesday last, said that Chichester was dependent on the labouring farmers around her, and if it was so, the prosperity of the one must rise or decline with that of the other. He would not then detain them any longer, but conclude by informing them that, should he be elected, he would support the Guildford Junction Railway, as that best adapted to suit their interests. He tendered his best thanks to those who had promised him their support (cheers and hisses). He trusted that his friends would fight out the question of protection at the hustings. He did not mean that they should discuss it, because discussion would not send their member to Parliament, but he repeated that he hoped they would fight it out at the hustings (cheers and groans).

Mr. FALVEY then rose and said, that he appeared before the constituency of Chichester that day in order to offer his opposition, not to the person, but to the principles of the noble lord who had just been soliciting their suffrages. He came before them, also, in a great measure owing to a challenge thrown out by the Duke of Richmond in his place in Parliament, that her Majesty's Ministers should dissolve Parliament, that the question now before the public might be openly discussed, for that was the point. Whatever might be the result of that day's proceedings, it was satisfactory to the friends of Free Trade to know, that it was as vain for the noble lord, his opponents, and his relatives, to stem the tide of public opinion on the question of Free Trade as it was for Madame Partington to attempt to put back the ocean one fine morning with her broom (cheers). He came before them with perfect confidence, because he felt from the experience which he had had in the agricultural districts, that both friends and foes were resolved to hear fully and fairly what was to be said in favour of the engrossing question. He trusted, therefore, that the noble lord would believe him if he spoke severely of the principle advocated by his lordship, that he meant nothing personally offensive, but was merely actuated by a regard to the dictates of humanity, common sense, and justice (cheers). The noble lord had denied, and he was bound to believe that his denial was true, as far as he was concerned, that Lord Arthur Lennox was requested or commanded to resign his seat for Chichester. He (Mr. Falvey), however, would ask what Lord Arthur meant by saying that he would be placed in a painful situation if he continued to represent the city in Parliament? Was the language of his address intended to have any authority with the electors, or was that address intended to be anything more than a childish form? No one could read the address without coming to the conclusion that Lord Arthur had been obliged to give up his seat by an unseen power not known to the constituency (cheers and laughter). There was not a more tender point to touch upon than the privileges by which the Commons returned their representatives to Parliament. It had been declared a high crime and misdemeanour in a peer of Parliament to interfere either directly or indirectly in the election of members to the other house. Yet, in the face of all this the representatives for Buckingham, for Woodstock, for Newark, and for Chichester had been silently turned out at the dictation of the neighbouring noblemen, and he should not have solicited at their hands the honour of representing them that day had it not been for the attempt which had been made to prevent the question of Free Trade being examined and discussed in their city (cheers). Thanks, however, to the power given on these occasions to the people, he had the opportunity of bringing the question before them in the best possible arena he could desire if he had his selection. For such an arena no question could be better adapted than that. Have the Corn Laws done well for their country—has protection answered its objects? Have the farmers those profits to which they are entitled on the outlay of their capital? Has the labourer been paid in proportion to his requirements (vehement cries of "No, no")? He did not blame the noble lord for conscientiously following in the footsteps of his relative. He had no fear, however, that if the question was not now finally settled, his lordship would no more remain a protectionist than Lord Arthur had continued so (cheers). Lord Arthur was said to be an honourable man and an excellent representative. Lord Arthur had kept his eyes and ears open. He heard the Free Trade declarations of the Prime Minister—he had listened to the argument adduced in favour of Free Trade by the greatest men on both sides of the House of Commons. He had felt that protection could not be maintained, and the result had been that he had stuck to his situation of 1200*l.* a-year at the hands of a Free Trade Minister (cheers and laughter). He did not despair of seeing the noble lord himself become the advocate of Free Trade; but if the great measure was carried before his conversion would be completed, then he would see the lands still in cultivation—the farmers prosperous—the labourer better paid and better fed—England worth living in still: and he will find, too, that his noble father has not run away and left it (cheers and laughter). He would put it to them as to any intelligent assembly, were not all Sir Robert Peel's personal and political predilections in favour of things as they were? He had a large majority in the House of Commons. He had been selected to lead the armies of protection; he had every reason to continue a protectionist; but he saw a blight coming over an esculent upon which (shame be it said) a large portion of the population of the land depended. He saw want in the distance by Government commissioners reporting the facts of the case, and then he went to Parliament, and though the Minister of a party, opposed to such a policy, declared that he would not take upon him the responsibility of keeping the ports shut, and that as the Minister of the Crown and the people he bade defiance to the aristocracy, and threw himself upon the support of the country (loud cheers). The consequence was that large meetings were preparing and sending petitions to Parliament to support him, while the protectionists were hiding themselves in holes and corners, and assembling in numbers so small that there were few present besides the reporters, and getting up petitions without allowing discussion upon them (cheers). With respect to the Duke of Richmond taking on his shoulders the Government of the country, his Grace might think himself very clever, but he (Mr. Falvey) would as soon expect to see a child wielding a thunderbolt as his Grace occupying such a position (loud laughter). The duke, who was Lord Lieutenant of the county, was reported to have said that if a Free Trader came to address the people of Sussex he would not answer that he would not get pinched by them. Now this was a most unwise suggestion, for, as the head of the magistracy, his Grace should not thus, by innuendoes, have hinted at violence. But expressions of that sort pass for nothing, because the labourers, when they met to declare their opinions, entered heart and soul into the cause of Free Trade, and protested against a system which had not protected them. Mr. Falvey then proceeded to address himself in detail to the different points of Lord Henry Lennox's speech, meeting each assertion with the usual and well-known arguments which the Free Traders have employed against the fallacies of monopoly. He concluded by complimenting the citizens upon the candour and impartiality of the hearing which they had given both to him and his opponents.

When Mr. Falvey had sat down, a gentleman named Barlow made an abortive attempt to gain a hearing.

The Mayor then proceeded to take a show of hands. The result of which he declared to be in favour of Mr. Falvey.

A poll having been demanded by Lord Henry Lennox, Mr. Falvey pleaded the want of a fair start in the canvass as his excuse for retiring from the contest, and again thanked the constituency for the kindness with which they had received him.

Lord H. LENNOX, in returning thanks for his election, which was duly declared by the mayor, said that if Mr. Falvey had expressed his high sense of the honour which they had done him in giving him the show of hands, how much more creditable was it to him that so many of the electors had promised him their support, that Mr. Falvey would not go to the poll. As long as he lived he should not forget the favour which they had that day conferred on him (cheers). His endeavour would be to promote the best interests of the city, and he hoped they would not find him so bad a bargain as they thought for (cheers and laughter). He could not quite conclude without thanking his opponents for the good humour and kindness they had evinced towards him.

A vote of thanks to the Mayor having been put and carried, the farce of an independent election at Chichester closed, as it had opened, with a disorderly procession, and the noisy discordance of wind instruments.

IMPORTANT TO SHEEP FARMERS AND OTHERS.—A correspondent earnestly recommends the sowing of rye grass and clover among heather. He observes, "I have seen barren patches of heath land converted into the most beautiful green sward, merely by sowing rye grass and clover among the heather, in the proportion in which these are generally sown together, without paying any attention to the afflu." In the instances in which I saw this done, I observed that three years or so had not elapsed before the heather had completely disappeared." This hint ought to be attended to, especially under present circumstances.—Edinburgh Evening Post.

CITY OF LONDON—COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL.

THE CORN LAWS.—After an ineffectual attempt made by several members to proceed to the consideration of petitions, the subject of the total and immediate abolition of the Corn Laws was entered upon.

The clerk of the Court read the requisition, which was signed by the following gentlemen:—David William Wire, Thomas Watkins, William Dawson, F. Bennock, James Hoole, Charles Barnard, John Last, Benjamin Brown, W. H. Ashurst, J. M. Barnard, J. Anderton, J. Prendergast, W. Johnson, T. H. Hall, W. S. Pilcher, James Frisby, W. Stevens, J. R. Carr, J. Bennett, R. Ashby, R. Thomas, W. Tozer, G. Wright, J. R. Thompson, J. Parker, J. Collingwood, J. Kilby, W. Christie, S. H. Jutsum, T. J. Holt, T. J. Salter, A. Freeman, J. Jerran, E. Fisher, T. Young, T. Tagg, J. Sharland, J. Waterlow, J. Duncan, D. Lauri, G. Virtue, N. Maughan, R. Westwood, H. Prichard, H. Blake, S. Ridley, R. Williams, H. L. Taylor, W. Lister, E. Hickson, W. Groucher, J. Roberts, L. Redhead, T. Sidney (alderman), T. Hall, J. Phillips, F. Sadler, T. Eldred, S. Read, S. Sharwood, S. Maw, S. Gilbert, W. B. James, G. Bracher, J. Curtis, G. Selson, T. Joyce, D. Cook, J. Law, W. Muddell, T. T. Lott, J. Jolliffe, T. Rowley, T. Sprague, W. Tyler, T. Marsden, S. Lepard, J. T. Bedford, R. Taylor, J. Bailey, W. M. Williams, R. Norris, G. Stacey, W. Harding, J. Whiteside.

Mr. WIRE said, that in rising to propose the resolution which he should afterwards submit to the consideration of the Court, he would best have consulted his own feelings if, after thanking the Lord Mayor for the readiness and courtesy with which his lordship had complied with the requisition in thus calling the Court on an early day, he had been permitted to submit the resolutions without any remarks. But he had understood that the resolutions would be opposed by gentlemen on the ground that the policy of Sir R. Peel had already gone far enough, and that to ask for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws would be to endanger the success of measures which, apart from that question, were considered beneficial to the country. He should, in a few words prove the immediate necessity for the concurrence of the Court in his propositions (hear). Happily the Court had not, like the members of another house, to retract opinions formerly enforced, nor had the individual members placed themselves in the unenviable position of being suddenly converted to Free Trade doctrines (hear, hear). For a series of years that Court had recorded its conviction of the impolicy and injustice of the Corn Laws, and had denounced the imposition of prohibiting duties as alike injurious to the commerce and industry of the country, and it was matter of congratulation that opinions so just in themselves, ratified and confirmed as they had been by experience, of the benefits arising from the relaxation of import duties, had been gathering strength every day, and had ascended from the haunts of commerce to the halls of legislation. The publication of the evidence taken by the House of Commons some years since, the report upon that subject made to the Houses of Parliament, the agitation of the Corn Law League, the speeches at the hustings, and other assemblies of the people, had carried conviction to the minds of all that extension, and not exclusion, as free interchange of the commodities of one country for the productions of another was the true basis of a sound commercial policy (hear, hear). One class, however, of the community remained unconvinced of the justice by selfishness or misled by prejudice, steadily resisted any change in the protection afforded to agriculture. It seemed as if it required, in addition to reason and experience, the visitation of Providence, in the shape of famine, to convince them of the folly and wickedness of withholding food and employment from the people. Sir Robert Peel, seeing the terrible prospect which awaited the greater part of the population of Ireland, in the destruction of their usual food, could no longer uphold the system of protection, and he had won for himself a nation's gratitude by announcing the change in his opinions, and by proposing those liberal, just and necessary measures which he had submitted to the House of Commons (loud cheers). It was to be regretted that, apparently awed by the clamour of the monopolists, he had not proposed the immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. If it were right that they should expire in three years, why should they not immediately cease (hear, hear)? Why, with an impending famine, should we go on continuing those obnoxious laws? Why should an important branch of commerce be deranged by a sliding scale which all parties have pronounced to be a failure (hear, hear)? It had increased the price of corn. It had filled the pockets of speculators. It certainly had not benefited either the tenant-farmer, the commercial man, or the labouring population. On whom then, while it inflicted great evil, had it conferred any substantial advantage? Surely not on the landlord, who on letting his farms had been unable to calculate upon the sure payment of rent without subjecting the tenant to ruin by the fluctuation of prices and the uncertainty of obtaining a remunerating profit for his capital and labour (hear, hear). Apart from these considerations, there was another and most important one, which was the injury done to commerce in general. Poor countries, which had no money, but great agricultural capabilities, were prevented from pouring their abundance into the land, to feed its millions of population; and we were unable to find a large market for the exportation of our manufactures. Ascending still higher, he could not but look upon the subject in a moral and religious point of view, and asking the Court to be consistent with itself, with its former resolutions, and to send up its unanimous prayer to Parliament to abolish that most hateful of all monopolies in the sight of God and man—the monopoly of food (loud cheers). He concluded by moving the following resolutions:—

"That while this court is desirous to record its cordial and entire approbation of the comprehensive, just, and wise measures introduced to the Commons House of Parliament by the first Minister of the Crown, for the revision of our commercial policy, and is gratified to learn that a repeal of the Corn Laws is also proposed, although at a future time, it cannot but express an earnest hope that the total and immediate repeal of those laws may yet be proposed, instead of deferring such a positive good for a period of three years.

"That this court is of opinion that the removal of all prohibitory duties upon the importation of food and other necessary articles is eminently calculated to promote the agricultural, commercial, and social interests of the people by improving their physical condition, and thus advancing their intellectual and moral habits.

"That, therefore, to delay the final repeal of the Corn Laws for a period of three years is an evil, and necessarily tends to introduce uncertainty into an important branch of commerce, to injure commerce in general, to procrastinate agricultural improvement, and thus prevent the application of service to the better cultivation of the land by which the English farmer, without protection, will be able successfully to compete with the foreign grower.

"That a petition be presented to Parliament founded upon these resolutions, and praying for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.

"That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the representatives of this city in Parliament, with the expression of the hope that they will support the measures introduced by her Majesty's Prime Minister, Sir Robert Peel, for the repeal of the Corn Laws and the remission of taxation, and avail themselves of any opportunity which may present itself, and which, without prejudicing or impeding the passing of the measure of Sir R. Peel, may yet afford an opportunity to obtain a total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn Laws."

Mr. DUNCAN seconded the propositions. He anticipated great advantages from the immediate abolition of the Corn Laws, and pointed to the disposition already evinced on parts of the Continent to assimilate their duties to ours as proof of the liberal commercial policy springing from the example of this country. After entering into some details on the benefits naturally arising from unrestricted trade, he stated that one of the great effects of the policy would be the complete settlement of the question of war, which was only for barbarians (cheers). A war with France would drive the people ten years back in civilisation, and would destroy the improvements which would be disseminated by the abolition of the abominable Corn Laws. Three years, in fact, would not elapse before the vast benefits derivable from immediate repeal would exhibit themselves, and the country would appear in a most flourishing condition (hear, hear).

Alderman H. HUGHES said it appeared to him to be extremely inconsistent in the court to support the Government in the measures they brought forward, and then turn round suddenly and require the Government to propose a total abolition.

Mr. PHILLIPS said it might be reasonably imagined that Sir R. Peel would be the best judge as to the time for the abolition (hear, hear). The Minister had fixed the time for the total removal of the restrictions, but the supporters of the resolutions, who did not seem to think at all about the consequences of immediate abolition to the agriculturists, were for hurrying on the measure. He thought that a concession had been made to the agriculturists to which they were entitled.

Mr. LAWRENCE said he considered several of the resolutions founded on reason and good sense, but he could not reconcile himself to the idea of calling for immediate repeal, at the same time that the portion of the resolutions he admired, pledged the Court to the support of the Ministers in the plan for fixing a future period for the total abolition (hear, hear). There was something strangely contradictory in the introduction of the paragraphs, and, in his opinion, the Court could not do better than adopt the former, and exclude the latter. A person would imagine that the opinion of such a man as Sir R. Peel, as to the time adopted for removing the restriction, might be considered as entitled to some weight; but there were some people, who if the stream ran in any particular line, were determined to go along with it. Mr. Lawrence then proposed an amendment to the effect described.

Mr. W. JONES supported the amendment, and remarked upon the inconsistency of the proposers of the resolutions. Lord John Russell had expressed, at a meeting of his friends, an opinion that it would be injurious to the measure of the Premier to advocate immediate abolition; and it might be reasonably admitted that such an authority deserved to be respected (hear, hear). He would then ask why the court considered such a suggestion unworthy of regard? It was well known, that the citizens were accused of too frequently meddling with political matters (hear, hear, and laughter). It was said they were afraid to go to Parliament upon any subject connected with their local interests, because they endangered their interests by meddling with politics. He believed that to be the fact. But the supporters of the resolutions knew that the immediate abolition could not be carried. If they thought it would, why did they not condemn Sir R. Peel? The terms of praise in which the Minister was lauded in the court, after having been subjected to very different sorts of compliment upon previous occasions must be very flattering and gratifying to his ears (laughter). He (Mr. Jones) believed that it would be an act of great injustice to the agriculturist to adopt the course advocated by the mover of the resolution, and no inconvenience of any consequence was likely to arise from the three years' continuation of the small duty proposed by Sir Robert Peel. If the Corn Laws were repealed at once, money would not be put into the pockets of the monopolists, but food would not be put into the bellies of the poor. He was an advocate for the measure proposed by the Premier; and he hoped the court would see the necessity of supporting that measure.

Mr. BOWER said the Corn Laws could not be repealed in any other way than in that proposed by Sir Robert Peel. If immediate repeal were to take place, it would throw money into the hands of individuals or foreigners; but it would not at all afford any benefit to the poor.

Mr. NORRIS supported the original resolutions. Those who advocated the proposition were anxious to express their approbation of the new feature in Sir Robert Peel's domestic policy: and to show their approval of it, they wished to make it known that they wanted it now instead of three years hence; but they also plainly exhibited a desire not in the slightest degree to embarrass him in the excellent measures he was carrying into effect.

Mr. BENNOCK very ably supported the resolution. He condemned all protecting duties as always delusive, never protecting those they pretended to protect.

Mr. WIRE replied, and the question was put. The amendment was negatived, and the original resolutions were carried by a large majority.

Petitions to both Houses of Parliament, grounded upon the resolutions, were proposed and carried, and after the transaction of some unimportant business, the court adjourned.

CORN LAWS.—A meeting of agriculturists took place at Toynes, on Tuesday, for the purpose of considering the financial scheme of Sir Robert Peel, and adopting certain resolutions with reference thereto. The meeting was called by the protection party, and resolutions condemnatory of Sir Robert Peel's proposed alteration of duties were proposed, but, strange to say, the whole of them were defeated with great majorities, and an amendment approving of an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, agreed to with acclamation. This was turning, the tables with a vengeance, and the astonished "protection" men left the meeting looking unutterable things.—Devonport Independent.

AGRICULTURE.

THE "PROTECTED" LABOURERS.

Of the many impudent pretences put forward by the monopolists as apologies for the Corn Laws, perhaps the most impudent is that which asserts that the agricultural labourers have an interest in the maintenance of artificial scarcity. In fact, nothing but a thorough reliance upon utter want of knowledge on the part of the public of the real condition of the rural population, and of the causes of that condition, could have induced the monopolists to venture on those statements. If there be one demonstrative proof of the impolicy of the Corn Laws, it is the state of the English peasantry in connection with the state of English husbandry. The land is imperfectly cultivated, producing little more than the half of what it might easily be made to produce by the employment of more labour, while labourers are unemployed, or starving on a pittance of 7s. or 8s. a-week. A mine of wealth exists in the soil, which only waits to be sought to be obtained; yet the means of its attainment, the muscles of the English peasant, are resting uselessly by in the form of a redundant and half-employed population. And this, after 30 years of that "protection," which we are told has been maintained for the especial advantage of the agricultural labourers!! Away with such nonsense! Ask the labourers themselves how they have fared under the fostering care of high rent seeking and monopolist landowners. Look at Wiltshire, where the monopolists muster in great force,—where, if anywhere, protection must have benefited the labourer; for, with very trifling exceptions, the county is now exclusively agricultural. Yet what said the thousand labourers assembled at Goatacre? What said the 1500 collected on Bremhill Green? Why, with one voice, they declared that protection has been the bane of agriculture, and the destruction of the agricultural labourer.

Probably none of our readers need be told of the effect the simple and touching statements of the poor men and women who spoke at these meetings have made upon the public mind; everywhere there is but one opinion upon the subject. Men least affected by rural sympathies or Free Trade arguments have said, "If this be the state of the protected labourers, there must be some error in the system; such things must not be." The monopolists, too, purblind as they are, could not avoid seeing what a decisive refutation of their favourite pretence these meetings afforded; and, accordingly, we find the most flagitious attempts have been made to misrepresent the Goatacre meeting, and its earnest and humble speakers. Thus, we learn from the Wiltshire Independent—a journal of unflinching integrity, and well worthy of its name—that, amongst other falsehoods put forth by the local organ of monopoly, it was stated that Burchell, one of the speakers, and his family earn 24s. a week. Now, what is the fact?—and, we refer to these statements mainly for the purpose of showing what is the real state of the labourers, the "protected" labourers of North Wiltshire, and as introductory to some notices we shall give of the state of husbandry in those parts:

Burchell is a married man; and his family, at home, consists of himself, his wife, and six children; one child, a girl, is out at service; she is, however, no assistance to her parents, but, at present, the contrary, the cost of fitting her out at Michaelmas last, having obliged them to deprive themselves of many necessities, and even to run into debt. Here, then, are eight persons in one family. Their earnings, we have stated, were, at the time of the meeting, 10s. 6d. a-week, and the following are the items composing that sum:—

Burchell himself	8 0
His eldest son, 19 years of age, who acts in the capacity of shepherd, to Mr. Henley, Burchell's master, and works seven days in the week	6 0
And his second son, 17 years of age, who also works for Mr. Henley, as milker, &c.	5 6
	19 6

"[Since the meeting, and in order to make out a case against Burchell, by swelling the amount of his family earnings, the third boy has been employed by Mr. Henley, at 3d. a-day; but with that we have nothing to do, and only mention it to prevent our being hereafter charged with any misrepresentation.]

"Now the two elder sons absorb, in better clothing and in better food than the rest of the family are obliged to put up with, nearly the whole of the benefit of their wages, so that, in fact, Burchell, his wife, and four children were living on 8s. a-week, their sole dependence."

Here we find an adult, an intelligent labourer, working at 8s. a-week; his son of 19, who is to all intents and purposes an adult labourer, and entrusted with the responsible duty of shepherd—a duty which requires attendance seven days in the week, and at certain seasons of the year a good deal of night work also—earns 6s. a-week, or about tenpence farthing per day; and another son, who also is competent to the post of milker on a large dairy-farm, has wages of 5s. 6d. a-week. Now let us ask any one whether such wretched wages do not indicate a low state of husbandry? And this is not a populous district. One may ride through the North Wilts Vale, of which Goatacre is the centre, and meet with nothing but a few scattered cottages and very small hamlets—they can't be called villages; while so few are the people at work in the field, that a traveller, having missed his way, may often go for several miles before he can meet with a human being to direct him. Yet he is wandering for the most part amidst good though neglected land. High rude hedges, full of timber, surround him on every side; ditches and water-courses are very imperfectly scoured, while the land universally wants that first necessary to good cultivation,—draining. Cows, sheep, and oxen, are feeding on the natural pastures, for which high rents are paid, though they afford but small profits to the farmer, and to the labourers such wretched wages as are received by Burchell's family; and who, be it observed, for a vale country labourer, is "well off." How is it with those, the majority, who are confessedly not "well off?" Now, without saying the whole, or even the greater portion of the land of this district, ought at once to be converted into tillage,—though we believe it might be so converted with great advantage,—inasmuch as that would imply an entire change of system, and almost a complete change of tenants, we do not hesitate to assert, that by converting certain portions of the least valuable pasture of each farm into arable land, the amount of the total value of the produce might be doubled.

There is not a tenant farmer in the vale who will not assent to that statement. All of them are always anxious to have more tillage land, but the landlords will not consent. The landowners like the nomadic husbandry, because they believe it can be carried on by men of less capital, and of more supple politics, than would be required for a mixed husbandry. They believe also that they get as high rents from dairy farms as they would do from a more improved system of mixed cultivation. And it is the high rent derived from rude and primitive cultivation which the Corn Laws are especially calculated to protect. But what of the labourers? If no more than one-third of the pasture were broken up, and if all the land were to be drained even by the slowest conceivable degrees—say ten acres in every hundred yearly—it is absolutely certain that labour in this district would become scarce, and that wages would at once rise fifty per cent. And while wheat and beans might be produced in considerable quantities, more cattle might be actually kept than are maintained on the present system; for, first, the pastures being well drained would carry more stock than at present, and the use of roots, the supply of straw, and the adoption of house and yard feeding and rearing of stock which should result therefrom, would enable the farmer to milk his cows longer and keep more dry stock than he does now. Then again, a cheap supply of pulse, Indian corn, and so forth, would be of singular advantage to the dairy farmer, who always has or ought to have a large stock of swine, which feed with great rapidity on corn and milk. It is not that these things are unknown to the farmers who occupy this district, but they have been compelled by their landlords to follow one beaten track, and have been taught to lean on the delusive support of protection. Now protection is coming to an end, it will be for the advantage of all parties, and especially of the "protected" Wiltshire peasantry that there should be no delay of absolute freedom.

We shall add a few passages from the Wiltshire Independent, illustrative of the present condition of the Wiltshire labourers. After refuting some of the misstatements of his monopolist contemporary, the editor says:

"The destitution of the Wiltshire peasantry is denied;—7s. or 8s. a-week for a large family to subsist on is a thing not to be credited; but on the contrary, instances where thirty or forty shillings a-week have been paid in money to the members of one family, besides 2s. or 3s. more of occasional perquisites, are known to the editor. Now we unhesitatingly assert, without fear of contradiction, and we will prove it if necessary, that 7s. and 8s. a-week is the general rate of wages for the best able-bodied labourers in the county; it is true a few get more, such as carters or shepherds for instance, who occasionally get nine, and perhaps one in a hundred, ten shillings a week; but in these cases all the amount above 8s. is for extra work; for their labour on the Sabbath-day, and for over hours on other days."

He also thus refers to another district of the county, Pewsey Vale, which is deep strong arable land, needing nothing but spirited culture to be one of the most productive tracts in the kingdom:

"Cases of general destitution have also been sent to us in great numbers, and from various parts of the county; and among other places from Farnford, where, at the late meeting of the Protection Society, Mr. Bethell spoke of the labourers as being happy and contented, but where, we are informed, the common necessities and common decencies of life are sadly wanting. From Pewsey, too, we have had most distressing accounts; there honest, able-bodied men are to be seen yoked to carts, like the brute-beasts, and drawing loads of stones to repair the roads; and for this degrading work, men, with wives, and three, four, five, and even six children, are paid only six shillings a-week! and on this sum they have to depend for their subsistence. Nay, more, one case is reported to us where a man with his wife and one child, and whose rent is £3 a-year, is employed at this work at four shillings only!"

Again he says:

"Were work as plentiful, and wages as good as the Gazette asserts they are, would such scenes as we have described at Pewsey exist, and would the independent labourers of the county be flocking into the Union Houses as they are? Last week upwards of fifty persons were admitted into the Devizes Union, and among them fourteen able-bodied labourers, some of them with wives and children, from the parish of All Cannings."

Vines, one of the speakers at Goatacre, on whose statement of his condition, the monopolist print, under the guise of a correspondent, affected to throw a doubt, thus writes to the Independent:

"It is false that I received 10s. for the job. And here I stand at Christian Melford (not at Sutton as the Gazette says) ready to prove the truth of what I said at Goatacre, and thither any man or any party of men from any part of England, is welcome to come to question me, and I, with my wife and also my children of age enough to have knowledge, will prove to them that the situation of myself and family at the present is really appalling. It costs me near 9s. a-week for bread, not having one potato I can eat. I do not deny that I had a place at 10s. a-week, but it is a falsehood that I came away; I was discharged, about four months ago, and with as good character as I went to the place with. As I said before, my distress is too conspicuous to be denied, therefore, sir, I submit this to you for publication as a testimony of my readiness to prove that the words stated by me at Goatacre are nothing more than bare facts, and not falsehoods."

Mr. H. Gale, of Malmesbury, who is well known for his hearty support of Free Trade, gave the following statements of the average case of Wiltshire labourers in his own neighbourhood:

"Jacob Chappell has a wife and seven children, oldest 13, (none of them employed) has been working at 8s. a week, but is now out of constant work; his wife went to the relieving officer on Saturday last, as he could not earn enough to buy food, but he could get no relief and he left home in search of work. He gives 5l. a year rent for a cottage and twenty lug of ground; pays poor-rates which leaves (after deducting for house rent and firing) 5s. for 9 persons, or 60d. for one hundred and eighty nine meals, or about 1d. a day each to live upon. Nothing for clothes and groceries."

"Thomas Hillier, of Westport, has a wife and 6 children, works at Cobwell at 8s. a week; rent £4 a year without land, which with rate is nearly 2s. a week. Firing 1s., leaving 5s. a week for food, clothing, soap, candles, and all the little &c.'s of housekeeping for eight persons."

"Richard Lea, of Westport, has a wife and 5 children, oldest 11; works for Mr. R. Milsome at 2s., and two quarts of table beer a day; rent 3l. 10s. for a very bad house without land; pays rates."

"Thomas Shallum, of Garsdon, works at Mr. Backlands, at 8s. a week, has a wife and five small children; no other means."

"Charles Tanner, of Corston, works for Mr. Whale at 7s. a week, has a wife and four children; rent 3l. 10s.; garden small."

"Richard Fry, of Filands, works for myself at 9s. a week, and as much milk as he requires to drink; has a wife and 5 children, one at service, and another has her food at her grandmother's, and three at home. Rent 5l. 10s. for a cottage and twenty lug of land; pays poor-rates, which makes the rent equal to 6l.; garden at 8l. an acre worth 1l. Deduct 3s. 2d. a week for rent and a hundred of coal, leaves 5s. 10d. for 5 person's food, groceries, &c., and 6 persons' clothes—less than enough to purchase three small loaves a day for fifteen meals."

The monopolist organ also said the Wootton Bassett labourers are fully employed. Hear what a correspondent of the Independent says thereupon:

"I beg leave to give you a brief statement of the real condition of the inhabitants of this town. They never were worse off than at this time. Some of them are, as I well know, at present in a state of starvation; and were it not for the benevolence of a few well-disposed individuals, they must inevitably perish. They go from house to house, begging, which seems to be their only resort. The other day, a friend who called on me said he had given a meal of victuals to one of his neighbours who was in a most distressing state of poverty. Another person whom I was in conversation with, stated that her brother-in-law had been out of employ for a month, having a wife and 4 children; and that they had actually been two or three days together without anything to put in their mouths. I have made inquiry respecting those persons who are out of work, and according to statements given

REVIEW.

Poems. By Thomas Hood. London. Moxon.

Among those who have devoted their lives to the service of their fellow-men, and employed the high powers with which they were gifted to relieve misery, expose hypocrisy, and resist oppression, there has been no one who has surpassed the late Thomas Hood in zeal, earnestness, and fearless expression of opinion. While these volumes ensure for his name a high and permanent place in the list of British poets, they equally establish his claim to the title of an enlightened philanthropist and a genuine patriot. His services to the great cause of truth and justice, for the advancement of which the League has been established, deserve the gratitude of every Free Trader; and we trust that all who can purchase books, will make a point of adding these volumes to their library for the sake both of the deceased bard and his surviving family. Even in his lightest pieces of wit and humour, Hood manifested an under-current of deep philosophic thought, combined with the finest sympathies of humanity. While the jest wreathed our lips with smiles, it suggested reflections which employed the intellect and roused feelings which touched the heart. In his more serious compositions he evinced an extraordinary power of deducing from external nature an entire creation of thought; every detail not only gave its image, but its train of imaginings. We may take, as an instance of this peculiarity, part of his description of "The Haunted House;" no one can read it without an involuntary shudder.

The wren had built within the Poreh, she found
Its quiet loneliness so sure and thorough;
And on the lawn,—within its turfy mound,—
The rabbit made his burrow.

The rabbit wild and gray, that flitted through
The shrubby clumps, and frisk'd, and sat, and vanish'd,
But leisurely and bold, as if he knew
His enemy was banish'd.

The wary crow,—the pheasant from the woods—
Lull'd by the still and everlasting sameness,
Close to the Mansion, like domestic broods,
Fed with a "shocking tameness."

The coot was swimming in the reedy pond,
Beside the water-hen, so soon affrighted;
And in the weedy moat the heron, fond
Of solitude, alighted.

The moping heron, motionless and stiff,
That on a stone, as silently and stilly,
Stood, an apparent sentinel, as if
To guard the water-lily.

No sound was heard except, from far away,
The ringing of the Whitwall's shrilly laughter,
Or, now and then, the chatter of the jay,
That Echo murmur'd after.

But Echo never mock'd the human tongue;
Some weighty crime, that Heaven could not pardon,
A secret curse on that old building hung,
And its deserted Garden.

The beds were all untouched by hand or tool;
No footstep marked the damp and mossy gravel,
Each walk as green as is the mantled pool,
For want of human travel.

The vine unprun'd, and the neglected peach,
Droop'd from the wall with which they used to grapple;
And on the canker'd tree, in easy reach,
Rooted the golden apple.

But awfully the truant shunn'd the ground,
The vagrant kept aloof, and daring Poacher;
In spite of gaps that through the fences round
Invited the encroacher.

For over all there hung a cloud of fear,
A sense of mystery the spirit daunted,
And said, as plain as whisper in the ear,
The place is Haunted!

Similar skill in the aggregation of minute circumstances is shown in "The Song of the Shirt," that unrivalled picture of the wretchedness produced by the operation of the cruel restrictions imposed by selfish monopolists on human food. It would be useless to quote a poem which is imprinted on the memory of all who can read, wherever the English language is known. We shall, therefore, quote its companion-piece, which, though equally meritorious, has obtained less celebrity.

The lady lay in her bed,
Her couch so warm and soft,
But her sleep was restless and broken still;
For turning often and oft
From side to side, she mutter'd and moan'd,
And toss'd her arms aloft.

At last she startled up,
And gaz'd on the vacant air,
With a look of awe, as if she saw
Some dreadful phantom there—
And then in the pillow she buried her face
From visions ill to bear.

The very curtain shook,
Her terror was so extreme:
And the light that fell on the broider'd quilt
Kept a tremulous gleam;
And her voice was hollow, and shook as she cried:—
"Oh me! that awful dream!"

"That weary, weary walk,
In the churchyard's dismal ground!
And those horrible things, with shady wings,
That came and flitted round,—
Death, death, and nothing but death,
In every sight and sound!"

"And oh! those maidens young,
Who wrought in that dreary room,
With figures drooping and spectres thin,
And cheeks without a bloom;—
And the Voice that cried, 'For the pomp of pride,
We haste to an early tomb!'"

"For the pomp and pleasure of Pride,
We toil like Afric slaves,
And only to earn a home at last,
Where yonder cypress waves;—
And then they pointed—I never saw
A ground so full of graves!"

"And still the coffins came,
With their sorrowful trains and slow;
Coffin after coffin still,
A sad and sickening show;
From grief exempt, I never had dreamt
Of such a World of Woe!"

"Of the hearts that daily break,
Of the tears that hourly fall,
Of the many, many troubles of life,
That grieve this earthly ball—
Disease and Hunger, and Pain, and Want,
But now I dreamt of them all!"

"For the blind and the cripple were there,
And the babe that pined for bread,
And the houseless man, and the widow poor
Who begged—to bury the dead;
The naked, alas, that I might have clad,
The famish'd I might have fed!"

"The sorrow I might have soothed,
And the unregarded tears;
For many a thronging shape was there,
From long forgotten years,
Ay, even the poor rejected Moor,
Who rais'd my childish fears!"

"Each pleading look, that long ago
I scan'd with a heedless eye,
Each face was gazing as plainly there,
As when I pass'd it by:
Woe, woe for me if the past should be Thus present when I die!"

"No need of sulphureous lake,
No need of fiery coal,
But only that crowd of human kind
Who wanted pity and dole—
In everlasting retrospect—
Will wring my sinful soul!"

Alas; I have walk'd through life
Too heedless where I trod;
Nay, helping to trample my fellow worm,
And fill the burial sod—
Forgetting that even the sparrow falls
Not unmark'd of God!"

"I drank the richest draughts;
And ate whatever is good—
Fish, and flesh, and fowl, and fruit,
Supplied my hungry mood;
But I never remember'd the wretched ones
That starve for want of food!"

"I dress'd as the noble dress,
In cloth of silver and gold,
With silk, and satin, and costly furs,
In many an ample fold;
But I never remember'd the naked limbs
That froze with winter's cold."

"The wounds I might have heal'd!
The human sorrow and smart!
And yet it never was in my soul
To play so ill a part:
But evil is wrought by want of Thought,
As well as want of Heart!"

She clasp'd her fervent hands,
And the tears began to stream;
Large, and bitter, and fast they fell,
Remorse was so extreme;
And yet, oh yet, that many a Dame
Would dream the Lady's Dream!

The legend of Miss Kilmansegg and her Golden Leg is one of the most extraordinary mixtures of whimsicality and philosophy which exists in any language. This favoured daughter of Mammon exhibits the misery of wealth, when riches are sought for their own sake, and gold made the end and object of existence. Even as a baby Miss Kilmansegg was brought under the dominion of gold.

When she saw the light—it was no mere ray
Of that light so common—so everyday—
That the sun each morning launches—
But six wax tapers dazzled her eyes,
From a thing—a gooseberry bush for size—
With a golden stem and branches.

She was born exactly at half-past two,
As witness'd a timepiece in ormolu
That stood on a marble table—
Showing at once the time of day,
And a team of Gildings running away
As fast as they were able,
With a golden God, with a golden Star,
And a golden Spear, in a golden Car,
According to Grecian fable.

Like other babes, at her birth she cried;
Which made a sensation far and wide,
Ay, for twenty miles around her;
For though to the ear 'twas nothing more
Than an infant's squall, it was really the roar
Of a Fifty-thousand Pounder!
It shook the next heir
In his library chair,
And made him cry, "Confound her!"

Her baptism affords an opportunity for some clever satire, equally marked by brilliancy, force, and truth.

It would fill a Court Gazette to name
What East and West End people came
To the rite of Christianity:
The lofty Lord, and the titled Dame,
All diamonds, plumes, and urbanity;

me, there are about thirty able-bodied so situated. Potatoes are scarce and very dear; and what the poor men will do to plant their land I cannot tell. The highest rate of wages of the labouring men here is 8s. per week; but there are many, who are out of employ, who would be glad to work for less; indeed there are several instances where they do work for considerably less than 8s. One case I will mention, that of a working man at a quarry; he is digging stones at the rate of 5d. per yard; and he says, he can only dig two yards per day. The master of this person is a protectionist farmer."

We could increase these extracts, but we have already exceeded our limits. It is well, however, to place on record the decisive contradiction which the actual state of the rural labourers affords to the assertions of the monopolists.

THE LEAGUE AND THE ANTI-LEAGUE.

The following paragraphs, from the Wilts Independent, place in strong contrast the desire for Free Trade and the affection for monopoly, as existing amongst the "protected" labourers of Wiltshire. We learn:

"OGBOURNE ST. GEORGE.—A public meeting of labourers was held in this village on Monday evening last, at 7 o'clock, for the purpose of considering the best means of supporting the labourers' petition, for the northern division of the county, for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. Notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, upwards of 300 people were assembled, and the business having been explained to them, a resolution in favour of Free Trade, and to promote the object of the petitioners, was unanimously agreed on. The petition received nearly 100 signatures before the meeting broke up."

A medical friend in that neighbourhood informs us that "the typhus fever always prevails at Og. bourne." This arises from the wretchedness of the population.

Again;

"A CONTRAST.—In the little village of Ogbourne St. George, the protectionists have been doing all they could the week before last against the Anti-Corn-Law advocates, and after a hard struggle have got their petitions to both Houses of Parliament signed by eight persons! The second signature was that of an old woman! On the 26th inst., about six o'clock in the evening, the rain falling in torrents, notice was given, by the bellman going round the village, that a meeting would be held that evening at seven o'clock, near the Shoemakers' Arms, to sign a petition to Parliament for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws; when not less than 300 people assembled, and after being addressed on the subject, sixty-six labourers, out of a total of eighty-eight living in the village, signed the petition."

This needs no comment. The same indifference to protection also exists in the western part of the county:

"The protectionists of Colerne have been engaged for the last two or three days endeavouring to procure signatures to some of their hole and corner petitions to Parliament. The gentlemen who received this document from their Chippenham friends, not liking to be seen taking an active part, employed the police constable, as it was thought the importance of his office might influence some of the small freeholders. Their expectations were, however, disappointed, as he was obliged to return the petitions with something less than twenty names to them; not one-fourth of the signatures they obtained were electors, and three or four of them declared they thought it was some parish business or they would not have signed them! The parishioners think the police constable would have been better employed looking after the property of those who are forced to find the money to pay him, than running about with pro-corn-law petitions. It is reported that some of the new police, for want of better employment, officiate as understrappers to the game-keepers, and are nightly employed in watching game."

We recommend the following example to all farmers who may be pressed to petition for protection:

"CALNE.—How to sign Pro-Corn-Law Petitions.—A laughable circumstance occurred last week at the Market Table of the Lansdowne Arms Inn, Calne. A worthy farmer, residing in the neighbourhood, having been entrusted with petitions to the Houses of Lords and Commons, in favour of protection, handed them across the table to receive the signature of a brother farmer, who, however, instead of signing them, as was expected, very coolly twisted them up, and, having lighted his pipe, threw the remains of both petitions into the fire, to the very great dismay of the protectionist, and to the great amusement of all the company present."

This farmer must have been a practical wit, for he thus plainly intimated his knowledge of the fact that these protectionist effusions are nothing but smoke!!

"FREE TRADE AT BAMBER BRIDGE.—Mr. Totell, of Bamber Bridge, has this week caused great excitement in the neighbourhood, by fixing a large loaf, stuck on the end of a pole, and labelled 3d., outside of his shop. Mr. T. had also posted up two large placards, with the following:—"Sign immediately the Great County of Lancashire Petition for the total, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws." He has succeeded by this means in obtaining a very large number of signatures to the Free Trade petition. Several gentlemen driving on the road have pulled up to look at so singular a demonstration made under the nose of one of the most ultra-monopolists in the county, which shows that there are Free Traders to be found fearless enough to publicly avow their principles even in the vicinity of Cuerden Hall.—Preston Guardian.

His Lordship the May'r with his golden chain,
And two Gold Sticks, and the Sheriffs twain,
Nine foreign Counts, and other great men
With their orders and stars, to help M or N
To renounce all pomp and vanity.

To paint the maternal Kilmansegg
The pen of an Eastern Poet would beg,
And need an elaborate sonnet;
How she sparkled with gems whenever she stirr'd,
And her head niddle-noddled at every word,
And seem'd so happy, a Paradise Bird
Had nidicated upon it.

And Sir Jacob the Father strutted and bow'd,
And smiled to himself, and laugh'd aloud,
To think of his heiress and daughter—
And then in his pockets he made a grope,
And then, in the fulness of joy and hope,
Seem'd washing his hands with invisible soap,
In imperceptible water.

He had roll'd in money like pigs in mud,
Till it seem'd to have enter'd into his blood
By some occult projection:
And his cheeks, instead of a healthy hue,
As yellow as any guinea grew,
Making the common phrase seem true
About a rich complexion.

The loss of her leg by an accident, and her firm determination to have the artificial substitute of gold, are described with great felicity; we are told,

'Twas a splendid, brilliant, beautiful Leg,
Fit for the Court of Scander-Beg,
That Precious Leg of Miss Kilmansegg!
For, thanks to parental bounty,
Secure from Mortification's touch,
She stood on a Member that cost as much
As a Member for all the County!

We must not omit the exhibition of this precious leg at a fancy-ball, and the jealousy with which it inspired ladies who stood on their proper limbs.

'Twas hard they hinted for flesh and blood,
Virtue, and Beauty, and all that's good,
To strike to mere dross their topgallants—
But what were Beauty, or Virtue, or Worth,
Gentle manners, or gentle birth,
Nay, what the most talented head on earth
To a Leg worth fifty Talents!

But the men sang quite another hymn
Of glory and praise to the precious Limb—
Age, sordid age, admired the whim,
And its indecorum pardon'd—
While half of the young—ay, more than half—
Bow'd down and worshipp'd the Golden Calf,
Like the Jews when their hearts were harden'd.

A Golden Leg! what fancies it fired!
What golden wishes and hopes inspired!
To give but a mere abridgment—
What a leg to leg-bail Embarrassment's serf!
What a leg for a Leg to take on the turf!
What a leg for a marching regiment!

A Golden Leg!—whatever Love sings,
'Twas worth a bushel of "Plain Gold Rings"
With which the Romantic wheedles.
'Twas worth all the legs in stockings and socks—
'Twas a leg that might be put in the Stocks,
N.B.—Not the parish beadle's!

The foreign fortune-hunter who won this prize in the matrimonial lottery, is thus described:

Savage at heart, and false of tongue,
Subtle with age, and smooth to the young,
Like a snake in his coiling and curling—
Such was the Count—to give him a niche—
Who came to court that Heiress rich,
And knelt at her foot—one need say which—
Besieging her Castle of Sterling.

With prayers and vows he open'd his trench,
And plied her with English, Spanish, and French,
In phrases the most sentimental:
And quoted poems in High and Low Dutch,
With now and then an Italian touch,
Till she yielded, without resisting much,
To homage so continental.

There are so many clever hits in the description of the wedding, that we should gladly have quoted the entire, but have only space for the conclusion:

Away! away! they rattled and roll'd,
The Count, and his Bride, and her Leg of Gold!
That faded charm to the charmer!
Away,—through Old Brentford rang the din,
Of wheels and heels, on their way to win
That hill, named after one of her kin,
The Hill of the Golden Farmer!

Gold, still gold—it flew like dust!
It tipp'd the post-boy, and paid the trust;
In each open palm it was freely thrust;
There was nothing but giving and taking!
And if gold could ensure the future hour,
What hopes attended that Bride to her bow'r,
But alas! even hearts with a four horse pow'r
Of opulence end in breaking!

The specimens we have extracted are so likely to induce our readers to procure the work, that we shall not anticipate the catastrophe. But we cannot quit these volumes without recording our tribute of gratitude to the publisher for having given us an opportunity of returning to poems which the world will not allow to die so long as genius is valued, or philanthropy revered.

EFFECTS OF SIR ROBERT PEEL'S ANNOUNCEMENT.—In Ireland, bacon has fallen 4s. and ham 2s. since Sir Robert Peel's new tariff arrangements, in anticipation of the reduction of duty on those articles.—Preston Guardian.

THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.—ANOTHER SMOCK-FROCKED MEETING IN WILTSHIRE.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

The farmers and landlords of Wiltshire have met and spoken—the labourers are holding their assemblies in turn. On Tuesday night last, a moonlit meeting of the "protected" hewers of wood and drawers of water in the agricultural county of Wilts was held at Bremhill, an unheard-of little hamlet, lying between the Great Western Railway and the quiet rural town of Calne.

These meetings of the peasantry—originating with themselves—springing from no ducal pints of beer—and at which labourers speak what they actually feel—at which they tell their own stories, interchange the sad history of their slow starvation—are very curious signs of these changing times. Who would have thought, a year or two back, of men in smock-frocks—the hedges and ditchers, the wielders of spades and hoes—meeting together; not, unhappily, over good dinners, but in the bleak air of a winter's night—to denounce protection—to accuse it of keeping them hungry—to call the Corn Laws "accursed?" And on Tuesday night women spoke as well as men. It was no ordinary public meeting that. Those who composed it knew nothing of the conventional rules of such assemblies. Hunger was the requisition which brought them together. Women were hungry as well as men, and they did not see why they should not try to bring about better times—fuller dinners.

The meeting originated entirely with the working-men. Every influence was brought to bear, first to prevent its taking place, and then to keep the labourers from attending it.

The reverend incumbent of the parish did his best to put the affair down. I speak from hearsay—if I am wrong, the reverend gentleman may correct me; but I was informed that he first applied to the superintendent of the rural police to know whether the people could not be prevented from gathering; that, failing in this, he succeeded in procuring the attendance of a great number of constables in private clothes, to be ready to disperse the meeting should the slightest confusion take place; and finally, that he told the man who went about with the bills announcing the affair, that he (the parson) would get him sent out of the country. These were the stories I was greeted with on every side at Bremhill. I may add, that the reverend gentleman is a fox-hunting successor of the apostles.

Not a bit behind the clergyman were the farmers in their attempts to gag the unfortunate labourers. Strenuous efforts were made to keep them back, and threats freely used. I know, on the best authority, that two tenant farmers were particularly active: Mr. Jeffreys, of Side-row Park, told his labourers that he would dismiss every one of them who went to the meeting; and Mr. Henry, of Preston, threatened his unfortunates with dismissal if they did not sign a protection petition now being hawked about. They refused to a man; and to a man attended at Bremhill.

The character of the speeches was peculiar; they were simply statements; little or no argument was used. Each labourer and labourer's wife told the details of their domestic economy. There was little or no variation in the story. Families of from four to twelve persons, wages at an average of 8s. a-week for the father, eked out in some cases by the "twopences a-day" received by his boys. As for food, all they had was potatoes, and, as one of the speakers strikingly phrased it, "stark naked bread." The proceedings went off very quietly. One attempt there was to create a disturbance made by a man, a Chartist, I believe from London, who called himself Gale. He claimed, as a working man, to be heard, and commenced a long tirade against machinery, full of the usual crude, half-understood positions usually taken up by men of his way of thinking. His exhortations, however, to charge, not the Corn Laws, nor any laws, but the threshing and dressing machines with their misery, was groaned down by the multitude with a promptness which did them very great credit, and the Gale got down as suddenly as it had arisen. One of the speakers afterwards charged this man with being the agent of the monopolists sent down to disturb the meeting. No reply was made to this imputation. But one spirit pervaded the speakers and listeners—down with monopoly! The women absolutely shrieked out, and the allusions they now and then made to hungry, crying children, produced the greatest sensation. The crowd kept up a running fire of comment and sympathetic remarks, speaking in more of a conversational than an oratorical character. The labourers generally expressed themselves tolerably well, of course with a strong Wiltshire accent and abundance of provincial solecisms, but by no means in a dialect akin in the extent of its patois to what one hears in Yorkshire or Somerset. At all events they were easily made out. I shall try to preserve something of the simplicity of the style, to which, however, the pronunciation gave a character I cannot convey.

I have said that Bremhill is a petty hamlet, lying not far from the town of Calne. Around it stretches a rich, gently undulating country; meadow and field, hedge-row and clump of trees, spreading far away—a fair expanse of greenery. Here coppice wood crowns the ridges of the hills—there they merge into breezy upland downs. Farm houses and cottages cluster in the hollows; and now and anon you observe the spire of the village church rising from its old embowering trees. Altogether, it is a pleasant and right English scene. Would that those who live upon it should share some little of the apparent riches of the soil!

Bremhill is a mere cluster of houses. You enter a narrow straggling street, or rather one which would be straggling were it long enough. The cottages which form it seem comfortable, their walls cleanly whitewashed, their roofs snug thatch. The place is very quiet, and a passing vehicle draws many a curious face to the little-paned windows. Proceed some score of paces along the street, and it spreads out into a species of oblong square, or what, if there be a market held there, would be the market-place. An old stone cross rises in the centre. The cottages, most of them with their gable ends turned to the way, are clustered irregularly round. A foot-path leads you across a stile, through the churchyard and by the church, with its square old Gothic tower and buttressed aisle, clad in green festoons of ivy. From among the graves you have a far-extended view of the swelling ridges about Marlborough and Devizes, enclosing the "Vale of the White Horse." Close to the church, in a neat Elizabethan cottage, dwells the Rev. Mr. Bowles, of "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers" memory. The "gentle sonneteer" is now, of course, a veteran one. Retracing our steps to the main and only street of the hamlet, we find it narrowing again into a continuation of the crooked lane by which we entered, stretching down a rather steep declivity, and losing itself amid hedges and clumps of trees.

It was already night when I arrived at Bremhill—an intensely cold, but beautifully clear and serene night. The sky was cloudless, not a breath stirred amid the leafless branches, and the full moon showed the vast panorama of fairly undulating country around, dimly sleeping in its radiance. It was a splendid night for out-of-doors work. "Providence," said a labourer to me, "Providence be with us surely—it was just such a night when we were at Goatscote."

In the centre of the open space before mentioned, close to the stone cross, a rude tent—the canvass stretched upon stakes roughly cut from the hedge—was erected for the reporters. A bench for the speakers stood before it; and when I arrived, I found both surrounded by a group of peasantry—men, women, and children. Every moment fresh parties arrived from different farms. Some of them had trudged ten or twelve miles, and this after a hard day's work in the fields. It was curious to see the groups—the men with their smock-frocks showing like white moving patches in the moonlight—making their way from all sides—appearing from the narrow streets—gliding across the churchyard—to the place of meeting. The women, generally, wore cloaks and bonnets. The men appeared a gaunt, raw-boned set—the women pinched and care-worn.

The proceedings commenced soon after seven, when there were probably about 1500 persons present—clustered in a dense mass round the stone cross and the canvass tent. A labourer, Job Gingle, took the chair—that is to say, perched himself on one of the higher stone steps which supported the cross, thus forming a sort of apex to the pyramidal group which clustered round it. Then by the flicker of a morsel of candle, held by himself, he proceeded to read the bill calling the meeting together.

This had a novel effect. The swartly, strongly marked features of the man—his white smock-frock, and oddly-shaped felt hat—seen every moment in a new light, as the slight currents of air stirring, caused the flame to wave and flicker—made up quite a novel picture of a chairman. The crowd round listened with attention as he read, with some little hesitation, the following placard:

"DISTRESS OF THE PEOPLE—FREE TRADE."

"A public meeting will be held at the Dumf Post, Bremhill, on Tuesday, 10th February, 1846, at half-past seven o'clock in the evening, for the purpose of taking into consideration the distress of the people, and of petitioning Parliament for a total repeal of the Corn Laws. It is earnestly hoped that all who are distressed will attend, that their condition may be made known."

Perhaps I may mention here that Mr. Edwards, of Marlborough, was kind enough to help the rustic chairman in the official part of his duties—of which course the poor man had no more notion than a Hindoo of icebergs. After reading the placard, he spoke somewhat as follows:—"My friends—I be a labouring man, I have a wife and seven children in family. My wages at the present time is 8s. a-week (loud cries of "You can't live on that—you can't"). In the beginning of December last I only got 7s. But one week with another I get 8s. That comes, I think, to 20l. 16s. a-year, allowing my wife to earn 9d. a-week, which certain be more than she did for the last three or four year, and seeing that two of my sons earn 2s. a-week, and one of them 1s. 6d., which, if I don't mistake, make together 9l. 2s. a-year, you see we may say we earn altogether 31l. 17s. Now, how do we live on that? First of all I should refer to the expenses of house-rent, that be 3l. 10s.; we can't live without firing, and that be 1s. a-week more; then, friends, there be the shoes bill—shoes for myself 14s., and mending, and my wife 7s. 6d. and mending, and my eldest daughter 7s. and mending, and my eldest son 8s. 6d. and mending, and my next son 7s. 6d. and mending, and the next 6s. and mending, and the next daughter 3s. 6d. and mending, and the next son 3s. and mending, and the next daughter 3s. and mending, and the youngest daughter 2s. and mending, which comes in all, my friends, to 2l. 18s. 6d. ("yes, full that—full that, to all 'o us"). Next thing I refer to is clothing. A smock frock for myself, 3s.; a shirt, 1s. 6d.; a pair of stockings, 1s. 3d.; a smock-frock for my eldest son, 1s. 6d.; his shirt, 1s. 3d.; his stockings, 1s. 1d. My next son has a smock-frock; I pay 1s. for it, besides his stockings. Then my eldest daughter has a frock, 1s.; a pinafore, 4d.; a petticoat, 8d.; a garment (probably a gown), 1s. 6d.; and so on, friends, for stockings and garments for my other daughters and my poor wife. Now, all this makes 2l. 12s. The next thing, my fellow labourers, will be soap; I pay 6d. a-week for it, and perhaps about 3d. a-week for candles, soda, thread, pins, and needles. All this make about 1l. 5s. 11d. a-year. The whole I pay for these articles—and we can't do without them—is about 13l. 13s. 6d.—that is, if I make no mistake—if I do say anything wrong then I will admit to any man a contradiction ("no, no, you be 'ant wrong—you be telling us the truth"). Then, friends, there is left 18l. 4s. or thereabouts, and I ax you if that be sufficient to the support of eight people for one year ("oh, no, no—certainly not—we have no more, and we have hungry bellies")? I say, friends, if you take the 365 days, that will only give 1½d. a-day for us each to live on all with the exception of 1s. (shame, shame). If 1½d. a-day be sufficient to support a labouring man, then I admit any labouring man to come for'ard and be answerable (renewed cries of shame)—and I made no account for breeches, hats, and leggings, which every working man is supposed to find; but I'm very ill off for such clothing (cries of "poor man"), therefore, friends, I do ask you what the Wiltshire labourer has done, or what crimes he has committed, that he be so deprived of necessities—that he be worse off than the convicts on board the hulks (loud cheers)? I have this to tell you, if any person do say that what I have described be sufficient for food for a hard labouring man, or clothing either, or if I have made an extraordinary charge, then I am ready, friends, to be answerable (loud cheers, and cries of "There be plenty more of the same mind"). This I am ready to discuss with any protectionist or monopolist (renewed shouting); for I believe there is nothing as will bring a man sooner to his recollection than hunger (true, true). Then let the Duke of Buckingham rise against this as he may, or Mr. Benett, with his petitions, do what he likes; there is a general distress in this country (hear, hear). Only refer, friends, to the tale of the "Prodigal Son" after wasting his substance in riotous living, he said, "how many hired servants of my father have enough and to spare!" Oh, friends, hunger and distress brought him to his senses, but the hunger and distress which we have been living under so long be owing to the Corn Laws (cheers). They protect us, do they (a voice: "Beant't you one of the Wiltshire protected labourers")? I be protected, but I be starving (hear, hear). And now let any other labouring man come forward and speak (cheers).

Mr. Edwards here shortly addressed the meeting, stating his belief that it was hunger which brought that meeting together, and asking whether their boasted protection had benefited them (cries of "no, no").

Here Mr. Gale's episode commenced, by that gentleman informing the meeting that they were starved by the operation of threshing machines. His interference was met by a general chorus of groaning, and cries of "We come here to speak of the Corn Laws, not of machinery," in the midst of which Mr. Gale disappeared, and was no more seen.

JOHN BATCHELOR, of Pemsy, a labourer, was the next speaker. (The speeches, as I have said, partake of the same character; I need, therefore, after having reported the chairman's at length, only give the distinctive points of the other addresses.) For the last fortnight he had only received 6s. a week. He knew many men with four children who had only 6s. a week and 5s. (shame). For himself, he did not know what to do. He expected to be discharged when he got home for having come to the meeting (a voice: "Come to me, and I will give you 10s.")—(cheers.)—There was only one labourer at Pemsy earning 8s. a week. Well, those with many children—what were they to do? (Oh, what can they do? they be half-starved.) It be them Corn Laws, them cursed Corn Laws, which made bread dear. The poor man must labour, and the farmer could not afford to pay, all through the Corn Laws (hear, hear). The repeal and small farms for large ones—that was what they wanted. He had been employed like a horse in drawing a cart (shame). Yes, but he had; he had pulled it more than twelve miles a day, and it was fully a ton weight (shame, shame). He was one of five men yoked to the cart. That was the way protection used them. Let them hold up their hands, then, for its destruction, root and branch. This was the resolution he proposed (I give it et literatim): 1. "Resolved that this meeting is satisfied from experience that one general distress prevails among the laboring classes that the Corn Laws have failed to give employment to the agricultural labourers and in the opinion of this meeting they ought forthwith to be repealed" (loud cheers greeted the resolution).

GEORGE CHIVERS, of Winterburn, seconded it. He did it because he had not bread enough to eat ("there be many like you.") He had sometimes 6s., and sometimes 7s. a week.

The resolution was duly carried.

HENRY DREW, of Lockeridge, in the parish of Overton, proposed the next resolution. His speech was, omitting repetitions, nearly as follows: I am a labourer myself, and have four children, and my earnings be 8s. a-week, that is, when I am in constant work; that is the rate of wages in the neighbouring villages generally. Some of my neighbours and relatives have three, and four, and five, and six children in family, and how they live, and how we all live, I can't tell. (Bad enough—bad enough.) Let us have Free Trade. (Yes, yes.) Let us pray to Almighty God to influence the Queen and the nobility to utterly destroy the Corn Laws, which make bread dear to us poor! If all the misery, friends, in the world, was put in three lots, the Corn Law misery would be the biggest (Aye, aye). I say it is the worst; I feel it. I have not had a bellyful of victuals now for these seven weeks (loud groans). I say that the state of things is so, that a poor man can get nothing more—if he gets that—than a piece of stark naked bread, and perhaps a few 'tatoes (hear, hear). It was God's mercy which sent a mild winter for us to have a few greens—that kept many from dying of hunger, for the 'tatoes are gone. I do say that we be in a sad state. What is for us to eat? (a voice: There should be Polish wheat and wheat from Ohio—(cheers). The speaker concluded by reading the following resolution: 2. "Resolved that this meeting pledge itself to do all in its power to promote the petition of the agricultural labourers of North Wiltshire for a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws."

CHARLES KINGELL, of Preston, parish of Hillmartin, seconded the resolution. I am, he said, one of your protected labourers. I have seven children; the eldest is 19 years of age, and he earns 8d. a day. This is protection (cries of "shame"). Well, he gives it to me—but it don't pay all his keep—I have to give him washing and lodging. I have a wife and six other children. I have a lad 10 years of age, working for twopence a-day. I labour myself for 8s. This is my condition (cries of "down with protection"). The speaker here entered into a detail of his domestic expenses, which was nearly similar to that given by the chairman. Whoever says that the Wiltshire labourer is well fed and well clothed says what is not true (hear, hear). The protection they talk of is no protection to us, or to the farmer. Many a night this winter I have lain awake for hours, and tumbled in my bed for want of food. ("There be many like you. There's many a man the same.") A female voice: "Aye, and woman, too." Friends, I second the resolution. It was carried by acclamation.

A female then stood forward to speak. She was a middle-aged woman, dressed in a long grey cloak, and old bonnet, and she partly read what she had to say by the light which the chairman held—partly spoke it fluently enough.

My name, she began, is Lucy Simpkins. I am from Preston. I am the wife of a labouring man. I have had seven children, all born in lawful wedlock. There are five living—two I buried. I have a boy seven years of age. He works for 3d. a-day; but he can't keep himself entirely on that, and the rest of the family must be supported from my husband's wages. No boy, friends, of seven years of age could keep himself on 3d. a day (cries of "It be a't likely"). Well, we can't do with less than seven gallons of bread, and we pay 8d. for it, and that is a little allowance for eight people to live seven days on (true). We are forced to go about on hungry bellies after we rise in the morning, and it is very hard to have poor dear little children, who don't know anything about the protection that makes bread dear, crying for food and you nothing to give them (hear, hear). Yes, and when I was confined last, I had nothing to eat from one o'clock one day until four o'clock the next day (shame, shame). I wished I had a good jug of gruel; but a poor labouring woman like myself came in, and said, "I have brought you something to eat—bread with sugar on it. I had no cheese, or I would have brought that" (shame). And recollect, neighbours, this is under a protecting law (a voice—"I am a witness to the truth of what she says"). My husband is not a drunkard, nor anything of the kind, but a good husband to me, and a good father to his children, but he can't make his money go farther than it will (hear, hear). Many a Monday morning I say to him, "Well, how be we to get through this week, we have no food and no fire." Well, but Saturday comes, and we have got through—but how, I don't rightly know. We manage it somehow. But that a't living (no more it be). What will 8s. a week do among so many people (groans)? I have been obliged to tell my children that I would beat them if they cried for hunger (you were forced to do so, poor woman).

Yes indeed I was; but if Free Trade will make bread cheap, then I want Free Trade (loud cheers).

MARY FERRIS, of Charlott, Bremhill, here stood forward with a resolution to propose. It was a somewhat singular one, but, nothing daunted, she read it as follows (I again copy verbatim):—"That a public meeting of females be held to give the wives of the agriculture labourers an opportunity of making known the distress which they have experienced under the Corn Laws" (loud cries of "Free Trade for ever!" greeted this extraordinary resolution). The proposer went on: We poor women do suffer much. I have been forced to go and cut nettles to boil for my children (shame). I have picked sacks of chaffuck (or some such name—the local term for a species of wild plant) to give my children to eat (groans). Somebody told me that chaffucks would kill my children; but I thought to myself that it would be as well to die with a bellyful, as to famish for want of a bellyful ("So it be"). We have eight to feed in family, and when we get our money, that is, 8s. a week, there are ten things to be done with it (hear, hear, hear). Then, may God bless the Queen, and give us cheap food. It is not the dressing machines, but the dear bread that we complain of. We be very bad off indeed; and I ax any one here to say if what I spoke is false (No, no). I will stop now to let others speak.

Here the resolution, although it had not been seconded, was declared carried.

WM. COLE, of Calne, said a few simple words in the strain of those who preceded him, and JACOB WILKINS, of Goatacre, spoke next. There were no less than "seven folks lying about Goatacre" (that is, out of work), and those who were in work only got 7s. a week. He had nothing to do at all, because the farmers had nothing to do. He had been to the whole of them. There was no work, and very little food.

JOHN HILLIER, of Goatacre: I have a wife and seven (or five, we could not make out which) children. I could not support my eldest son, and I put him in the union (shame). The young lad he was willing to go, for he knew our distress; but I did not like him leaving us, and oh, his mother was terrible loth to part with him (there was one loud general groan). I have had very much distress. We want protection done away with. It does us no good. Let a man protect himself (cheers). After the Goatacre meeting our steward came round to us, but instead of asking us poor how we lived, he went to ask at the farm-houses (groans). What is the good of that? Why didn't he come to ourselves, if he wanted to know the truth (hear).

Mr. EDWARDS again shortly addressed the meeting with reference to the discomfited Mr. Gale, charging him with "having been sent down by the Duke of Richmond or other monopolists to disturb the meeting." The labourers would meet Gale if he chose, and discuss the machinery question on Calne Green on Tuesday evening. Here was a challenge to him, and to anybody who chose to accept it.

W. COLE reiterated the challenge; but Mr. Gale manifested no anxiety to pick up the gauntlet; and Cole went on to propose a vote of thanks to that portion of the public press, which had advocated the people's fight to cheap food.

This vote having been carried, with a friendly hint to the Devizes Gazette (the local Tory paper), that there was no use in falsifying the proceedings, three hearty cheers were given for Cobden and Bright, and the meeting was declared over; those who formed it quietly dispersing to return to their scattered habitations.

Thus ended this very remarkable labourer's meeting.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

DIRECTORS.
A. W. Poulton, Esq., Samuel Harrison, Esq.,
Richard Potter, Esq., Dr. James Carlisle,
William Leavies, Esq., John Gadsby, Esq.,
William Wilson, Esq., H. Hall, Esq., Exbridge,
R. G. Welford, Esq., Richard Burnett, Esq.,
Sidney Smith, Esq., J. Watson, Esq.

TREASURER.
Dr. Thomas Price, 7, Highbury-terrace, Islington.
George Thompson, Esq., 6, Waterloo place.
Captain Cogan, Upper Mill, Hammersmith.

BANKERS.
Messrs. Prescott, Grote, & Co.

SECRETARY.
Josh. Trimey, Esq., 26, Chancery-lane.
Mr. Frederick Farrand, Priory Villa, Peckham.

PROSPECTUSES may be obtained, gratis, on application at the Society's Offices, East Temple Chambers, Whitechapel-street, Fleet-street. The Rules (6d. each) are now ready, and may be had as above.
Persons desirous to join the Society are requested to make application immediately.

The Society's Offices will be open for receiving subscriptions and the general transaction of business, every Tuesday and Friday evenings, from 6 to 9 o'clock.

THE FREE TRADE INVESTMENT ASSOCIATION.—

A Public Meeting will be held on Thursday evening next, the 19th inst., at the Assembly Room, White Conduit House, Pentonville, when the principles of the Society will be explained, and addresses delivered by
GEO. THOMPSON, Esq.,
DR. THOMAS PRICE, and
SIDNEY SMITH, Esq.

The Chair will be taken at half-past seven o'clock. Persons wishing to join the Society, may give in their names, and pay the entrance fee at the close of the meeting.

POSTSCRIPT.

LONDON, Saturday Morning, February 14, 1846.

While the debate in the House of Commons drags its slow length along, two resistless enemies of the Corn Laws are giving fearful evidence of the dangers that will result from any delay in their abolition. Famine and fever,—advocates more formidable than any monopoly has yet encountered, have commenced their ravages in the South of Ireland. The perilous consequences of protection, so often predicted, are manifested to an extent already great, and rapidly increasing. We have received the report of the Mansion House Committee on Fever, and Dr. Corrigan's very able pamphlet on the fevers which are always found to follow a deficiency of food in Ireland; and we have also before us letters from the principal districts of Munster and Connaught, describing the steady spread of disease and destitution, with the fearful prospect of five months during which this double pressure must be borne. It is a heavy aggravation of this dire calamity that the protective system stimulates the export of food from this starving people. Stores and warehouses are crammed with grain, for export to England, while multitudes are perishing for want of sustenance in sight of these plenished granaries. Relief must be immediate, or ruin will be complete. Under such circumstances, the public may well be weary of protracted discussion, when the visitations of Providence have predestined and necessitated the ultimate decision. Proprietors of boroughs, and traders in the votes of their tenantry, may "do what they like with their own,"—may dismiss members of Parliament as they would their scullions, and select representatives with as little ceremony as they hire grooms; but there can be no trifling with the sufferings of a starving people,—there can be no compromise with the pangs of disease, and the presence of death. Mr. T. Baring, the rejected of London and chosen of Huntingdon, stands alone in his proposal of compromise; he is the only person who deems it possible to have a capitulation with Famine, and to negotiate terms with Pestilence. He proposes to stand between the living and the dead; not that the plague should be stayed, but that some bargain should be struck to regulate the amount of future victims. What are the lives of a few thousands, more or less, when compared with the value of mortgages and settlements? In vain do the piercing cries of the labourers of Wiltshire strike the ear of Mr. Thomas Baring. Were the fearful vision described by Famine, in Coleridge's Eclogue, realised before his view—

"A baby beat its dying mother,
I had starv'd the one and was starving the other,"

he would propose a compromise, and offer the demon half its prey, rather than allow the behests of Protection to remain unsatisfied. Lord Morpeth justly declared that the time for compromise has gone past for ever; it would not be endured by the people of England—it would be destruction to the people of Ireland. The ground on which the protectionists stand is crumbling beneath their feet, and nothing but a precipitate retreat can save them; a step in advance would hurl them into the abyss; a maintenance of their post would only last until the sap reaches the ground beneath their feet. In either case their fate must be the same—they fall never to rise again. Defeat is no longer to be dreaded; all our danger now arises from delay; what is to be done must be done quickly. Imperfections must be endured when time is to be gained. There will be leisure for discussing amendments when the imminent peril is averted. Save the patient first, and then discuss the regimen by which his health may be preserved for the future.

We have given reports of the most remarkable speeches as yet delivered in this long debate, but we feel that they lose much of their interest when compared with the more eloquent cry of distress which daily swells louder and deeper on the wind. The arguments of misery are not to be misunderstood; hunger is a sharp logician; the reasoning of fever conducts very rapidly to a conclusion. It was said of an obdurate generation, "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead;" but we live when men require millions of their fellow-countrymen to be added to the dead before their minds can be open to tardy conviction. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!"

MR. COBDEN.—The numerous inquiries addressed to us from every part of the country, render it necessary that we should inform our readers of the recovery of Mr. Cobden from his recent and severe indisposition. He is now so far convalescent, that he will probably resume his Parliamentary duties next week, though it is still doubtful whether he will be able to take a part in the present debate. His illness arose from his having fallen asleep in a railway carriage, the window of which was open, on his return from Manchester last week. The exhaustion of his powers produced by his recent labours increased the predisposition to illness; he was attacked by a severe earache and nervous pains in the side of the head, which terminated in an abscess. This has yielded to medical treatment, and is now almost completely reduced. It might almost compensate for such suffering to observe the anxious concern evinced by the public when the fact of his sickness became known; the sympathy was not confined to any party—friends and opponents equally expressed the deepest interest in his health, and have been equally gratified by his restoration.

ORIGIN OF THE LEAGUE.
THE MANCHESTER TIMES of this Day contains a History of the Anti-Corn-Law Movement prior to its being joined by RICHARD COLEMAN.
The paper will be sent post free on the receipt of four penny stamps.
Office, Duncle-place, Manchester.

NEW MUSIC.—New Editions of the FREE TRADE SINGERS' SONGS, dedicated by permission to R. Coleman, Esq., and to be performed at all Free Trade meetings and fairs, now ready in the PIANIST'S No. 65, price 1s. by post, eighteen stamps. Mr. Coleman's autograph permission is seen at the Pianist's No. 67. Paternoster-row, one door from Chesapeake, where may be had No. 30 Pianist, containing the whole opera of Sonnambula, for 2s. The Pianist's No. 65, price 1s. by post, eighteen stamps. The Pianist's No. 65, price 1s. by post, eighteen stamps. The Pianist's No. 65, price 1s. by post, eighteen stamps.

On Tuesday, Demy 8vo, price 10s. 6d. cloth.
THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRADE, or Outlines of a Theory of Profits and Prices; including an Examination of the Principles which determine the Relative Value of Corn, Labour, and Currency. By PATRICK JAMES STIRLING.
Oliver and Boyd, Edinburgh; Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., London.

Just Published, price 1s.
GOD'S LAWS versus CORN LAWS: a Letter to His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury. By a Dignitary of the English Church.
Houlston and Stoneman, 65, Paternoster-row.

Complete in 3 Volumes, price 5s. 6d. each, in cloth.
LECTURES ADDRESSED CHIEFLY TO THE WORKING CLASSES. By W. J. FOX.
MUSIC FOR THE MASSES. Price One Penny. THE DAY LABOURERS' SONG.—My Aim is this.—Vide Vine's speech at the Goat-ere Meeting, Jan. 16, 1846.
Charles Fox, 67, Paternoster-row.

IMPORTANT TO TEETOTALERS!
On Monday, March 2, will be published, and printed on good paper, price One Penny, (or stamped, 3s. per annum, No. 1 of THE TEETOTAL TIMES, or MONTHLY TEMPERANCE MESSENGER, containing Original Articles on the History, Nature, Necessity, Advantages, and Progress of Teetotalism. It is intended to enlist the chief talent of the Teetotal Corps in the service of this Periodical, which will be by far the largest and best Temperance paper which has ever appeared. Each Number, though published at One Penny, will contain more matter than is in one number of Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.
Teetotalers! and all who desire correct information on the Temperance question! Remember to send your orders for THE TEETOTAL TIMES, before March 1, either to your own bookseller, or to the Publisher, W. Brittain, Temperance Depot, 11, Paternoster-row.

Price Six Shillings.
COMPENSATION TO THE PEOPLE for Aristocratic Food Laws and Unfair Taxation; or the Influence of Aristocracies on the Condition of Nations. By J. G. MACINTYRE, Esq.
London: Tisher, Son, and Co., and all Booksellers.

CORNER'S NEW HISTORICAL WORKS, for School and Family Reading.
Each History, commencing with the earliest authentic records, is continued to the present time; faithfully portraying, also, the Manners, Customs, and States of Civilisation of the People.
England and Wales; five fine plates, and map, - - - 4s. - - - 3s. 6d.
Ireland; three fine plates, and map - - - 3s. - - - 2s. 6d.
Scotland; three fine plates, and map - - - 3s. - - - 2s. 6d.
France; three fine plates, and map - - - 3s. - - - 2s. 6d.
Spain and Portugal; three plates, and map - - - 2s. 6d.
Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; with two fine plates and map - - - 2s. 6d.
Germany and the German Empire; 3 fine plates, and map - - - 3s. 6d.
Turkey and the Ottoman Empire; 3 fine plates, and map - - - 3s. 6d.
Poland and Russia; with three fine plates, and map - - - 3s. 6d.
Italy and Sicily; with three fine plates, and map - - - 3s. 6d.
Holland and Belgium; with two fine plates, and map - - - 2s. 6d.
The object of these works—peculiarly suited to Schools and Families—is to furnish the reader with a faithful History of each Nation, interspersed with an accurate account of the Religion, Customs, National Characteristics, State of Civilisation, and Domestic Habits of the people, in various periods of their history—to attract the attention of the rising generation by purity of language and clearness of detail; and thus render easy and pleasant the attainment of a knowledge of the leading events of history.
London: Dean and Co., Threadneedle-street; and, by order, of all Booksellers.

Price One Shilling; by post, One and Six.
WHAT TO EAT, DRINK, AND AVOID. Addressed to the Nervous. By R. J. C. GIBSON, M.D., Member of the Royal College of Physicians, &c. Shrewsbury, 23, Paternoster-row, and all Booksellers, or direct from the Author, 21, Arundel-street, Strand.

Just published, price 1s., the Fourth Edition (translated from the Nineteenth French Edition),
CONSTIPATION DESTROYED; or Exposition of natural, simple, agreeable, and infallible means, not only of overcoming, but also of completely destroying habitual Constipation, without using either purgatives or any artificial means whatever (discovery recently made in France by M. Warton), followed by numerous certificates from eminent physicians and other persons of distinction. Free by Post, 1s. 6d.
Sold by James Youens and Co., Ten-dealers, 43, Ludgate-hill, London; and by all Booksellers in the United Kingdom.

READING AND BOOK SOCIETIES.—Now Ready.—
Delivered Gratis, A NEW PLAN for READING and BOOK SOCIETIES throughout the Kingdom. This Plan provides an unlimited supply of Standard Works—all the New Books—and the right of Members to purchase any work desired at one-half the published price, as soon as the first demand has subsided.
Delivered Gratis, and sent post-free to order, enclosing two stamps, addressed to Mr. H. L. LABARRAN, 19, Holles-street, Cavendish-square.
Also the New Catalogue of Duplicates withdrawn from the Library for 1846.
National Tableau of Public Interest, which has been Eight Months in Preparation.
THE Royal Family at Home, consisting of the Queen and Prince Albert caressing their four lovely children. The Grouping and Colouring by Madame Tussaud, the Models and Portraiture by Mr. F. Tussaud, the Costume by Mrs. F. Tussaud. Is now added to the Collection.
—BAZAAR, Baker-street, Portman-square.
"This is one of the best exhibitions in the metropolis."—Times.
Admission, 1s.; Napoleon Rooms, 6d. Open from 11 till 4; and from 7 till 10.

WANTED.—A Good Second-Hand Steam-Engine and Boiler, for 2-horse power, for Agricultural purposes. Address, Box 24, Post Office, Holford.
GYPSUM FOR MANURE.—PEGG, HARPER, and Co., late Robert Pegg and Co., possessing the advantage of large Water power situated near the celebrated Chesham Gypsum quarries, can afford to sell this article on very low terms.—Derby, Feb. 18, 1846.
LUXURY IN SHAVING.
JOHN GOSNELL and CO.'S AMBROSIAL SHAVING CREAM. (Recommended by Prince Albert.) This inestimable shaving cream possesses all the good qualities of the finest Naples Soap, without the disagreeable smell inseparable from that article in a genuine state. It is of a white pearly silvery appearance, produces a creamy lather, which will not dry on the face, and emits in use the delightful aroma of the almond.
In Pots, price 2s. 6d. and 6s.
Perfumers to her Majesty, 12, Three King-coat, Lombard-street, London. Manufacturers of Combs and Brushes of the best quality, and on the most approved principles.

THE PERFECT SUBSTITUTE FOR SILVER.—
The high estimate formed by the public during the ten years RIPPON and BURTON'S chemically purified material has been before it (made into every useful and ornamental article usually made in silver, has called into existence the characteristic purity and durability of silver, has called into existence the deteriorated compounds of "Albata Plate," "Berlin Silver," and other so-called substitutes; they are at best but imitations of the genuine articles manufactured with the view of satisfying the purchaser, by Rippon and Burton, and sold only by them.
Table Spoons and Forks, full size, per dozen - - - 12s. 6d. - - - 12s. 6d.
Desert ditto and ditto - - - 10s. 6d. - - - 10s. 6d.
Tea ditto and ditto - - - 8s. 6d. - - - 8s. 6d.
Gry ditto - - - 8s. 6d. - - - 8s. 6d.
Detailed Catalogues, with engravings, as well as of every Ironmongery article, sent post free.
Rippon & Burton, 39, Oxford-street, corner of Newman-street. Established in Wells-st., 1820.

THE CARE OF THE HAIR may be unceasing, and its cultivation superintended by the most unquestioned skill and judgment, but without a genial growth and condition of the material to which every effort will be fruitless. The most timely and successful that it is possible to exert of art may be converted into luxuriant tresses by the application of which has thus become the indispensable appendage to every fashionable toilet. 6s. 6d. per bottle. No other price is genuine.—Oliver's Balm, 1, Wellington-street, the second house from the Strand, London.
OLIVER'S BALM OF COLUMBIA,

THE BRITISH BUILDING AND INVESTMENT COMPANY was commenced on the 4th September, 1845, in five months enrolled 1250 Shareholders, issued 2500 Shares, and advanced about 50,000 to its Shareholders, for the purchase of Property. Such success is unprecedented in the annals of Building Societies.
Starting with the promise of even greater success, the Directors have much pleasure in announcing the Enrolment of
THE SECOND BRITISH BUILDING AND INVESTMENT COMPANY.
Enrolled under the Act of Parliament, 6 and 7 Wm IV., cap. 32, passed for the encouragement and protection of Building Societies, and established on MacArthur's Simplified and Improved Plan.
Directors.
Mr. William Farrer, Chairman. Mr. Thos. Sheppard, Deputy-Chairman.
W. Anderson, M.R.C.S., 12, Chancery-lane, Myddleton-square.
W. H. Best, 11, Grosvenor-square.
W. Farrer, 20, Charlotte-terrace, Barnsbury-road, Islington.
John Finch, 67, West-street, St. Giles.
William Handley, 34, Chiswell-street, City.
John T. Hind, 32, Cannon-street-road.
Alexander Metcalfe, 16, Long Acre.
Stephen Nicholas, Brewer-street, Clerkenwell.
Thos. Sheppard, 5, Gainsford-place, Barnsbury-road, Islington.
James Staley, Tibberton-square.
Thos. Swift, 2, Upper Ashley-street, Goswell-street.
Henry Underhill, Cross-street, Hatton-garden.

A PUBLIC MEETING will be held in the London Mechanics' Institute Southampton Buildings, Holborn, on Tuesday Evening Feb. 17th, 1846, at Eight o'clock, exact time, to explain the principles and objects of the Company, to enrol Shareholders, and answer inquiries. All Persons desirous of becoming Shareholders, or of obtaining information as to the best mode of procuring Advances—Finances, or neglect of payment reduced to less than one half those usually charged. Four opportunities of making the Monthly payments given instead of one. Shareholders assisted to purchase property at Auctions, the Society paying the deposit. Shareholders may at any time pay off the advance made by the Society, and redeem their Property.
Entrance Fee, 2s. 6d. Monthly Subscription, 10s. per Share. No Redemption Fee. The Entrance Fee only may be paid at this Meeting. The First Subscription will be due in March.
This Society is open to all Persons, Shareholders, to enable them to purchase property. The property so purchased is taken as security for the money advanced. The Tenants of the property purchased are applicable to the repayment of the Money advanced, and in general, will be found sufficient to pay the Subscriptions due to the Society—so that Houses acquired with their own rents, the interest of small sums of money will realise a much larger profit than in the Savings' Bank.
This Society also possesses other great and important advantages, which are peculiarly its own viz: There is no Fine on Withdrawals or Transfers. Interest at Five per Cent. is allowed on every payment. No Bidding or Premiums for Advances—Finances, or neglect of payment reduced to less than one half those usually charged. Four opportunities of making the Monthly payments given instead of one. Shareholders assisted to purchase property at Auctions, the Society paying the deposit. Shareholders may at any time pay off the advance made by the Society, and redeem their Property.
We hold MacArthur's Plan for forming Building Societies to be a decided improvement.—Weekly Dispatch.
He has really simplified and improved the plan on which Building Societies are conducted.—Temperance Intelligencer.
The Prospectus may be obtained, gratis, of any of the Directors, and at the Sussex Hall, 52, Leadenhall-street, City, Coffee Rooms, Exeter-street, Sloane-square; Coffee Rooms, Henry-street, Portland Town; the Mechanics' Institution, 67, Charlotte-street, Portman-market; C. Witcomb, 121, Leadenhall-street; J. H. Hanway-street, Oxford-street; J. H. Storie, 186, High Holborn; or of the Manager, Mr. J. R. MacArthur, 3, Tavistock-terrace, London Hospital, or the Secretary, Mr. K. Jessurun, 17, Clifton-street, Finsbury, London; or at the Office of the Company, 3, Ivy-lane, St. Paul's, from 10 to 4 o'clock.

DEANE'S DOUBLY-REGISTERED STULOS COFFEE-POT.—The strictly scientific construction of this article involves two simple processes, which, by their rapid and certain action, secure a run of rich, boiling, aromatic, and brilliant coffee within five minutes. When the cylinder is filled with boiling water, the latter drives out all the cold air from the body into which the extract instantly follows. When the cylinder is filled the second time, and is raised to the top of the pot, the tall column of small diameter is, by a well-known law of pneumatics, instantly captured into the pot below, and the coffee is at once ready for use.
GOSNELL and JOHN DEANE, opening to the Monument, 46, King William-street, London-bridge.

STOOPING OF THE SHOULDERS AND CONTRACTION OF THE CHEST, entirely prevented, and gently and effectually removed in Youth, Middle Age, and Gentlemen, by the occasional use of the Improved Elastic Chest Expander, which is light, simple, easily employed, outwardly or invisibly, without any uncomfortable restraint, or impediment to exercise. Sent per post, by Mr. A. BISHOP, 8, Old Mary-at-Late, St. Paul's, Covent Garden, London, or full particulars on receiving a postage stamp.

FENDERS, STOVES, AND FIRE-IRONS.—Bright steel fenders, 4 feet, from 30s each; rich bronzed scroll do., with steel bar, 10s 6d; iron fenders, 3 feet, 4s 6d; wrought iron kitchen fenders, 3 feet, 4s 6d; bright register stoves, with bronzed ornaments, and two sets of bars, from 10s; bed-room register stoves, 2 feet, 16s; fire-irons for chimneys is 9d per set; handsome do., with out, 1s 6d. The money returned for every article not approved of. Detailed catalogues, with engravings, sent per post free.
Rippon and Burton's Stock of General Furnishing Ironmongery is literally the largest in the world. They regret they cannot employ any language which will convey an adequate impression of its variety and extent; they therefore invite purchasers to call and inspect it.—39, Oxford-street (corner of Newman-street). Established in Wells-street, 1820.

THE GOLDEN FLAX CRAVAT COLLAR.—"THE SINGLE BANDS" may be worn with the customary cravat—giving increased warmth and compactness, by substituting linen bands in place of the unsightly and troublesome tape strings, and avoiding the unseemly necktie and irritation of the usual collar at the back of the neck, by one linen band passing through the other.
"THE DOUBLE BANDS" need no additional cravat—in one article is combined both collar and cravat.
In both kinds "The Purest White" is obtained by the use, exclusively, of "THE GOLDEN FLAX" linen.
N.B.—Each cravat collar bears the name of "John Paterson, London, registered 29th August, 1845," and may be obtained at any of the principal hosiers and drapers in London and the country.

JONES'S £4. 4s. SILVER LEVER WATCHES
Warranted not to vary more than half a minute per week, are selling at 1s. 10d. per watch, opposite Berners-street. They combine the trustworthiness of a mathematical instrument with the ornament of taste. On receipt of a Post-office order for 1s. above the price, a Watch will be sent free to any part of the kingdom. Read Jones's "Sketch of Watch Work," sent free for a 2d. stamp.

OUTFITS TO AUSTRALIA, INDIA, AND THE COLO-NIES. Parties leaving England will find it to their advantage to purchase their Outfits from J. MONAGHAN and CO., 165, Fenchurch-street, City, where a large assortment of Shirts, Clothing, Hosiery, Gaiters, Merino Under Shirts, &c., adapted for each particular colony, as well as for the voy age, is kept ready for immediate use, and at prices far more reasonable than usually charged for the same article.
Bedding, Military Accoutrements, Cabin and Camp Furniture of every description. Lists, with Prices asked, forwarded by post.

POLISH YOUR PIANOFORTES, YOUR CABINET AND FRENCH-POLISHED FURNITURE WITH ADAM'S PATENT COMPOSITION.
Indispensable to the house of every Englishwoman should be this invaluable preparation. Enology on its many excellent qualities is now unnecessary; suffice it to say, that with a little of the usual labour, French-polished Furniture, Piano-fortes, Mahogany Goods, &c., are cleaned and restored to their original brilliancy, and a polish equal to French quickly imparted to all other descriptions of Furniture. The enormous sale of this article in all parts of the world, sufficiently proves its merits. Sold in bottles at 1s. 2d. and 2s. each, by the proprietors, Warner, Brothers, 22, Abchurch-lane, Fenchurch-square, London, and Portenello, Sheffield, Fisher and Co., upholsterers, Finsbury-square; Wilcoxon and Co., Monument-yard, Barchy and Sons, Farringdon-street; Edwards, St. Paul's Church-yard, and by most Oilmen, Furnishing Ironmongers, Chemists, and Upholsterers in the United Kingdom.

SELLING OFF CARPETS.
LUCK, KENT, and CUMMING, beg to inform the Nobility and Gentry, as well as their friends and the public, that they have received their large stock of Carpets from Curzon's Hall, London Wall, to their long-established Warehouse, 1, REGENT STREET, WATERLOO PLACE, opposite Howell and James's, and to 98, HATTON GARDEN, HOLBORN, where they trust that Patronage will be continued which they have enjoyed for upwards of thirty years. A considerable portion of their large stock of BRUSSELS, KIDDERMINSTER, and other Carpets, to be sold at a Great Reduction. In addition to Carpeting, they have at their West End Establishment, a large Stock of Chintzes, Damasks, Tabourets, &c., well worthy of attention. A splendid Carpet, of British manufacture, 20-3 by 15, with a centre and border, at less than cost price.

NUMBER ONE, ST. PAUL'S CHURCHYARD.—
As real goodness is not helped by praise, nor injured by reproach, so the BLACK TBA, at 4s. 6d. per lb., sold by JAKIN and COMPANY, owes its popularity solely to its intrinsic excellence.
Orders from the country forwarded Carriage Free.

BOTANIC WATER and BEAR'S GREASE.—When the hair is becoming thin and falling off, the only effectual remedy, besides shaving the head, is the use of the two above named articles, applied alternately—the botanic water to cleanse the roots from scurf, and as a stimulant, and the bear's grease as a nourisher. If any further evidence was required of the virtues of bear's grease for renovating and preserving the hair, Mr. Catlin's account of the quantity used, and the length of hair obtained by some of the North American Indians, would be a sufficient answer.—ROSS and SONS, 119 and 120, Bishopsgate-street, who first introduced the use of bear's grease in this country, and who fat and kill the animals, recommend the public to purchase none other but with their names and address printed on the pot, or the chances are they are obtaining a spurious article. All vegetable oils applied to the hair are worse than useless.

BERDOE'S WATERPROOF OVER-COATS, and OUTSIDE GARMENTS of all kinds—guaranteed to exclude any rain whatever. More than seven years' extensive trial of these well-known garments, has enabled the public to form its own opinion respecting them: what that is, is best shown by their established and constantly extending sale, and the numerous competitors their success has produced, some of whom employ other similar attempts to mislead, actually attach to their garments W. B.'s name and label. General price from 40s. to 50s. An extensive variety kept to select from, or made to order at a day's notice. All sloop and inferior goods strictly excluded. W. BERDOE, Tailor, Over-coat Maker, and Waterproofing, 69, Cornhill, north side.

HEAL and SON'S LIST OF BEDDING, containing a full description of weights, sizes, and prices, by which purchasers are enabled to judge the articles that are best suited to make a good set of bedding. Sent free, by post, on application to their establishment.—Heal & Son Feather Dressers and Bedding Manufacturers, 195, Tottenham-court-road.

BALDNESS.—The reproductive powers of ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL are constantly and surprisingly shown in cases of Baldness of the Head from whatever cause arising, proved by numerous testimonials open for inspection at the P.roprietors, in eliciting, unerringly, from the latent stem the active progression of vitality, so that in numerous instances where other specific remedies have been tried in vain, ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL has superseded the ornaments of art by re-instating in full plenitude of beauty the permanent graces and utilities of nature.
CAUTION.—The words "ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL" are on the Wrapper of each bottle.
Sold by them at 20, Hatton Garden, London, and by Chemists and Perfumers.
* * All others are FRAUDULENT IMITATIONS!

A CHAT IN THE 'CHANGE;
Or a "Stop" to Rumour—not to Payment.
Two gentlemen were seen to range
The area of the New Exchange;
They'd often met each other there,
On business and the like affair;
And oft while pacing to and fro
They'd have a bit of chat, you know.
Sometimes the theme on which they'd fix
Were Church affairs and politics;
At other times discussion turn'd
Where trade and commerce were concern'd.
Twas thus upon the day in question,
They'd many topics for discussion,
But that which form'd the greater part
Was MOSES' celebrated Mart.
The part where we were staying at Enabled us to hear the chat;
And as we think it worth narration
We'll let you know
THE CONVERSATION.
"I say," said one, the first who spoke,
I'm told, without a word of joke,
That MOSES' house—that Mart for raiment,
Has positively stopp'd its payment.
I trust 'tis some unfounded notion.
For, sir, 'twould be a sad commotion
What are your thoughts upon the matter?"
Dye you think it's truth, or merely chatter?"
THE REPLY.
"What!" said the other, rather "poppy,"
MOSES and SON, the Mart's stopp'd?
Don't name such stuff to me, nor don't!
I won't believe it—that I won't!
I give at once a contradiction
To such a base, malignant fiction.
For instance—MOSES' deal with me—
And purchase most extensively
I've bargain'd with that house for years,
And never found the least arrears.
No—as a merchant, I can say
They're always ready cash to pay;
As soon as goods are taken in
They're always ready with the "tin."
Excuse my joke—I can but laugh
At such a piece of trifling chat.
This rumour, doubtless, came from lips
Belonging to pretended "snips."
Who would rejoice, with all their hearts,
To "stop" outright the Mart of Mars.
The tailors and such competition
Has plac'd them in a sad position,
And finding that they can't compete
With times so mighty—so complete—
They split their spite in sore vexation.
And force a silly fabrication.
These "little fellows" of the trade
Have many a puny effort made,
And finding that won't do, they try
At fabricating—what?
I tell you what—I'd stop their "clocks"—
I'd put the cane about their backs.
But why should I beset you out?
MOSES' enjoy the fun no doubt,
I guess, and I have heard his sides—
They've laugh'd enough to hurt their sides.

LIST OF PRICES.
READY MADE.
Beaver Tasslonis - - - £ 8 6
Chesterfields or Cordonnets - - - 0 10 6
D'Orray's, Athol's, Embroke, and every description of winter coats - - - 1 5 0
Boy's winter Vests in every style - - - from 0 6 6
Winter trousers, lined - - - 0 4 6
Doekins - - - 0 10 6
Dress Coats, edged - - - 1 0 0
Frock Coats - - - 0 10 6
Roll collar Vests - - - 0 1 6
Double breasted ditto - - - 0 2 6
Boy's Hussar and Tunic Suits - - - 0 18 6
Boy's winter Trousers - - - 0 9 0
Boy's winter Vests - - - 1 6 0
MADE TO MEASURE.
Winter Coats in every style and shape, handsomely trimmed - - - 1 5 0
Milled Cloth Great Coats, velvet collar and cuffs - - - 1 12 0
Tweed Wrappers - - - 0 18 6
Ditto Trousers - - - 0 12 6
Winter Trousers, in all the new patterns - - - 0 18 6
Deekin Trousers - - - 0 10 6
Best, or Dress Trousers - - - 1 0 0
Dress Coats - - - 1 12 0
Ditto, best quality made - - - 1 12 0
Frock Coats - - - 1 13 0
Ditto, best quality made - - - 0 8 0
Cuskinere Vests - - - 0 8 6
Satin, plain or fancy - - - 0 12 6
Boy's Hussar and Tunic Suits - - - 0 18 6
Boy's Great Coats - - - 0 14 6

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.
A new work, entitled "Habillment Hall," with full directions for self-measurement, may be had on application, or forwarded post free. Mournings to any amount can be had at five minutes' notice, at the following prices:
Men's Suits, dress coat, vest, and trousers - - - from 1 18 0
Ditto, jacket, vest, and trousers - - - from 0 18 0
IMPORTANT. Any article purchased or ordered, if not approved of, exchanged, or returned, at the discretion of the Proprietors.
J. MONAGHAN and CO., Tailors, Wholesale and Retail Woollendrapers, Outfitters, and General Warehousemen, 154, Minorities, and 86, Aldgate, City, opposite the Church.

CAUTION. J. MONAGHAN and CO. are obliged to guard the public against imposition, having learned that the unscrupulous falsehood of being connected with them, or it's the same concern, has been resorted to in many instances, and for obvious reasons. They have no connexion what-with a y other establishment in or out of London; and those who do desire genuine "cheap" clothing should to prevent disappointment, call or send to 154, Minorities, or 86, Aldgate, opposite the Church.
N.B. No business transacted at this Establishment from sunset on Friday to sunset on Saturday, when business is resumed till twelve o'clock.

Printed at the Whitefriars Printing-office, Bouverie-street, in the precinct of Whitefriars, in the City of London, by James Gosney, printer of Number 7, Ridgway-place, Roper-street, in the County of Middlesex, and also of Number 4, Paribell-place, Chesham hill-road, in the parish of Manchester, in the County of Lancaster, and published at Number 67, Fleet street, in the parish of St. Dunstan-in-the-West, in the City of London, by ABRAHAM WALTER PATERSON, of Number 67, Fleet-street storeside.—Saturday, February 14, 1846.

SUPPLEMENT TO THE LEAGUE.

No. 125.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1846.

[GRATIS.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

DEBATE ON THE CORN LAW.

It is unnecessary to observe that ever since Sir Robert Peel's memorable statement of the 27th ult., the present parliamentary week had been looked forward to by all parties with no ordinary interest. The subject, indeed, had already been discussed in all its bearings, and it was not expected that new light could be thrown on the real merits of the question; but still it was regarded as the opening up of the concluding scene—the commencement of the last stage of a great national movement, to which every circumstance—even the comparative tranquillity of the preceding week—conspired in no ordinary measure to direct the undivided attention of all classes of the community. No startling revelation was expected, but still as the hour drew near when the House was at length fairly to launch out on this important question, it was manifest that the excitement which pervaded the metropolis had increased; and multitudes might be seen in the vicinity of St. Stephen's, whose interest in the proceedings of that evening was not less intense than that of the crowded assemblage of members and spectators within the walls of the House. It was known and felt throughout London, and throughout the kingdom, that a great legislative question was on the eve of being finally discussed and adjusted, the settlement of which, in accordance with the wishes and with the hopes of the nation, would usher in a new era in the commercial policy and in the social circumstances of this country.

The reader will remember that Monday, the 9th inst., was the day appointed for resuming the consideration of this great question. When the House of Commons had met, the quietness of the usual routine of preliminary proceedings was enlivened by the entrance of Lord Morpeth, who, when taking the usual oaths, was cheered. The same mark of attention was paid to the noble Lord when he was called on to present petitions from Yorkshire, praying for the immediate as well as the total repeal of the Corn Laws.

Mr. FERRAND asked if the noble Lord could assure the House that the signatures to these petitions were the free and unbiassed acts of the parties themselves, for he had been assured—

The SPEAKER informed Mr. Ferrand that he might ask a question, but could not make a speech.

LORD MORPETH, in reply to the question, declared that, to the best of his belief and the entireness of his conviction, the signatures were the free and unbiassed acts of the parties.

Amongst various questions and answers, and other preliminary business, the topic of the evening was introduced in the following manner, by the right hon. baronet at the head of her Majesty's Government.

SIR R. PEEL—I am anxious to take the first opportunity of referring to a question which was put to me the other night by the noble lord the member for the city of London. The noble lord (J. Russell), following his colleague (Mr. Pattison), asked me whether it was the intention of the Government to remit the duties on foreign corn immediately after the resolution of this house should be reported? That question, Sir, was put to me at once by the noble lord without previous notice; and, under the impression that the Treasury had dealt with the duties on corn in the same way as other duties, I answered the noble lord, that the Treasury would remit the duties on foreign corn on the report of the resolution in this house. I gave that answer under the impression, as I have said, that the Treasury had dealt with the duties on corn as with other duties. I find that impression is erroneous. In every case when the corn duties have been dealt with by Parliament the reduction of duty has taken place from the passing of the Act; and the Treasury has never in any case, on the report of the resolution, undertaken to remit the duties. I should be exceedingly unwilling to assume, on the part of the Treasury, any authority for which there was not a precedent. I should be also exceedingly sorry to assume it in this case, because I fear that the assumption of that authority for the first time would have a tendency rather to prejudice than promote a satisfactory settlement of this question (cheers). It is the intention of the Government, therefore, to adhere to the course which has been uniformly pursued in all former periods of alteration in the Corn Laws, and make the reduction of duty, if the measure should meet with the sanction of Parliament, take effect from the passing of the Act. I believe there will be no inconvenience or delay as to the taking of corn out of bond at the duty of 4s. dependent on the passing of the Act; but, at the same time, it is of so much importance that the decision of Parliament on this subject should be known as soon as possible, and that the trade should have an assurance as to the principle which is to govern our conduct, that her Majesty's Government propose to give preference to the corn bill over all other proceedings. So far as we are concerned, we will propose no other Government business until the decision of this branch of the legislature with respect to the new Corn Law shall have been taken (cheers). That bill will, therefore, be proceeded with before any other measure connected with the tariff; and, provided it meet with the sanction of this house, will be sent at once to the House of Lords (cheers).

Mr. CHRISTOPHER presented several petitions in favour of the continuance of the existing Corn Law.

Mr. BANKES presented 23 petitions from Bridport and other places in Dorsetshire praying for a continuance of protection to British agriculture, at least until the sense of the country should be taken on the question. He also presented several petitions from different places in Hampshire.

Mr. HAWES presented a petition signed by 72,000 inhabitants of Lambeth, in favour of a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.

Mr. PLUMPTRE presented several petitions in favour of the existing Corn Laws.

Mr. J. T. CLIFTON presented several petitions from places in Northamptonshire in favour of protection to British agriculture.

SIR G. GREY presented a petition from Devonport and Stonehouse, praying the house at once and for ever to abolish the Corn Laws.

Mr. GIBBORNE presented a petition from the Isle of Wight in favour of the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.

Mr. MACAULAY presented a petition from the Lord Provost, magistrates, and town-council of Edinburgh, expressing their general approbation of the measures of the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel), but regretting that the repeal of the Corn Laws was not to be immediate.

Mr. DUNCOMBE presented a petition from the paper-hangers of the city of London declaring themselves favourable to the principles of Free Trade, but wishing them to be equally applied, and complaining that the duty on the importation of foreign paper-hanging was to be reduced five-sixths in place of one-half.

Mr. BRIGHT presented petitions from Stockport and 30 other places in favour of the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws.

Similar petitions were presented by Mr. CHRISTIE, from Weymouth; by Sir B. HALL, from Marylebone; by Mr. WARBURTON, from Bridport, and from Ambleside, in Westmoreland; by Mr. STRUTT, from Derby, and seven other places in Derbyshire; by Mr. ROSS, from 1400 inhabitants of Belfast, and from 150 inhabitants of another place in Antrim; by Lord J. RUSSELL, from South Devonshire; by Mr. BOUVIER, from Salisbury and five other places; by Mr. HUME, from the magistrates, town-council, and inhabitants of the Royal burghs of Montrose, Arbroath, and Forfar, from the merchants and shipowners of Arbroath, from the guildry of Arbroath, from the inhabitants of Forfar, Letham, Lunanhead, &c.; by Lord A. PAGET, from Lichfield; by Mr. W. COWPER, from Hertford; Sir W. CLAY, from the Tower Hamlets; by Sir W. MOLESWORTH, from 44,600 inhabitants of Southwark; and by Mr. AGLONBY, from Whitehaven.

Mr. BENETT presented a petition from Salisbury, praying that no alteration should take place in the Corn Laws until an appeal should be made to the different constituencies.

Mr. M. PHILIPS presented a petition from 314,520 merchants, bankers, landowners, farmers, traders, and others, in the county palatine of Lancaster, expressing their general approbation of the measures of the Government; declaring their opinion that they would be much more appropriate and much more valuable to the country if they had dealt with the immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, instead of leaving that as a prospective measure; and praying the house immediately to proceed to the abolition of the Corn Laws. The hon. member also presented a similar petition from the Manchester Commercial Association. The latter body also expressed their hearty concurrence in the proposed change in the law of settlement.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL presented a petition from Abingdon in favour of the measures of Government.

Mr. W. MILES presented a number of petitions from parishes in the counties of Somerset, Monmouth, Glamorgan, and Gloucester, all in favour of protection to British agriculture, and expressing a hope, that should it be the determination of her Majesty's Government to propose an alteration in the Corn Laws, an appeal should in the first instance be made to the country.

LORD DUNCAN presented a petition from Bath, which had in four days received the signatures of 6700 inhabitants, Whigs, Tories, and Radicals, in favour generally of the Government measure; but humbly praying that advantage might be taken of the present season of scarcity at once to repeal all duties which tended to diminish the supply of the people's food.

Mr. CAYLEY presented a petition from a place in the North Riding of Yorkshire in favour of protection to British industry.

Mr. WAKLEY presented a petition from 83,000 of the inhabitants of Finsbury, expressing their regret that the proposed total repeal of the Corn Laws was not to be immediate, and praying that, as the protectionists desired an immediate repeal, if at all, their wishes should be complied with. The hon. member also presented a petition from Newton, in Montgomeryshire, in favour of a total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. The hon. member then proceeded to state that he had another petition of an important nature to present on the same subject. It was from 14 labourers in Wiltshire, and was as follows:

"TO THE HON. THE COMMONS OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

"The petition of the undersigned, inhabitants of Pewsey, in the county of Wilts, sheweth,—That your petitioners are agricultural labourers, members of that class for whose especial protection and benefit the Corn Laws are said to have passed, and are now sought to be maintained. That, so far from having received protection and benefit, the condition of your petitioners is one of destitution and of degradation, being obliged to submit to the work usually assigned to beasts of burden, namely, to be harnessed to carts and to draw them, laden with stones, from place to place, in order to earn, not the fair wages for labour, but a miserable pittance, a sum nicely calculated as being just sufficient to keep them from starvation, and to prevent their availing themselves of that refuge which the law of the land has provided for them, and which the poor-rate is levied to ensure to them. That, although some of your petitioners have as many as eight in their family, in no one instance does the payment for their labour amount to more than 6s. a-week, out of which sum rent, fuel, and other necessities, as well as food have to be provided; that being thus reduced, under the Corn Laws, which do not enable the occupiers of the soil to give them employment for fair wages, and which clearly do not afford them protection, or conduce to their benefit, your petitioners are strongly of opinion that those laws are injurious, rather than advantageous to them; they therefore humbly implore your hon. house immediately and entirely to abolish those laws, and all others the tendency of which is to make food scarce and dear,—a state of things that is always hurtful to the labouring classes. (Signed by 14 labourers, having 14 wives and 48 children, altogether amounting to 76 persons, subsisting on 4l. 2s. a-week, or 13d. each person, being less than 2d. a-day each.)"

SIR R. PEEL presented a petition from the Lord Provost, magistrates, and town-council of Glasgow, in favour of the commercial policy of Government. The right hon. baronet presented similar petitions from Hawick, Thirsk, in Yorkshire, and Pollokshaws.

SIR G. STAUNTON presented a petition from the town of Gosport and parish of Alverstoke, in Hampshire, for the total repeal of the Corn Laws.

Petitions were also presented in favour of immediate repeal, by Mr. MILNER GIBSON, from the Mayor and Corporation of Manchester; by Mr. OSWALD, from Glasgow; and by Mr. B. ESCOTT, from a place in Winchester. The petitioners in the last instance prayed also for an equalisation of the sugar duties.

CORN-LAW DEBATE.

The question having been put that the Speaker leave the chair, that the house might resolve itself into a committee on the Corn Importation Acts,

Mr. P. MILES rose to move his amendment, that the committee be postponed until this day six months. He did not wish, he said, to expose the Speaker to the infliction of a tedious debate, but the present seemed to him the most fitting time to take the discussion (hear, hear). He was resolved to treat the question calmly and dispassionately, and no expression calculated to excite any angry feelings should drop from him: the question was too important—too comprehensive in its details—to be debated upon party grounds, for it affected equally the merchant and the manufacturer, the landlord and the tenant, the operative and the artisan (hear, hear). He trusted, therefore, that the house would give it the fullest and most anxious consideration. It was a greater question than the Reform Bill, because it involved a change of policy which from the earliest times had been the ruling principle of government, under which Great Britain had risen to her present eminence, and which all nations had long followed, and still continued to follow. Whether the country were prepared for the change, and the constituency disposed to sanction it, remained to be proved (hear). He did not hesitate to say that upon such a question the constituency ought to be consulted (hear, hear), and it was indisputable that the majority of the house had been returned upon protectionist principles. Notwithstanding the explanation given by the right hon. baronet, he (Mr. P. Miles) must concur in the expression of the late Secretary for the Colonies, and at one time of the greater number of the colleagues of the right hon. baronet (hear, hear), that there was no special necessity for the measure (hear, hear). No one could more deeply deplore the undoubted failure of the potato crop in Ireland than he did, but there was no real ground for apprehending famine. The oat and barley crop had been unusually large; and by a return now on the table, it appeared that between the 5th July, 1845, and the 5th January, 1846, nearly four million quarters of grain had been imported, and more than a million cwt. of meal. Did this look like famine? At the very moment the right hon. baronet wished to open the ports the price of wheat was only 56s. 2d. per quarter, which in 1842 the right hon. baronet had considered a fair remuneration to the grower (cheers). He trusted that the house would not look upon him as inclined to undervalue the responsibility of a Minister. He did not wish to taunt the right hon. baronet with being alarmed without cause—far from it. He could well understand and allow for the anxieties of a Prime Minister, and he knew how much they must be increased by the bare idea of famine (hear). He was aware what reports reached him from various quarters, but the alarming paragraphs the right hon. baronet had read from the newspapers did not produce the same impression upon him.

The law of 1842 was, he believed, admitted by all parties to have worked well (oh, oh), as far as any Corn Law could go. It had produced steadiness of prices, and it had given the farmer a fair price for his corn. Under the law of 1842 the right honourable baronet estimated the price of 56s. as a fair amount for the farmer to receive for his wheat, but he should be glad to know what price the right honourable gentleman considered a fair price for the farmer now (loud cries of hear, hear, from the protectionist members)? The right honourable baronet offered the farmer what he called compensation, but did he suppose that the advantages which he offered in return for the protection which he took away would compensate the farmer for a loss of ten or fifteen shillings a quarter upon wheat, which was the amount to which the right honourable gentleman opposite expected it would fall? The right honourable gentleman's opinion was that the farmer would not lose by the change introduced by his measure; but if that opinion were correct, what became of the argument of the right honourable gentleman opposite which was founded upon the certainty of a cheap loaf (hear, hear, hear)? He believed that there was a vast difference between a cheapness produced by good harvests and a cheapness produced by a free importation of corn. He was afraid that the right honourable gentleman had been mistaken in his calculations, and that he had overstated the prosperity of the country in consequence of the good harvests with which Providence had blessed us (hear, hear). It was the opinion of Mr. Huskisson—none the worse for having been pronounced many years ago—that “cheapness produced by the importation of corn from abroad was the sure forerunner of scarcity, and that a steady home supply was the only safe foundation of steady and moderate prices” (hear, hear). He (Mr. P. Miles) was of the same opinion. No state was so critical as that in which a country was regularly dependent on a foreign supply. What the result of these changes might be no man could at present foretell. He thought himself that they would lead to great fluctuations in prices, and that before long hon. members would see the right hon. baronet come down to the house and propose some new measure for the regulation of the trade in corn. (Cheers from the protectionist members.) The principle of free trade for which hon. members opposite contended, if rightly understood, meant this—that every other country should be allowed to inundate us with their goods, without offering us any corresponding advantages in return. Now, he must say, that he thought it would be very difficult for the manufacturer to compete with his rival in the foreign market unless he reduced the rate of wages. (Hear, hear.) The Swiss, the Germans, and the French competed with us at present most successfully in many articles of manufacture. If the important item of wages were excepted, the English manufacturer would stand in a position equal, or perhaps superior to the foreigner; but hon. members all knew what an important item that was to manufacturers. Hon. members might be told that cheapness of provisions would not affect the price of wages, but let provisions be as cheap as they would, the manufacturer here could not compete with the foreigner unless wages were reduced. The house had heard the stress which the right hon. bart. laid on the withdrawal of protection from the manufacturing interests. Manufacturers, however, had a great advantage over the agricultural interest. He much doubted whether agriculture and manufactures, although they depended on each other, could be said to be governed by the same laws and principles, but he knew that if the agriculturist did anything with his farm, he must task his labourers to the utmost. Again, the manufacturers had an advantage when the burdens were considered which both must bear. He held in his hand a return showing how unequally these burdens pressed upon the manufacturers. The returns of one manufacturer's business amounted to 170,000*l.*, and the wages which he paid to 30,000*l.*; but upon looking at the burdens which he bore, he found that they only amounted to 530*l.* When he looked to the compensation which was offered to the landed interest in return for the changes about to be introduced, he was surprised to find how slight it was. A compensation of 300,000*l.* or 400,000*l.*, spread over all England, would hardly be felt. He thought that the agriculturists would have been better pleased if the right hon. baronet had had offered them nothing at all (loud cries of hear, hear, hear). The honourable member, who was heard but imperfectly in the reporters' gallery during the latter portion of his speech, in consequence of his dropping his voice at intervals, then formally moved, as an amendment upon Sir R. Peel's motion, that the house do resolve itself into the said committee on that day six months.

Sir W. HEATHCOTE begged leave to second the amendment, and in doing so he asked the right hon. baronet as the head of the Government to believe that he disclaimed any imputation of unworthy motives to him. It was true that he thought his measure both dangerous and delusive, that the grounds upon which it was based were insufficient, when taken separately, and inconsistent and self-destructive when combined. He thought the right honourable baronet had not sufficiently appreciated the violent shock to which confidence in public men was exposed, when their opinions were suddenly changed without any apparent change of circumstances, on matters upon which the public mind had been long exercised, and upon which public opinion had been long expressed (hear, hear, from the protectionist members). To say, however, that the right hon. baronet pretended to entertain opinions which he did not hold, or that he had not the best interests of the country in view when he introduced his measure, appeared to him (Sir W. Heathcote) to be a gratuitous assumption. He must give, therefore, the supporters of the Government measure the advantage of the argument which was derived from the good intentions of its author; but he nevertheless intended to oppose it, because he considered the measure mischievous in itself, and not justified by reason or experience.

He (Sir W. Heathcote) had supported the right honourable baronet upon the Canada Corn Bill, and he would have been prepared to support him in a similar boon to Australia (hear, hear). But in the measure before the house there was a boon to no colony (hear, hear). On the contrary, for the first time, an anti-colonial policy was openly avowed (hear, hear). Entertaining these views, he could not consent to go into any question of terms or conditions of compromise. He thought it his duty generally to oppose the proposition and to support the amendment (hear). There was one practical consideration which he had no doubt had much weight with hon. gentlemen on his side of the house who were prepared to support the ministerial proposition—he meant the feeling that the existence of the Government would be compromised in the midst of the discussions and dissensions which would arise from their taking a different course. Now he did not underrate the importance of that contingency. He for one was not careless whether the right honourable baronet and those with whom he acted, or whether the noble lord the member for the city of London and his friends, sat on the Treasury bench. He had supported the right honourable baronet because he, generally speaking, agreed with the course taken by his Government, and it was not because he differed from him on one important point that he would be led away to a transference of that support to those with whom he had little in common, and on a point on which he disagreed from the views of the noble lord as much as he did from those of the right honourable baronet. That right honourable gentleman took power not to carry out private ends but for great public purposes. But if, on account of their disagreeing with a particular measure, he was induced to throw up the Government which they still wished to see confided to his hands, why then upon him, and not upon those who generally supported him, must rest the responsibility and the blame (loud protectionist cheering). The honourable gentleman concluded by seconding the amendment (hear, hear).

The question was put from the chair, and Mr. W. LASCELLES (who was at first almost inaudible, and often indistinctly heard) rose. He was understood to say, that the honourable gentleman who had just concluded his address seemed to think that the country had attained the prosperity which had been its lot, entirely in consequence of the restriction on trade which had been so long imposed upon it. He owned that the honourable gentleman seemed to him to have read very incorrectly the history of the empire. In his view, ever since the commencement of the time when restrictive policy began to be applied, they were visited with a series of fluctuations in the price of food which could not be otherwise than detrimental to the country (opposition cheers). He must deny that upon the reconstruction of the Conservative party after the Reform Bill, its commercial principles were those founded on a restrictive policy (hear, hear). He for one had never considered such a policy as the test of the Conservative party. On the eve of the general election he had considered it necessary to assert that no such principles as those of restriction were necessarily those entertained by the Conservative party, and with this view he had voted for the noble lord opposite, as he would have supported him had he been able lately to form a cabinet (hear, hear). He had watched the course which Government had taken with respect to this matter very closely, and when honourable gentlemen spoke of the danger which would accrue from the Government proposition, he replied to them that the very first act of the Government implied and involved the very principles now on the eve of being carried out (hear, hear). Why, he had thought it impossible to listen to the speeches with which the tariff had been prefaced, and not to have seen that they inculcated the full principles of Free Trade (loud opposition cheering). And there was proof that these speeches were so understood by honourable gentlemen on his side of the house, or why, in every successive session of Parliament, were so many questions put to the right hon. baronet, implying that, from the principles which he had asserted, the questioners believed that he was about to alter the Corn Laws, and requesting to know whether or not he actually and really did (opposition cheers). Well, an answer was given, which they were obliged to deem satisfactory (hear, hear, and a laugh). The right hon. baronet told them that he had no intention of repealing the Corn Laws at the time, but that he did not regard the corn question as one on which a minister, responsible for the welfare of the nation, was for ever to pledge himself (hear, hear). Now, that was the full amount of the charge which could in fairness be brought against the right honourable baronet. He was willing to do both the honourable mover and seconder of the amendment the justice to acknowledge that they had not followed the course which had been taken with respect to this subject out of doors. They had rather addressed themselves to the actual merits of the case, than the personal topics mixed up with it. The hon. seconder of the amendment had told them that the country had prospered in consequence of the Corn Laws. Now, let them look at what had been the immediate effects of relaxation wherever the principle had been carried out. He did not merely rely on the result of the measures of the right hon. baronet, but he would take as instances of the good effect of commercial relaxation the cases of silk, of sugar, of wool—in short, with respect to all the articles which they could possibly bring to mind; and the fact which the advocates of a protective policy would have to refute was this—that the result of all experience, without one single exception, had confirmed every theory which the wisest men had uttered upon the subject (hear). To this rule, he repeated, there was no exception. He did not believe that when it was applied to agriculture, there would be any exception in that case more than in others. There might be some suffering and distress before the sound system was established, but that constituted no reason why the change to it should any longer be deferred (hear, hear). He had a very strong feeling on this subject. Painful as it was to do anything to break those party ties which so often cemented private friendship, he could not help expressing the satisfaction that he felt in reflecting that he had laboured to place the right hon. baronet in the position in which he stood, in the full confidence that he would apply his great knowledge, his undoubted powers, to the satisfactory settlement of the question before them. That right hon. gentleman had acted as he anticipated, and without wishing for a moment to diminish the merits of those hon. gentlemen opposite who had so long, so ably, and so consistently argued against commercial restriction, still he did think that, practically speaking, the right hon. baronet had done more than any one else for the—to his mind satisfactory—adjustment of this great question (loud opposition cheers).

LORD NORREYS rose with pain, not only to oppose the measure, but also to withdraw his confidence from the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel), with whom he had acted on every occasion, in and out of power, from the year 1830 to the present period (hear, hear).

If the right hon. baronet had refused to resume office until a noble duke (the Duke of Richmond) had been offered the government (cheers and laughter)—that would have opened the eyes of the agriculturists to their actual position. Every one knew what would have been the result, and the agriculturists being then made aware of their actual position, a measure far more favourable to them might have been carried by the right hon. baronet (hear, hear). But could he (Sir Robert Peel) be surprised that they had stood out for no alteration? They were only following the advice given by him in 1839. He (Lord Norreys) could not have expected that he who gave that advice in 1839, who so damaged the fixed duty in 1841 that that mode of protection had been abandoned, who professed a settlement in 1842, who objected to an 8s. permanent duty, could have proposed a 4s. duty to end in total repeal (hear, hear). He did not believe the right hon. baronet acted dishonestly, but it was clear, from his former conduct, that he had been wanting in political foresight, and was therefore unworthy of the confidence of public men. Whatever the result of opposition might be, he held the right hon. gentleman responsible, who had risked this state of confusion without any sufficient cause, and who had so unhandsonly driven his opponents from power on that question in 1841 (hear, hear).

Mr. B. COCHRANE.—He was compelled to differ from the opinion expressed by some honourable gentlemen at recent meetings of the agricultural societies, and he could not agree with them that the Corn Laws involved a Christian and religious principle. On the contrary, looking through the whole history of the Corn Laws, he could not discover any principle at all, a principle being something immutable, not taking its colour from the impulse of the moment, and beyond the influence of the circumstance and the hour. So far from a fixed principle, he found that for five centuries posterior to the Conquest importation was free; but agricultural protection, which dated from Henry VI., gradually increased until the Revolution, when a bounty of 6s. was given to exportation; and importation, totally forbidden until the price of wheat was 54s., was subject to a duty of 8s. between that price and 80s. This, with occasional variations, remained in operation until Lord North's Act, in 1773, reduced the protection to 44s.; but in 1791 the agricultural was again the predominant interest, and greatly favoured until 1815, when the duty amounted to a prohibition. Then followed the Act of 1822, and afterwards Mr. Grant's resolutions in 1828; in 1842 the present measure was passed, which he for one supported, and which it was now proposed to overthrow altogether. Where, then, was the lurking place of this principle, if it did exist? Through what strange scenes and changes had it passed! If there was a Corn Law faith, it admitted of every diversity of heresy (hear, hear, and a laugh). If he might be permitted the opinion, he thought the agriculturists were requiring too much, when they claimed a Corn Law principle. He would rather adopt the language of the honourable member for Shrewsbury, and term the Corn Laws an accident or an expedient, subject, as all expedients must be, to the influence of time and circumstances.

The right hon. gentlemen at the head of the Government had been accused of gross inconsistency. But when he looked back to the histories of other public men, he did not find any greater consistency. Why, Lord Ashburton, the now protector of protection, in 1820, presented a petition from the merchants and traders of the city of London, praying for total free trade. Facies non omnibus una. There was scarcely one public man who had devoted his attention to the corn laws who had not been compelled to change his opinion, and what did this prove? That all public men were dishonest, and that public virtue had no existence? This he thought, on whichever side of the argument, would be an unfair assumption; it rather proved that the question was one full of difficulties, ever varying with the seasons and the times; that there might be some truth in Mr. Sydney Smith's dictum, “whoever talks of an unalterable law, is an unalterable fool” (a laugh)—that events in politics were not like equal quantities in mathematics, always the same, or like the great abstract truths of morality, eternal and invariable in their nature (hear, hear). He (Mr. Cochrane) was one of those who did lament those harsh necessities which hurried men on from change to change; but to lament was not to prevent, and for God's sake let them look at the state of the world as it is and was, not as it should be. Let them look at the movements which had taken place within the last 16 years: the development of industry, the progress of invention, the extended intercourse—America brought within 12 days, China within two months, goods conveyed 40 miles an hour, letters sent from Penzance to Caithness for one penny. With all this movement upon the waters, could the mind of man alone remain unchanged? And then let them regard the great fact of the population doubled within 100 years, and increasing half a million annually—increasing through the expansion of that trade which broke the alliance between Napoleon and Alexander, and which had extended our colonial intercourse to the furthest quarter of the globe. Above all, could they ever forget that the Reform Bill had passed? That reform which the honourable baronet the member for Cornwall truly styled a revolution. The consequences of that measure never could die—and who were the Ministers who passed it? Why, among others, the noble duke at the head of the agricultural societies, a noble lord who had succeeded, and a noble earl who, it was supposed, would secede from her Majesty's Government (hear). These were the Ministers who compelled the Crown and the aristocracy to yield to clamour, and these noble lords, who threatened “to swamp” the House of Peers, now stand up in defence of the landed interest of this nation.

Sir, (said the hon. gentleman,) I vote for this measure because I have confidence in the financial policy of the right hon. gentleman. I vote for this measure because I prefer legislation to agitation; moreover, because I am a sincere advocate for protection (hear, and a laugh). Yes, sir, for protection not to one class, to one interest, however important; but protection to all classes, to all interests, foreign and domestic—protection in hours of darkness and trouble, which, I pray God, may be far from us, but which, we cannot conceal from ourselves, may depend on the life of one man in France, or on party cry in America—protection when another northern confederacy may have threatened our shores, and hostile fleets threaten our colonial empire—the protection of a strong and vigorous administration;—but above all, I vote for this measure because, in the beautiful language of the prayer which we hear each day, I would set aside all private interests, prejudices, and partial affections, and lend my humble but most sincere endeavours to any settlement which those whose peculiar province it is to rule the destinies of this great country may judge conducive to the comfort and welfare of the poorer, but not less loyal, classes of my fellow-subjects (cheers).

Mr. DEEDS hoped he should be allowed to trespass on the time of the house for a short period, as this was the first time he had ever appealed to them for a similar indulgence (hear, hear). He was much tempted to express his dissent from the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government on the first night on which he submitted his great measure, but he was deterred from that course because he understood the merits of the question were not then to be entered into, and because he was desirous to remove from himself the imputation of having formed a hasty judgment on so grave and important a matter. In the course of his address the right hon. baronet had alluded to the thriving condition of the country during the last three years, but it must not be forgotten that the empire had been under the operation of the revised law of 1842 during the whole of the period. The right hon. baronet now called on the house to expunge that law. He (Mr. Deedes) could not go along with him, or give him a support which would be contrary to the best judgment he was able to form (hear, hear). He feared very much that the abolition of the Corn Laws would have the effect of throwing the poorer soils in the kingdom out of cultivation. Without passing over in review those measures which might be called an offset to that abolition many of which he believed good in themselves, he could not but express his opinion that they ought not to have been added to a revision of the Corn Laws. Entertaining those views generally—dreading above all things the dependency of this country on foreign nations, in the event of any scarcity in so important an article as bread—fearing that specie must necessarily go out of the country to pay for corn, that a consequent reduction of specie must take place in the Bank of England, which supplied the other banks in the country—fearing the results of that restriction on the community, and bearing in mind the language of the right honourable baronet in introducing the measure in 1842, he could not allow himself to vote against his convictions. Having thanked the house for the indulgence with which he had been heard, the honourable member concluded by saying that he sat down with the fervent prayer that it might please God, who had raised this country to so high a place among the nations of the earth, to continue her therein—to guide and direct her rulers, and to make her an example and pattern to the rest of the world (hear, hear).

Sir J. WALSH, on rising to address the house, was met by cries of “spoke, spoke,” which were silenced by the Speaker. The honourable member proceeded to say that the agricultural party in that house had every motive to urge them to speak; and he would add, every claim on the justice of the house for a patient and forbearing hearing. That party must be allowed to be the representatives of great and important interests. They must be recognised as the organs of opinions which, if they had lost some important leaders and champions recently in that house, were still the opinions of the great mass of the population of the kingdom (hear, hear). He thought they must present themselves likewise to defend their motives from charges and imputations almost of a personal character which had been levelled against them throughout the length and breadth of the land (hear, hear). Those hon. members opposite, who had refrained hitherto from taking any part in the discussion, and had preserved that stubborn silence which was remarked on another occasion (hear, hear), had held up himself and his friends as the champions—or rather as the weak and impotent advocates—of an odious and selfish monopoly, and had represented them as persons actuated by no other motive or aim than the maintenance of the landlords’ rents, in opposition to all the interests of the mass of the country (hear, hear). The agricultural members might also present themselves under circumstances of great disadvantage, deprived, as they had been, by the sudden change of the right hon. baronet, of that powerful advocacy of their cause on which they had been accustomed to rely (cries of hear). The right honourable baronet had accompanied his present proposition with some measures of amelioration and compensation, and it might be of some value to the agricultural interests that he had by his defection placed them in a situation to defend their opinions and vindicate their characters (hear, hear). On behalf of that interest he first of all begged to deny, in the strongest and most emphatic terms, that they considered this question as one of rent and rent only (hear); and he denied that it could possibly be looked upon in that light (hear, hear). But before he addressed himself to that point, he would ask the house to consider, if they were to argue that question upon the narrow basis upon which their opponents endeavoured to place it, whether it would not, even in that point of view, be a question of sufficient importance to engage their attention? It appeared from the return made on the motion of the hon. member for Wolverhampton in 1842, that the landlords’ rental of the kingdom was assessed at the sum of 45,750,000*l.*, exclusive of Ireland. There was no return respecting that country from which her rental could be ascertained, but they could not err in assuming it to be 15,000,000*l.* or 20,000,000*l.* He was sure, then, they were within the mark in assuming that this narrow question of rent was one involving no less than 60,000,000*l.* sterling annually—a sum which was double the interest of the national debt, and exceeded the amount of our annual export trade, and which could not but be considered as involving the wealth and prosperity of the country.

There was another subject that had often been discussed in that house, and on which they—the protectionists—were wont formerly, in great measure, to rest the strength of their case, the peculiar burdens affecting the land. For some time past honourable gentlemen opposite had taken upon themselves to controvert that position, and deny that there actually were any peculiar burdens on land. The hon. member for Montrose (Mr. Hume) was the first to advocate that view, and he had been supported by the hon. member for Sheffield (Mr. Ward). He, however, thought that both honourable members had fallen into a great error in this matter. The hon. gentlemen, he conceived, argued that from the official accounts it appeared that a great amount of the local taxation fell upon other sorts of real property than land, such as houses and mines, and therefore was not an exclusive burden upon the land. To that his reply was, that they did not pretend it to be an exclusive burden, but that it was one which fell with particular weight upon agriculture, and that those connected with the landed interest paid more than those engaged in trading and manufacturing pursuits.

The right hon. baronet rested the adoption of his measure upon the experience of the last three years (hear, hear, from Colonel Sibthorp); but he (Sir John Walsh) was sure that public opinion would decide that another cause had been in operation, which had had a most powerful effect in producing the resolution of the right hon. baronet. To the organised efforts, and the vast funds raised by the Anti-Corn Law League, the public would be induced to ascribe in a great measure the great commercial revolution which had now been announced (hear, hear). Within the course of 25 years, that was the second of these associations that had sprung up and produced important effects upon the institutions of this country. Read the history of the first of these, and then solve this problem—How many of these associations it would take to crush the independence of Parliament itself (loud cheering)? To strike at the aristocracy (as we understood the hon. member, for the cheering with which this sentiment was greeted from the Tory benches rendered the conclusion of his sentence nearly inaudible) and to endanger the monarchy? This was an evil which must be grappled with by some minister or other—this was a system which must of its nature be destructive of the independence and utility of representative government (cheers). He opposed this measure, then, because he believed it to be a dangerous experiment upon the resources of the country—he opposed it doubly because he believed it had been very much brought about by the influence of that association, which he considered every lover of order and good government was bound to oppose (Conservative cheering). He did not oppose the measure on the narrow ground of class interest—he did not oppose it because he believed rent, and rent only, to be concerned—but he opposed it because he was convinced if they made a mistake in this matter—if the calculations of the right hon. baronet proved erroneous—the result of that mistake would not be the sacrifice of the interest of a class, but the destruction of the prosperity of the empire (loud cheers from the protectionists).

Mr. A. HOPE said that the right hon. baronet at the head of the government had, as the leader of the opposition, led a struggle against the noble lord the member for London; and the Whig government, after ruling England since 1830, had by the natural course of events become effete (laughter); and when the noble lord had brought forward free-trade measures, the right hon. baronet had opposed them and compelled the noble lord to appeal to the country (hear, hear). The country then returned a Parliament as a protectionist Parliament, to crush free-trade, and they chose the right hon. baronet as a leader because they believed him to be the leader of the protectionist party (cheers). And now the members of that house were called upon to pass a far stronger and more sweeping measure than that which their constituents returned them to oppose (cheers). A Conservative government had come forward now at the beginning of 1846 to accomplish free trade, and the reason they assigned was, that it was consistent with the principles of true Conservative policy (hear). It might be true Conservative policy, but it was not a policy which would conserve the affections of his own party. There was a very powerful minister who in times when the House of Commons had not attained its present position, swayed his Sovereign with as potent an influence as that exercised by the right honourable baronet in that house; and that minister was said to have used the expression, Ego et rex meus. The right honourable baronet might with equal propriety use the expression, “I and my party” (hear). In 1841 honourable members were elected upon strong protectionist principles. Now so much were they expected to follow their leader, that they were brought down to that house as they had been last Tuesday week, without the common courtesy which always accompanied measures of much less importance—of having some inkling of the nature of the measure to be proposed (hear, hear). He (Mr. Hope) had been one of the members who in 1841 knew something of what was to be brought forward, but now a total change in the commercial system which had prevailed for centuries was considered a bubble—a mere blea-bite (laughter)—a nothing greater than a turnpike bill. Such a policy was truly Wolsheyan. This, which was literally one of the greatest revolutions the country had ever seen—a revolution in commerce, trade, and manufactures, calculated to produce results more serious than even a revolution in the constitution or government of the country, was brought forward in the course of an almost effete Parliament, and members were expected, as a matter of course, to support it. If there was any glory to be derived from this achievement, most assuredly it belonged to the noble lord and not to the right hon. baronet, and he could not help thinking that the right honourable baronet would have acted a more glorious part, and one of far more advantage to his fame than that which he had adopted, if the moment he found “a change coming over the spirit of his dream”—he had gone to the noble lord and said—“I now find that you all your life were right, that I all my life was wrong, and it is but right that I should now resign to you the reins of Government, in order that you may not be deprived of the glory of carrying into operation those measures which you have so zealously, and I must say so properly, advocated” (hear, hear, hear). Had the right honourable baronet done this long, long ago, he would have avoided the reproach of arraying himself in borrowed plumage, and he would have pursued a course which gentleman at both sides of the house—however they might differ from him in opinion—would have commended as a heroic and magnanimous attempt for the well-being of the country (hear, hear, hear). Besides, it would have been nothing more than an act of justice to those who in bygone days were the adversaries of the right hon. baronet. The right hon. baronet was now their fellow co-operator and fellow-labourer; but why should he not allow them the merit to which in his heart he must feel they are entitled (cheers, and cries of hear, hear, hear, from Sir Robert Peel)? The hon. member concluded by expressing his determination to uphold the protective system as far as in him lay by voting in favour of the amendment.

Lord SANDON next addressed the house; but spoke in so indistinct a tone of voice as to be for some time almost inaudible in the gallery. He was understood to say that he felt himself called upon to explain and vindicate the course which he was about to take with reference to this great question. He had an opinion of his own to represent and illustrate, and it was very possible that it was not an opinion which was shared by any other member of that house. The fact was, he was about to support the Minister’s measure, although he disapproved of it (laughter). The arguments which Sir R. Peel had used in reference to this question appeared to him in many respects untenable, and very many of the grounds which he had assigned as the basis on which he had founded his change of opinion seemed to him to be deserving of little or no consideration. They had little if any weight with him (Lord Sandon); for they constituted, in his opinion, too narrow a foundation on which to establish such startling changes as those which were now in contemplation. They did not furnish an adequate pretext by which to justify the overturning of institutions which had been sanctioned by the experience of many years (cries of Hear, hear). The right honourable baronet at the head of her Majesty’s Government attempted to justify the change in his policy by a reference to arguments and facts deduced from the experience of the last three years, but that experience was a superficial one, resulting from peculiar circumstances not likely again to occur, and most assuredly it was not that description of experience which warranted a statesman in disregarding and setting at naught principles which were warranted by the experience of thirty years. He (Lord Sandon) could not concur in the opinion that the price of corn did not to a certain extent influence the rate of wages. No one could persuade him that the price of corn did not exercise a very decided influence upon the wages of the agricultural labourer, and upon those of all classes of unskilled workmen, though it might be very true that the effect would not be at all as sensibly felt in the case of artisans and tradesmen.

Having argued to show the right of the farmer to protection, his lordship then proceeded to observe that after making this exposition of his views, it was only right that he should now give some explanation of the somewhat anomalous course he was about to adopt in recording his vote in favour of the minister’s measure. He found that this country must be governed (hear, hear); moreover he felt that great questions of this kind had no chance of long maintaining their ground unless they were sanctioned and supported by great masses of enlightened opinion; and whatever his own views on the matter might be, he could not be blind to the fact that this question of repeal of the protective system was, in truth, thus sanctioned and supported (hear, hear, and cheers.) He looked around him and saw that opinions hostile to protection had been cordially adopted and fearlessly enunciated by the great leaders on both sides. He saw that a great and a wonderful change had taken place both in that house and out of doors. All the members of her Majesty’s government with the exception of two, had given their acquiescence to this measure, and were prepared to justify that acquiescence and to persevere in it. In fact he could not conceal from himself that the fate of the Corn Laws was sealed. The question was no longer a matter of discussion. The protective system was doomed, and the only questions now to be decided were, when and how it was to die (hear, hear). He looked upon the question as entirely settled, out of the pale of argument. There might have been different opinions with respect to free trade; but no matter what discrepancy of feeling might exist, this must be admitted on all hands, that the country must be governed. It was impossible that the present system of agitation could continue. It was convulsing society in these countries, and the sooner the question which gave rise to it was settled the better (hear). The present state of things could not continue without great and manifest injury to the country, for the agitation of this question disarranged our social system, and inevitably gave rise to bitterness of feeling. His friends around him might vote as they pleased, but their votes would not work salvation for the Corn Laws (hear, hear, and loud cheers.) They might succeed in “staving” off the destruction of the protective system for a few months, or it might be perhaps for a year; but eventually the same result which was now impending must be realised, for the downfall of the fabric was inevitable. Abolished it must be, and the only question now was, how was it to be done (hear, hear)? For his part, he held it to be unwise, and in the last degree inexpedient, to permit the country to be convulsed any longer by agitation (hear, hear). These being his feelings, he would vote with the ministry. He had declared that in his opinion the experiment about to be tried was a hazardous one; but he wished it to be understood that he did not feel the same degree of apprehension respecting it that some of his friends did. He believed it to be a perilous experiment—he knew it to be an unprecedented one; but while he made this admission, he was far from thinking that it would be found to be fraught with consequences quite as disastrous as many honourable gentlemen in that house appeared to apprehend (cries of hear, hear). He was not one of those who anticipated that a million of labourers would be thrown out of employment by it, nor did he fear that the cultivation of the land would be in any material degree interfered with. He remembered a period when market prices fell from 10*s.* to 5*s.*, but no large proportion of the labouring population were deprived of employment, nor did any large tracts of country go out of cultivation (hear, hear). He was of opinion that the measure now contemplated was a rash and a perilous one—he knew that much individual misery must result from it; but he did not anticipate a great national calamity (hear, hear, hear). He had faith in the country, and he was sure that the vessel of the state would gradually right herself, and escape the breakers (hear, hear, and cheers). In the abstract he was for protection, but having regard to the present circumstances of the country, and bearing in mind that the Corn Laws, however much to be commended, did not involve any question of faith or morals, he felt himself quite at liberty to take, in reference to this subject, whatever course he considered most conducive to the interests of the English people (hear, hear, and cheers).

Lord J. RUSSELL.—I believe, Sir, that I am the first member who has risen on this side of the house on the important, the very important, question now before us; and, while I shall give my vote on the same side with the noble lord who has just addressed the house, I can say that I shall do it with better heart and hope than that noble lord (cheers) as to the task we are about to undertake. I will not attempt to underrate the importance of this question. Hon. gentlemen whom we have heard speak on the opposite side of the house, and who object to the propositions made to us by her Majesty’s Ministers, seem to consider that they have said what is quite conclusive when they say that for centuries a system of protection has been the system of legislation adopted in our public policy (hear). I am not at all terrified, Sir, by that denunciation. We know that for centuries the system of religious disabilities was the system of legislation adopted in this country; we know that for centuries the want of security for the liberty of the person was the legislative system adopted in this country; but happily we live to acknowledge the great benefits which have flowed from the destruction of those systems (hear, hear); and I hope that we are now at the commencement of the destruction of another system which has been most injurious to the country, and that we shall hereafter feel proud that we have participated in laying the foundation for a new and a better order of things (cheers). It appears, Sir, that the question with respect to the Corn Laws, which in former years was almost exclusively confined to the particular question of corn, has of late, especially in meetings and discussions in the country, been widened to the whole principle of protection; and those who defend the present Corn Laws, and who wish to maintain them—avoiding all appearance of selfishness or of legislation for a particular class, have said that they wish all native industry to be protected (cheers from the minist-terial benches); but the hon. gentleman who seconded the amendment this night seemed to confess, at least he was sensible that protection to all native industry was a mere plausible word, that it rested on no solid foundation, because he asked, how could protection be found for many great interests in the country? The great cotton manufactures of this country, the great woollen manufactures, the great linen manufactures of this country are sent abroad to compete in markets at a great distance from us; they are sent to the markets of America and of Asia to compete with the fabrics of other countries; we therefore want no protection for them in Sussex or in Lincolnshire (hear, hear). If that be the case, and if the great branches of our industry want no protection, they are not benefited by the trifling and the trumpety protection which remains on your statute-book, and they are not benefited by that protection which seems to give to one particular class of industry an advantage. The great general argument of all writers on political economy, with regard to protection, applies to each particular class. In the first place, it interferes with the due current of trade on behalf of one particular class; in the next place, it lays a tax upon the rest of the community for the benefit of that particular class; and in the third place, that this particular object is not attained, and that the very classes it seeks to benefit lose by this pretended protection. Indeed, these propositions have now been so clearly proved, that they have become axioms in political science. (Cheers.) I was induced the other day, in consequence of the praise bestowed upon it by the hon. member for Norfolk, to read a pamphlet, in answer to another pamphlet published by Messrs. Morton and Trimmer, written by Mr. Halesworth, who says that every quarter of corn is raised 17s. in price by the protection afforded by the Corn Laws. If this be so—though I believe it in fact to be a great exaggeration—if corn and bread be thus raised in price, an enormous amount of protection is given to agriculture. Suppose the fact were so, if 20,000,000 quarters were raised 17s. a-quarter, a tax of no less than 17,000,000l. a-year would be paid by the people of this country for this protection to agriculture. I believe that this statement is most exaggerated, but still the principle is correct; it does raise the price, and while we give protection, as it is afforded by the present law, we give, what I will not call an advantage, but an apparent advantage, to a particular class, which is injurious to the other classes. The hon. gentleman the member for Hampshire, who seconded the amendment in terms which were so temperate and so unobjectionable (cheers), stated that a difference ought to be made between those in whose occupations more manual labour is employed and those in whose occupations there is less manual labour, and in which machinery is more employed. Now, I do not see the foundation for any such distinction. Suppose 5,000,000 are employed in a trade in which machinery is used, and others are employed in a trade where there is little machinery, that is not a good ground why one should receive the protection of the Legislature, and why the other should not enjoy that protection. Well, then, Sir, if it be the case that the system of protection be in itself an evil, as the great writers have laid it down, the question comes to be, "What course ought we to take to get rid of this protection?" And here I must say that the writers who have written most ably on the subject—I refer to Adam Smith, and to Ricardo, and to Lord Grenville and Mr. Huskisson as statesmen—have not pointed out in what way we are to get rid of this protection, how we are to eradicate this vice. On this subject they have thrown little light, possibly because there was little which a theoretical writer could throw upon it. I confess that I agree with the noble lord who last spoke, that a great transition cannot be made without incurring the risk at least of considerable suffering. (Cheers from the Ministerial side.) Circumstances may be so prosperous that we may avoid it, but I do not wish to risk the prediction that if we get rid of protection, though we promote eventually the welfare of the country, we shall not for a time incur a considerable sacrifice. I think that this admission has been made by all who have thought upon the subject. Some may speak of a panic; others, as landlords, of the difficulties of making arrangements as far as different classes are concerned; but all will admit that there is a material, a considerable danger, of some loss of capital and of some diminution of profits. I come then to the mode in which the right hon. gentleman opposite, the first Minister of the Crown, proposes to treat this question. I agree with the noble lord that I do not think he has laid his grounds broadly and extensively enough in point of time (cheers). It appears to me that there are measures to which he might have alluded. He could have had no difficulty in referring to them, because I believe he was a member of the Cabinet by which those measures were introduced. I allude to the measures of Mr. Huskisson, which in many cases substituted a moderate duty, and did away generally with prohibitory duties. I will not make any statement of figures, but I will say, generally, that I think the duty on silk having been made a moderate duty from prohibition in 1825 or 1826, in 1837 and 1838 we found the import of raw silk had increased more than 100 per cent.; with respect to French gloves, with regard to which there was a great alarm, the increase in the article of hides and skins necessary to make gloves, was 57 per cent. in the course of about ten years after those duties were reduced; with regard to wool, the reduction to 1d. a-pound produced a great increase in the price of the article, an article, the produce of the British agriculturist; the French wool being introduced at that low duty, the exports increased to a very great extent; and I think the tod of wool rose from 25s. to nearly 40s. I think there are instances among many that may be quoted from the history of the last and the present centuries, showing the benefit of at least reducing duties (hear, hear). But, then, the right hon. gentleman has proposed a plan which goes beyond the mere reduction of duties to a moderate amount, thereby increasing the import; he has proposed, with regard to the duties on corn, that after three years they shall altogether cease. Now, I am of opinion that if the right hon. gentleman had undertaken this task in 1842 in a different spirit, and had made a far greater reduction in the duties on corn than he then made, it would have been better for the agriculturists as a body, and better for the country in general; but as matters stand now, I am ready to say, seeing the contest that is going on—seeing the struggle that would go on if you attempted any intermediate step either of a sliding scale over a few shillings or a small fixed duty, I am prepared to say, as indeed I have already said in public, that I think the abolition of the duty is the most expedient course for a Government to propose to Parliament (cheers.) Considering the plan of the right hon. gentleman as a great measure, as a measure that is to lay the foundation of a completely new principle with regard to our commercial legislation, that principle being neither to foster one trade nor the other, neither to attempt to promote agriculture nor manufactures, but to leave them "to flourish or to fade" according to the energies and skill of the people of this country, and believing that is the sound principle, I am prepared to give every support I can to the plan brought forward by the right hon. gentleman (cheers). But, Sir, I think it incumbent upon me to say, with regard to the mode in which he has introduced it, that of having a new system of corn duties for three years, that the opinion I had formed in December has been more and more strengthened by everything I have heard since the right hon. gentleman made his plan public in this house (hear, hear). I hear from all parts, from Devonshire, from Roxburghshire, from various parts of Scotland, and from various of the midland counties of England, that the farmers who have been consulted upon this subject say everywhere—"If we are to have the system of Free Trade instead of the system of protection, let us know at once what that system is to be (hear, hear); we would rather have the duties immediately repealed, than take the chance of this new Corn Law which you propose, as breaking our fall, and as intended for our benefit"—(hear, hear). Sir, I think there is great reason in that. In the first place, I think the tenant farmer will be better able to arrange with his landlord as to the particular sums that he will have to pay, if he knows at once what the state of the law is, and has not to wait till February, 1849, to take the chance of what may then happen. In the next place, I think there is some danger to the farmer—but it is according, of course, to what the seasons may be—that in 1848, if the price is low, there may be a very considerable accumulation of corn, and that a glut which would not happen if trade were free, may happen if there is a sudden reduction of 10s. to 1s. in 1849, not owing to the price of corn, but owing to your previous legislation. In the next place, I have always thought, that if there be a danger of competition to the English farmer, the danger will be far greater after the lapse of two or three years than it is at the present moment (hear, hear). It so happens that, in the present year, we know, owing to the bad harvest in some of the countries in Europe, there is very little stock of corn remaining at Dantzic or Hamburg, or those parts of the Continent from which corn is usually introduced, and there is no reason to suppose that there is any great stock in the United States; there is therefore no apprehension on the part of the farmer. I think the way in which the immediate prospect of the duty being reduced to 4s. has been encountered in the market—for I believe the price of corn has generally rather risen than otherwise—is a proof that there is no great danger at the present moment (hear, hear). If there be any danger to encounter, it is when, both on the Continent of Europe and in the United States, preparations are made, the ground has been cultivated, and the seed has been sown, with a view to send in large supplies to the English market, and then at that very moment the duty is to cease. It is as if the right hon. gentleman were to furnish the farmer with a great coat, provided he only wore it in the summer; and were to make it a condition that he should take it off when Christmas arrived (hear, and a laugh). The provision, I think, may expose the agricultural interest of this country to a danger which it would not otherwise encounter. But I would put it to the right hon. baronet whether he will not reconsider that part of his plan? (Loud cheers.) The right hon. baronet has frequently alleged, when bringing forward subjects of this importance, that it would almost be impossible to know the exact effect of the duties proposed, until they had been by himself stated in this house, and the opinions of those who would be most affected by them taken and collected. It does appear to me, as far as I have heard, that with respect to this, which the right honourable baronet intended, no doubt, as an advantage to the cultivator of the soil, the general opinion is that it would not be that advantage. I hope, therefore, that the right hon. gentleman will reconsider this part of his plan. But, as I have already said, I wish the plan of the right hon. gentleman to succeed; I wish to see his measure with respect to corn successful in this and the other house of Parliament, and no vote of mine shall tend in the least to endanger a measure of such a character (cheers). If, therefore, when we come into committee the right hon. gentleman tells me that he has considered the representations made from various parts of the country, but that upon the whole he considers the delay of three years, and the duty to be imposed in the meantime, an essential part of his plan, I for my part shall go out with the right hon. gentleman upon it (loud cheers). I have stated thus much with regard to certain parts of the plan as it affects corn; it is not necessary that I should say much with regard to other parts of the plan which the right hon. baronet explained to the house. With regard to sugar, it will not be necessary for me at this time to make any observation whatever. With regard to manufactures, I should say, generally, that if the corn duties are to be abolished, the taking away protection from manufactures, unless where there is an impost which gives a considerable revenue, is a clear duty to the agricultural body (loud cries of hear, hear). I think you are bound to show them that you abandon protection altogether as a principle, as a principle vicious in itself, and injurious to the country, and not that you are about to subject them to any peculiar experiment, which is so hazardous that you will not subject other parties to the same experiment (hear, hear). I own I doubt if in some instances the right hon. gentleman has acted upon that principle: but, however, that will be matter of detail when we come to consider the various duties (hear). But there is another part of the subject which I certainly cannot approach with any great satisfaction, from the difficulty of treating it. The right hon. gentleman has proposed to give certain relief with respect to local burdens, and especially with respect to the expense of prisons and of prosecutions. I think those amendments in the law are upon their own grounds just; I think they are improvements upon the existing law; I did not hear the right hon. gentleman say that they were offered as compensation, and I do not think any compensation of that kind could properly be offered (hear). But I confess I do not feel sure that with respect to the general burdens of the country, the landed interest, the owners and occupiers of land, may not have more than the share that properly belongs to them (hear, hear). It is a point upon which I feel difficulty, because, although my opinion certainly was that they were thus unduly burdened, I found that whenever a proposition was made (cheers from the Opposition benches)—when my hon. friend, the member for Sheffield, (Mr. Ward,) making a statement adverse to that opinion, asked for a committee, none were so ready as the agricultural gentlemen to oppose inquiry, and to declare that they would not submit the question to investigation (renewed cheers). An hon. gentleman, the member for Radnorshire, gave us rather a long comparison or analogy; he has said that if the shoemakers of this metropolis were ordered alone to pay the police rate, they might well state that they could not sell their shoes so cheap as other persons could sell the different articles they produced, and they might complain of the unjust burden upon them, and that might be so; but if the shoemakers happened to form a majority in this house (a laugh), and if the shoemakers were to say, "We will not have this subject inquired into, we will not let you know whether we do pay more than you or not for the police," I own I should very much suspect those shoemakers of thinking that their case would not prove so right when it came to be sifted as it was plausible in appearance (laughter and cheers). But there is another difficulty in this question. When, about a year and a half or two years ago, there was a very large surplus of about 3,500,000l. in the Exchequer (or indeed more, for there were increased estimates afterwards), I suggested that it might be worth the while of the agricultural interest, if they could at all perceive what was coming on, to have their case as to burdens investigated, with a view to obtaining relief with regard to some taxes,—I mentioned the malt tax, for instance, which I thought pressed heavily upon them; but they would not hear of such a proposition; they said, "Protection must be kept just as it is" (hear, hear). When the right hon. baronet came to distribute those 3,500,000l., he distributed them no doubt advantageously to many interests of the country, very advantageously to the trade of the country, but with no peculiar regard to the agricultural interest (hear, hear); and I for one felt no sympathy for them. I could not vote that they ought to have even the 250,000l. which the hon. member for Somersetshire proposed they should have granted to them, because I thought, as long as they clung to this protection and insisted upon having what I considered an unfair advantage against their fellow-countrymen, they had no claim for having a peculiar relaxation of burdens. But, as the right hon. baronet now proposes the matter, he really would have little more surplus to give. I do not know that he has fairly so much as the 500,000l. or 600,000l. which he proposes. I confess freely that if I had had to propose a scheme upon the subject, it might have differed from the right hon. baronet's scheme, but that there would not have been any more very material relief. (Hear, hear, and a laugh.) For the right hon. baronet has this alternative,—to take what there is of surplus in the Exchequer, to endeavour to lay burdens more equally which are now unequal, or to propose an increase of taxation more severely on the landed interest. Now, that increase of taxation, I think, would be a most inexpedient course; I believe it would expose the landed interest to very great unpopularity; I believe nothing they could gain in point of money would be equal to the odium which would attach to them, if it was to be said that the taxes of the country were to be increased in order to provide a compensation for the abolition of the Corn Laws (hear, hear). For these reasons, therefore, I say at once that I concur in the general scheme of the right hon. gentleman. I wish that the repeal had been immediate instead of deferred (cheers); but in the present state of affairs, seeing the attachment there is on the part of a large portion of the community to this protective system, I think the advantage so great of getting rid of that system as respects corn in three years, and of almost every other protection giving way immediately afterwards, unless it be really some case which will bear argument, that I am unwilling to disturb in any way the settlement of this question (renewed cheers). But I cannot forbear making one remark which fell from the hon. member for Wakefield (Mr. Lascelles) with regard to these plans proposed by the First Minister of the Crown. The hon. member said, that without meaning anything (I am sure he did not) discourteous to those who sit here, he thought the right hon. gentleman more able to carry these measures successfully than we were likely to be. Now, that is an observation which compels me to state, that I do think that measures of the same kind would have been successfully carried, if the right honourable gentleman and those who sit with him had supported plans brought forward by those who are his political opponents in the manner in which we support plans brought forward by ours (cheers and counter-cheers). This matter of Free Trade and Protection, as it has been very justly stated, I think, by the hon. member himself, is not properly one of those questions which come within the domain of party. When Mr. Huskisson brought forward his plan, many of those who sat on his own side of the house were opposed to him; many of us who sat opposite to him gave him our support. Plans of moderating duties, and introducing a tendency towards Free Trade, are not properly Whig plans; they are not exclusively Tory plans (hear, hear). The right hon. gentleman opposite, when Home Secretary, as I have always understood, and as he himself has stated, acted most cordially with Mr. Huskisson in the promotion of those measures. But when the Whig party were in power, and Lord Althorp attempted a reduction of the timber duties, he was met by a party opposition (hear, hear). In 1830, when we all of us who were then in office, two Secretaries of State, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Presidents of the Board of Trade and the Board of Control, voted with the hon. member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers) for going into committee to consider the Corn Laws, with a view, as we all stated, of proposing a moderate duty, we were met, then, by a party opposition, which prevented us going into committee (hear, hear). In 1841, when we came forward as a government to propose reductions with regard to corn, and sugar, and timber, we were met by a united party, containing many members who represented commercial places—many, who, I believe, if they had not been bound by a party tie, would have acted according to their convictions that it would be for the benefit of their constituents that more free principles of commerce should be adopted. The hon. member for Wakefield is an honourable exception to that remark (hear, hear). He voted,—I believe he frequently has,—with my hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton, when he proposed those motions for the repeal of the Corn Laws, of which he is now about to see the triumph; and I congratulate my hon. friend on that prospect (cheers). But I think it is to be lamented that the right hon. gentleman opposite, and those who with him had learned sound principles of commercial freedom, who had been colleagues and friends of Mr. Huskisson, who could not be ignorant of those principles by which the trade of nations ought to be governed, who did not share in those principles which I think totally unsound and erroneous which have been expressed by the Opposition to-night; it is to be lamented that they did unite in party votes in order to defeat plans founded on those sound principles (hear, hear). My opinion is, that if that had not been the ground of opposition, if the Government of that day had been defeated in any other manner, and those measures had been allowed to pass, much of the sufferings of 1842 and 1843 would have been avoided (hear, hear); the right hon. gentleman would have avoided for himself much of the invective and the reproach now cast upon him, as having betrayed somebody or other (hear, hear), when he has been, if not consistent with the course which he took in 1841, true to the interests of his country (cheers). But, Sir, when the hon. gentlemen, the member for Wakefield, tells me that the right hon. gentleman opposite will be more successful in carrying these plans than we should, I say again that it is by our aid (cheers), and in consequence of the conduct that we shall pursue, that the measure will attain its success (hear, hear, from Sir R. Peel, and some other members). I think myself bound to say so, in justice to those who act with me (hear, hear). And if the right hon. gentleman has the glory of adopting plans of commercial freedom which will benefit his country, which will enable the poor man to get a better reward for his labour, which will increase the demand for all the productions of this country, and which, after these questions are settled, will, I hope, open the way to the moral improvement of the people of this country, hitherto prevented by their want of adequate means of comfort (cheers),—if the right hon. gentleman has the glory of carrying a measure fraught with such large and beneficial results, let ours be the solid satisfaction that, out of office, we have associated together for the purpose of aiding and assisting the triumph of the Minister of the Crown (loud and continued cheering).

Sir R. INGLIS said that he was not astonished that his noble friend who had just sat down felt gratified that the numerous and united party formerly opposed to him should be firing at each other (hear, hear). He felt some surprise at the course that the debate had taken, and at the apparent reluctance of hon. members to address the house. He was not surprised that his honourable friend (the member for Wolverhampton) rested under the laurels which he had acquired by the success of the cause which he had so long advocated; but what had become of the new converts to Free Trade opinions on his (Sir R. Inglis's) side of the house (hear, hear, and laughter). He did not wish to say any thing unkind or likely to excite angry or personal feelings, for he was happy that the debate had hitherto been conducted with so much calmness; but he could not help remarking that when those honourable gentlemen were so long silent, his noble friend came to the rescue (hear, hear). His noble friend objected to the statement of his honourable friend the member for Hampshire, as to the difficulties which affected labourers engaged in agriculture, in comparison with those engaged in manufactures, but the objections were merely assertions, and could not be termed arguments. When his noble friend, the member for Liverpool said that he should vote for this measure, he (Sir R. Inglis) felt that such a conclusion was at direct variance with the reasons adduced throughout the speech of his noble friend (hear, hear). A more able speech he had never heard even from his noble friend himself, and he agreed in all parts of it, with the exception of the statement at the close of it, that he should vote for the measure (laughter). He would now detain the house for a few minutes while he went into the general question. He believed that it was the duty of the Minister to endeavour to procure an adequate supply of food at the most equitable and moderate price. Now, he would take the protective system, and he would appeal to any dispassionate person whether under it, in this country, moderate and regular prices were not general? (Hear, hear, and no, no.)

He was aware that some persons looked upon the noble lord the member for London as if he were an ogre (laughter), and imagined that there was nothing too bad for him to do (laughter); but all he would say was, that he preferred an honest enemy, who would say what he meant to do, than one—it was not for him to say an enemy (a laugh)—than one who would not at once take that open course. A great party had been broken up by this latter course, and however he might deplore that occurrence, it was not his intention to say anything which could create an unpleasant feeling, but he could not avoid remarking that he would rather see a measure of this nature carried by honourable members opposite. At what time was this measure brought forward? At a period of profound peace in Ireland, not when, like the period of 1798, there were 200,000 armed men in that country (hear, hear, from Sir Robert Peel)—not when, as they had witnessed three years ago, that country was disturbed by monster meetings (hear, hear, from Sir R. Peel). How was England situated when this measure was brought forward? England was in a state of almost unexampled prosperity in every department of industry, and that prosperity, be it remembered, had grown up under the system of protection. There was no breach of trade in England which had been at any period so flourishing as in 1846. Why, then, was this measure brought forward? Quia non movere was a good motto. Let well alone. If we were well, why take physic and die (cheers from some county members)? He saw nothing in the circumstances of the times in which this measure was proposed which could be any justification of such a change, and he would, therefore, cordially support the amendment of his honourable friend the member for Bristol.

Mr. FITZMAURICE next rose, but he spoke in so low a tone as to be nearly inaudible. He expressed his decided advocacy of the system of protection, not only for agriculture, but for every other branch of industrial employment, all of which had long flourished under the system of protection. Free Trade would, in his opinion, throw land out of cultivation in exact proportion to the quantity of foreign corn imported. It had been said that America would take our manufactures in exchange for her corn; but suppose instead of taking our manufactures she should insist on having gold, would not the consequences be most disastrous to this country? And he was putting no supposititious case, for he would ask the right honourable baronet at the head of the Government whether he did not know that nearly three-fourths of the whole of the shipping which came into the port of London, during the last quarter, laden with corn, had left England in ballast; or, in other words, with English gold in exchange for their corn. He thought that an efficient change would be secured in the present Corn Law, if they would take the averages by weight, instead of by measure. Bread and wheat would then be at corresponding prices, and the great monopolies in Mark-lane would thus be destroyed. It was not surprising that at present the farmers of England were in great doubt and anxiety. No thing could be worse than that eternal change from which they had of late suffered so much, which interfered at once with the process of farming, and with the regulations of labour. No wonder that they were in doubt, when the highest in the land were changing their opinions every six months with respect to the law which ruled the farmers' destiny (hear, hear). As to the farmers of England, it was much the same to them in the end whether they were killed by the puncture of 10,000 needles or by the deadly thrust of one sword: they might as soon die by the manly open thrust of the honourable member for Stockport, as by the mince-meat, ladylike interference of the right honourable baronet. But the right honourable baronet having been placed in the high position which he now occupied by the exertions of the farmers, could not be surprised if they now turned round, and in the bitterness of their feelings, said—

"Blow, blow thou winter wind,
Thou art not so unkind
As man's ingratitude." (cheers.)

Mr. S. HERBERT.—If I were called upon to cite authority in confirmation of my opinions, and in favour of the expediency and justice of the course which her Majesty's Ministers are prepared to adopt, I think, of all the speeches I have heard this evening, I should select the two last speeches of my two hon. friends as those which furnish the strongest arguments against the conclusions which they announce as their convictions, and against the course which they intend to take on the present question. An attempt has been made to show, in a speech mixed up with much hostile feeling and prejudice against the conduct of her Majesty's Government, that there are no circumstances existing in this country which call for legislative interference—still less that there are grounds for interference to stop the usual course of law—that nothing has occurred, either in this country or in Ireland which could have justified all parties in stepping out of their previous course, and announcing a great change of opinions—a change of opinions forced upon them by different circumstances, which no one by possibility could have contemplated. I wish I could agree with my hon. friend that there was not in Ireland any such cause for interference—that there was no cause for anxiety, none to justify any extreme step taken by the Government, none to justify Ministers in proposing to change the laws which regulate the importation of food. The hon. gentleman tells us—and he selects an electoral district in illustration—that there was a larger crop than the average sowed in Ireland, and therefore the loss was not so great as the increase which the unusual fertility of the fields produced. (A voice, "Yes, but potatoes.") Yes, but potatoes are a prime article of food in Ireland; and it is impossible to disconnect the failure of the potato crop from this question of food. It is not necessary for me to expatiate upon the misery of a population depending upon that kind of food exclusively. We have this year a signal instance of the state to which a population may be reduced when it depends on such a kind of food for subsistence, and when that food is not susceptible of keeping from one harvest to another. The commissioners, referring to the opinion that upon the whole the potato crop this year was a very large one, said—"We regret to add that we have been unable to obtain any proof of this, on the contrary, we have seen that the crop was small, and we have it in evidence that it is below the average; but we have also seen it to be heavy, and we therefore conclude that it may, perhaps, be an average crop." From first to last I must say that the reports which the Government has received from the constabulary and from the stipendiary magistrates were most creditable to their judgment in this respect, that as they never gave in to the panic at first, they never gave in to the fool's paradise at last. They never gave in to the statement that there were no sound potatoes left. They never misinformed the Government, and they never in that reaction of the public mind—to which perhaps they are more subject in Ireland than in other parts of the empire—fled to the other extreme, and told the Government that no danger was to be apprehended. So far as the failure of the crop in Ireland is concerned, I wish I stood here in the position of being obliged to state that the reports by which we have been guided are fallacious, our judgment erroneous, our precautions unnecessary. On the contrary, I fear that any inquiry you may institute will give a fearful and melancholy corroboration of the facts on which we have acted, and that our judgment will be proved true in a manner and to an extent which none can regret more warmly than we do. Potatoes are also a staple article of food in the west of England; their use has increased there almost as much as in Ireland. No man has put more strongly than the noble lord the member for London, the paradoxes of a scarcity of food with cheapness, owing to the inferiority of what is produced. So the averages of corn were depressed last season by the inferior quality of the grain. I do not stand on a point of consistency when I frankly avow that I think the law of 1842 has failed (cheers)—that the first time it was tested by adverse circumstances it failed, and signally failed. For short harvests the law of 1842 would have worked, for it was a mitigation of the principle of protection (cheers). Hon. gentlemen forget that the whole object of the Corn Law enacted in 1815 was to effect the transition from the high prices of war to the low prices of peace. Every statesman altered it. How? To increase protection? No; but to carry out the principle in the same spirit in which it originated. Seeing the existing state of matters, seeing the law had failed of its purpose, that food was deficient in quantity and inferior in quality—that the deficiency was common to the whole of Europe—that in consequence of that deficiency other countries opened their ports for importation of grain—while Turkey, Egypt, and others had closed theirs against exportations of grain—that other countries on which we had depended for supplies had become competitors against us for the purchase of grain—under these circumstances I thought, with others in her Majesty's Government, that it was necessary to take steps for meeting the difficulties under which the country was labouring. I am glad to hear from the hon. member for Somerset that he is not one who was adverse to opening the ports—that he was not prepared to oppose such a measure if its necessity were absolutely shown. I regret, even now, that the course we then contemplated was not adopted. I think that in cases of public emergency, promptness and vigour ought to be exercised ("hear, hear," from the Opposition benches). I thought, under these circumstances, that if the Government at once took upon itself the responsibility of these measures, the battle would have been half won (hear, hear). I knew this, moreover, and say what gentlemen may in this house they will not persuade me to the contrary—that the gentry and agriculturists of England were not men to set up their pecuniary or other interests in opposition to the public advantage (hear). My noble friend, the member for Liverpool, (to whose speech, though it has been claimed by the hon. member for the University of Oxford, I also may lay claim, because I think it proves the accuracy of our anticipations of the results of Free Trade), expressed with some earnestness his regret that this measure should have been proposed by the Government of the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel). I have no hesitation in saying that I held the same opinion; and that I strongly advocated the necessity of this measure being entrusted to other hands than ours. The noble lord opposite (Lord J. Russell) has spoken in terms of some bitterness of past differences on this subject. But those differences did not relate to the question of protection or no protection, but to the relative advantages of a fixed duty and a sliding scale. The noble lord is a recent convert to Free Trade; but I think that, as latterly he has, from his party connexions, been so much mixed up with the cause, he had a better right than we had to bring forward this measure, and I, for one, should have been heartily glad if he had undertaken its conduct (hear, hear). I regretted to hear the noble lord (Lord J. Russell) use an expression—whether inadvertently or not I am uncertain—intimating that if we had offered to support him, as he is about to support us, he would have been able to carry this measure. I observed that the expression to which I refer was received with a cheer by hon. gentlemen on the other side, as if they thought there was a wide difference between the conduct of the two great parties in this house on the question now under discussion; and I must say that I think no distinction could be made more unfair, than that which is thus attempted to be drawn. The noble lord said, in allusion to the speech of the hon. member for Wakefield, who questioned the power of the right hon. baronet (Sir R. Peel) to carry this measure, that if we had offered him the same support he is prepared to give us, he would have been as well able as we are to pass this proposition.

Lord J. RUSSELL.—I alluded to the year 1841. I did not refer to anything that has occurred recently.

Mr. S. HERBERT continued.—Then I have misunderstood the noble lord; but I must say that the support we volunteered to him was spontaneously and cordially tendered, and we stated to the noble lord the grounds on which we felt that a private concert between the leaders of parties would have been resented by the House of Commons as an infringement of their rights of free deliberation. The noble lord admitted the truth and soundness of those arguments; but I will say, for my right hon. friend and myself, that no support could have been more cordially and heartily given, than that which we tendered to him. When I hear assertions as to the effect the measure suggested by her Majesty's Government is to produce upon the agricultural interest in this country, I wish hon. members would show us how we are to be ruined by a more extended commerce, and from what countries the abundant supplies of wheat they anticipate are to be imported. I heard an hon. gentleman say, a short time since, that wheat could be imported into London from Poland at 30s. per quarter. Such a thing certainly has not yet happened. If you go to Dantzic you may buy Polish wheat, but I doubt whether you would get it at anything like so cheap a rate as the hon. member anticipates. I am afraid, if he enters into any contract of that description, that ruin will fall upon himself rather than upon the agricultural interest. In Dantzic the prices of wheat are now as high as they are in London; and whenever there is, in that place, the slightest demand for wheat, the price rises rapidly. It must be remembered that in these producing countries the fluctuations in price arise from two different causes; from the nature of their harvests, and from our demand. One place from which a very large supply of corn is expected, which might, it is supposed, interfere materially with our own produce, is Odessa. I have made inquiries as to the state of the markets there, and I find that the price has frequently been 30s., 31s., and 32s. per quarter. At Malta, which is supplied with Odessa wheat, the average price is about 32s. or 33s.; and the cost of the transit of that wheat to this country would bring it to a price at which it could scarcely enter into competition with our own. (The right hon. gentleman here spoke for some moments in so low and indistinct a tone, that it was impossible in the gallery to collect the purport of several of his observations.) You will find it impossible that any great quantity of corn can be brought here from Dantzic or Odessa to compete successfully with our home produce; and those are the two great continental ports from which importations are expected. Spain, where corn can be produced cheaper perhaps than in any other country, receives large importations from America. Great apprehensions are also entertained of the extensive importations of corn anticipated from the United States. I find that in Ohio, the largest and most fertile state in the Union, the population increases much more rapidly than the production. The population has increased from 15,000 in 1800 to nearly 2,000,000 at the present time. The total exports of flour and wheat, from the United States, have been gradually diminishing for the last 15 years. It is time now that we should allay the apprehensions which exist on this subject; that we should prevent the agriculturists of this country from being scared from their propriety by alarms which are founded in delusion. I found, in considering the present circumstances of the country, that a state of things existed which promised a succession of high prices for one, two, or more years. I saw that a great change of opinion had taken place in the public mind on this question. I found that a great change had taken place even in the opinions of the agriculturists themselves; and that among the tenant-farmers there was an impression, which I have heard them express frequently in strong language, that this is a landlord's question. An hon. gentleman who has spoken to-night, has said he considers that any depreciation in the value of produce must be divided between the landlords and the tenants—that it must affect the rent of the one as well as the profits of the other. The tenants had taken leases on what was called the Act of Parliament prices. The market price was below the Act of Parliament price, and the landlord got the benefit of the difference. Sir, I felt that if these opinions were prevalent among farmers holding large quantities of land, it would be impossible to maintain the existing system. The supporters of that system said, "Let us be quit of that which is so uncertain, which depends on Parliamentary majorities, the caprices of members of Parliament, the turns of public affairs; let us trust to our own skill, capital, and industry, and then we shall have nothing to complain of. At all events it will be better than a state of uncertainty." These were the opinions of the occupying tenants; and as to the feelings of the labourers, I appeal to every agricultural gentleman whether they do not entertain similar opinions (hear, hear, from the Opposition side). Sir, a meeting took place in my county (hear)—a meeting which has been alluded to in a different sense by different parties in this house (hear, hear). Now, I am not prepared to deny—indeed, I think on the face of the resolutions agreed to at that meeting it is obvious that those resolutions were not drawn up by working men, that the proceedings were pre-organised and contrived by others (hear). But this I am bound to state, that the statements of those working men as to the difficulties they labour under were correct (hear, hear). I live in the midst of a population as to whom I scarcely know how they exist (hear). That is a question which has disturbed more men's minds than mine. Sir, honourable gentlemen, my colleagues, have thought, and thought painfully, on these things. They have said, "I don't care what change you make. I defy you to make their condition worse." I am not one of those who would say, as hon. gentlemen opposite would, that this state of things is the effect of the protective system. But, at the same time, although it may not have been the cause of these things, it does not follow that it may not help to remove them. I will read to the house a letter I received to-day from a man of great intelligence, who farms what is called "high farms," who manures his land highly, and is thoroughly master of the subject:—"I am quite sure that if the Wiltshire hills were farmed as they ought to be, and as under the proposed measure I hope they will be, you would not find a labourer unemployed in the whole county. Light-land farmers attach too much importance to their wheat crops; they grow corn on too large a proportion of their farm, and do not consume half enough on their land by stock, viz., they ought to produce more beef, mutton, and pork, and less grain. I can, Sir, give you an example how far good and high farming permanently improves the soil. There was a common field in Berkshire which was occupied by several persons,—one of whom was a baker who had three acres in different parts of the field. He used to fatten a great many pigs, which made much very rich manure; this he applied very liberally to his land—and, although it is 10 years since the field was divided, yet the baker's acres may be discovered at this day by the most casual observer, from their increased and surpassing fertility,—thus proving not only the advantages of this high system of cultivation, but the necessity of a long tenure to enable the farmer to obtain such a full return as his energy and capital so well merit. By compliance with the conditions I have above mentioned the landlords' rentals will not be decreased, but their tenants will be prosperous, and their labourers employed at good wages. Another argument which is used by the opponents of Free Trade is, 'the reduction which it will cause in the wages of the agricultural labourer,' founding this opinion on the fallacy that the price of labour varies with the price of wheat. Now, my own experience fully controverts this statement; for, since I have been in Wiltshire, I have sold wheat as high as 78s. and as low as 40s. per quarter, and have only paid two rates of wages, i. e., 9s. and 8s. per week, a variation by no means commensurate with that of the proposed standard; and I cannot but think, if the condition I have spoken of before were complied with, that the increased demand for labour arising from the safer employment of more capital on our farms, and the general better cultivation of them, will more than counterbalance the slight difference in wages which so large a variation in the price of wheat may have caused." There has been much misapprehension on this subject, because hon. gentlemen will draw deductions from what falls under their own eye rather than from a general view. It is incontestible in the manufacturing districts, and we have lately had additional proofs of it, that so far from wages fluctuating with the price of food, the price of food rises while wages fall. When a fall in the price of wheat takes place wages will fall, but when the price of wheat rises, wages do not rise in proportion (hear). Well, sir, for these reasons, and seeing these changes of opinion among the very classes who profess to support those laws, I first thought that they were not maintainable, but still more, I considered that they ought not to be maintained, because being no longer accepted by the community they became most unjust. That this was a time for making the change with the least prospect of the infliction of suffering was an additional reason why it should take place. But I confess other reasons more cogent than these, than a desire for the extension of commerce, or to avoid scarcity; I felt that it was more consistent with honour (a loud cry of Oh, oh! from the Ministerial side). The right hon. gentleman, after a short pause continued. Hon. gentlemen may have a difference of opinion from myself on these subjects—(the rest of the sentence was inaudible.) I was speaking not of the honour of the Government, nor of my own personal honour—I hold that, as far as my personal honour is concerned, I did that which was consistent with the conduct of an honest man. After much doubt on a question on which I had entertained fixed opinions, reluctantly, slowly, I changed my opinions; I did not make light of party engagements; I saw these evils; I knew the intimidation that would arise; I knew of the threats that would be held out of what I should experience if I visited my constituents, because I had chosen, in the exercise of my duty, to follow the dictates of my conscience rather than of personal interest;—I speak in no tone of bravado, for if such a punishment were to be inflicted on me it would be to me a matter of the deepest mortification; but I counted the cost of these things (hear, hear). I knew that my duty to the country required that I should not stand here as the delegate of a mere local interest, to make a scramble with other delegates to get as much as I could from the general pickings; I thought that such a position it would be disgraceful in me to hold, and one which my constituents never dreamt of imposing on me, and, thereupon I acted as I have done. (Hear, hear.) So much, sir, for my personal honour. (Hear.) The honour I spoke of was that of the landed interest only. (Hear.) I say, now is the time to concede with honour, when there is no appearance that your concession is extorted by violence. There is no danger from agitation at your doors. Arguments you have had which I confess have great weight in my mind; but the amount of the agitation of the League, led, though it has been, by men of the greatest ability, has been much overrated. Like the armies we see paraded on the stage, the same men have served for the same parts many times over. The agitation of the League has not been that of masses, such as we have seen in the case of former agitations. It has been an agitation not of force, but of reason. If you do not now yield to reason, to that agitation some day force may be added, and then you will yield, not as now, with honour, but with loss of station, influence, and character. I now come to a ground I wish to touch upon, and which I frankly avow to you is with me a stronger motive than all why we should set ourselves free from the continuance of this law. The public mind is not in the state it was in in 1815. At that time these matters were so little understood that those gentlemen who were the heads of the party who brought forward this question, Lord Liverpool and the men of that time, brought it forward as an exception to a recognized principle. It has been so dealt with ever since. In 1841, when the noble lord opposite brought forward his budget, I frankly avowed my complete adhesion to the principles of Free Trade, but I objected to the mode of their application to corn. I said that corn was an exception from them on account of the rapidity with which they would be applied. But now the public mind is enlarged upon the subject (loud cheers). You have men of all classes, of all shades, and of all colours, and engaged in all domestic pursuits, beginning to think that one portion of the community has a benefit over another. Then, if we are to stand upon such ground as that, we stand upon a mine, upon a rotten footing, and we cannot maintain it (hear, hear). Talk of party, the hon. gentleman says that the party is broken up. I do not admit that this party, Conservative party or Tory party—call it by what name you will—is bound together by no greater object than a Customs' duty upon the importation of foreign corn. Look at the intention of these laws. Was it party intention? We have had Corn Laws ever since the reign of Charles II., and why were they granted? For the purpose of regulating the importation of foreign produce. I could show you cases when the duty was no higher than 6d. a quarter,—when the laws were suspended, and the ports were opened. But it has been said that party is part of our constitution. I think it is contrary to the whole spirit of our constitution (hear, hear). I am not one of those who wish to see the constitution of this country rendered more democratic than it is. I cannot think that the public mind wishes it to be more democratic than it is. I think late events have rather shown that the mantles of despotism which disgraced the world have fallen on democratic rather than on temperate and mixed Governments (hear). I wish to see the aristocratic element preserved in our constitution; and therefore I say, do not peril it on a question in which your motives may be impugned (hear, hear) when once you are convinced, as I am, that these laws are not for the good of the community. I say that, with that opinion, no earthly power can induce me to rise from this bench to defend them. They may say that the country gentlemen are a party having great power and influence; that that power and influence have been given to us to be exercised for the public good; but that we have used it for the increase of our incomes. I cannot deny that these laws have that effect; but I say I should sit with shame upon my face were I to hear such an accusation made, and were I unable to refute it (hear). Hon. members must recollect that great changes had taken place in the last 50 years in the social constitution of this country; that the manufacturing power had increased to an enormous degree; you may dislike the effect of it—you may think it congregates together great masses of men—that you have less security for their morality and welfare; but depend upon it, it is a power you cannot check or control; it has become a permanent element in our society; it has great wealth, and offers great employment; it is a source of that commerce which has maintained our colonial empire and given us the dominion we possess throughout the world. You must recollect, too, that it is now, as it has always been, the great source of our maritime power, and you must also recollect that if you intend to maintain this great empire, and think as I do, that it is possible to carry its free institutions, and temperate liberties, and reformed faith to other parts of the globe, it is by these humble means that you are enabled to do it—it is by extending your commerce that you are able to carry your institutions into every part of the world, and to civilise and exalt the remotest and the wildest regions (cheers). You must recollect, too, that men who give you these benefits are entitled not only to a full share of what they contribute to posterity, but to a full share also of the advantages of the State (hear, hear). My noble friend who opened the discussion at the meeting of Parliament, in one of those eloquent and graceful speeches so characteristic of him (hear), pointed out how if your interest is a commercial interest, if your interest be to have peace, security, and the maintenance of your institutions, that is most likely to be secured. You must recollect that those gentlemen whose pursuits depend so much upon public tranquillity are the best auxiliaries for maintaining those things under which this empire has so long flourished—those institutions which do not depend upon customs' duties, but which have grown with the growth of this country, that require to be constantly amended, but with a tender and reverential hand. I wish to see the two interests of agriculture and manufactures united. If there has been a fault of legislation it is not a fault on either side; but I wait to see these two knitted together. I believe the proposals of the Government have a tendency to cement the two. I believe that the proposals of the Government, being involved in a large and comprehensive scheme, will produce a change in such a way as to produce little loss or suffering to the interests affected; and I believe further, that when the country shall have maturely considered them, and when the constituencies more exclusively agricultural shall have calmly considered them, they will think that those proposals offer a means of escaping from that protection which they no longer require, that they have the means of attaching to themselves large masses of men who have been taught by circumstances to be almost hostile to them; that they may follow their pursuits without doubt and uncertainty, and the loss attendant upon them from which they have hitherto suffered, (hear, hear). I should lament, moreover, to see the class to which you and I belong, and which I consider to be one of the noblest spheres of usefulness that exists in private life in any country in the world—I mean a class of English country gentlemen—debased in any way, or lose its natural influence, and I know no way in which that influence can be so weakened as by your maintenance of a law, from which, in my conscience, I believe you derive no advantage whatsoever, but which I consider to be unjust and impolitic, and must lower you in public estimation, by giving to those who watch your proceedings false, but I admit, most injurious, notions as to the motives by which you are actuated. You have now an opportunity of repairing the greatest error ever committed by any body of men (loud cheers from the Opposition.) I may assert that the gentry of this country have been distinguished from those of all other countries in the world as having never been the advocates of disgraceful immunities; while other aristocracies have been the sycophants of courts, they have borne the chief burdens of the State; they have given to the State their service and their blood and treasure, and from them have sprung some of the most eminent men in the field, the church, or in the walks of science, this country has ever produced. I am anxious that our character should be maintained (hear, hear). Honourable gentlemen laughed just now, but I do think that the law of 1815 was a great error (hear, hear). We offer you the means of repairing it. I trust you will accept it. For myself, my own mind has for some time been firmly made up to it. I believe the measures we propose will be for the interest of all classes of the community. I have confidence in their success in this house; I have confidence in the results that will follow from them; and I leave them in your hands, with the earnest and sincere hope that without previous bias, without party or resentful feeling, and believing that they are for the interest of yourselves, as well as of the community at large, you will sanction the measures which the Government have proposed to you for the public good, and for the public good alone (loud cheers).

On the motion of Mr. STAFFORD O'BRIEN, the debate was then adjourned.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE—TUESDAY.

On the motion of Mr. CARDWELL the order of the day for resuming the adjourned debate on the Customs and Corn Importation Act was agreed to.

Lord EBRINGTON presented a petition, as we understood, from tenant farmers, in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws.

Mr. S. O'BRIEN was reminded by the petition now presented by the noble lord of the statement put forth last night by the noble lord the member for the city of London, that the farmers of this country were now in favour of an immediate repeal of the duties on corn, if they had not previously made up their minds to that extent; and that the noble lord pressed upon her Majesty's Government to take the propriety of immediate repeal into their serious consideration, now that the Government measure had been laid before the farmers and the country, and that a general opinion had been expressed in its favour. Now, whether there was a general opinion among those farmers to whom the noble lord referred in favour of that measure he would not take upon him to say, nor would he pronounce any opinion on the matter; but he would only say that the parties to whom the noble lord referred did not express the opinion of the farmers generally upon this question (hear). He had some hope of directing the attention of the house and the country to a full explanation of their views on this subject. He had not changed his opinions upon this matter; and what he had said before he should probably say now. What the documents were to which the hon. member for Bolton alluded, he was not aware; but at all events his sentiments remained the same as they were last year. His hon. friend (Mr. S. Herbert), who spoke last night, had not only felt it his duty to announce the change of his opinions in reference to this great question, but had uttered a sentiment the end of which was drowned by the cheers from that side of the house, that the law of 1815 was the greatest error this country ever saw (hear, hear). That law might be the greatest error ever perpetrated in this country; but he looked to that side of the house and asked, if it was the greatest error, who were those who had been hitherto injuring the landed interest of this country not to revoke the error, but to persevere in it and maintain it (hear, hear)? The right hon. gentleman said that now he gave them an opportunity of revoking that error. Obligated as they were by the courtesy of the right hon. gentleman, he must say, however, that this was not the first opportunity given to the country gentlemen to repair that error, if error it was. The hon. member for Wolverhampton had often afforded them that opportunity, but they had always refused to avail themselves of it; and the most powerful and skilful reasons why they would not avail themselves of it were the reasons that had been given by the right hon. gentleman (hear). Now, though it might be extremely distasteful to his friends of the Government, to whom he was prepared to address himself, he trusted he might be permitted to do so for a few moments. The right honourable gentleman had said, that if he changed his opinions he should be ashamed of himself if he did not rise and declare so. Now, he (Mr. O'Brien) should be ashamed of him also if he fully and truly believed that he was capable of taking any other course. But, what he wanted to know was, on what principle parties in this country were now to be held together (hear). It might be said this was the old story, and that they were attacking the right hon. gentleman, and making their defence on a bad cause by personalities; but he was as far as any man from imputing other than the most patriotic motives. In this country they had hitherto been governed by party, and it might be a prejudice, but he was not ashamed to own himself a party man (hear, hear). It had hitherto been the custom in this country to uphold, by the discussion of questions of party principles, the distinct enunciation of those principles; having always before them the expectation that they were in this way best eliciting the truth and conducting to sound legislation (hear, hear). It might be observed, that not only had the Government changed the principles upon which they came into office, but they had taught the lesson that protection, as a distinct principle, should henceforth cease to be a bond of party altogether (hear, hear). He (Mr. S. O'Brien) was not in the house before the present Government came into office; the first vote he ever gave was to place them there; but he could only say, as he had laboured and worked for them in the country, that if ever there was an opposition conducted upon party principles, upon party tactics, and for party ends, it was the opposition marshalled, headed, and led by the leaders of her Majesty's present Government (loud cries of hear, hear). The disappointment was too bitter, too great, and too general to be disguised any longer from a fear of personal offence. It was too bitter, too great, and too general, to permit him, even from feelings of private friendship, to refrain from distinctly reprobating it in that house (hear). The right hon. gentleman (Mr. S. Herbert) had said the preceding night, and he really thought that was the sum and substance of his speech, that inasmuch as the law of 1842 had failed, therefore he was prepared to abandon entirely those protective principles upon which he came into office. The right hon. gentleman had said that the law of 1842 had failed; but the word "failure" might be understood in two ways; and when he remembered what the right hon. gentleman was, in February, 1845, when he solicited and obtained the suffrages of the electors of Wiltshire, and when he saw what his right hon. friend now was, when he made the announcement of his being a convert to the principles of Free Trade, he (Mr. O'Brien) must ask him, when he said that the law of 1842 had failed, whether he meant it had failed to the Sydney Herbert of last year, or the Sydney Herbert of this (hear, hear)? He must ask the right hon. gentleman also how he could hope it was possible by any ingenuity, that the members of the Legislature could so frame a law as to answer both the one gentleman and the other (cheers and laughter)? The right hon. gentleman of 1845 would find the law of 1842 a failure if it let in corn too freely, whereas the right hon. gentleman of the present year would find it to be a failure if it restrained the free importation of corn (hear, hear). The right hon. gentleman expected too much if he expected the law of 1842 could succeed with gentlemen of every opinion and of every time. His right hon. friend should remember that even if he were obliged by the failure of the law of 1842 to give up the sliding scale, there was still the principle of a fixed duty to fall back upon (laughter)—that there was still a middle point between a sliding scale and entire Free Trade, of which he might have availed himself if he had chosen. He (Mr. S. O'Brien) thought that the right hon. gentleman judged too harshly and too severely of a law which was passed only three years ago, and which he had declared had answered for two of these years and had failed in only one, if he had no better arguments than these to induce him to give up the principles of a life (hear, hear). The right hon. gentleman had also stated that this was not a question upon which he could consent to stand there as the delegate of a mere local interest, or to make a scramble with other delegates for the general pickings. He (Mr. O'Brien) presumed the right hon. gentleman did not mean to charge those who stood on that side of the house, whatever might be their opinions on the controverted question then before them, with being more anxious for the pickings, or more inclined to act as delegates of mere local interest, than the right hon. gentleman himself; but if he meant to describe the present contest as a mere scramble for pickings, or the persons who opposed the Government as the mere delegates of local interests—if he said that the great Conservative party could not, and ought not, to be split asunder or bound together by no greater object than a customs' duty upon an article of importation, he (Mr. O'Brien) must say that that was talking too lightly of a great question like this. If it was merely a question respecting a duty on the import of only one article—if it was only such a small change as this, how was it that such passions had been agitated and such a panic raised concerning it? It was not merely a question of a duty on the import of only one article when they put out the Government of 1841 (laughter and cheers from both sides of the house). It was not merely a question of a customs' duty on only one article when the present members were sent to that house by the constituencies of the country. It was not merely a question of duty on one article of import when the Conservative party were returned by a triumphant majority. It was not merely a question of duty on one article of import when that party placed the present Government on the Treasury benches (loud cheers). Let them say, if they pleased, that they had changed their opinions on this question; let them say so freely and manfully, and they (the protectionists) might respect their motives, although their confidence in them might be impaired; but let them not represent it as an insignificant question (hear, hear). Let them not say that the gentlemen opposite, who had laboured so long and so zealously to bring about this measure, had done so merely on a question of duty on one article of import. Let them not attempt by such phraseology to disguise the magnitude of this great question. It might be for good, or it might be for evil—there were strong antagonist opinions concerning it; but he had never heard till then, and he wished he had never heard it at all, that it was a light and trivial question. The right hon. gentleman afterwards, in alluding to Ireland, had charged the hon. member for Oxford with saying that there was no necessity for moving in a question like this, because the potato rot in that country was not so bad as had been stated. Now, he (Mr. O'Brien) had no wish whatever to under-rate the imminence of the evil now impending over Ireland. He was rejoiced that the hon. member for Cork was to bring the subject under the special consideration of the house to-morrow (Wednesday); but he must say that his right hon. friend the member for Wiltshire had greatly misrepresented—he had almost said, except that such a term would not apply to the right hon. gentleman, unfairly misrepresented—the hon. member for Oxford. He (Mr. O'Brien) understood him to say, that for a particular evil there should be a particular remedy—that he should be the last person to refuse to open the ports in the case of a famine in Ireland, but that he did not see how the exigencies of the case could be met by an alteration in the corn system—that his objection was that the Government were announcing a new principle for what he hoped was only a casual disaster, and that they announced this new principle without attempting to trace the connection between the existence of the Corn Laws and the continuance of the famine in Ireland, or to show how the total abrogation of those laws could possibly relieve the threatened distress (hear, hear). And he (Mr. O'Brien) might remark, in passing, that while the Government were bringing forward the question of Free Trade for the relief of Ireland, all the letters he had from that country—and he might also add the hon. member for Limerick, whose influence was only second to that of the hon. member for Cork—had all pronounced against the scheme of Government; they all asked employment for the people, they all prayed that the railways might be forwarded; they all said that great difficulty would be felt in obtaining seed for potatoes next season; but at the same time they all said that if Government wished to ruin them, their plan was to destroy their agriculture (hear, hear). He (Mr. S. O'Brien) begged also to remark, with reference to the potato disease, that three months ago he had been in Ireland and came over to England, but was soon called back to Ireland again by the reports of the failure of the potato crop and its alarming ravages. The disease was making such rapid progress then that he did not believe there would remain one single vegetable in Ireland, and, therefore, he set about examining people of practical experience on the subject. In a short time he learned that the disease, instead of progressing, began to mend, and after taking all the precautions he could against the disease, he again returned to England, yielding so far to the "fool's paradise," as the right hon. gentleman (Mr. S. Herbert) had called it, that there was no cause for alarm. He regretted to say, however, that since then the rot had set in again, that continued wet weather, or some other mysterious cause, had occasioned an increase of the rot, and, therefore, he did not hesitate to say that there never was a country which called for more urgent measures than Ireland now did; and he had great satisfaction in being able to say that he firmly believed there never was a Government more anxious for the welfare of that country than the Government which now occupied the treasury benches (hear, hear). But he thought it fair, both to the hon. member for Oxford and himself, to remark, that it was difficult to see how the famine in Ireland could be met by a change in the corn system; that it would be necessary to alleviate the misery of Ireland much more rapidly than they could bring the proposed change to bear upon it; and that he did not see, if the ports were open to-morrow, how one quarter more of wheat, or one hundred weight more of meal, would reach one poor person in Ireland, unless they were accompanied by other measures (hear, hear). The right hon. gentlemen had said that he lived in the midst of a population as to whom he scarcely knew how they existed, and he cautioned the opponents of the Government measure to beware how they resisted the attempt to remove the misery of the labourers to whom he referred. Now, he (Mr. O'Brien) would say, that it would be generally found that the poverty in the agricultural districts was greatly attributable to the owners of the soil (hear, hear); and that there was this great advantage which the agricultural districts had over the manufacturing districts, that when they saw a parish destitute, when they saw cottages wretched and the labourers half starved and half clothed, if they inquired who were the landowners of the district, they would generally be able to bring the cause home to them (cries of hear, hear, hear). He thought it right to say, however, that he had had a conversation that morning with a Wiltshire farmer, who had borne testimony to the fact that the distress in that country was not attributable to the right hon. gentleman (hear, hear). But he (Mr. O'Brien) must say, on the other hand, that if the right hon. gentleman brought forward the cause of distress in Ireland as a reason for the proposed change, he had totally failed, inasmuch as he had failed to show how the repeal of the Corn Laws would remedy the evil. The right hon. gentleman had read a letter from a farmer in Wiltshire, to the effect that if agriculture were conducted on certain improved principles, which he stated, the labourer would be better off. This was just saying, in other words, that employment, and the wages of employment, tended to the happiness and morality of the labourer. But if he had followed up his argument and shown how the repeal of the Corn Laws would tend to the cultivation of the poor soils, he would not only have made out his case completely, but would have furnished an argument in favour of the abolition of the Corn Laws which had never yet been given on the other side (hear, hear). As the right hon. gentleman had declared his inability to show how the labourers in Wiltshire lived, it might not be wholly unsuited to the occasion if he referred to the manner in which the labourers of Northamptonshire lived (hear, hear); and he could tell him that their wages were 12s. and 14s. a week, and that if the right hon. gentleman would favour him with a visit in that part of the country he would show him specimens of cottage comfort and agricultural prosperity which he was sure would gratify his benevolent heart. The noble lord, the member for London (Lord John Russell) in his speech last night laid down three propositions which he assumed to be incontrovertible, the long and short of which was, that protection to British industry was no longer tenable, and that the legislature ought in future to foster neither agriculture nor manufactures, but leave them to "flourish or fade" according to the energy and skill of the people of this country. Now, he (Mr. O'Brien) thought he was not quoting the noble lord unfairly, neither did he think that he was quoting the right hon. baronet at the head of the Government unfairly, if he assumed that the principle so laid down was in future to be acted upon by the legislature of this country. The noble lord assumed that the propositions were true because all political economy had agreed upon them. Now, notwithstanding that he might thereby expose himself to the charge of bigotry and old-fashioned prejudices, and "clay intellect," he ventured to dissent from the noble lord's propositions, and to say, that even if political economists had agreed upon them, there were other considerations which would require him to enter into a statement of the question before he could give his unqualified assent (cries of hear, hear). Writers on political economy, he (Mr. O'Brien) thought, were too apt to confound the science of political economy with that of legislation (hear, hear). His notion of political economy was, that it was a science referring to the accumulation and the distribution of wealth, which he held to be only one among many elements which entered into the science of legislation. But he would proceed to notice the question of protection to British industry—a question which the noble lord the member for London said had recently been interwoven with the question of agriculture—not recently, however, he would have the noble lord to know, for it had been interwoven before the existence of the protection societies. But it was said that labour was the property of the poor man. Very well; assuming this definition to be true, the parties making it must not, unless they wish to be misunderstood, stop there. They must, while they were meeting there every day for six months, for the protection of their own property,—they must tell the poor man that his property, his labour, would not be protected, but that it must protect itself; that they must be left to fight it out with foreign competition; and that they (the legislature) were to sit quietly above, and watch whether they triumphed or not. The axiom of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest, and that the property of the poor man needed no protection, was a very plausible one; but see how it operated. Suppose an individual to buy his paper-hangings in Paris, his carriages in Brussels, and his hardware in Germany; and suppose, while he was looking out of the window of his smart house, or his elegant carriage, he saw the labourers all idle because of the new law which had passed in favour of the introduction of these articles; and suppose he said to them, "My good fellows, I have done my best to make you poor and wretched, but I have not done so from any selfish motive. On the 27th of January, 1846, it was propounded by the head of the Government that the property of the poor needed no protection, and that in future we should all buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest, and I have only a wish to promote my own interest by acting upon those principles." What poor consolation this would be to the poor workman. He begged the house also to think not only of the amount of poverty which these proposals, if carried out, would occasion, but of the amount of alienation and disaffection which they would occasion. In that house they were all rich men (a laugh), more or less he assumed that qualification (cheers); hon. gentlemen who had it not might laugh at the notion of having it. Comparatively they were all rich. They all had had a breakfast that morning and they all would have a dinner before night. But there were millions in the country who could not say so (hear). He might assume, considering the frightful contrast between rich and poor, all in that house were rich. How, then, did the matter stand? The doctrine they had announced was a most selfish doctrine. It was not a question of cotton against corn. But when they spoke of always buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest market, he would ask how they reconciled their principle with that of a poor law? Could they explain why one man's industry was taxed to relieve another man's poverty? In showing that their principle struck against that of a Poor Law he was only arguing against a clumsy, hard, and impracticable dogma on which they never could act; which, if reduced to practice, would alienate the affections of the people, and only increase their own dangers. He was sorry to hear that dogma promulgated in that house, the members of which could not call themselves in any sense the representatives of the poor man (hear, hear); but because, while they talked of respecting the rights of the poor, they had hitherto been acting so as practically to diminish and destroy those rights, they should be careful how they, the representatives of the people, announced that they were no longer able to protect the property which millions of their fellow-countrymen said was all they had in the world. Dr. Adam Smith had specified two exceptions from this rule of Free Trade; and if a state chose to protect corn with the view of securing that regular supply which was conducive to the health and longevity of the inhabitants, to their physical and moral well-being, that State would not act wisely. The amount of the duties was not the question. That which was protection 10 years ago might be more than protection now; to continue it at the same amount might be unjust; it might be fatal to the producer himself (hear). He (Mr. S. O'Brien) protested against any change such as was proposed in a complex state of society like that which existed in this country; and he agreed with the noble lord the member for London (Lord John Russell) in thinking that it would have been better had a single change taken place in 1842, instead of one then and another now; the transition would have been thereby rendered easier—the shock would have been broken. He had not been careless in studying the operation of the Corn Law during the last four years. If he could not agree with those who now thought the protection excessive, he must acknowledge a change of opinion produced by so studying the operation of the law. He had believed that this was a landlord's question, that a sudden repeal would throw a large quantity of land into the market with the effect of deteriorating the price. But, from what he had read and seen, he doubted very much whether such would be the result. If it were a landlord's question, it was only a question of the small landed proprietor (hear), who, on the faith of previous legislation, might have charged his estate to an extent beyond the means which an altered state of the law would leave available for his extrication. But he (Mr. S. O'Brien) looked on this as a tenant farmer's question, and, so far from abandoning his opposition because he so believed, on that ground he took his stand, and refused to assent to the proposed alteration. He might take the opportunity of applying the new philosophy to this tenant farmer's question. The tenant farmer came to the landlord and said—"You see the change that has taken place; you know its effects, and I hope you will allow an abatement of rent. My family has held under your family. We have weathered the storm in difficult times. I have worn your colours; and I shall be very sorry to go anywhere else." (cheers.) The landlord would reply—"My good fellow, I am very sorry for you. You have invested your capital in those drains; I too have invested my capital. You invested yours on the faith of legislative enactments; but so did I. We are told to buy in cheap and sell in dear markets. A gentleman from the manufacturing districts is largely interested in your farm. You talk of feudal times, of days long gone by, of your wearing my old colours. Those are old exploded notions; but as to colours, I tell you, my good fellow, there is no true blue now." (Great cheering from the protectionists). So, unless the landlord acted towards the tenant with better faith and kinder feeling than the agricultural interest had experienced, the tenant farmer must go forth on the world. A few months ago a farmer came to him and said, "I have got a fortune left me." "Take your good land, then," was the reply, "and farm it for yourself." "Why," said the farmer, "there are the gravestones of four generations of my race in the churchyard—father, grandfather, great-grandfather, and great-great-grandfather. I will not invest my money anywhere else; I shall stick to the old farm." To his mind the heart of that old fellow was worth a very heavy volume of political economy (cheers). And (continued the hon. gentleman) it is hundreds of thousands of men like that—of men, not with such fortunes in their pockets, but with such hearts in their bosoms, whom you are driving forth by your legislation with broken hearts and ruined families. Neither is it too much to say that when—feeling the effect of your policy—they take a retrospect of the past, their keenest associations, their bitterest recollections of the period from which they will date their blighted hopes and broken fortunes, will not be with the name of Cobden (loud cheers). We will not aid you in your triumph over those old men. We do not envy a triumph which we do not participate; and small in numbers, yet it may not be without some influence, we will raise our voices against the injustice you are about to perpetrate. You may exult in your triumph over a body of men who are loading that table with petitions and who see ruin staring them in the face. Moderation in prosperity and patience in adversity were their virtues, and their greatest fault was that they trusted you, and you are prepared to triumph over them (I can give it no milder term) in strange coalition with men who, true to their principles (cheers from the protectionists), can neither welcome you as friends nor respect you as opponents (renewed cheers); of whom I must say, in conclusion, that the best and most patriotic of them will least rejoice to witness the ruin and downfall of a great constitutional party, and will most deplore the loss of public confidence in public men (great cheering from the protectionists).

Mr. S. CRAWFORD considered that the eloquence of the last speaker was much greater than the power of his arguments; for though he professedly took great interest in the welfare of the working man, he showed the value of his professions by refusing to give that working man cheap food. Nothing would promote the prosperity of the country so much as cheap corn, and therefore it was that he wished to repeal every tax which was imposed on its importation from foreign countries. He then entered into a discussion upon the social and domestic condition of Ireland, and upon the bearing of the changes now proposed upon the labouring population of that country; and after warning the house that the danger of famine in Ireland was not visionary, but actual and substantial, concluded by declaring his intention of giving his cordial support to the proposition of her Majesty's Government on this occasion.

Mr. H. BAILLIE lamented that this question should have been made the war-cry of a party, as it rendered it more difficult to discuss with calmness and without acrimony one of the most difficult questions within the whole range of political economy. After pointing out the fatal results produced by free trade in India, where the free importation of British manufactures had destroyed the native manufactures, and had caused greater numbers to perish by famine than had ever perished under the sword of any conqueror, he asked whether we could be surprised that foreign Governments, witnessing such results, should refuse to try the experiment of free trade upon their own people, and should impose barriers against the free introduction of our goods into their dominions? He did not, however, conceive that this determination on their part ought to induce us to try that experiment upon our own countrymen. It was an old axiom, that there was an intimate connexion between agriculture and commerce, and that any measure which injured or benefited the one must also injure or benefit the other. As our master manufacturers had made greater profits during the last year than during any year previously, it would not be irrelevant to inquire into the causes of that prosperity. Were those causes to be found exclusively in the new tariff? No; they were also to be found in three good harvests which had successively followed each other. Then it was clear that the prosperity of agriculture had been most conducive to the prosperity of commerce; and such being the case, the question arose how could we best promote our agriculture? Was it by affording to it a moderate protection, or by permitting it to meet unmitigated competition with countries which, from their climate and fertility, enjoyed advantages over our own country for the growth of corn? He thought that if we adopted the latter course, a portion of our wheat-land must be thrown out of cultivation, and we must become dependent on foreign countries for a large portion of our supply. It was his opinion that free trade would increase our population, on the one hand, and would decrease our natural means of subsistence on the other. This question, however, could not be decided on its own merits; for before we came to a conclusion upon it we must take into our consideration all the circumstances of the country, and, above all, the mischief of the continuance of that struggle in which the interests of the great masses of the people were arrayed against the interests of a few. We must also take into consideration that besides the two classes in the country now pitted against each other, the leading men of all parties in that house were united in the doctrine that some great alteration in the Corn Laws was necessary, and that those who opposed that alteration were themselves unable to form a Government. We have, therefore, only the choice of two alternatives—we must either accept the compromise now offered to us, or throw out the present Administration to make room for another equally pledged to the abolition of all duties on the importation of foreign corn. Under such circumstances, he should support the proposition of the Government, from a conviction that in so doing he was supporting the best interests of the British Empire.

Mr. LEFROY commented on the speech of Mr. S. Crawford on the wretched condition of the population of Ireland, and asked how this measure was calculated to improve it, or to raise the capital of the landlords and farmers of Ireland, who were the employers of labour? He declared himself compelled, as an Irish member, to oppose the proposition of the Government, which he denounced as a most rash and hazardous experiment.

Lord CLEMENTS had no hesitation in meeting the challenge of the last speaker, and in contending that this proposition would not be injurious either to the population or to the landlords of Ireland. He wished hon. members would inquire how far the Corn Laws had benefited the agricultural population of Ireland. Nothing could be more destitute or deplorable than the condition of the peasantry of that country.

It was forcibly depicted in the report of Lord Devon's Commission, and still more forcibly in the spirited communications of the commissioner of the Times. He bore the highest testimony to the accuracy of that commissioner's statements, and asserted that there was not a single syllable in the slightest degree exaggerated in his description of the calamitous state of the Irish peasantry. What, then, was, or what would be, the benefit of protection to a population in such deplorable misery? Had it been, or would it be, of the slightest use either to the tenant farmer, or had it prevented, or would it prevent, the labourer from standing idle in the market-place? No such thing. He should, therefore, give his support to the Government proposition for the alteration in the Corn Laws. He then expressed at some length his opinions on the other parts of Sir R. Peel's scheme relative to the payment of the police and of the cost of prosecutions in Ireland.

The Marquis of GRANBY believed that Sir R. Peel was actuated by the most pure and honourable motives; but if he had promulgated in 1841 the same opinions which he now entertained, he would not have proposed them now as a Minister of the Crown. It was not a fair way of putting the question to say that the labourer, if the Corn Laws were repealed, would be enabled to buy cheaper bread. The question was, would he be able to buy and to eat more bread? He was afraid that the labourer would not be able; for where subsistence was cheap, labour was cheap also, and the condition of the population most miserable. Sir Robert had told the house that he could not hold out hopes that foreign nations would follow our example or relax the regulations of the tariffs. But even if they did, you might increase your exports, but in the same proportion your home consumption of manufactures would fall off, as your agriculturists would be deprived of funds wherewith to purchase them. He should support the principle of protection, which had mainly conduced to the greatness, the happiness, and welfare of Great Britain.

Mr. GREGORY contended that agriculture had flourished hitherto in this country, not through, but in spite of protection. He derided the fears of the agriculturists that land would be thrown out of cultivation, and that we should become dependent on foreign nations for supply, if we acceded to the proposition of Government. He hoped that the house possessed too much true courage to be afraid of the imputation that this measure was granted as a concession to agitation. The only mischief which he anticipated from it was that which would arise from continuing a portion of the existing duties for three years, instead of abolishing them entirely at once. He gave his cordial support to the commercial policy of Sir R. Peel.

Lord BROOKE, as the representative of a large and important county, explained the reasons which induced him to give, on this his first entrance upon public life, his decided opposition to the commercial policy proposed by Sir R. Peel. The change in that policy was, no doubt, conscientious on the part of the right hon. baronet; but he must say that the conduct of some of Sir Robert's supporters in agreeing to the same change was not equally straightforward, for it was so sudden as to be almost miraculous. He pointed out the inconsistency of Lord Sandon in supporting a measure which he had denounced as unworthy of approbation, and amused the house, now approaching from its age to a dissolution, by comparing it to a decrepit old man, who from the length of his life had lost his memory, and with it all the recollection of his former pledges. He was afraid too that it was imitating the same old dotard in its mode of making its will, and in defrauding its lawful heirs by bequeathing its property to strangers and aliens. He then handled with considerable tact the usual agricultural arguments against the repeal of the Corn Laws, and declared his intention of voting against the Government proposition.

Lord WORSLEY observed that this measure was not brought forward by her Majesty's Government as a measure which they deemed right, but as a measure which peculiar circumstances had rendered expedient. At the last general election no cry was so general as that of "Peel, the farmer's friend;" but now "Peel, the farmer's friend," was introducing a measure which almost every farmer in the country considered as pregnant with ruin to himself and his property. Noticing the observation of Mr. Sidney Herbert, that the country gentlemen of England were entertaining apprehensions of the proposed change not very creditable to their good sense, he asked who were the parties who had first poured those apprehensions into the agricultural mind? They were no less personages than Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham. Having read amid the cheers and laughter of the House extracts from their speeches in direct contradiction to the many advantages which they now proclaimed as likely to result from free trade, he observed, that with the recollection of these speeches fresh in their memories it was impossible that the farmers would not at the next general election choose such representatives as would enable them to demand a revision of the Corn Laws—(hear)—even if they were defeated in their present opposition to the new-fangled scheme of Government. The question, therefore, would not be settled, even if the present measure were passed; but he hoped that it would not be passed even by the present Parliament, which was elected as a protection Parliament; for it was neither wise or equitable to enact a permanent law to meet a mere temporary evil. He urged upon the Government the propriety of appealing to the country upon this subject, and of taking the opinion of the constituencies whether they would or would not abandon protective duties. If they did not, they must remain in their present painful position, in which they were dependent on their opponents for support.

Sir J. GRAHAM—Sir, I have risen to address you at this time chiefly in consequence of the able and powerful speech of the hon. member for Northamptonshire, who addressed the house this evening, and in whose sentiment I most cordially concur, that we ought not to allow this discussion to degenerate into a mere fiscal question (hear, hear). When a great party is on the point of being dissolved, the question, though in itself even insignificant, becomes a great national one (hear, hear). I think that no leader of a great party, such as that which has placed its confidence in my right hon. friend, can be justified for one moment in treating this great occasion, in any other light, except as one of immense national importance, and one that needs the frankest explanation. This is a question that I hope also may not be treated altogether as a question of mere personality (hear). I cannot at all blame my noble friend who has just sat down for the reference he has made to my former declarations on this subject. I admit that the past declarations of opinion made by a member of this house, who either leads, or aspires to lead a party, and declarations made by a First Minister of the Crown, if at variance with the course he now adopts, are subjects not unworthy of reference, and which call for explanation. The hon. member for Northamptonshire made a direct appeal to the Government, and challenges us, if we had changed our opinions, manfully to own it. I answer that challenge. I do frankly avow my change of opinion, and by that avowal I dispose of all the speeches (loud cheers from the Opposition, with counter-cheers from the Protection benches, rendered inaudible the rest of the sentence). Upon the advice given by the hon. member for Northamptonshire, that if I were prepared to make that avowal it is my duty to do it; I now make the avowal, and I only ask the house to exercise patience, and indulge me while I point to the reasons of that change (hear). And that I may stand in the position of a man worthy of confidence, I will only glance at a few considerations explanatory of the course I now pursue, instead of leaving the matter to rest on the individual honour of the person who makes the avowal. If you look at the tests by which change of opinion must be tried, on the part of a particular member, you would find that the first which should be applied is this—does the change of opinion promote his personal interest? Perhaps, under the circumstances, I may be allowed to glance at my personal position. All that I possess is as a landlord. I have nothing to hope for except from the possession of landed property. I have inherited by that property a large tract of land, of inferior soil; and I congratulate myself that by my position as a landlord, if the proposed change be dangerous, it exposes me to as great risks as any landed proprietor in the country. So much with respect to my personal position. Now, as a Minister of the Crown, allow me to ask you to apply a test equally conclusive. Does a change of opinion on the part of a Minister of the Crown increase his strength or consolidate his power? Can there be a doubt, after the unhappy scene which we have witnessed during the two last evenings in the conduct of the debate on this side of the house, that my right hon. friend, before the commencement of this session, being (as is allowed) a leader of great talent, possessing the confidence of a great party, and of powerful and immense influence out of the house, has lost—has, as it is now said, almost dissolved that party, by the conduct which he, from a sense of public duty has pursued (cries of hear, hear)? I will try another test upon that subject, and it shall be the last. Has the Minister, by a change of opinion, acted unfairly towards his political adversaries, and availed himself of that change of opinion to exclude them from office? I think it is not expedient, at this time, to touch further upon that subject; but my right hon. friend, with my entire concurrence, frankly tendered to her Majesty the office which he held as the head of the administration. I certainly concurred in that resignation; and I can truly and sincerely say, it was my earnest desire that this measure should have been brought forward by the noble lord opposite, in whose hands I think it would have been more properly placed (hear, hear). I state that, unfeignedly and frankly, I thought, after all that has occurred, it would have been better for the public, better for public men (hear, hear, and loud cheers). I am stating my sincere opinion—I think it would have been more for the public advantage, and for the credit of public men, if what has been proposed, as it has become our duty now to propose it, had been brought forward by the noble lord opposite; and I may say, and I am sure the noble lord will bear testimony to the truth of what I am saying, that both in writing and verbally I assured the noble lord that if he, as a Minister, brought forward a measure such as was indicated in his letter to his constituents of London, I, as a private member of Parliament would have given to that measure my frank and cordial support (cheers). Now, having disposed of that which more personally related to myself, I may perhaps be permitted to refer to some of the points touched upon by the hon. member for Northamptonshire (Mr. S. O'Brien), and the noble lord (Lord Worsley). The noble lord asks me—is this measure brought forward merely because we think it expedient? He appeared to doubt whether we thought it right. I say that we bring forward this measure, not because we think it expedient, but because we think it right, and because we think it necessary (hear, hear). Then the noble lord proceeded to state, that the time had arrived when this question must be settled. I perfectly agree with him, and I join in the alternative he put; he said it could only be settled in one or two ways, either by absolutely refusing to go into committee upon this question, and to entertain any further proposition in relation to agricultural protection, or else that you must proceed as the Government now advises you to proceed, to the total abolition of protection to agriculture (hear, hear). An hon. member has put the question, as I think, shortly and fairly; he said, the question to be decided is, is the abolition of protective duties adverse to the poor? The noble lord the member for Stamford (the Marquis of Granby), who addressed the house also with great ability, put it in terms equally distinct; he said, the question is, will this alteration in the Corn Laws, not only give cheap bread, but give a greater quantity of cheap bread to the working classes? I must say that this is the issue which I think we have to try—this is the great question we have to determine (hear). The hon. member for Northamptonshire addressed the house with so much ability, that I really was surprised to hear him, even in a passing sentence, speak contemptuously of political economy; he said that the object of political economy, in his opinion, was the accumulation of wealth. I had always understood that the great object of political economy was the distribution of wealth. (Mr. S. O'Brien,—"I said the distribution of wealth")—will the hon. member allow me?—in my humble view the great object of political economy is not the accumulation, but the distribution of wealth, and the application of capital to industry on principles which science and experience shall have proved to be conducive to the happiness and welfare of the greatest number (hear, hear). The question, then, which we have to determine is, is the maintenance of the existing Corn Laws conducive to the interests of the greatest number of the community? Will it insure them an ample supply of food of the cheapest and best kind? The noble lord who has just sat down rather apologised for reading extracts from speeches, because he thought they were not very palatable to the house; I must say, that the extracts he read appeared to me by no means unpalatable (laughter). Will he allow me also, in perfect fairness, to read just two extracts? The noble lord imputed to my right hon. friend that not intentionally, but without intention, what had fallen from him on former occasions

 For Remainder of Debate see our Regular Paper.

Printed at the Whitefriars Printing-office, Bowyer-street, in the precincts of Whitefriars, in the City of London, by JOHN GARNET, printer, of Number 7, Ridgmont-place, Hampstead-road, in the County of Middlesex, and also of Number 4, Earfield-place, Chesham-hill-road, in the parish of Manchester, in the County of Lancaster, and published at Number 67, Fleet-street, in the parish of St. Dunstan-in-the-West, in the City of London, by ADAMANT WATTS, printer, of Number 67, Fleet-street, aforesaid.—Saturday, February 14, 1846.

THE LEAGUE.

No. 126.—VOL. III.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1846.

[3d.]

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

LEAGUE FUND.

All Subscribers of £1 and upwards to the LEAGUE FUND will be entitled to, and receive, a copy weekly of this publication for twelve months from the date of the receipt of their subscription.

Subscribers of half-a-crown, and under £1, will have forwarded to them a copy of THE LEAGUE, containing an acknowledgment of their subscription; and it is requested that all subscribers will be kind enough to send their names and addresses to the offices of THE LEAGUE, Newalls-buildings, Manchester, or 67, Fleet-street, London.

N.B. As there is considerable risk in the transmission of gold and silver by post, parties wishing to forward small contributions to THE LEAGUE FUND are particularly requested to make their remittances by post-office orders.

The Council of the League would also suggest to their friends in the country the importance of transmitting their copies of THE LEAGUE newspaper, after perusal, to such parties (more especially farmers) as may be either hostile or indifferent to the question of Free Trade.

By order of the Council,
JOSEPH HICKIN, Secretary.

IMMEDIATE REPEAL.

Our readers are already prepared for the announcement which we have now the pleasure of making, that Mr. Villiers has given notice of his intention to move, in the Committee of the House on the Ministerial Corn Bill, an AMENDMENT for making total repeal of the Corn Law IMMEDIATE.

After the very satisfactory and creditable intimation given by Sir Robert Peel, on Monday night, that he will acquiesce in the sense of the House of Commons, whatever that may be—that, if such an amendment be carried, he will accept the amended bill, and still regard it as his own—we cannot doubt that ALL Free Traders will be at their posts, prepared to express their opinion in a unanimous vote. The most sensitively and scrupulously timid of our Parliamentary friends can now be under no apprehension that the success of the amendment will endanger the bill. Opposition to the Government on this point will not have the spirit nor the effect of opposition. To outvote Sir Robert Peel will not be to defeat him.

This is a most wise determination on the part of the Government. To insist on the three-years' delay, as an integral part of the Ministerial measure, would have been a blunder which we were all along convinced Sir Robert Peel would not and could not commit. It is no essential element of his plan. It stands in no relation whatever, except in that of direct contradiction to the grounds on which the plan, as a whole, is based. All these demand immediate repeal. The great Free Trade principle, to which he has now given his full and unqualified adhesion, and conformity with which is announced as the rule of our whole future legislation, demands immediate repeal. The frightful emergency which has suddenly resolved all doubts, and ripened half-formed opinion into prompt and vigorous action, demands immediate repeal. So far back as the 1st of November, Sir Robert Peel judged it imperatively necessary to open the ports to the unrestricted importation of food; and, as he said, the other morning, "the necessity which existed for the adoption of this measure on the first of November, is NOW ONLY INCREASED."

The three years' delay was never adopted on its merits. It was only meant as a compromise—a concession to please the landlords, and smooth down landlord opposition. As such it has failed. The landlords one and all repudiate it. The Duke of Richmond will have none of it; he says that immediate repeal would be immeasurably less objectionable. Mr. Miles, the same. He declares, "upon his honour," that both the farmers and himself would "infinitely prefer" immediate repeal; and he gives precisely those reasons for the preference which are so forcibly urged in Mr. Cobden's Letter to the Farming Tenantry. The protectionists of Dorsetshire (who regard Mr. Cobden as the "father of lies," and Sir Robert Peel as something a good deal worse), say the same—so does the Standard. So does everybody, without a single exception, in Parliament, and out of Parliament. If "what everybody says must be true," there never was a truth so indisputably and overwhelmingly authenticated as this. One might, with the most perfect safety, offer a thousand pounds reward to the discoverer of any man out of Bedlam who denies, or doubts, the preferableness of immediate to delayed or gradual repeal of the Corn Laws.

Nothing now remains to be done, but that everybody should say, in regular Parliamentary form, that which everybody thinks—and then the Government say it, too. We are sure that the very happiest day of Sir Robert Peel's life will be that on which he is forced, by the agreeable compulsion of a nominally adverse, but really friendly majority, to clear the greatest and noblest act of his political career of a flaw utterly inconsistent, both with its general principles and its special and temporary grounds, and—as we have shown on a former occasion—most perilous to its practical well-working.

In the unrivalled ability and constancy with which, year after year, under every conceivable circumstance of discouragement, Mr. Villiers has urged on the reluctant attention of a hostile House of Commons, the motion which is so honourably identified with his name and fame, the Free Traders of Great Britain have a sure pledge, that now—when the cause of total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws is all but triumphant—the most strenuous exertions that zeal can prompt, and wisdom and experience direct, will be put forth to render the triumph complete and final.

THE PROTECTIONISTS AND THE PREMIER.

We have, of course, nothing to do with that mere party question between Sir Robert Peel and his "Conservatives," on which such an infinity of landlord rhetoric has been expended during the past fortnight. We must, however, say, of the protectionists' quarrel with their Premier, that if it had been these gentlemen's express purpose to justify him in cutting the connection, they could not have managed the matter better. Their own case is their own condemnation. Their impeachment includes and suggests his defence. Their accusation of "treachery" recoils with crushing weight on their own sordid and miserable selves. Their charge against him of "perfidy" and "breach of compact" is, of itself, a confession of their own faithlessness to the highest duties of legislators—of their utter incapacity even to understand the fundamental moralities of the legislative trust. They quarrel with Sir Robert Peel, not as a bad statesman for the empire, but as a bad steward of their private concerns. He has broken faith with them. They had hoped he would look after their interests, and never mind the empire—and they are disappointed. Their hired "counsel"—to use the similitude which Mr. Francis Scott regards as most expressive of the moral relation of a Prime Minister of England to the landlords—throws up his brief, and stops the cause. They had actually sold the empire to their Peel, by private contract, for a "consideration"—and they are outrageous at not getting value received. Well might the Premier speak of "servile tenure!" He judged wisely, the other night, in waving them and their indictment contemptuously aside, and going at once to the business of the country, without more words—though we do think he might, in common charity, have spared the cruel side-hits at the "British lion," the "flag of protection," and "protection in its integrity." The country asks no apology for the breach of a compact so palpably of the fœdus latronum class.

We have nearly done with these men now. Their power for mischief is pretty well at an end, and it is hardly worth while to trouble ourselves with monopolist absurdities, and impertinences that have lost the significance they once possessed, as indicating the purposes of an irresistibly dominant faction. On the whole, we are willing to let the landlords' speeches alone, and leave them to make their own impressions on the country. One exception must be made. We cannot refrain from holding up to the indignant reprobation of all just and Christian minded men, the almost incredible selfishness and sordidness so audaciously avowed—obviously with the most perfect unconsciousness of offence against God or man—by the protectionist leader in the House of Commons. Should the oratory of a Miles find its way to posthumous remembrance, the future historian will be at a loss for language to express his amazement, that in the nineteenth century of the Christian era, a reputable British legislator could be found to give utterance to the sentiments expressed last Friday night by the member for East Somerset. Mr. Miles is, it seems, perfectly aghast at the idea of the earth being properly cultivated. He abhors the notion of deserts becoming fruitful fields. He cannot speak ill enough of "the supply of corn which they were to expect from America." "It was not alone to the quantity of corn now grown in that country that they should look"—though the matter wears already a sufficiently menacing aspect. But we do not half know the worst yet. "The cultivation of the teeming and fruitful land of the United States was rapidly advancing—the population was increasing at the most extraordinary rate, and that population, active and industrious, occupied a vast and boundless territory, containing some of the richest land in the world. They only wanted a profitable market for the excess of their produce to raise an infinitely greater quantity of grain than they had hitherto grown." Then there are the Polish provinces, and Novogorod, and all Tamboff, with absolutely frightful "capabilities" of food-production—capabilities at present happily suppressed, but now about to be developed into a sort of venomous activity. "All he could say was, that there was an immense acreage in those provinces; they were known for their fine rich loamy soil, and for their vast production; and, immediately the markets of this country were thrown open, a ready opening would be afforded to the different nations of the Continent; in that instant would all these vast and productive lands be cultivated, and just so much as they were cultivated, would the fair lands of our own country be blighted. HE COULD NOT CONCEIVE A PROSPECT MORE DISMAL."

This defies comment. The blinding, perverting force of a sordid interest can no further go. When the inspired prophet of old would depict, by the liveliest and most impressive imagery, the joyful effusion of divine blessings on mankind, he summed up all in those beautiful words of hope and promise—"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." Were Mr. Miles a biblical commentator, he would, we presume, subjoin in a foot-note, "I cannot conceive a prospect more dismal."

We turn with delight from these ravings of a fatuous folly, and a fanatical selfishness, to the wise and generous utterances of a statesman's mind. Sir Robert Peel's speech of Monday night has been characterised as a "speech more powerful, and more to be admired than any which has been delivered within the memory of any man in that house." The eulogy thus pronounced by Mr. BRIGHT will, we believe, be very generally responded to by every reader who is capable of appreciating noble truths and sentiments worthily expressed. Of the special topics of this masterly vindication of the course which he has pursued, as responsible ruler of the empire, during the past eventful four months—this lucid and eloquent exposition of the principles that are henceforth to govern all British legislation—we need not speak in detail. That speech will be read, and read again, wherever the English language is known. What most strikes us in it is the new heart, energy, and eloquence with which Sir Robert Peel seems to be inspired, since he has sunk the party politician in the statesman and the man—emancipated himself from the debilitating and degrading bondage of the "servile tenure"—and won the liberty of speaking the truth. Now that he has ceased to be the advocate of a class, the counsel for a class-interest—and has resumed power, not as a landlord over his under bailiff, but as the servant of the Crown and country—there is an expansion in his thoughts, a force and life in his speech, that are altogether new. He can now do justice to himself and his own powers. Never was there a more triumphant exposition of a great truth—triumphant, not in point of logic only, but in vigorous fearless of its tone and spirit—than that of Monday evening, when the Premier wound up a luminous argument, by challenging all gainsayers to "look back to the commercial history of the country for the last thirty years, whether as regards our colonies or our home transactions, and point out one single instance when either producer or consumer was injured by relaxing the prohibitory system," and scornfully asked, "Is it not strange how gentlemen can forget historic facts, and ally themselves to their own infatuations?" And never did a Prime Minister, of this or any other country, speak words more instinct with power—more certain of finding their way to the heart and soul of a great nation—than those in which he appealed to Englishmen, to improve the magnificent opportunities that God and nature have given them, proclaimed industrial progress as England's destiny, and industrial freedom as England's law:

"The question you have to decide is simply this—WILL YOU, IN THIS ENLIGHTENED AGE, ADVANCE OR RECEDE? Remember, the eyes of the world are upon you. Oh, act a part worthy of yourselves and of your country. Will you advance or recede? Which is the policy best suited to a great commercial empire? Remember your position—remember your great national reputation. LOOK TO THE ADVANTAGES WHICH GOD AND NATURE HAVE BESTOWED UPON YOU. Look to your geographical position; on the confines of Western Europe, the connecting link between the North of Europe and the Continent of America. Remember that the improvements of navigation and the applications of science have brought you within ten days of Petersburg, and within ten days of New York. Look to your physical advantages—the nerves and sinews of manufacture—iron and coal—which abound throughout your country. Look to your acquired advantages, possessed as you are of a capital tenfold greater than that of any country in the universe. Look to the inexhaustible mine of wealth that is to be found in the unwearied perseverance, the indomitable skill of your people; look to their talent—their ingenuity—their great mental power. Look, too, to your free institutions; your unshackled press; your glorious constitution, which, though it prohibits licentiousness, affords rational liberty to all. Look, I say, to all these things; think of the glory England has acquired from the equator to the pole, and tell me, IS YOUR'S A COUNTRY TO DREAD COMPETITION WITH ANY COUNTRY ON THE FACE OF THE EARTH?"

This is a "great fact," indeed—a speech like this—from a statesman, who has a majority ready waiting to make his word law. It is worth having toiled seven years, to hear such words from the lips of the first Minister of the British Empire; to hear them with the certainty that they will be read and pondered over by tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of Englishmen—that they will sink into the national mind, be embodied in national law, and become part and parcel of the national history—that they will reach to the remotest ends of the earth, be translated into every language spoken by civilised men, and, in their remotest workings, change the public opinion of the world.

THE KING OF SPADES.

Those charitable persons who so good-naturedly took for granted that a successful railway specu-tor must needs make a wise lawgiver—who indulgently excused absurdity by the plea of ignorance, and were sanguine enough to hold that a man who extemporised nonsense in July would study, reflect, and become rational by February—are now undeceived. The oracle of the railway world, the idol of the great stag interest, has spoken again—and mankind know, once for all, what is in him. Mr. Hudson has given us his true measure. His pretensions as a politician and man of sense are now made level to the meanest capacity.

Mr. Hudson has "deeply reflected and thought upon the question in its various bearings"—and the result is before the world in general, and his proud and delighted constituents in particular, in his superlatively silly speech of Tuesday night. The representative of one of our greatest industrial interests—a man pledged, by the fundamental necessities of his position and relations, to the cause of commercial and industrial progress, and to large and bold views of all commercial and industrial questions—a man prominently identified with one of the grandest social revolutions known to history—is not ashamed to endorse and circulate the vulgarest and stupidest fallacies of a rotten cause, and an expiring and disgraced faction. All the antiquated and exploded nonsense of landlordism finds a ready advocate in the Railway King. Platitudes which disgrace the very dukes themselves, are mouthed with the most stolid self-complacency by this representative of the cause of industrial science and national growth. He seems to like the trash, as if it were his own. He, too, has the ineffable silliness to talk of "land thrown out of cultivation" in consequence of the increase of everything that makes land worth cultivating. A man who has seen land rise five, ten, or twenty fold in value, through the extension of trade and manufactures and the opening of new markets, "believes" that without the artificial stimulus of Parliamentary prices, "the farmer will not be able to cultivate the land, even if it were let without rent"—in other words, land in England is naturally and intrinsically valueless. And a man whose life is passed in the presence of the most startling and splendid achievements of the industrial genius of Englishmen, has the almost incredible poltroonery to deprecate competition, and "believe that English labourers cannot contend with labour from abroad."

A precious legislator we have got, truly, in this railway king! For Irish famine, the simpleton would prescribe a—PUBLIC SUBSCRIPTION!! the said public subscription to be expended (if we rightly understand the royal logic) not in bringing more food into Ireland for the Irish people to eat—this would only make matters ten times worse. His Railway Majesty is as frightened as a duke at the notion of food coming into the country. An "extensive importation of foreign corn" knocked up his railway schemes, some years ago; and so, extensive importation is to be dreaded as one of the plagues of Egypt. This accomplished thinker never troubles himself to ask why an extensive importation of foreign corn need be more embarrassing to railway enterprise than an extensive importation of foreign tea, foreign sugar, or foreign cotton. He stops at the "extensive importation." There is the mischief. That's where it is, gentlemen. The harm is in the supply, not in the siege and the famine.

Sunderland really deserves all this. The humiliation of having so unspeakably empty-headed and conceited a representative is the fit retribution—we own it is a severe one—for the electoral dishonesty that bartered away public rights, for the beggarly bribe of "local interests."

QUARTER OF A MILLION FUND.

As the time for the final struggle approaches, the exertions of the Free Traders must be increased, and every effort made to establish our principles in their full integrity. The necessity for fresh zeal and fresh vigilance increases every day, and the expediency of strengthening the League for the decisive issue becomes more and more apparent. Monopoly will only yield to the resolute determination of the entire people, and this resolution will be best manifested by exhibiting how widely and how deeply the importance of the great cause is felt through the length and breadth of the land. Sir Robert Peel has declared that he will not abandon his scheme, even though he should be forced to substitute immediate for deferred repeal. The Westminster election has shown that the delay of three years is not acceptable to the country; the crisis has, therefore, arrived, in which it behoves us to exert all our strength, and put forth all our resources. The moral effect of the great Quarter of a Million Fund is even of greater importance than its financial amount, at this peculiar juncture. It is felt to be an expression of opinion which admits of no mistake or misrepresentation. It has struck terror into the protectionists, and broken the harmony of their camp. The demonstration must be continued, in order that its effects should be complete and decisive. During seven arduous years, the appeals of the League have been eagerly and nobly responded to by the people of England; and with unabated confidence we now call upon them to make still more vigorous efforts for a final campaign. Victory is not yet won; there are many signs which intimate that our cause has yet to encounter many perils and many hazards. The battle will not be won for us by any combination or derangement of parties. Never yet was any great boon won for the people which was not achieved by the people. A dissolution of Parliament is menaced, and whatever may be the fate of the measure now under the consideration of the legislature, we believe that the period for a dissolution is not far distant. Free Trade must be represented on every hustings, and its voice heard in every polling-booth. Bribery and intimidation will be marshalled against us, as they were before, and we must meet them with every legal means which the constitution places at our disposal. The contest with which we are menaced will be arduous and expensive, but it will also be final. Providence, in its wise dispensations, has brought round a combination of circumstances the most favourable for the perfect establishment of those sound principles of wisdom, justice, and true charity, which we have so long supported; but we shall be deservedly the mockery of mankind if we allow the opportunity to pass unimproved.

It is not to be expected that such another combination of circumstances can be expected in the course of a generation. The repeal of the Corn Laws may be effected totally and immediately, without disturbing a single existing interest. The state of the Continental markets liberates the British farmers from all the possible evils that may be dreaded in a period of transition; employment is prepared for labour so soon as the food is free by which labour must be supported. The doom of the present Corn Law is sealed; but there is great danger of our being subjected to a more insidious system, and one which it will be far more difficult to remove. When the breach is made, and the storming parties formed, it would be sheer cowardice and sheer folly to listen to proposals of compromise and capitulation. Let us nerve ourselves for the final effort; let each contribute according to his means his share in achieving a complete triumph. Half a victory under present circumstances would be worse than a defeat, for we can never again expect to hold so favourable a position in a field of battle.

Under these circumstances, we appeal to our countrymen. Come forward and help us freely, promptly, and largely, ere the great opportunity be lost for ever. What you have done before will be rendered unavailing if you hold back now. The vessel is in sight of port; but there are breakers ahead between us and the harbour. In the brief interval between us and safety, every one of the crew must be watchful, and must be active. Our fund, consecrated to advance the great cause of "Glory to God and good to man," must be placed above the chances of those unexpected exigencies whose advent no man can foresee, and whose amount no man can calculate. The hour of our deliverance is at hand if we are true to ourselves; but if we fail at the crisis of our fate, our certain doom is disappointment, aggravated by the consciousness that it has been occasioned solely by our own coldness and neglect.

MR. STAFFORD O'BRIEN'S CHARGE AGAINST MR. M'GREGOR, OF WILFUL MISSTATEMENTS.

Mr. S. O'Brien, in his speech on Sir Robert Peel's measure for the repeal of the Corn Laws, took occasion to make a most unjust and unfounded charge against Mr. M'Gregor, the Secretary of the Board of Trade, accusing that gentleman of having in his work, "The Commercial Legislation of England and America," made statements to suit the arguments of the Free Traders, not founded on facts. Mr. S. O'Brien is the chairman of the publication committee of the Protection Society, and in his accusation has been too forward in measuring Mr. M'Gregor by his own standard. That society has not scrupled to make wilful misstatements to advance its own objects; and our readers cannot have forgotten our frequent exposures of its disgraceful garbling of quotations from Adam Smith. We do not wonder, therefore, that Mr. S. O'Brien should think others capable of the like unworthy proceedings. But let us see how a few plain words can put down the charge:

Mr. O'Brien states that Mr. M'Gregor has given the amount of four excise duties received on spirits for the United Kingdom, as £241,456*l.*, whereas it ought to have been £241,456*l.* Mr. M'Gregor did no such thing. In the corrected sheet (which we have before us), the account stands thus:

For Great Britain	£4,226,951
For Ireland	1,014,505

Total £5,241,456

How, then, could such a mistake have been made by such a profound Pundit as Mr. O'Brien? We will tell him.

He had the uncorrected sheet to go by (which we have also at this moment before us), where the account stands thus:

Received for Great Britain ..	£4,226,951
„ Ireland	1,014,505

Total £4,241,456

Mr. O'Brien stated that such an error would be disgraceful to a school-boy who so drew up accounts; whereas the man who could not see that such an error in an uncorrected sheet is not attributable to the author but the printer, must be worse than any school boy, even at "Do-the-boys Hall." There is another alleged "disgraceful misstatement" as to the Malt Tax—it is of a similar kind, the misplacement of a figure 5 in the uncorrected sheet, which is placed right in the corrected work!

What a mountain in labour is this!! Lastly, Mr. M'Gregor has been charged with bringing before the public his dull romances! Mr. M'Gregor wants no defence on this score from us. His "dull romances" have enlivened the present generation to their true interests; and, with his predecessor, Mr. James Deacon Hume, he will be remembered as a man who did good in that generation when the stupid misapprehensions of the whole school of which Mr. O'Brien would fain be an ornament, will not only be forgiven—but forgotten!

MR. BRIGHT'S SPEECH ON TUESDAY NIGHT.

(From the Sun)

The great feature of the evening—the feature by which it became conspicuous amongst its predecessors—was the circumstance of the League having at length mingled in the conflict of tongues, having at length broken its "sullen silence," having at length descended among the rhetorical gladiators of the Commons. And this first thrust, as it were, of their intentions within the echoes of the Parliament House was allotted to Mr. Bright, owing to the unfortunate indisposition which has excluded the hon. member for Stockport just as his earnest and unmitigated exertions were driving matters to a consummation. Still, maugre the crushing and solid reduplication of facts by which Mr. Cobden's oratory acquires such extraordinary influence, the opening speech of the Anti-Corn-Law Leaguers could scarcely have been more chivalrous, more imperative, more dignified, and honest, and magnanimous, than it proved to be under the auspices of Mr. Bright. In it that honourable gentleman excelled himself; the singularity of his position, as he rose to address the (miscalled) Oppositionists and Ministerialists, seemed to animate him to an unwonted pitch of rhetorical excellence; his periods were, as usual, adroitly and elegantly turned; but, in addition to this, they alternately glittered with satire, and burnt with energy, and thrilled with a tone even occasionally pathetic. Nor was there anything forced or conventional in his speech; he became effective without apparent labour, and never appeared to strive for the attention of his auditors. And indeed this very aspect of being spontaneous and unaffected lent to each opinion its principal interest. There is something absolutely noble, there is something admirable, there is something great in the pure and generous eloquence with which the hon. member enlivened his former antagonist, the courageous, the large spirited, and now popular Sir Robert Peel. "I watched the right honourable baronet go home last night," said Mr. Bright, "and I confess I envied him the ennobling feelings which must have filled his breast after delivering that speech—a speech, I venture to say, more powerful and more to be admired than any speech ever heard in this house within the memory of any man in it." This was no idle compliment, it was no ebullition of sympathy, it was no favour carrying laudation; it was full-hearted, it was untridled, it was most strictly deserved. And in a subsequent passage we discover a death-blow to the incessant recrimination hurled at the devoted head of the Premier; a few simple syllables, in which the jeers of Messieurs the Protectionists are smothered up for ever. "When the right hon. baronet resigned," said he, "he was no longer your minister; he came back to office as the minister of the Sovereign, as the minister of the people; and not again as the minister of a class, who made him such for their own social and private objects." As such, namely, as a statesman actuated simply and ostensibly for the good of his country, for the just maintenance of the constitution, for the integrity of the empire, the confidence of the monarch, and the general happiness of all classes of the people, we honour the heart and admire the intellect of the Prime Minister; while as a man animated with purely liberal sentiments, and as one ready to acknowledge justice in whatever garb she may assume, Mr. Bright has no insignificant place in our estimation.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

THE FREE-TRADE MIRROR OF PARLIAMENT FOR THE SESSION OF 1846

Fifth Week, ending Saturday, February 21.

Our notice of the great debate, last week, terminated with Thursday night, which, but for the speech of Lord Morpeth, would have been very dull. Friday night however, transcended it. Four speeches were delivered, three of which were of excessive length and excessive tediousness; the exception was an excellent speech from Mr. Ward, at once telling and pithy. But for some little characteristic occurrences, nothing could have been more exhaustive than the protective oratory of that night.

Mr. Miles, the Aristarchus of Protection in the House of Commons, made his "great display" on Friday night, loaded with an unwieldy and undigested mass of documents, which were expressly prepared for him at No. 17, Bond-street. The reading of them was one of the most dreary and monotonous things imaginable. As parchment after parchment was taken up, the sight of each formidable document called up a suppressed moaning sound, which we do not imagine to have proceeded from any excess of pleasure. Mr. Miles at last became so excited by his own arithmetical frenzy, that he was fairly on his way to the middle of the floor, when good Sir Robert Inglis rose and gently pulled him back by the skirt of his coat. The honourable member for Oxford then resumed his seat, looking more sleek and demure than ever, and Mr. Miles pursued his dismal argument. One incident, and only one, enlivened his speech of three hour's duration. Reading statements of the extent, capacity, and population of different districts in Russia, which the document he held described as being able to supply all Europe, he came to the province of Tamboff, covering he said, an acreage of twenty-five millions of square miles. This blunder, associated as it was with the recollection of Lord Stanley's famous adoption of the blunder about Tamboff fertility, raised most extraordinary laughter and cheering, some members, in ecstasy, actually clapping their hands. Mr. Miles corrected himself by substituting thousands for millions; and he concluded a long speech, by telling Sir Robert Peel that the country was not prepared for his proposed changes; and assuring the House that when the various interests affected understood their own interests, they would rise unanimously against them.

But we have forgotten Mr. Francis Scott, one of the sons of Lord Polwarth, and the representative of Roxburghshire. He, as did also Sir Howard Douglas, occupied the early portion of that evening with long speeches as tedious in their delivery as they were contemptible in style and argument. Mr. Francis Scott, however, proved the truth of the adage, that he who is his own counsel has a fool for his client. He compared Sir Robert Peel to a lawyer, who, after taking a fee for advocating one side at the assizes, took to the other side when the case came to be argued on appeal; and was, of course, imitated by "juniors" and the attorney. Some time afterwards, he admitted that improved facilities of locomotion, and other causes, enabled the farmer to carry on cultivation at a very reduced cost. The House, at the time, was very quiet, for it was the important hour that lies between seven and eight o'clock, the hour of dinner. Sir Robert Peel, who was sitting immediately below Mr. Francis Scott, turned round, and, in a good-humoured under-tone, asked him, "Whose counsel are you now?" This put Mr. Scott into a terrible passion. He could not see the joke; and absolutely stormed away, as if Sir Robert Peel had insinuated that somebody had given him a guinea to plead the cause of protection! He protested in loud tones that he was counsel neither for the agriculturists nor the mercantile interests, nor for the foreigner, but for the interests of Great Britain. He then proceeded to admit that the theory of Free Trade was a beautiful one—cobweb hung with brightly sparkling dew-drops, but it was unfit for practical use. The honourable member delivered his oration from the bench behind the one on which Sir Robert Peel was sitting, in a sibilant emphatic tone, which did not however much seem to affect the nerves of the Premier.

The dull night of Friday did not pass over without a small "scene," produced by that accomplished gentleman, Mr. Ferrand. Lord Northland, the eldest son of the Earl of Ranfurly, and representative for Dunganon, made a short speech, in which he avowed his intention of supporting Sir Robert Peel, because he had more confidence in him than in Lord John Russell. Now, the story goes (it was originally given on the authority of the Dublin Evening Mail) that at the time of the passing of the Maynooth Act, Lord Northland was caught in the house, as it was going to a division; and being unwilling to vote either for or against the Bill, he hid himself in a small recess, which had been formerly used as a coal-hole; and some mischievous "friend" having observed it, told the Serjeant-at-Arms, and Lord Northland was compelled to come out, and vote. Mr. B. Ferrand, who is invariably distinguished for his lofty sense of public duty, and who reckons the amenities of private life as of little importance when compared with the discharge of his high functions, recalled this circumstance to the recollection of the noble lord, amidst uproarious laughter. "What confidence," he bellowed, "had you in the right honourable baronet, when you were dragged out of the coal-hole to vote for him?"

On Monday the general question was debated in both houses. In the House of Lords, the question of "peculiar burdens" was raised by Lord Beaumont, who moved for a select committee of inquiry. On this occasion, Lord Stanley gave a tolerably distinct intimation that he will oppose the measures of the Government. The Duke of Richmond glorified Lord Stanley, and threw out a coaxing kind of invitation to him to devote his noble intellect to the protection of "native industry." After a discussion, the motion was agreed to, and the committee has been since appointed.

On Monday night, the adjourned debate was resumed by

The Earl of March, eldest son of the Duke of Richmond. This noble lord bids fair to be as sagacious and intelligent a Duke of Richmond as his father, should he succeed to the title. He added nothing whatever to an exhausted debate; and it was, therefore, with pleasure that we noticed, amid the crowd of members contending for the "possession of the house," that Mr. MILNER GIBSON had caught the eye of the SPEAKER. The clear, easy, fluent, and agreeable style of the member for Manchester always secures for him the attention of the house; and on this occasion he received and he repaid attention. His speech was excellent, both in matter and in manner. The great distinction between the advocates of Free Trade and the advocates of protection, during this protracted debate, has been the important fact, that while the one have addressed themselves mainly to the question, the others have indulged mainly in vituperation. Mr. Milner Gibson kept the attention of his auditors to the subject in hand; and the loud, hearty cheers with which he was greeted, showed how welcome was the relief afforded by the speech of an intelligent gentleman, raising up faculties all but laid prostrate by the unconscionable dullness of protection oratory.

After the excellent speech from Mr. Milner Gibson, Sir William Clay, one of the representatives for the Tower Hamlets, discussed four or five of the opinions at issue largely and clearly; and Lord Alfred Churchill read such a speech as the nominee of Woodstock might be expected to read. Mr. Wm. James, member for East Cumberland, also addressed the House, not very unnaturally, in somewhat of a self-laudatory strain, as having been through a long course of years the steady advocate of the measure which was now about to receive the sanction of the House. Lord Harry Vane, too, spoke in favour of the measure. He is the brother of the monopolist Duke of Cleveland. We had also a "maiden" speech from Mr. Halscy, the new member for Hertford, who spoke in a bold strain against the Government; and a similar course was adopted by Mr. Buck, one of the Members for North Devon, though his manner was mild and gentlemanly. But the Government was supported by Mr. Dickinson, one of the Members for West Somersetshire, who frankly avowed that he was a convert to Free Trade principles.

Sir John Tyrrell took the opportunity of coming out, on Monday night, as clown in the pantomime. The Essex baronet is a perfect treasure to the House of Commons. Were it not for the presence of one or two such members, honourable gentlemen would sink under the weight of dullness which seems necessary to legislative discussion. After the human intellect has been puzzled for three or four hours with self-contradictory theories, pelted with statistics, exacerbated with invective, rendered torpid by prose in its very worst form, to see a good dry joker rise to address the House is such happiness as is rarely given to man. Sir John had nothing particular to say about flax, no new light to shed upon any of the disputed articles in the tariff; but he held a little paper in his hand, which, for the moment, was feared might contain some hitherto unknown data about the state of the Essex fens. Nothing of the sort—it was a fragment from the works of a gentleman lately deceased, a reverend divine, a doctor in divinity, the late Dr. Arnold. Although Sir John Tyrrell was aware that honourable gentlemen would not unfrequently smile at observations of his, yet he was sure that the House would lend him their attention while he read to them Dr. Arnold's opinion of the Premier. This was to the effect that the late lamented Dr. Arnold would trust Peel in a question of currency—he had an idea about that, and he was sure that upon that subject he would not unduly yield to popular clamour; but upon any other point—the Church, for instance—he was sure Peel did not care a straw about the matter, and would yield at the first summons. The right honourable baronet, continued the member for Essex, is always talking about his having an eye to posterity, and he was sure that there was but one feeling in the House on this subject, and that was that posterity might have him all to themselves without any further delay.

But the great speech of Monday night was the one delivered by Sir ROBERT PEEL. The First Lord of the Treasury rose about a quarter to ten o'clock, and spoke till near one o'clock—for nearly three hours arresting and enchaining the house by the most emphatic, the most powerful, the most earnest speech which perhaps he ever delivered. The crowning merit was its earnestness. Yet, though impassioned force and truthfulness constituted its main characteristics, it was not devoid of playful assault on his antagonists, and good-humoured railery. It was quite edifying to hear Sir Robert talk with playful scorn about “rousing the British Lion,” “True Blue,” “the Corn Law in all its integrity.” Altogether, he made “minced meat” of those who have charged him with “treason,” “apostacy,” and so forth. First, Mr. Thomas Baring, then Mr. Francis Scott, the member for Roxburghshire, who, as he had been the most furious and polemical, so his turn came among the first—Sir Robert called him Anacharsis Clootz, laughed at his assumption of the office of “Attorney General for the whole human race,” confronted his sentences with each other (and Mr. Scott's sentences cannot stand this test), and trotted him up and down the house, much to the amusement of honourable gentlemen, for some considerable time—“all in good humour,” as Sir Robert said. He certainly appeared in an admirable temper himself, but Mr. Scott, who is of a beligerent and disputatious nature, appeared not quite to relish the joke. Mr. Miles was the next victim to the Premier's jocularities: he had risked an assertion about the cultivation of flax in the parish of Chizzleborough, and had talked about acres being thrown out of cultivation in consequence of the removal of the protecting duty two or three years ago. Sir Robert recalled to his recollection that the duty had been really removed in the year 1824, and that so he must seek some other cause for the agricultural distress which the honourable gentleman had quoted as existing in Chizzleborough. There was something in the sound of the word Chizzleborough which seemed to give the Premier an innocent satisfaction; for he would continue to repeat the word in every possible intonation; and furthermore, a little pleasantry about Mr. Miles taking his stand upon grease. Describing the great grease debate, the First Lord of the Treasury provoked roars of laughter, by exclaiming “Grease you shall not touch—hence, avaunt, 'tis holy ground!” Then there was an onslaught on Mr. Colquhoun. Sir Robert playfully inquired if any hon. gentleman had laboured under the same misfortune as himself, that of having perused Mr. Colquhoun's pamphlet? He gathered from that publication that the honourable gentleman's views were favourable to Free Trade. Now he expressed himself determined to maintain protection; at another time he was for a fixed duty; then he had voted for Mr. Villiers' motion. “How,” inquired the Premier, “can one tell how to hold such a man? There is nothing like consistency in his conduct.”

All this, however, was only the “light artillery” of the speech. Sir Robert Peel had business of too weighty a nature in hand to spend much time on trifles. We, therefore, commend to the patient consideration of our readers a speech which produced an extraordinary effect on the house, as it has since done on the country. The conclusion of it, especially, is all that the most ardent Free Trader can desire; it was delivered with remarkable force; and on sitting down the First Lord of the Treasury was greeted by a burst of cheering as sincere and spontaneous as ever honoured the eloquence of a member of the legislature.

On Tuesday night, the resumption of the adjourned debate was retarded for a short time by a motion which was made by Mr. O'CONNELL, on the impending famine and disease in Ireland. The appearance of Mr. O'Connell, we regret to say, was feeble; he appeared to be labouring under general debility; and his round, full-toned voice, was subdued to an almost inaudible whisper. He confined himself chiefly to statistical documents. Sir James Graham, in reply, described the precautions which the Government are taking, in order to mitigate the effects of the impending calamity; and after a short discussion, Mr. O'Connell withdrew his motion.

Lord John Manners then resumed the adjourned debate. This nobleman has got a little farther in conviction than his brother, the Marquis of Granby, but both are going to give their votes against the Government measure, thereby evincing the animus of the Rutland family. Lord John Manners thinks that the time has come for a settlement of the question; but wishes Parliament to be dissolved previously, so that the “constituencies” may express an opinion. Altogether it was a very strange speech. He neither feared Free Trade, nor hoped much from it; but at present he declines having it. Notwithstanding his amiable character, and his “chivalrous” feelings (though what is meant by that is not very clear) there is a misty, confused, indefinite character about the intellect of Lord John Manners, which would indicate that his politics have been imbibed under some mystic political Dr. Pusey. Whatever amiability there may be about such intellects, there is little in them either of grasp or force.

After a dashing speech from Captain Layard, member for Carlow, in favour of Free Trade, and a long prosy address against it from Mr. Robert Palmer, one of the Berkshire representatives,

Sir Charles Napier rose, and made one of those characteristic speeches, which, from their blunt style, and sailor-like manner, always provoke the merriment of the house. But the gallant commodore spoke much excellent and appropriate common sense. He told the house how he had changed his sword into a ploughshare; and had converted a worthless farm of 40 acres into a profitable one. Agricultural members laughed at his 40 acres; but the commodore told them that what was good for 40 was good for 400. The speech of Sir Charles Napier was a capital contribution to the cause of Free Trade.

Then came Mr. Shaw, Recorder of Dublin, and one of the representatives of its University. He has always been considered not merely a personal friend, but even a toady, of Sir Robert Peel. That he is a disappointed man is a common belief—he has long looked for a higher judicial post. He came out, on Tuesday night, with a bitter attack on Sir Robert Peel, charging him with treason, faithlessness, instability, cowardice, trickery, and all other sins against the “great party.” Then, as if to exhibit the lickspittle spirit of the man, he expressed a hope, in a whining tone, that Sir Robert Peel would still permit him to call him his “right honourable friend!”

Mr. BRIGHT came next, in a speech which was a “blister” to the “great party.” His cordial admiration of the speech of Sir Robert Peel; his taunts of the Protectionists as to their utter inability to form an administration; his appeals to fact—all told upon the House. It was certainly the most powerful speech delivered during this debate, with the single exception of the Prime Minister's.

Mr. Hudson followed Mr. Bright. Never was there a more marked failure. The self-satisfied air—the pompous indication of conscious self-importance; the vulgarity of the style of address, breaking Priscian's head in every sentence; and the ludicrously inconclusive logic, were all in keeping. The House of Commons worships rank and mammon; but the House of Commons is also an admirable school: and however shrewd the “Railway King” may be in companies, gradients, and lines, if he ventures to speak on general topics, he will assuredly find his level in the legislature.

Before the debate was resumed on Thursday night, Mr. Collett, the member for Athlone, called the attention of the house to the open, undisguised influence exercised by the “Dukes”—those of Newcastle, Marlborough, Buckingham, and Richmond—in the boroughs of Newark, Woodstock, Buckingham, and Chichester. He charged the “Dukes” with unconstitutional practices, involving a violation of the rights and privileges of the commons of England: but as he did not bring forward any specific act, merely alleging the notorious belief, it was easy for Sir Robert Peel to show that the house could not act on surmise, and so the motion was withdrawn.

Lord Duncan opened the adjourned debate in a smart speech, in which he told an amusing story of a Warwickshire grazier, who once believed, on the authority of Mr. Miles, that they were building a great ark at New Orleans, in which to carry over a swarm of cattle and pigs—thousands of them—to be landed at Bristol. Having sold his cattle at a loss, by the fear of such an importation, he was lately asked what he thought of the account given by Mr. Miles respecting Tamboff. “Ah!” said he, “I was gammoned by that gentleman afore, but I won't be gammoned again!”

Mr. Alderman Thompson followed; and the reputation which he has acquired for commercial shrewdness, as well as his great wealth, caused his opinions to be watched with some anxiety. It was curious to observe how the earlier feelings of the man, who has ploughed his way from a humble to a high position, were neutralised by his later associations, in the capacity of a landlord. He admitted that he had signed the celebrated petition of the merchants of London in favour of Free Trade; but he has since become a landowner in his native county, Westmoreland, and, also, by favour of the Lonsdale interest, one of its representatives. Therefore, though many parts of Mr. Alderman Thompson's speech might have been spoken in favour of the Government measure, his conclusion was that he must oppose it.

Sir William Molesworth, who, like Lord Morpeth, has now, for the first time, had an opportunity of raising his voice in the present Parliament in support of his old opinions, made an excellent speech, which was closely and almost mathematically reasoned out, in support of Free Trade. This one speech alone, if the closeness and consecutive character of its logic were noticed and felt, would be conclusive of the whole question.

Mr. Benett, the notorious senior member for Wiltshire, made a long prosy speech, marked, however, by an audacity which caused impudence to pass for spirit, and nonsense for agricultural wisdom. He told the house that he had always treated the poor, forlorn, broken-down, starved, and crushed labourers of Wiltshire as his particular “friends!” Nay, more, he admitted that Free Trade would benefit landlords and large farmers, but he opposed it for the sake of the small farmers and the poor labourers! Every quarter of corn imported displaces twenty-five shillings worth of agricultural labour—the real English of this being, that the more means the nation possesses, the poorer it must become.

Mr. Thomas Duncombe made one of his smart speeches, in which, after hitting the agriculturists very hard about their opposition to Sir Robert Peel, he contrived to obtain agricultural cheers, when he began to hit the manufacturers, and to enforce the necessity of securing for the workmen the proposed alteration in the law of settlement, by which industrial residence for five years in a manufacturing town will give a claim to relief.

The only other speech (with the exception of minor orators) was a terrible long one from Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, one of the representatives for Devon, and father of Mr. Thomas Acland, one of the Somersetshire members. The manner of the worthy baronet was very energetic, but his matter was singularly poor; the most forcible argument he exhibited was a stick, with which he belaboured the floor of the house. But there were clear indications in his speech that he only votes against Sir Robert Peel to please his constituents, and that he will not be displeased if the Government measure is carried by a large majority.

THE CORN LAW DEBATE.

Continued from Page 366 of our Supplement.

ADJOURNED DEBATE—THURSDAY

LORD DUNCAN, in resuming the adjourned debate, said he had always been an advocate of Free Trade, and though he had not taken part in the present debate, he was not deterred by any arguments he had heard from the hon. member opposite. Heremembered the prophecies of the hon. member for Somerset (Mr. Miles) in 1842. That hon. gentleman said that New Orleans was situated in a territory spread over 460,000 square miles, and its inhabitants were prepared to pour into this country flour, corn, beasts, and pork. He (Lord Duncan) happened at that time to be in Warwickshire, and he met a gentleman, a friend of his, a great grazier in that county, riding along at a fearful rate (a laugh). He asked his friend why he rode at such a pace? “Oh, I am going to sell my beasts, for Peel and the rest of you have ruined us all (renewed laughter). Have you read,” he continued, “Mr. Miles's speech? He is the great orator that we agriculturists always believe in, and he tells us that 5,500,000 people are building a sort of ark, in which pigs, cattle, and corn are to be brought over to Bristol” (much laughter). Now, I have lately seen my agricultural friend, and have asked him, “Have you not seen what your friend Mr. Miles says of Tamboff?” “Ah,” said he, “I was gammoned before by that gentleman, and I don't mean to be gammoned again” (laughter). Now if the honourable gentleman's former prophecies were not fulfilled, he must excuse him (Lord Duncan) if he trusted more at the present time to the predictions of the right honourable gentleman at the head of the Treasury (cheers). Now, he must refer to the speech of the hon. member for Sunderland. That gentleman of iron nerves was surprised that the Government should be in such a panic. “There are only nine millions starving in Ireland,” said he, “that is nothing, I could get rid of it at once.”

MR. HUDSON said—That is not what I stated (hear, hear, from the protectionists).

LORD DUNCAN—Well, he should quote the honourable gentleman's speech. The honourable gentleman said, “he conceived the repealing of the Corn Laws had nothing to do with the calamity in Ireland (hear, hear, from Mr. Hudson). If the famine which was dreaded occurred in Ireland, he was anxious to alleviate it by public subscription.” He was the more surprised at the honourable gentleman's arguments, as he always looked upon the honourable gentleman as no friend to agriculture from the vigour with which he broke up turnpike roads, and disturbed rural solitude (hear, hear, and a laugh). But the honourable gentleman said he recollected that 1841 was a year of extreme distress in this country, but that in 1842 the state of things was completely changed. And this was owing, he said, to the over-production of corn in this country (hear, hear, and a laugh). The honourable gentleman also told them that he himself had bought foreign corn at 25s. a quarter, though he had not specified where. If that was so, the honourable gentleman was certainly a good political economist, "for he bought in the cheapest and was resolved to sell in the dearest market" (hear, hear, and laughter). Then the honourable gentleman went on to say, "You are not to look to Sussex as a proof of the benefit of protection, where men are working for 8s. a week, but take a special train, and come with me to Yorkshire (where, by the way, the duties on cotton, wool, and silk have been of late years abolished) and I'll show you peace and plenty." This was important testimony, for he never heard a manufacturer, or a friend of manufacturers, get up in that house, and maintain that the poor were better off in their districts than in purely agricultural counties, that it was not attempted to cry him down. (Hear, hear.) All those on his side had a great respect for the name of the honourable gentleman, and they were really anxious not to see it in the provisional committee of the Great Bubble Protection Society. (Laughter.) He confessed, that as a landlord he had no objection to high rents; but he thought it most lowering to the class who received them, that they should be raised by artificial means. [The noble lord then went over the history of the different Corn Law measures, which had been repeated over and over again in this debate, and referred to the speech of Mr Robinson on the bill of 1815.] It was, in his opinion, a mean, base, and paltry principle to tax the people in their food, that the aristocracy might receive a larger sum for their produce. That aristocracy had been accustomed to lead, not to follow. He hoped they would continue to direct, but not to coerce public opinion (hear, hear). Should the natural leaders of the people hold back when the whole country was preparing for foreign competition? The landlords and tenants in that part of the country in which he was born were acting very differently from those in Somerset. They were already buckling on their armour for competition with the foreigner, and were little afraid of him as to the growth of corn, hemp, or flax. There was an exclusive burden on land, which he was surprised he had heard nothing of in that debate—he meant education. The Prussian and Scotch farmer could educate his son at a cheap rate. The English farmer had not a practical school to send him to (hear, hear). He stood there to-day to act up to the pledges which he had given on the hustings. He then said he should vote for any measure he thought beneficial to the country; and believing that the right hon. gentleman's measure was a measure intended for the benefit of trade, and of the commercial and working classes, and believing also that their interests could not be promoted without advancing those of the class to which he had the honour to belong he gave it an humble but an honest support (cheers).

Mr. Alderman THOMPSON contended that it was a delusion to maintain that wages could be maintained at their present rate if the price of food were diminished, as the advocates of the repeal of the Corn Laws maintained that it would be by that measure. Sir Robert Peel had proposed his present changes in our commercial policy, because they would improve the moral and social condition of the labouring classes; but he was convinced that if those changes injured agriculture, as he was certain that they would do, they would turn the scale of national comfort and prosperity quite the other way. If a Free Trade in corn were made the law of the land, further changes must follow, and amongst the earliest must be the abrogation of our colonial system, and the repeal of the navigation laws. For one, he could not consent to go along with such extreme measures. What statesman, even in Europe or America, had ever advocated perfect Free Trade?

Sir R. PEELE.—The merchants of London advocated it in their petition in 1820, which you signed.

Mr. Alderman THOMPSON admitted that he had signed it, but he had not been speaking of merchants, but of statesmen with enlightened minds. Mr. Webster, the most eloquent man in America, had denounced it, no longer than November last, as an impracticable scheme of commerce, which must be ruinous to all engaged in it. Replying to Sir R. Peel's question on a former night, he observed that he was not disposed either to retrograde or to stand still on the road of commercial relaxation. On the contrary, he was prepared to go forward, but not on the road on which Sir R. Peel was advancing. Instead of reducing the duty on corn, he recommended the Government to reduce the duties on tea to 6d. a lb., and to lessen materially the duties on soap and tobacco. By such a measure he would confer the greatest boon on the labouring classes. In conclusion, he expressed his regret that a sense of duty should compel him to differ on this question from the political leader whom he had hitherto followed with pride during the whole course of his political life.

Sir W. MOLESWORTH: I will not trespass upon your patience, sir, by discussing the general principles of Free Trade. I will content myself with replying to some objections which have been urged against this measure by honourable gentlemen opposite. They have repeatedly asserted that it would be injurious to the labouring classes, that Free Trade would cause low prices, and that low prices would be followed by low wages. The right honourable baronet, on the first of the session, stated his conviction that there was no connection between low prices and low wages. He has been repeatedly and violently assailed both for this opinion, and for having arrived at such a conclusion from an experience of only three years. I think, however, if it were necessary, it would be easy to confirm that position by a much wider experience. Just before the dissolution of the last Parliament, I gave notice of a motion for a committee to inquire if any connection could be traced between the amount of the wages of labour and the price of food. If I had been able to bring that motion before the house, I think I could have shown, from a series of Parliamentary returns embracing a period of more than 30 years, that there was no connection between high wages and high prices, and low wages and low prices; on the contrary, it appeared to me, from a careful examination of those returns, that generally speaking the wages of labour, especially of manufacturing and skilled labour, were higher when the price of food was low, than they were when the price of food was high. And the reason appeared to me to be this. When the price of food is low, the labouring classes, and they form the great bulk of the community, can expend a larger portion of their earnings on the purchase of articles of clothing, dress, and other the staple manufactures of the country. Consequently, when food is cheap, there is a greater demand for those articles, and a greater trade in them. There is therefore increased activity amongst the manufacturers, increased employment for their workmen, and as a necessary consequence, the wages of labour, especially of manufacturing and skilled labour, tend to rise. On the other hand, when food is dear, as the labouring classes must first and before all things obtain the means of subsistence, they are compelled to expend a greater portion of their earnings on the purchase of food, consequently they are compelled to diminish their consumption of articles of clothing, dress, and manufacture. There is therefore a diminution in the demand for those articles, stocks of them accumulate in the hands of the dealers, trade becomes dull and stagnant, the manufacturers employ fewer workmen, and, as a necessary consequence, the wages of labour, especially of manufacturing and skilled labour, tend to fall. Thus, reason and experience show not only that there is no connection between high prices and high wages, and low prices and low wages, but that, generally speaking, the wages of labour are higher when food is cheap than when it is dear. In fact, the amount of the wages of labour depends upon the relation which exists between the supply of labour and the means of employing it. If there be no alteration in the supply of labour, wages rise or fall according as there is more or less employment for labour. Now, the means of employing labour are in proportion to the capital of a country, to the extent of its trade, commerce, manufactures, and other industrial operations of its inhabitants. But it can hardly be doubted that Free Trade would augment the commerce, manufactures, and capital of this country. It follows, therefore, that with Free Trade the means of employing labour would increase, the wages of labour would rise, and the condition of the labouring class would be improved (hear, hear). Some hon. members are apprehensive lest a large number of agricultural labourers should be thrown out of employment by a repeal of the Corn Laws. It cannot be denied that if the repeal of the Corn Laws were to produce a panic amongst the agricultural classes, that if in consequence of that panic a large quantity of land were thrown out of cultivation, there would be a diminution in the demand for labour for agricultural purposes. Now this might prove, under other circumstances than the present ones, a serious though temporary evil. Fortunately, however, if the Corn Laws were immediately repealed, there are causes at work which would fully counteract the effects of any such panic. The railroads which are now making, or about to be made, will create a great demand for that very description of labour which it is supposed the repeal of the Corn Laws would throw out of employment, and long before those railroads are completed the apprehensions of the agricultural classes would be dispelled. As far, therefore, as the agricultural labourer is concerned, it would be difficult to find a better opportunity than the present one for repealing the Corn Laws (hear, hear). Most of the honourable gentlemen who have spoken against this measure, have expressed their opinion that the repeal of the Corn Laws would chiefly affect the tenant, and not the landlord. I cannot agree with them. It appears to me that if Free Trade makes any alteration in the value of land, or of agricultural produce, the chief gainer, or the chief loser, must be the landed proprietor. The honourable gentlemen possess landed property. They have let estates. What, I ask them, does a farmer do before he offers to take an estate? Why, he considers the nature of the soil, the vicinity of the estate to markets, and the general value of agricultural produce, and, according to these particulars, he offers a greater or less rent for the estate. The landlord or his agent does precisely the same thing: he takes into account precisely the same particulars, and demands a rent accordingly. Thus a bargain is struck between landlord and tenant for a definite or indefinite number of years (hear, hear). Now, suppose any event occurs which alters the value of the estate, as, for instance, if its fertility be improved by drainage or other means, if it be rendered more accessible to markets by new roads or railways, or if the general value of agricultural produce be altered by legislative enactments, or other causes, then, at the expiration of the period for which the original bargain was made, either the landlord demands a higher rent, or the tenant offers a lower one, according to the circumstances of the case. Thus a new bargain is struck, in which the landlord generally takes good care to obtain the full value of his estate, and the tenant is equally cautious not to offer more than that value. Thus it appears to me certain that if Free Trade diminish the value of land, rents will fall; if, on the contrary, as I expect and believe, Free Trade will increase the value of land, then we shall have the pleasant task of raising our rents: in either case, it will be the landlord, not the tenant, who will ultimately lose or gain (hear). In one point of view, however, the farmer will be a gainer by a repeal of the Corn Laws; for a repeal of the Corn Laws will be a final settlement of the corn question. During the last half century there have been I know not how many Corn Laws, with the professed object of regulating the price of corn. Now I may assert, without fear of contradiction, that under each Corn Law the price of corn has been much less than was calculated upon or intended by the framers of those laws. If farmers, therefore, acted upon these expectations of higher price in their bargains, with their landlords, they must have been repeatedly and grievously disappointed. A repeal of the Corn Laws will dispel all doubt and anxiety on the subject. The farmer will soon know what he is about, and what bargain he ought to make with his landlord (hear). I must acknowledge, however, that these observations chiefly apply to those farmers who possess sufficient capital and skill to cultivate their estates in the best manner; for only such farmers are really independent, and can make an equal bargain with their landlords. There is, however, another class of farmers, who possess little capital and less skill, the tenants of small estates, which they cultivate in the worst possible manner, many of which estates have been in the same family for successive generations; of this class of farmers the hon. gentleman the member for North Northamptonshire gave a pathetic description the other evening. He portrayed in forcible terms their impending ruin, and attributed that ruin to the Free Trade measures of the right honourable baronet. It cannot be denied that the class of farmers in question will cease to exist. In many parts of England, especially in the west, with which I am well acquainted, they work harder and fare worse than the agricultural labourer. It is a mistake, however, on the part of the honourable gentleman to attribute their present condition or future fate to Free Trade. Whether the Corn Law be repealed, or its provisions be rendered more stringent, their doom is inevitable. What is the cause of it? I answer, it is their want of capital and of skill. It has been discovered that in agriculture, as in every other branch of industry, by the combination of capital and skill, production can be carried on more cheaply and profitably than in any other manner. Of late years agriculture has ceased to be a mere empiric routine: it has become an art founded upon chemistry, vegetable physiology, and other kindred sciences. For the successful cultivation of this art, much capital and skill are required (hear, hear, hear). By these means the agricultural produce of certain portions of England has been greatly augmented, and the produce of the remainder might be equally increased. Indeed, it appears to me that some of the honourable gentlemen opposite have scarcely been guilty of exaggeration when they asserted that if the whole of England were cultivated in the best manner, we might raise an amount of food sufficient for a larger population than the present one, and at as low a price as it can be imported (hear, and cheers). But to do this, the land must be cultivated by farmers who possess sufficient capital and skill. And what, then, would be the fate of the small farmers without capital or skill? Sir, the large farmer, with abundant capital, and acquainted with the best methods of agriculture, can produce more cheaply, can afford to pay a higher rent, and at the same time can obtain a better profit than the small farmer without capital. The former can and does undersell the latter in the market. He cat and does outbid him with the landlord, and he prospers, whilst the condition of the other daily becomes worse and worse. In proportion; therefore, as agriculture improves, in proportion as more capital and more skill are required in the cultivation of the soil, the doom of the small farmers, who have neither capital nor skill, becomes more and more certain, more and more imminent (hear, hear). They are the hand-loom weavers of agriculture, and their fate is the necessary consequence of the competition between capital and skill on the one hand, poverty and ignorance on the other. We may sincerely deplore the sufferings of the individuals, but neither as individuals nor as legislators can we prevent the result (hear, hear). For in order to prevent it we should have to stop the accumulation of capital, to check the advancement of knowledge, and stem back the tide of human progress. Though most of the honourable gentlemen who have spoken from the opposite side have declared their belief that the repeal of the Corn Laws is only a farmer's question, yet I know that many who sit on that side of the house firmly believe that Free Trade will diminish the value of land, and that the landowners of England will be ruined. As an owner of land, and of no other description of property, I do not entertain any such apprehensions (hear). For some years the principles of Free Trade have evidently been gaining ground, and every year the repeal of the Corn Laws has become more and more probable; yet has the value of land decreased in this country? Certainly not. Land sells better now, and for a greater number of years' purchase than it ever did before (hear, hear). Upon what, I ask, does the value of the land of a country depend? It does not depend entirely, or even mainly, upon its fertility; for in some places a few acres of inferior soil are much more valuable, and fetch a higher price in the market than thousands of acres of the richest soil in other places (hear). The value of land depends mainly upon the wealth and numbers of the surrounding population, and upon its vicinity to good markets. Now, when I reflect on the enormous population, the vast trade, and the great wealth of this country—when I calculate the stimulus which will be given to population, the additions made to commerce and wealth, by a system of Free Trade;—when, on the other hand, I consider the narrow extent of the land of England, and the increasing demand for it which must arise from any increase of wealth and population. I laugh at the notion that the landlords of England can be permanently injured by a repeal of the Corn Laws (cheers). It is my firm belief that the value of our lands is augmenting, and will augment, and I contend that we owe that augmentation to the accumulation of the manufacturing and commercial classes (hear, hear). For example, a great revolution seems to be about to take place in our means of internal communication. If this country continue prosperous—if commerce and manufactures thrive, before long England will be covered with railroads—railways will exist between every town of any importance, and extend into every district possessing either mineral or agricultural wealth. Great Britain will become like one vast city, our remotest agricultural districts will be brought, as it were, into the vicinity of the metropolis, and a few hours will convey their productions, their corn and cattle uninjured, to the best markets of the world. To whom shall we be indebted for these railroads, which in many cases will double the value of our land? Not to the capital of the landowner, but to the accumulations of the commercial and manufacturing classes (cheering). More than any other set of men the landowners of England are interested in fostering the commerce, augmenting the wealth, and increasing the population of this country; for, in proportion to that commerce, wealth, and population, will be the demand for our land, and in proportion to that demand will be its value in the market, and we shall be rich. Therefore, sir, if I were not actuated by noble or better motives, self-interest alone would induce me, as a landowner, to give my cordial support to the measures of the right hon. baronet (much cheering).

Mr. BENETT had never changed his opinion respecting the propriety of standing by the principle of protection, but admitted that he had moderated it with respect to the amount of protection to be afforded. He controverted the theory that cheap food would not produce cheap wages, and declared that the meetings at Goutiere and Bremhill were not meetings of agricultural labourers, but were got up, and addressed by paid emissaries of the League. He opposed the present measure for the sake of the labourer and the little farmer. He opposed it also on account of the landowner, as it would lead to a large confiscation of their property. Sir Robert Peel's bill for the resumption of cash payments had almost destroyed the landed interest. It was just beginning to recover from that wound, when Sir Robert Peel came forward with his present bill to strike it another blow almost as mortal.

Mr. HENRY BERKELEY said: I might have been unwilling to obtrude myself upon the house in this protracted debate had it not been for the very prominent position in which my honourable colleague has placed himself by moving the amendment. I find myself called upon to make some remarks on the subject, and I intend to confine myself as much as possible to the line of argument adopted by my honourable colleague. My honourable colleague has thrust himself into the front of the protectionist army. Whether he has achieved this greatness willingly, or it is greatness thrust upon him, we have no right to inquire; but there I find him pleading the cause of protection sternly and stiffly. My honourable colleague argues, "There was no special necessity for the measure." My honourable colleague observes, "Even the honourable member for Wolverhampton must be astonished at the miraculous conversion of some of his new coadjutors, who were now prepared to substitute for their own the opinions of the member for Stockport;" and my honourable colleague winds up his determined protectionist speech in these words:—"He believed that he was acting for the benefit of the country and the colonies also by advocating protection for every branch of British industry." Now, sir, the astonishment my honourable colleague evinces for the conduct of others may be somewhat abated if my honourable colleague will only take trouble to scan his own. On Monday, the 9th, my honourable colleague made the speech, from which I have quoted extracts; and on Tuesday, the 10th, having been asked by a most respectable constituent to support the prayer of a petition, signed by 18,000 of his constituents, approving of the ministerial plan, but preferring immediate abolition, my hon. colleague—ever having voted against the annual motion of my hon. friend the member for Wolverhampton—ever having been a sturdy protectionist—having on the 9th made a protection speech, thus writes on the 10th:—

"London, Feb. 10, 1846.

"Dear Sir—I received your letter this morning, and regret that I cannot give my vote in favour of the immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, as I am opposed to the measure introduced by Sir Robert Peel, when considered as a whole; but though I cannot give my vote in favour of the immediate repeal, I do not hesitate to say that I think that it would be better for all parties that the repeal should be immediate; and, entertaining this view of the question, if the motion should be made, I shall not oppose it.

"My speech of last night will, I hope, sufficiently explain to you my reasons for not being able to come round to a sudden change of opinions.

"Believe me, dear sir, yours truly,
G. Thomas, Esq. PHILIP W. S. MILES."

Now this is consistency with a vengeance (hear, hear). Why, if the honourable member for Wolverhampton be astonished at the conversion of any one, he may well be astonished at the conversion of the member for Bristol (hear, hear, hear). Has the proposition of the right honourable baronet to deal with the Corn Laws had the wonderful effect of disarming the honourable member's objection to total abolition (cheers)? But, no, he will not now oppose the instant abolition of the Corn Laws. Then, if not, why not (hear, hear)? Because the right honourable baronet has brought forward a scheme for a sort of modified abolition of the Corn Laws; can that be a pretence for the hon. member for Bristol giving up all defence for protection? and how are we to reconcile his speech of the 9th with his letter of the 10th (hear, hear, hear)? Really, when gentlemen opposite talk of inconsistency, it would be better to remove the mote from their own eye before they look after the beam in the eye of their neighbour (cheers); and I would just ask my hon. colleague if the Conservatives of Bristol are inclined to be hypercritical, whether they might not think that his determined opposition to his own political leader might savour of faction, coupled as it is with the surrender of his opinions to those of a political opponent (cheers)? I now turn to that great commercial city, which we have unitedly the honour to represent, and I tell my hon. colleague that he does not speak the opinions of the majority of the inhabitants of the city and county of Bristol (cheers), nor of the constituency, nor of that portion of the constituency which sent him to Parliament (cheers). I believe most decidedly this to be the case. The petition which I presented contains 18,000 signatures, and those the signatures of Conservatives equally with Liberals (cheers). Now, if my hon. colleague spoke more than his opinion, if he claims the weight which a member deserves who speaks the voice of a powerful constituency, where were his petitions? Not a single one did he or could he produce (cheers). The opinions of the hon. member on this question are the opinions of a mere clique (hear, hear). Bristol has suffered too much from the principle of monopoly not to feel disgust at the very name (cheers). Monopoly has been the evil genius of the city (hear, hear). Whatever strength protectionists may have in other parts of England, it exists not in Bristol (hear, hear). I have heard loud boasts from hon. gentlemen opposite of an appeal to the people. An appeal to Bristol, I most decidedly believe, would prove that the constituency fully recognise the principles of Free Trade (cheers); and I fear my hon. friend would find that his supporters in that city would not sanction a secession on his part from her Majesty's present minister (hear, hear). In short, since my hon. colleague cannot understand the signs of the times—cannot read the writing on the wall, the people of Bristol will read it for him. They will discriminate between obstinacy and consistency; and if my hon. colleague stands still, his constituency will follow the right hon. baronet in his onward course. And why should they not feel and yield to the pressure of the times, and following the example of the two first statesmen of the age, give up foregone conclusions—abjure bygone errors—and uniting heart and hand, do that tardy justice to their country, the necessity for which has forced itself on their reason (cheers)?

Mr. JOHN TOLLEMACHE, in expressing his determination to vote against the Free Trade scheme of ministers, took occasion to declare that the Anti-Corn Law League owed all its importance to their feeble and vacillating policy.

